Translators John Canti and Wulstan Fletcher of the Padmakara Translation Group were awarded the 2016 Khyentse Foundation Fellowship, for their service to the Buddhadharma:

<http://khyentsefoundation.org/2016/01/2016fellows/>

An interview with the fellows:

<http://khyentsefoundation.org/2016/01/conversation-with-2016-khyentse-fellows/>

Malcolm wrote:

Nice fellows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 21st, 2016 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Three things that help me get the feel of emptiness:

No matter how much I think/feel that something exists "from its own side" ... all I'm really doing is assigning a symbolic name to a nameless phenomenon.

No-thing is as it seems.

All we can ever see/know is phenomena; the noumena that "give birth" to these phenomena (in our minds) are forever beyond our seeing/knowing.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no noumena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 21st, 2016 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You can read the Agama citations which detail the non-afflictive ignorance of arhats and pratyekabuddhas in the Abhidharmakośaṭīkālakṣaṇānusāriṇ, etc.

Astus said:

Such a category can be used to exploit otherwise ordinary stories and claim that arhats are not that perfect. At the same time, similar events in the Buddha's biography can be found as well, but those are explained in a very different light.

But still the source of such ignorance is not explained. Or maybe it's the expectation of fantastic omniscience - beyond what logically can come from clear seeing of appearances - of a buddha that would need to be established. Otherwise, such stories can only fall into the category of parables.

Malcolm wrote:

Uhuh. So basically what you are saying is that if a source does not fit your preconceptions, it is a "parable" and does not conform to your notions of what is "logical."

Glad you have placed it on such a subjective basis.

In short, omniscience is not required for arhatship, indeed, none of the five mundane abhijñās are required. All that is required is that through seeing phenomena through the lens of the four noble truths, one relinquishes all ten fetters. That's all. In the Hināyāna teachings, only a buddha does this in one session, without a teacher to guide them. Arhats have a teacher to guide them, and generally gradually so. However, the same Hināyāna sources note there are severe restrictions on the knowledge of arhats like Maudgalyāyana which do not apply to a buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I do not believe in birth and death

Malcolm wrote:

It happens to you whether you believe in it or not.

jundo cohen said:

Yes, I agree, Remove the mind created delusion and, like a house of cards, karma, affliction, birth and death and all the rest come tumbling down.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is, seeing into the delusion of birth and death does not mean that birth and death stops for everyone. It only stops for you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Techno Yogi said:

Posters on Dharma Wheel may find the following resources to be helpful:

<http://www.budsas.org/ebud/ebdha126.htm> " by Ven. W. Rahula - this article explains the difference between a sect and a vehicle.

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty much a Theravada take on the bodhisattva path. It should be pointed out that there are serious differences between the bodhisattva taught by the Buddha in Mahāyāna, and the bodhisattva path which is described by commentators in Theravada.

Techno Yogi said:

" <https://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/pdf/5-personen/analayo/hinayana.pdf> " by Ven. Analayo - this essay explores why it is anachronistic and incorrect to refer to Theravada as "Hinayana".

Malcolm wrote:

This essay depends on acceptance of the idea that there was no Mahāyāna at the time the Buddha was teaching in India. However, as we know, Maitreyanatha states in the Sūtra-alaṃkara that "Mahāyāna arose at the same time," meaning that Buddha taught Mahāyāna during the Early Buddhist period. Not only this, Agamic teachings are explicitly referred to in the Samdhinirmocana sūtra as the first turning of the wheel teachings, where as Mahāyāna teachings are referred to second and third turnings. Thus means that from a Mahāyāna point of view, Mahāyāna teachings existed during the early Buddhist period.

Techno Yogi said:

<http://dhammadwheel.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=10503&hilit=tantric+theravada> - a series of links exploring the reality of Theravada Buddhist practice in Asia, which incorporates a significant amount of mantra, visualization, energy work, and outright magic.

Malcolm wrote:

While indeed Vajrayāna was once practiced in all countries that are presently considered Theravadin, and even by people who were self-described Theravadins, what is described in these links is not Mantrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Neither arhats nor pratyekabuddhas are completely free from ignorance, only a buddha is

Astus said:

I meant in the Agamas, an arhat is completely free from ignorance, otherwise he would still be stuck in samsara. Of course, in a one vehicle approach, only a buddha is truly wise and free.

Arhats have ignorance, and this means they possess the knowledge obscuration. What are they ignorant of? Knowledge obscuration means being bound by the view of grasper and grasped, the concepts of agent, object, and action. They are free from clinging to the five aggregates and the six sensory areas, so there is nobody to grasp anything. What is left then to be obscured by?

Malcolm wrote:

You can read the Agama citations which detail the non-afflictive ignorance of arhats and pratyekabuddhas in the Abhidharmakośaṭīkālakṣaṇānusāriṇ, etc. As an example, in the discussion of the nonafflictive ignorance which both śrāvaka arhats and pratyekabuddhas possess, the Buddha states in one passage:

All of the causes in a single peacock feather is not an object of knowledge for the one who is not omniscient, but that can be known through the power of omniscience.

Other examples include Śariputra rejecting a candidate for ordination that Buddha later deemed suitable, and so on. These commentaries on the Kośha provide examples extracted from the Agamas which display the non-afflictive ignorance of arhats and pratyekabuddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 9:34 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Astus said:

A stream-enterer is not yet free from ignorance, only an arhat is.

Malcolm wrote:

Neither arhats nor pratyekabuddhas are completely free from ignorance, only a buddha is,

As the Agamas teach freedom from appearances, and that means no obscurations, it is no different from realising buddha-nature.

This is your own fabrication. Arhats have ignorance, and this means they possess the knowledge obscuration.

BTW, when the Buddha says this or that is not realized by śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not realize this or that, "śrāvaka" here means śrāvaka arhats,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Belief"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth is a product of delusion and ignorance in all Buddha's teachings. This is why the first link of the twelve fold chain of dependent origination is ignorance. The point is that as long as one is under the power of delusion and ignorance, for that long one will take rebirth.

jundo cohen said:

That is why I am hoping you put all that ignorance down soon. This rebirth is of your own mental making!

Malcolm wrote:

Everything is made by mind, Jundo. This is why your active disbelief in rebirth is a little puzzling.

jundo cohen said:

We all have dualistic thinking, Jundo. Yours just happens to be grounded in a fundamental disbelief in the Buddha's core teachings (dependent origination, karma, rebirth, four kinds of realized persons, etc.).

I believe in all that! Just perhaps not as you do, and by seeing through the self-created dualisms that brings the shadows to life.

Malcolm wrote:

You believe in none of it. Do you know why the Buddha taught dependent origination, his motivation? It was to prevent people from asking him who they were in their past lives. So he said instead, based on affliction in a given continuum, there is karma, based on karma there is birth, if affliction is not eliminated, one will engage in karma, and if one engages in karma, suffering will result for that continuum until the end of time.

You believe that when you die, the terminus point of your mind is when your brain is dead. The Buddha described such a point of view as annihilationism (ucchedavāda). You see, there were whole schools of people in iron-age India, not followers of the Buddha, who hold your modern twentieth century belief that when the body dies, the mind dies with it.

All authentic Dharma teachings from Theravada to Dzogchen teach that based on affliction in a given continuum, there is karma, based on karma there is birth; if affliction is not eliminated, one will engage in karma, and if one engages in karma, suffering will result for that continuum until the end of time. The difference between all these schools, from Theravada to Dzogchen lay in the details of how this problem is approached and resolved, not in the essential problem itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Astus said:

it seems logical to me that the full knowledge of one requires the other two as well.

Malcolm wrote:

But it is not the case. For example, even Maudgalyāna needed to ask the Buddha where his mother had taken rebirth.

Astus said:

So for you, arhats, first stage bodhisattvas, buddhas and pratyekabuddhas all demonstrate precisely the same qualities and realization. If not, why not?

Yes, from the wisdom side of things that's exactly what should happen.

Malcolm wrote:

But again, it isn't the case. Why? Because if it were the case, then even hinayāna stream entrants should have the same realization as a buddha, but they do not.

Astus said:

It is possible to keep buddha-nature with a one-vehicle explanation, where every level is only a stage on the path to buddhahood. And in order to explain the historical problem raised here by many, it can be said that while the Agamas are not at fault or lacking, the way they were interpreted by some is incorrect, thus we see that Mahayana apologetics are against Abhidharmic ideas primarily. Similarly, in Tibetan Buddhism they find the sutra teachings somewhat deficient as they actually view them through a number of treatises (while, for instance in some Mahamudra works quoting sutras that match with the highest teaching is fine).

Malcolm wrote:

Or, the Agamas, as Nāgārjuna says very clearly, do not teach the path to Buddhahood, let alone buddhanature (which itself can only be seen by buddhas).

Mahāyāna sūtras provide details on a path that are not detailed in the Agamas. If they were detailed, the Mahāyāna sūtras would be unnecessary, not to mention the tantras and the Dzogchen tantras, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Second, I happen to believe that he probably --did-- teach that as a man of Iron Age

India, but that Buddha also taught (in Mahayana interpretation) that rebirth is a mind created nightmare that sentient beings need to see through. So, he also taught that rebirth is the product of delusion and ignorance.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth is a product of delusion and ignorance in all Buddha's teachings. This is why the first link of the twelve fold chain of dependent origination is ignorance. The point is that as long as one is under the power of delusion and ignorance, for that long one will take rebirth.

The fact that Buddha lived 2500 years ago is irrelevant.

jundo cohen said:

It may exist for you, Malcolm, because you believe in it and that you will be reborn, a product of your own dualistic thinking that you need to pierce.

Malcolm wrote:

We all have dualistic thinking, Jundo. Yours just happens to be grounded in a fundamental disbelief in the Buddha's core teachings (dependent origination, karma, rebirth, four kinds of realized persons, etc.).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Yes, I also believe that you suffer an "utter lack of understanding of the Buddha's teachings"...

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that the Buddha really did teach rebirth in samsara as the principle existential problem that sentient beings face, and I happen to agree with him. You don't. Thus, the main difference between us is that I support Buddha's core teachings, you don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 20th, 2016 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Agamas/nikāyas teach leading a path of freedom, but not a path leading freedom and omniscience, the latter is found only in Mahāyāna.

Astus said:

Omniscience is not an attribute of the Buddha in the Agamas.

Malcolm wrote:

While this is not actually the case (that omniscience is not an attribute of the Buddha in the agamas), nevertheless, you are agreeing to the basic premise, i.e. that a path leading to omniscience is not found in the agamas.

Astus said:

As for Mahayana, omniscience is really just the prajnaparamita, not abiding in any dharma whatsoever.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not all omniscience is for Mahāyāna. There are two kinds of omniscience a buddha possesses: the omniscience of just how things are and the omniscience of all things that there are.

Astus said:

Furthermore, buddha-nature is completely revealed once there is no grasping at illusory appearances, and all possible buddha-qualities manifest. Since the Agamas teach not relying on any dharma, that should also mean the accomplishment of all attributes of perfect enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

So for you, arhats, first stage bodhisattvas, buddhas and pratyekabuddhas all demonstrate precisely the same qualities and realization. If not, why not?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Buddhist scholars or worldly scholars?

Malcolm wrote:

Classical scholars. But there is no consensus among them on this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course they can, since they are a movement spread among several lineages, not just one, and they too base their ideas on statements uttered by the Buddha.

Not only do they take refuge in the Buddha, but they engage in the three trainings, śīla, samadhi, and prajñā.

Mother's Lap said:

So note no.225 isn't correct then?

<https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=LPMRr-V9BFQC&lpg=PP1&pg=PA402#v=onepage&q&f=false>

Malcolm wrote:

The note is accurate, some scholars have this opinion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The terms Hinayāna, or Śrāvakyāna, are umbrella terms covering all kinds of points of view, from Pudgalavāda to Theravada.

Mother's Lap said:

Can Pudgalavada even be called shravakayana? Wouldn't they be "Buddhist by refuge" at best?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course they can, since they are a movement spread among several lineages, not just one, and they too base their ideas on statements uttered by the Buddha.

Not only do they take refuge in the Buddha, but they engage in the three trainings, śīla, samadhi, and prajñā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: Stephen Batchelor - A Critique of "Buddhism Without Beliefs"

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Many folks in the Buddhist world (perhaps!!!) become upset with Batchelor because they see such beliefs as central and fundamental to Buddhism and their own personal beliefs. The reaction of many in the Buddhist world to such skepticism or denial is much the same as denying that the Bible is the literal word of God for some Christians. It is no surprise that folks get upset when their closely held religious beliefs are challenged.

Malcolm wrote:

No, no one is upset when people like you and Batchelor present your physicalist rejections of rebirth. Instead, we are saddened by your utter lack of understanding of the Buddha's teachings and in it, the central role of escaping rebirth.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Saving all beings

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

What does "saving all beings" actually mean to you, in terms we can all understand where we are now?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a virtuous aspiration, that is all. For example, the question is posed in by Shantideva, "How did the Bodhisattva perfect generosity without satisfying all sentient beings' needs and wants?" The answer Shantideva provides is that while the Bodhisattva did not have the capacity to satisfy all sentient beings' needs and wants, he sincerely wished to. It is developing that spirit of generosity that perfects generosity, not whether one actually has anything to give.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

TRC said:

I know you were quoting CTR Simon, but the points still stand. In fact your erroneous first statement is all founded on a self-view too as well as clinging to rights and rituals. These would no longer arise at stream entry.

I notice Dan was making pretty much the same points as I was writing my reply.

I have to add these are typical misrepresentations of the path expounded in early Buddhism. On these gross misunderstandings (most typical in Vajrayana) the Mahayana can't be trusted to define what Theravada is.

Malcolm wrote:

The terms Hinayāna, or Śrāvakyāna, are umbrella terms covering all kinds of points of view, from Pudgalavāda to Theravada. There are many tenets which belong to various Hinayāna schools. For example, Nāgārjuna negates the Theravadin theory of karma in the MMK.

It is not the case that Hinayāna is some monolithic entity when it comes to tenets. However, it is monolithic with respect to its goals, arhatship as opposed to buddhahood.

Why? It conceives of buddhahood as being merely a special kind of arhatship, attained by special kind of person, a bodhisattva, who hasn't even an inkling of awakening until his final birth in which he attains buddhahood. A buddha must be a "he," since in all Śrāvakayāna schools there is no chance that a women can become a buddha, even though she can become an arhat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Is it? In Dhammapada, the Buddha says: Just as a bubble may be seen, just as a faint mirage, so should the world be viewed

Astus said:

If we analyse a bit deeper than just repeating over and over the same things
(<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kQFKtl6gn9Y>) of superior or not, then it can be clear that on the wisdom side of things the Agamas teach the same complete freedom as any Mahayana or Vajrayana path (see <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=19609> and <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=21768>). However, it should also be recognised that the bodhisattva path is more extensive when it comes to other aspects, particularly the ability to teach beings, as that's the main quality a buddha has to possess. And when I say extensive, it doesn't mean one cannot find those qualities in arhats, but they are not requirements.

Malcolm wrote:

The Agamas/nikāyas teach a path leading to freedom, but not a path leading to freedom and omniscience, the latter is found only in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 6:23 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

and how did he describe what it was like?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, in his Vajra Tantra and many other places.

gad rgyangs said:

and he said....?

Malcolm wrote:

You can read these things for yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

and how did he describe what it was like?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, in his Vajra Tantra and many other places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I think you may have missed the memo. There's a fifth vision now.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is a Bonpo thing where they split up one of the four visions into two parts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As for producing someone who claims to have done so, I can point to the late Kunzang Dechen Lingpa, who indeed claimed to have experienced the fruit of the Mahāyāna path in his lifetime.

gad rgyangs said:

He actually claimed to be a fully awakened Buddha? I thought Maitreya was going to be the next one.

Malcolm wrote:

He reached the end of the fourth vision. That is buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Simon E. said:

They might even get to #3 Malcolm before feeling too unsettled .

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, you mean this one:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=2916&p=30739#p30739>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Astus said:

That is actually what accepting on faith is: trusting in what others say without gaining an understanding on one's own.

SpinyNorman said:

But that only goes so far. Sooner or later there is a need to develop personal confidence through experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and the fastest way to do that is to practice Dzogchen. Everything else is much slower and far more indirect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Dan74 said:

If Malcolm came to ZFI and offered his view on things...

Malcolm wrote:

...people would freak out.

Simon E. said:

For some reason this set my mind imagining Malcolm on 'New Buddhist '....

Malcolm wrote:

They can come here and read my 16K + posts, and revel in the inconsistent glory that I have become.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not circular reasoning, any more is it circular reasoning to accept a car functions on the basis of its definitions.

gad rgyangs said:

the existence of a car is demonstrated by getting in one and driving, which we have done. Neither you nor I have experienced ourselves as a Buddha, nor can you produce anyone who claims to have done so. Otherwise just because you define a unicorn as a horse with one horn doesn't mean that they exist.

Johnny Dangerous said:

If you cannot accept the premise that Buddhas arise and teach, what value are Buddhist teachings to you, and why?

Malcolm wrote:

This is just what Dante does between guitar lessons, just as this is what I do between pecha pages. It is serious on the one hand, but not so serious on the other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not circular reasoning, any more is it circular reasoning to accept a car functions on the basis of its definitions.

gad rgyangs said:

the existence of a car is demonstrated by getting in one and driving, which we have done. Neither you nor I have experienced ourselves as a Buddha, nor can you produce anyone who claims to have done so.

Malcolm wrote:

Neither you nor I have gotten into a space shuttle, and yet we both accept they exist.

As for producing someone who claims to have done so, I can point to the late Kunzang Dechen Lingpa, who indeed claimed to have experienced the fruit of the Mahāyāna path in his lifetime.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Dan74 said:

If Malcolm came to ZFI and offered his view on things...

Malcolm wrote:

...people would freak out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A Buddha is a conventional entity around which definitions are constructed. The question is, "Are those definitions functional?"

If you argue that they are, then you are accepting the Buddha as defined. If you argue that they are not, then you are rejecting a Buddha as defined.

Since there is no other place to discover the definition of a Buddha other than texts and people who describe a buddha in this way and that, there is no way to establish what a Buddha is in absence of authority, since an authority is needed to provide a conventional definition of what a Buddha is.

For example, though Dharmakirti tries to do this, ultimately he fails because he has to rely on the definition of a Buddha provided in Buddhist texts.

gad rgyangs said:

ouroboros-1.jpg

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not circular reasoning, any more is it circular reasoning to accept a car functions on the basis of its definitions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Do you need to believe, if you can see? Moreover, the belief can interfere with the seeing, if handled unwisely.

Malcolm wrote:

Well Dan, you know what they say, "Seeing is believing."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

how are you be able to say that the result of mahayana is superior?

Malcolm wrote:

Through reasoning and inference.

gad rgyangs said:

actually lets start with something simpler:

can you, through reasoning and inference, and without appeal to authority, establish that there is such a thing as a "Buddha", i.e. someone who has attained the kind of result that you claim the mahayana texts present?

Malcolm wrote:

A Buddha is a conventional entity around which definitions are constructed. The question is, "Are those definitions functional?"

If you argue that they are, then you are accepting the Buddha as defined. If you argue that they are not, then you are rejecting a Buddha as defined.

Since there is no other place to discover the definition of a Buddha other than texts and people who describe a buddha in this way and that, there is no way to establish what a Buddha is in absence of authority, since an authority is needed to provide a conventional definition of what a Buddha is.

For example, though Dharmakirti tries to do this, ultimately he fails because he has to rely on the definition of a Buddha provided in Buddhist texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, that's fine. I will say that, IMO, "the Mahayana" is not some monolithic thing you either have confidence in or not, and part of the problem with insisting on "The Buddha" as it's unique source is that it tends to foster the opposite idea.

Malcolm wrote:

Consistently we have pointed to the sources for Mahāyāna being the Buddha, Nāgārjuna and Maitreyanatha. Actually, what we call Mahāyāna now is largely a product of the Maitreyan synthesis.

dzogchungpa said:

Oh? So is it a monolithic thing you either have confidence in or not?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes (apart from differences in opinion over matter of the view of emptiness between Yogacara and Madhyamaka).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, that's fine. I will say that, IMO, "the Mahayana" is not some monolithic thing you either have confidence in or not, and part of the problem with insisting on "The Buddha" as it's unique source is that it tends to foster the opposite idea.

Malcolm wrote:

Consistently we have pointed to the sources for Mahāyāna being the Buddha, Nāgārjuna and Maitreyanatha. Actually, what we call Mahāyāna now is largely a product of the Maitreyan synthesis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I don't think fence sitters are awful, it just seems like people want to have their cake and eat it too, to simultaneously practice the Mahayana while having no real confidence in it. People can be whatever they want to be, in the truest sense...it just seems like a confused, and borderline dishonest approach to me. Beyond that, a few people have even indicated that somehow they think fence sitting is productive practice, or even an integral part of Dharma practice. I'm not trying to play with credentials or anything, just going off what people are saying, and there are some big holes in this notion of vague skepticism being equated with some kind of inquiry.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, that's fine. I will say that, IMO, "the Mahayana" is not some monolithic thing you either have confidence in or not, and part of the problem with insisting on "The Buddha" as it's unique source is that it tends to foster the opposite idea.

BTW, I've found you can do some fairly high quality sitting on fences. It's just a question of balance.

Malcolm wrote:

Here's to high quality fence sitting:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

That's the whole point of listening to The Buddha, once you have decided he is The Buddha...

Malcolm wrote:

That is the point — there are fence sitters who don't really think Mahāyāna is the teaching of the Buddha, even though they like Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna teachings.

dzogchungpa said:

Fence sitters are really terrible, aren't they?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, awful people....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

That's the whole point of listening to The Buddha, once you have decided he is The Buddha...

Malcolm wrote:

That is the point — there are fence sitters who don't really think Mahāyāna is the teaching of the Buddha, even though they like Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna teachings. They basically accept (without any nuance) the Western view that the Buddha's "original" teachings are those contained in the Pali Canon/Agamas. They do not contend the general thrust of Buddhist text critical studies at all. They really have no confidence in Mahāyāna teachings because at the end of the day, they do not believe the Mahāyāna was the Buddha's teaching. For them, there is no issue of whether or not Theravada is Hinayāna because for them there is no Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Examining the teachings IS practice, or at least could be.

Malcolm wrote:

I am quite sure that JD knows that reflecting on the teachings is part of practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

how are you be able to say that the result of mahayana is superior?

Malcolm wrote:

Through reasoning and inference.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, I think the ideas in the Mahāyāna sūtras, in general, are better than the ideas in Hinayāna sūtras, etc.

dzogchungpa said:

Right, so why bother trying to pretend that the ideas in the Mahāyāna sūtras are the teachings of one particular person?

Is that too challenging?

Malcolm wrote:

I credit the ideas in Mahāyāna sūtras to the person to whom they are credited in Mahāyāna sūtras, i.e., the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Did it ever occur to you that the reason I do so is precisely because I have judged the ideas on their own merits? In other words, I think the ideas in the Mahāyāna sūtras, in general, are better than the ideas in Hinayāna sūtras, etc.

gad rgyangs said:

I see instead judgment of the Theravada as incomplete or inferior based on the fact that the mahayana texts say so rather than any demonstration that can be supported without appeal to authority.

Malcolm wrote:

Theravada is a śrāvakayāna path.

The question centers not around whether Mahāyāna judgements about Śrāvakayāna paths are valid — that is an entirely separate question — the question centers around whether the Theravada path matches the criteria set out in Mahāyāna Sūtras for such a path, and the answer, as far as I am concerned, is yes.

The question of superiority or inferiority can only be answered by an analysis of view and practice. In my opinion, the view, meditation and result of Mahāyāna is in every way superior to that of any śravaka school — but hey, that is just me. Everyone has to come up with that answer based on their own study and practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 19th, 2016 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so what is the ultimate authority of texts with such an origin?

Malcolm wrote:

Why, the community that observes them.

It is pretty hard to consider oneself a Mahāyāna practitioner if one does not consider Mahāyāna sūtras authoritative for one's view and practice.

gad rgyangs said:

and why would you consider texts that are, by your own admission, "edited, formalized, formatted, sanitized and generally prepared for an audience" authoritative at all? Its not that the sutras are not of interest or don't contain interesting ideas. The problem is when one set of texts are arbitrarily considered "authoritative" then other texts are by definition considered false, mistaken or "provisional". Buddhism is not the only tradition that has wasted time and energy arguing about what is authoritative on arbitrary grounds (usually appeals to mythological sources for the texts). All religious traditions do this. But in the West since the 17th century we have developed the idea of judging ideas on their own merits without appeals to authority. This seems to me to be progress in awakening, which is what Buddhism purports to be the goal. Ironically, even the Buddha is portrayed as discouraging his followers from blind adherence to his teachings and that they should rather test them on their own merits and not simply appeal to authority.

Malcolm wrote:

Did it ever occur to you that the reason I do so is precisely because I have judged the ideas on their own merits? In other words, I think the ideas in the Mahāyāna sūtras, in general, are better than the ideas in Hinayāna sūtras, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so what is the ultimate authority of texts with such an origin?

Malcolm wrote:

Why, the community that observes them.

It is pretty hard to consider oneself a Mahāyāna practitioner if one does not consider Mahāyāna sūtras authoritative for one's view and practice.

For myself, I use a hierarchical approach:

Where Mahāyāna sūtras contradict Hinayāna Sūtras, I follow the former.

Where Vajrayāna tantras contradict Mahāyāna Sūtras, I follow the former.

Where higher tantras contradict lower tantras, I follow the former.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

. So, while Malcolm will give you all kinds of reasons why the mahayana polemic about Theravada being an incomplete path is actually true...

Malcolm wrote:

They are not my polemics. They are critiques made by the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras, and following them, Nāgārjuna and Maitreyanatha.

People are free, and they can make up their own minds, gurus or not. But they should be properly informed, and the point of view that holds that Theravada is immune from being considered an exemplar of Śrāvakayāna, aka Hinayāna, by the criteria laid out in Mahāyāna texts is quite simple misinformed.

There is these days a species of Buddhist Correctness however, which misguidedly tries to claim that the path of an arhat is just the same as the path of a bodhisattva, no better, no worse, just "different" (whatever that means) even though Theravadins by and large have abandoned the idea that it is possible to become an arhat — examples of this anecdotally exist in Tibet, where Vajrayāna practitioners who lack Mahāyāna bodhicitta still manage to eliminate their afflictive obscuration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Removing Obscurations

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

it does not remove the knowledge obscuration.

Astus said:

How do you define knowledge obscuration?

Malcolm wrote:

See the Abhisamaya-ālamkara, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Removing Obscurations

Content:

Astus said:

This is a topic raised by the question

(<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=320501#p320501>) of whether freedom from attachments equals realising buddha-nature. Please tell if you agree or disagree and why.

Malcolm wrote:

Freedom from attachment only removes the afflictive obscuration, it does not remove the knowledge obscuration.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyone who does not believe that one can become a Buddha, that only special people like Gotama Buddha have that capacity, that it is better to eliminate birth through eradicating afflictions right now, rather than embarking on the harrowing path of full buddhahood.

gad rgyangs said:

But why would anyone believe that if they heard the mahayana teachings? as we have seen, everybody in the sangha heard all the teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

And as we see, not everyone was capable of accepting what they heard. BTW, do you think that in Mahāyāna sūtras, evam maya srutam ekasmin is spoken by Ananda? No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyone who does not believe that one can become a Buddha, that only special people like Gotama Buddha have that capacity, that it is better to eliminate birth through eradicating afflictions right now, rather than embarking on the harrowing path of full buddhahood.

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, in all seriousness, do you really believe in the harrowing path of full buddhahood? Not as some kind of pro tem Mahayana polemicist, but as a practitioner, particularly a dzogchenpa?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. Without the Vajrayāna path, it is the only possible way to become a buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 18th, 2016 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

for example, the PP in 8000 lines speaks at the beginning of " a great gathering of monks, with 1200 monks, all of the Arhats..." etc. In other words everybody was there. So explain to me how, after that, the teachings would be rejected by enough of those there that there would be no mention of them at all in the Pali canon?

If the various early canons have all come down to us in fragmentary state, then you would expect a random mix of teachings, both shravaka and mahayana. This is obviously not the case. The pali canon has only non-mahayna sutras. how do you propose to explain this?

Malcolm wrote:

Dante:

Everything written down in a book is edited, formalized, formatted, sanitized and generally prepared for an audience.

This applies to all Buddhist canons, not just the Mahāyāna canon.

Secondly, in the Pali Canon itself it details the fact that Buddha would put on disguises and go and teach various things to various people, devas and so on.

Third, why do you assume the reports about the proceedings of the first council are factual?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

I just don't buy the idea that the Buddha taught a hobbled version of the Dharma that is what is preserved in Theravada, and a complete version that is preserved in mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma found in the Agamas and Nikayas is not incomplete if your goal is to become a arhat. It is incomplete with respect to how one becomes a buddha. This is both Nāgārjuna and Maitreyanatha's point.

gad rgyangs said:

who says "I dont want to become enlightened like the Buddha, I just wanna be an Arhat"?

Malcolm wrote:

Anyone who does not believe that one can become a Buddha, that only special people like Gotama Buddha have that capacity, that it is better to eliminate birth through eradicating afflictions right now, rather than embarking on the harrowing path of full buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Dan74 said:

As regards Theravada, I've seen precious little understanding of what Theravada does or does not teach here and elsewhere in Mahayana/Vajrayana circles and much misunderstanding. Just like I've seen plenty of misunderstanding of Mahayana/Vajrayana among Theravadins. That's why I suggested earlier in the thread, that if one is genuinely interested in Theravada-related questions, it is best to turn to Theravada sources and teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

Dan, the Theravada teachings are not some mysterious "other." Many of us here have studied Theravadin and other Śrāvakayāna teachings in quite a great bit of detail. Many of us here have read in detail and extensively all the Pali Canon translations that are available both from Bhikku Bodhi and the PTS. The sum total of all classical Theravada meditation practices can be found in the Visuddhimagga, and they are little different than their counterparts in Sarvastivadin Abhidharma. We all share the 37 bodhipakṣa dharmas, the five skandas, the three afflictions, various schemes of dependent origination, and so on. We all share the common ideas about stream entry, etc. So you see, many of us have done our homework and checked into these sources.

The differences lie mainly not between the Sarvastivada and Theravada employment of these key concepts, the difference is that in Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna these ideas are treated a little differently. Nevertheless, Mahāyāna too is grounded in these key concepts.

Another point is that the meditation practice tradition in Theravada is largely reconstituted from books. It was revived, and does not have a living continuous tradition as in Tibetan Buddhism, Zen and so on. Indeed, Theravada for many centuries even seems to have given up the idea that arhatship is possible, though, in the 20th century it appeared that this skepticism was partly reversed. In Mahāyāna, it has never been the case that we have ever given up the idea that awakening and even buddhahood is possible.

The usual contested "misunderstanding" is the Mahāyāna assertion that the path of buddhahood does not exist in the Agamas/Nikayas. Well, it does not. It does not matter if there are such texts as the Buddhavamsa and so on. Texts such as these are hagiographies, not manuals for practice. Mahāyāna sūtras cover many topics, but their central concern is describing the bodhisattva path, which is distinct from the arhat path.

There is another point — anyone who is a Theravadin can follow Mahāyāna by properly taking the bodhisattva vow if they so choose, just as many Mahāsamghikas, Sarvastivādins, Dharmaguptakas, Mulasarvastivadins and so on have. They can also follow Vajrayāna if they so choose. Some people seem to think that Theravada is the only active Śrāvakayāna school left, but it is not true.

Sarvastivada abhidharma ideas, such as the six causes and four conditions actively permeate even Dzogchen teachings. Whole mandalas are constructed on the basis of the thirty-seven bodhisattva dharma, such as the mandala of Cakrasamvara.

Śrāvakayāna teachings form the backbone of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna, but the goal put forward in those teachings is limited in its scope since they concern only achieving liberation for oneself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gaden chopel said:

I just don't buy the idea that the Buddha taught a hobbled version of the Dharma that is what is preserved in Theravada, and a complete version that is preserved in mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma found in the Agamas and Nikayas is not incomplete if your goal is to become an arhat. It is incomplete with respect to how one becomes a buddha. This is both Nāgārjuna and Maitreyanatha's point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

TRC said:

To further verify that the Buddha didn't hold back a different set of teachings, he categorically states this in the <http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.1-6.vaji.html>

Malcolm wrote:

No, but he clearly parceled out different teachings to different kinds of students, for example, teaching the Kalamas only about the four brahma-viharas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Lungta

Content:

Adamantine said:

It is fine to commission someone to hang flags for you: it is important they are consecrated by a qualified Lama with mantra, sometimes done during a sang ceremony, first however.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you can consecrate them yourself. But if you think some lamas blessing is more potent, go for it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: The posture

Content:

tingdzin said:

Too, your own cultural chauvinism may be sufficient reason to reject thousands of years of Asian lore about physiology in one fell swoop, but your remark also shows that you are completely unfamiliar with Western psychological research on the hemispherical functioning of the brain that shows the brain's two sides do indeed have complementary functions, which do, indeed, play out in human psychophysical activity.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you do have to bear in mind that Jundo's teacher thinks the goal of seated practice is to cause a spontaneous alignment of the vertebrae of the spinal column resulting in a balanced "body-mind" which, according to him, is the essence of Soto practice. Here is his own summary of his theory of Zazen:

When he was 29 years old he left the palace in search of the meaning of life, and after several years, when he was 35 or 36, after adopting a simple method of physical practice that balanced his body and mind, he discovered what he had been searching for; he found that the world exists just at this time and in this place, and that the whole universe is splendid just as it is. For many years he taught his disciples about the simple practice and what it meant as the essential truth that all human beings should know. Gautama Buddha was not a god, but a man. And he taught that we can all return to our original state, which is serene and peaceful. His teachings are not spiritual, but essentially humanistic; with this simple practice we can all attain our perfection as human beings.

And:

What do we experience in Zazen?

Zazen is the simplest form of action, and when we are practicing Zazen we do not intentionally think about anything or concentrate on our feelings and perceptions. We sit in a simple nondiscriminating state where our body-and-mind are balanced and undivided. However, in order to discuss the state in Zazen we cannot avoid making divisions and categorizations. In spite of these categorizations, the actual experience of Zazen remains a wholistic one.

We can describe four aspects in the practice of Zazen. They are: 1) Different from thinking; 2) Making the body right; 3) Oneness of body-and-mind; and 4) Oneness with the Universe.

1. Different from Thinking

The state in Zazen is without intention and is different from thinking. This statement sounds strange as we normally believe that we are always thinking. We avoid intentionally following a train of thought during Zazen by concentrating on maintaining the posture. Of course spontaneous thoughts and images arise in our consciousness during Zazen, but they are not important. When we notice that we are thinking about something, we should simply stop. If we correct our posture, the thought or perception will disappear and our consciousness will slowly become clear and we will feel peaceful. In this peaceful and balanced state, we are in the state that is “different from thinking.”

However, if we intentionally try to attain the state that is different from thinking, we can never do so. When our consciousness is full of thoughts and feelings during Zazen, we should leave our state as it is. Our worries will bubble to the surface and evaporate into the universe! In this way, by concentrating on the posture, we will return naturally to our original state during our practice.

2. Making the Body Right—a Balanced Autonomic Nervous System

In Zazen we sit on a cushion on the floor with both legs crossed, and with our lower spine, upper spine, and head held straight vertically. Keeping the spine straight has a direct and immediate effect on the autonomic nervous system that controls many of our body's functions. Its effects include control of heart rate and force of contraction, constriction and dilatation of blood vessels, contraction and relaxation of smooth muscle in various organs, the ability to focus the eyes and the size of the pupils, and the secretion of hormones from various glands directly into the blood stream.

The autonomic nervous system is composed of two subsystems: the sympathetic and the parasympathetic nervous systems. When the sympathetic nervous system is stimulated, our heart rate increases, arteries and veins constrict, the lungs relax, and our pupils dilate; in short, we become tense and alert. When the parasympathetic nervous system is stimulated, the opposite happens; our heart rate decreases, arteries and veins dilate, the lungs contract, and the pupils constrict. You can see that the two systems prepare the body for an active or passive response—sometimes known as the “fight or flight” syndrome. When the effect of the two systems on the organs is in balance, we are neither ready to fight, nor ready to run away; we are in a normal state.

The parasympathetic nerves emerge from the spinal chord at the base of the spine (the second, third and fourth sacral vertebrae) and through the cranial vertebrae in the neck, whereas the sympathetic nerves emerge from the spinal chord through the middle vertebrae in the back (the T1 to L2 vertebrae).

Keeping the spine normally upright, with the head sitting squarely on the top of the vertebral column minimizes the compression of the nerves of these two systems at the points where the nerves emerge through the vertebrae, and ensures an uninterrupted supply of blood, allowing them to function normally. When the parasympathetic and sympathetic systems are both working normally, they function in opposition to give us a state of balance of body-and-mind; not too tense, and not too relaxed, not overly optimistic or pessimistic; not too aggressive and not too passive. It is this physical state of balance in the autonomic nervous system that give rise to what we call a balanced body-and-mind.

In addition to this, sitting in the upright posture, where the force of gravity acts down through the spine onto the pelvis, is a position in which our body's reflexes can work efficiently to integrate the functioning of the whole body.

3. Oneness of Body and Mind in the Present Moment

Usually we think there is something that is called "mind" and something else called "body" and that the two are separate, although they have a great effect on each other. In Buddhism we believe that body and mind are two sides of one entity, which we call "myself," but that we actually cannot fully grasp. We believe that every mental phenomenon has a physical side, and every physical phenomenon has a mental side. We do not believe in the independent existence of something called "mind" that is separate from the physical body, brain, nervous system, and so on. When we sit in Zazen, because we do not concentrate on thoughts, or perceptions, our body-and-mind exist undivided in the present moment. When our mind is in the ordinary state and our autonomic nervous system is balanced, we are in the "balanced state of body-and-mind."

4. Oneness with the Universe

When we are practicing Zazen, not only can we say that body and mind are one; we are also sitting in the state where there is no distinction between ourselves and the external circumstances—the world around us. Most people have at some time experienced this simple feeling of oneness with everything, and in Zazen we can notice that it is not just a feeling, but the actual state of things in the present moment. When we are sitting in Zazen we are one with the Universe, and the state includes all things and phenomena. In that sense, although we are experiencing the state, we cannot grasp it intellectually. We cannot describe it completely. We call the state “ineffable,” or “dharma,” or “truth,” or “reality.” But even these words are inadequate to describe the simple and original state that we return to in Zazen.
<http://terebeess.hu/zen/mesterek/NishijimaZazen.pdf>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: What is Luminosity?

Content:

fckw said:

can you tell which specific Tibetan or Sanskrit terms Malcolm referred to? A lot is lost during translation.

Malcolm wrote:

luminosity = 'od gsal ba clarity = gsal ba.

Sometimes the latter is used as an abbreviation for the former.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no record of a lot of things.

gad rgyangs said:

if the mahayana sutras are actual records of teachings of the historical Buddha, there would be at least some mention of them in the Pali corpus, if no more than to reject them.

and even that makes no sense: the Buddha was obviously worshiped and idolized by his close circle. Do you seriously think they would have been at rajagriha but then were like "nah... thats not right, lets pretend he didn't give that teaching."?

Malcolm wrote:

Different people heard different things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Saoshun said:

You don't understand process of Buddha, you do not have any cultivation achievements. Buddha was only 1 day in each village moving all the time, he set only process of purification, he was setting people life to way of enlightenment as set the sails, he was not cheating, he knew people limitations. Do you ever notice why they had orange-like robes? because is the color of basic root chakra, he was working on sutrayana first to get "soldiers" for the future. I do not know if you are trolling but I hope you are joking.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahahaha, dude, there was no set color for monks robes. Some monks died their robes blue, etc. They just could not be white.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

haha thats cheating.

Are you seriously saying that the monks who preserved and passed down the pali canon chose to exclude what later appeared as "mahayana" sutras because they didn't like them?

Malcolm wrote:

Why not? After all, there are millions of people who take a pass on Dzogchen and Vajrayāna (like Spiny Norman) because they don't like it or think that it is valid.

gad rgyangs said:

there are no records of councils or schisms from the early period where a "mahayana" sect split off and "their" sutras were rejected by the conservative elements.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no record of a lot things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

haha thats cheating.

Are you seriously saying that the monks who preserved and passed down the pali canon chose to exclude what later appeared as "mahayana" sutras because they didn't like them?

Malcolm wrote:

Why not? After all, there are millions of people who take a pass on Dzogchen and Vajrayāna (like Spiny Norman) because they don't like it or think that it is valid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats are nowhere described by the Buddha as having the ten powers, four fearlessnesses and so on. Ananda, in the Gopaka Moggallana Sutta, states that no one has all the qualities demonstrated by the Buddha.

gad rgyangs said:

so why don't they ask the Buddha: "tell us how to attain the same enlightenment that you have?"

Malcolm wrote:

They did. The answers are recorded in Mahāyāna sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.012.ntbb.html>, among others.

gad rgyangs said:

there he is describing his own state I see no comparison of it with arhatship.

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats are nowhere described by the Buddha as having the ten powers, four fearlessnesses and so on. Ananda, in the Gopaka Moggallana Sutta, states that no one has all the qualities demonstrated by the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He never equates the attainment of arhatship with total awakening.

Astus said:

Thus the requirement of a bodhisattva accumulating merit on a grand scale over aeons. But then it's been overwritten by the inherent buddha-nature whereby anyone can reach buddhahood in a single lifetime.

Malcolm wrote:

This latter statement of yours is false, the latter does not preclude the former.

Astus said:

And how can the full function of buddha-nature manifest? By not being attached to appearances, thus removing all obscurations. However, since arhats are also without clinging to appearances, their buddha-nature should manifest in the same way.

Malcolm wrote:

This statement lacks any basis. All obscurations are not removed merely through lacking attachment to appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so is the Buddha portrayed in the Pali canon as saying "what I am teaching you here does not lead to total awakening: it is just a first step"?

Malcolm wrote:

He never equates the attainment of arhatship with total awakening.

gad rgyangs said:

how does he distinguish (in the Pali canon of course) his awakening from arhatship?

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.012.ntbb.html>, among others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: David Loy's call for ecological engagement

Content:

kirtu said:

<http://www.lionsroar.com/can-we-awaken-to-the-ecological-crisis/...> or as I would put it, Buddhists have to start helping to save the world.

Loy has a tendency to make claims from the unsubstantiated position that Buddhists are not already doing something but he has a point here even though most people I know have been engaged at least in raising consciousness about our looming ecological disasters.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Sour grapes on Loy's part. I don't know anyone who fits the description he is painting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so is the Buddha portrayed in the Pali canon as saying "what I am teaching you here does not lead to total awakening: it is just a first step"?

Malcolm wrote:

He never equates the attainment of arhatship with total awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 17th, 2016 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One does not have to prove anything. One cannot attain buddhahood by following the path Buddha taught in the Pali canon because he did not teach that path in those teachings.

gad rgyangs said:

so you're saying a "Samma Sambuddha" is not a "Samma Sambuddha"?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that no path to becoming a sammāsambuddha is presented in teachings of the Samsambuddha in the Pali canon/Agamas, those teachings only exist in his Mahāyāna teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so says the Mahayana mythology. The Theravada mythology begs to differ.

Malcolm wrote:

People somehow have developed this mistaken idea that because we can find examples of the pāramitās in the myths surrounding the careers of Buddhas in Theravāda texts that this makes Theravada teachings about the path of buddhahood equivalent with Mahāyāna teachings. They are not equivalent: not in structure, not in content and not as a path.

gad rgyangs said:

thats not the point. who says they're the same? the point is that some people prefer one mythology with its meditation advice, others prefer the other. It is only insecurity that would drive someone to consider it necessary to "prove" (as if that were possible) the superiority of one mythology over another.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not have to prove anything. One cannot attain buddhahood by following the path Buddha taught in the Pali canon because he did not teach that path in those teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

so says the Mahayana mythology. The Theravada mythology begs to differ.

Malcolm wrote:

People somehow have developed this mistaken idea that because we can find examples of the pāramitās in the myths surrounding the careers of Buddhas in Theravāda texts that this makes Theravada teachings about the path of buddhahood equivalent with Mahāyāna teachings. They are not equivalent: not in structure, not in content and not as a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

]

Theres really no qualitative difference between arguing about which flavor of Buddhism is superior/inferior and being ISIS. Its only a quantitative difference: you use words, ISIS uses guns and bombs.

Malcolm wrote:

There is both a qualitative difference as well as the quantitative difference you mention. The qualitative difference is that no one is suggesting that Śrāvaka schools are peddling something false (that is the what Śrāvaka schools say about Mahāyāna), what is being suggested is that if you want to become a buddha instead of an arhat, you need to follow Mahāyāna because the path for achieving that does not exist in Śrāvakayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Available for free reading in its entirety on Google books The Bodhisattva Ideal: Essays on the Emergence of Mahayana

By Karel Werner, Jeffrey Samuels, Bhikkhu Bodhi, Peter Skilling, Bhikkhu Anālayo, David McMahan is quite interesting in light of this thread. The bodhisattva ideal in Theravada is discussed. Good reading for anyone seriously interested in informed discussion on the differences between Theravada and the Mahayana as well as the rise of the early Mahayana.

Malcolm wrote:

All of the information in there is old news.

None of the articles seriously treat Nāgarjuna's and Maitreya's positions with respect to their rebuttal of Śrāvakayāna critics of Mahāyāna with regard to the the absence of a bodhisattva path in the Śrāvaka canon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Simon E. said:

It would be bad manners.

TRC said:

It is also bad manners to ascribe certain characteristics to a path that you do not personally practice. This has been mentioned before. How can one be completely objective about another path when it does not practice that path, but instead practices another path? Well of course it can't. So it is not only bad manners, but moreover, it is delusional.

Malcolm wrote:

Is there some kind of practice in Theravada which is absent in Mahāyāna? No, there is not. There is nothing in Theravada as path which is not also practiced in Mahāyāna, but there is much in Mahāyāna which is not practiced in Theravada, nor any other of the eighteen schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

TRC said:

If the Mahayana was a higher more complete path it would have the knowledge and vision to understand that Theravada is not Hinayana.

Malcolm wrote:

But Theravada is indeed a Hināyāna path: that its goal is arhatship, it denies that bodhisattvas are awakened beings, etc. It bears all the characteristics Buddha tells us belong to a Hinayāna path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Reggie Ray Mindrolling podcast

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Feeling unsafe and blown apart seems to be important concepts to Trungpa students, I have noticed. They generally like to brag about it.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, there may be some truth to what you say but your formulation is somewhat intemperate IMO.

Malcolm wrote:

Moderation was never my strong suite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point actually is that if there is no Mahāyāna there could not be a Theravada or any other Hināyāna school because there would be no Buddha to teach śrāvakas the arhat path.

Adamantine said:

We are discussing people who have all mutually taken refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. Followers of Shakyamuni Buddha. So your seeming parallel is a non sequitur.

Astus said:

It would be possible to point out that Mahayana has a different interpretation of all three of the treasures, so while on the surface they sound the same, they don't mean the same, just like Buddha is the ninth incarnation of God for Vaisnavas. And even if they are the same, it still seems illogical to give any "benefit of doubt", as that would also mean doubting one's own tradition.

However Mahayana sutras are addressed to those embarking on the Bodhisattva path, they're not intended to make sravakas feel bad about themselves. As I already said, these types of things are contextual teaching devices, not proclamations to be heralded on billboards or in a Theravadan forum.

Vimalakirti sutra, ch 3 is a good example of making sravakas feel bad. But if such instances are teaching devices, then there is no discussion of any Hinayana school, only a number of misinterpretations that do not represent any actual doctrine and discipline, therefore it not only has nothing to do with Theravada, but it's not relevant to the Agama scriptures either. Personally, I am sympathetic to that interpretation of the Mahayana supremacist rhetoric, but so far it has not really surfaced in this thread as an option.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

you and others have been taking of nothing but allegiances, that thats what the whole issue is: buying into a perspective

Malcolm wrote:

You and Herbie can team up in your Heman Belief Haters Club.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Reggie Ray Mindrolling podcast

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, on the mp3 at least, precisely at 31:47, although for context a little before would be good, maybe at 30:00 or so.

Malcolm wrote:

Feeling unsafe and blown apart seems to be important concepts to Trungpa students, I have noticed. They generally like to brag about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Reggie Ray Mindrolling podcast

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I listened to the interview last night and the bit about Ray not considering CTR to have been a Buddhist was a bit of a letdown.

Still, though, an interesting interview.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, where is it on the tape.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 16th, 2016 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Perhaps you should start another, more responsible forum.

Malcolm wrote:

Already have.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Simon E. said:

I don't and wouldn't, pop up on Dhamma Wheel making claims of superiority or even equality...why would I ?

SpinyNorman said:

I'm not making "claims", just challenging the assumption that Theravada is inferior. And your phrase " even equality" speaks volumes.

Malcolm wrote:

However, it is foregone conclusion in Mahāyāna that Theravada, being part of the Śrāvakayāna, is a lower path. There is nothing even to argue about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: A good book on Jhanas

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

Hi, I came across Leigh Brasington's Right Concentration : A Practical Guide to the Jhanas. Very interesting ! It appears to be Theravada (excuse my limited experience with Buddhism). What is the Tibetan or Mahayana equivalent to such a book ? Is it samatha ? I tried looking it up on the net for a simple explanation but didn't get anything that enlightens (sorry I can't resist the pun), instead it got more confusing. Can someone throw some light on this ? Thanks...

Malcolm wrote:

One important thing you need to understand about all Theravada meditation traditions is that they were reconstituted from books in the mid 19th century in response to European interested in Buddhist meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and Western Philosophy

Content:

smcj said:

You said "Rigpa was self-aware..." I was responding to that. Rigpa is not being aware of its own nature?

Malcolm wrote:

"Self-aware" is a term liable to misunderstanding. Generally it is taken to mean that a consciousness is aware of itself as an object.

Rigpa is not "self-aware" in that context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

kirtu said:

That is completely ridiculous. Sartre was not a systematic, academic philosopher. After WW2 many philosophers weren't.

smcj said:

I'm still waiting on a clarification on this:

Sounds to me he was barking up the right tree. Too bad nobody ever told him that Rigpa was self-aware without any duality. It would have saved him a whole lot of work that was wasted believing the subject/object duality was unavoidable.

Malcolm wrote:

To be self-aware automatically implies duality...its an even worse duality, since consciousness needs to take itself as an object...

smcj said:

That was Sartre's thesis. My thesis is that Rigpa is non-dual awareness that does not take itself as an object, thus simply allowing it to express itself to itself. (Easier said than done.) Somehow you seem to be agreeing with Sartre and not me, while having just dissed Sartre.

If this thread goes further it might be good to end up in the Lounge.

Malcolm wrote:

You said "Rigpa was self-aware..." I was responding to that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sarte is not a serious philosopher.

kirtu said:

That is completely ridiculous. Sartre was not a systematic, academic philosopher. After WW2 many philosophers weren't.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and they are not serious either. FWIW, I was raised by a philosophy professor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Rory said:

Now whether you regard Open Dharma as a Hell realm like Malcolm and Simon...

Malcolm wrote:

I view it as irresponsible.

Ayu said:

Harsh words from someone, who demanded "Free speech" at another occasion on DW.

So what is your proposal? Please define it.

Malcolm wrote:

There are limits to free speech, there always have been.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Rory said:

Now whether you regard Open Dharma as a Hell realm like Malcolm and Simon...

Malcolm wrote:

I view it as irresponsible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Well, inferior doesn't sound nice - but deconstructing this with all honesty--

If one path is complete, and one is incomplete, wouldn't you say the complete one was the superior one? (I mean, you know, if you had a gun to your head)

SpinyNorman said:

But then a Theravadan probably wouldn't accept the premise that the Theravada path is incomplete. So again we're back to the problem of subjectivity, one vehicle judging another according to its own assumptions, and not to any objective standard.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Theravadins would not accept their path is incomplete, but the ultimate of the lower is the relative of the higher, and from a Mahāyāna point of view the Theravada path, along with the path of the rest of the eighteen schools, is incomplete in that following it will not result in buddhahood.

In other words, for a Mahāyāni, the point of the path is not only personal freedom, but rather it is the attainment of bodhisattva awakening and eventual buddhahood in order to free all sentient beings from suffering. The path laid out in the 18 schools simply does not cover the bodhisattva path.

The Buddha teaches in many sūtras that the arhat path is incomplete and inferior. So, really, it is not Mahāyānis who are making this statement, it is the Buddha.

You may choose not read those sūtras the Buddha taught where he expresses these things, that is your privilege. But in a Mahāyāna forum, one assumes that the Buddha's teaching in Mahāyāna sūtras are the baseline for what is higher and lower, and so on, and in this case, the Buddha in these sūtras clearly lays out which paths lead to which results. Moreover, there is an entire literature explicating in detail the meaning of these issues, authored by Nāgārjuna, Maitreyanatha and their followers, who clearly explain the intent of the Buddha in the Mahāyāna Sūtras. Those are the teachers we follow, and it is their teachings on this matter to which we refer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

smcj said:

If I'm not mistaken they do call Sakyamuni in his previous lives a Bodhisattva. That's say he was on a different path.

SpinyNorman said:

As far as I can see a Buddha is a Buddha. It's not like there are "inferior and selfish" Buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there are, pratyekabuddhas are lower than samyaksambuddhas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dhyāna is very precisely defined. It is not at all mysterious to those who have been properly educated and trained in Buddhadharma.

jundo cohen said:
Hi Malcolm,

You remain a master of the cut and dried assertion, I feel anyway.

In such case, "properly trained" may come down to being the fellow and his interpretation that the speaker happens to believe.

A fascinating book of a few years ago was Richard Shankman's "The Experience of Samadhi", not particularly for the author's personal interpretation, but for the interviews with many experienced and venerated teachers from a variety of lineages (granted, primarily on the Theravada/Vipassana side of things), who agreed on very little in the details.

<http://www.shambhala.com/the-experience-of-samadhi.html>

Malcolm wrote:
Considering that Theravadins completely reconstituted their meditation traditions from books, it is not surprising at all that there are disagreement among them.

Fortunately, in the Tibetan tradition we have a continuous meditation tradition which goes back to Indian Buddhism and its continuities. While there are indeed disagreements over some philosophical issues, there is broad agreement, experientially as well as theoretically, over such issues was what constitutes the first dhyāna and so forth.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 3:00 AM
Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?
Content:

jundo cohen said:
Hi Astus,

Yes, it could be so ... assuming, of course, that the "various manuals" and tests are reliable. How often have we seen voices, visions, various unusual phenomena, miracles and the like proclaimed and confirmed by "experts" in all religions only to have a more worldly cause demonstrated later? One might call this "Shroud of Turin" Syndrome.

Malcolm wrote:
For example?

jundo cohen said:

As in our recent discussion of "Jhanas", there has been some wonderful writing in recent years which basically shows how poorly the meaning is defined, how little agreement on what the experience constitutes, great subjectivity and disagreement in how to test for it and so forth.

Malcolm wrote:

Dhyāna is very precisely defined. It is not at all mysterious to those who have been properly educated and trained in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Simon E. said:

Its an extraordinary moment...On a forum dedicated to Mahayana and Vajrayana we are told that see Buddhadharma in terms of the Mahayana and Vajrayana ' stinks of sectarianism '

As though the forum were a platform for the neutral discussion of academia...which apparently for a tiny few it is.

Which perhaps follows naturally if you don't actually practise Mahayana or Vajrayana Buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=21709&start=120#p320132>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Dudjom Tersar question

Content:

Adamantine said:

Dorje Drollo is within the Guru cycle, but it is not generally given or permitted until one is quite advanced on the path. It is perhaps the most secretive and protected practice within this terma.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahaha, this was the very first empowerment I ever received in Nyingma...other than the Khon Kllaya....

Adamantine said:

I'm guessing not the Dudjom-- was it Kunzang Dechen Lingpa's Drollo terma you're referring to? I think I was at the same wang with you in Vermont.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am referring the full Dudjom Drollo empowerment granted by Ngagpa Yeshe Dorje in 1992 in Newton, Ma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present for

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In this subforum, there is neither Dharma of realization nor Dharma of texts. The minute you introduce texts, then people like Kim issue derisive statements to the effect that one cannot here use textual authority. This is completely wrong headed.

Adamantine said:

Really? Is that true? I haven't followed so many threads in Open Dharma, so I haven't witnessed this.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=21709&start=20#p319608>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present for

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Disrespect is one thing, but I really think there should be a place on DW for people to ask detailed and CHALLENGING questions about Mahayana. There is no need to defend anything. Factual or logical errors are easily corrected. Everything else is basically down to one's faith or trust or whatever, and that is all one really needs to say to defend it. Some people may not like that, but isn't that how it really is?

Malcolm wrote:

There are already many places for this on DW, the whole forum in fact.

dzogchungpa said:

Nope, the whole reason this thread exists is because I pointed out to you that saying you preferred the Mahayana POV was irrelevant in the Open Dharma forum, i.e. that it was not a good argument here. Apparently that was too challenging but I don't think it should be disallowed on that account, or even discouraged.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the "Open Dharma" forum is a misnomer, there is no such thing as "open dharma," as if it were code.

Dharma is not based on the petty squabbles of the ignorant and the fraudulent, it is based on the realization of the Buddhas. Those who do not themselves possess realization, must depend on the Dharma of texts. In this subforum, there is neither Dharma of realization nor Dharma of texts. The minute you introduce texts, then people like Kim issue derisive statements to the effect that one cannot here use textual authority. This is completely wrong headed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 1:01 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Another area which I believe is related to "How much should Buddhism Change" is the question "How much can Buddhism do without superstition?" That is certainly eye of the beholder, depending on such basic questions as what one considers "superstition". I personally advocate Buddhism abandoning much within it that is perhaps superstition and fallacy.

Astus said:

I consider that too extreme a view. It is undeniable that not only rebirth but also superpowers have always been very much elements of Buddhism. Seeing them as metaphors and superstitions is failing to understand what they meant to our ancestors and even to many contemporary practitioners. Instead of rejecting them out of cultural habit, there are two important areas where we can practise openness towards initially strange teachings. One is the anthropological and historical approach, considering the role of those teachings in the past. Second is the practical approach, in how we can actually make use of those elements of the path. I think both are possible, interesting and educational.

Malcolm wrote:

There are people who care about the Dharma, and then there are people who care about wearing funny gear, having students and followers, and otherwise putting on spiritual pretenses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

One difference now is that we have some actual tools to know how the world likely is structured and how it works, just a tad better than in the past.

Malcolm wrote:

Having abandoned inner tools and inner knowledge, which are infinitely precise, we have instead come to depend on material tools that are crude and limited, which crudely limit how much of the world we can actually see.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I personally advocate Buddhism abandoning much within it that is superstition and fallacy.

Malcolm wrote:

You are just editing Buddhadharma to fit with your conceptuality.

jundo cohen said:

As has everyone in the Mahayana since the founders invented the Mahayana and its sacred books out of whole cloth to fit their own conceptuality of what Buddhadharma should be, and as inspired and creative teachers have done ever since.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna was not invented out of whole cloth, and the suggestion that is such a fabrication is deeply offensive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Disrespect is one thing, but I really think there should be a place on DW for people to ask detailed and CHALLENGING questions about Mahayana. There is no need to defend anything. Factual or logical errors are easily corrected. Everything else is basically down to one's faith or trust or whatever, and that is all one really needs to say to defend it. Some people may not like that, but isn't that how it really is?

Malcolm wrote:

There are already many places for this on DW, the whole forum in fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I personally advocate Buddhism abandoning much within it that is superstition and fallacy.

Malcolm wrote:

You are just editing Buddhadharma to fit with your conceptuality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 15th, 2016 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

May I ask how you know who is a qualified teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it starts with one's prospective teacher having received a good education in Dharma, etc.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, how do you know what constitutes a good education in Dharma, or even what Dharma is, etc?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, it is pretty easy to ascertain — Sakya Pandita opined that it took about 7 years to become competent in Dharma studies.

As for what Dharma is? That is similarly easy, whatever is conducive to liberation is Dharma, the opposite is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Dudjom Tersar question

Content:

Adamantine said:

Dorje Drollo is within the Guru cycle, but it is not generally given or permitted until one is quite advanced on the path. It is perhaps the most secretive and protected practice within this terma.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahaha, this was the very first empowerment I ever received in Nyingma...other than the Khon Killaya....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Dudjom Tersar question

Content:

madhusudan said:

I feel really fortunate to have connected to this authentic lineage. The wording of the ngondro is profound in the way that it condenses vast teachings into just a few words. I wonder about the statement that it is, "intended for those who do not understand or are unable to recite the extensive preliminary practices according to the New Treasure."

I'm wondering, is this a complete path? Or should one aspire to the "extensive preliminaries"? I guess I'm asking because I feel really suited to the concise presentation of the dharma in this terma and I want to commit to just one simple essence path. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dudjom Tersar ngondro is a complete path. The extensive ngondro states explicitly states that one needs no other practice besides it.

In Dudjom's Rinpoche collected works, in the volume that contains the extensive ngondro and its commentary, the two main practice manuals for practicing Dzogchen are found directly after it. If you follow this system, you don't really need any other practices at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

seeker242 said:

What other people do or don't do is their own business. What they do or don't do is irrelevant. I think you've missed the point I was making, which is that it's not appropriate to engage in offensive speech....If you are trying to say that just being a Mahayana Buddhist, is itself, offensive, that is not close to being the same as oneself engaging in offensive speech.

Malcolm wrote:

So, by using the term "Hināyāna," Buddha was engaged in offensive speech?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:
dzogchungpa said:
May I ask how you know who is a qualified teacher?

Malcolm wrote:
Well, it starts with one's prospective teacher having received a good education in Dharma, etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 6:02 AM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
ok I'll bite: for example?

Malcolm wrote:
Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, for example, is a bodhisattva on the stages.

gad rgyangs said:
actually, if you read the description of the first stage here:

<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/stages-and-path> it actually does sound like him.

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed...hence my point.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 4:41 AM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

Simon E. said:
This isn't about me..or you. No matter how much cuts that across your attention seeking agenda.

dzogchungpa said:
Yeah, I really should get a life, shouldn't I?

Simon E. said:
Its about the fact that real teachers exist with real teachings for those who can get their eyes off their own reflection.

dzogchungpa said:
You mean, like Ngakpa Chogyam and Pema Khandro?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 4:35 AM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

Saoshun said:
We can talk about it. I actually have good understanding (read almost all english publication of dzogchen) on the concept based and view, and rigpa etc. but sitting all the time in rigpa doesn't seem to release from samsara beyond recognition of rigpa which is there, but maybe I miss some other instructions to get with union empty and blissful as they say.

Malcolm wrote:
Hahahahaha, my friend, reading about Dzogchen will get you no where.

And no, we cannot really talk about. Dzogchen is the path that depends on direct introduction and personal experience.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 4:04 AM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, for example, is a bodhisattva on the stages.

Saoshun said:
he seems rather like intellectual dzogchen wh just passing the view and talks about it. but I do not know him rather besides some youtube videos and couple ifnformation that he passing things like yantra yoga etc. but I do not see any manufactured enlightenment beings by his works. Many of his students which I met have rather level of realization like lip service dzogchen, it's fine while talking about it but then when life gets you it's useless.

Malcolm wrote:
You don't understand Dzogchen. If you did, you would not say such silly things.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 3:48 AM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

gad rgyangs said:
ok I'll bite: for example?

Malcolm wrote:
Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, for example, is a bodhisattva on the stages.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 3:40 AM
Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form?
Content:
smcj said:
Let's make Dzogchungpa the moderator and add the rule that you've got to have a sense of humor to post in Open Dharma. That should diffuse problematic posting.

dzogchungpa said:
This.

Simon E. said:
Yes. The way that putting the village idiot in charge of the coffers would solve the communities finance problems.

dzogchungpa said:
I'm beginning to feel like a bit of an Aunt Sally.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 3:37 AM
Title: Re: What is terma?
Content:
Terma said:
Someone here please correct me if this is wrong, but I have been taught that all Tertons are emanations of one of the "25 disciples of Guru Rinpoche" that were present during the assembly of the great dispensation. This is the direct correlation of why these particular Masters were destined to find the particular Terma at that specific time.

Malcolm wrote:
This really is not true. There are all kinds of termas that have nothing to do with Padmasambhava, for example, the 17 tantras, Vima Nyinthig, the Brahmin cycle, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Have you met and interviewed Arhats, Bodhisattvas and Buddhas in order to understand what if any realization they have, or are you merely reporting what is said in various old texts of diverse origins? And on what grounds do you decide which of those texts, when they disagree, you will believe?

Reporting on, and discussing what is presented in old texts is called historical research, and is very interesting. Taking what they say as absolutely veridical without a shred of evidence is foolhardy.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we have that evidence in the form of the continued tradition of practice of Mahāyāna teachings for more than 2000 years.

We also have the evidence of the practice of Theravada, etc., for 2000 years.

We know quite well that for Theravadins, etc., nirvana is the end of the road, cessation. This point of view is strictly rejected in Mahāyāna.

gad rgyangs said:

we know what the texts say, that's not the issue. The question is, do the texts make any sense & what is the concrete evidence that anything in them is true? Isn't there an irredeemable subjective component to the whole thing, in that there is no way to proceed from the assumption of another's attainment?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha describes quite well in the Agamas the differences between his realization and that of four classes of aryas.

gad rgyangs said:

And as far as the different fruits go, well let's talk to an Arhat, a Bodhisattva on the levels and a Samyak Sambuddha and ask them. Oh wait.... there aren't any to talk to..

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, that is really not true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form
Content:

Jeff H said:

Challenging Buddha's teachings in order to re-establish them for ourselves is a common Buddhist teaching across many traditions.

Malcolm wrote:

People are challenging the teachings without even beginning to understand them, or as in the case of some here, have no interest really in learning what Mahāyāna Buddhism actually is and why it critiques non-Mahāyāna schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Matt J said:

One could argue that those who reject rebirth aren't Buddhists, but neo-Buddhists. Why? Because they reject the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Noble Truth. Under the materialist view, the origin of suffering is biological birth, and suffering will cease upon death. Accordingly, the Buddhist teachings are at best, merely an early exit from suffering. At worst, they are a complete waste of time.

Rather than spend time on practice, we would be better off spending our time earning money or otherwise making ourselves as comfortable as possible until the liberating moment of death. The quickest and surest path to the end of suffering is not Zen, Vajrayana, Dzogchen, or Mahamudra, but actually a premature death.

It seems like the whole enterprise falls apart without rebirth.

Kim O'Hara said:

Uh, uh ... suffering will cease upon death, you say, but how do you know?
And what happens if you're wrong?

At times like this, I call for the Apannaka Sutta:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.060.than.html>

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

Thus — by means of the divine eye, purified and surpassing the human — he sees beings passing away and re-appearing, and he discerns how they are inferior and superior, beautiful and ugly, fortunate and unfortunate in accordance with their kamma. And thus, we can see here clearly the Buddha taught rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 14th, 2016 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Ayu said:

Criticized? Can you give examples, please?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Abhisamaya-alaṃkāra contains a detailed critique of the arhat path and pratyekabuddha path based on the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras.

The first section of the Mahāyāna Sūtrālaṃkāra similarly contains a fairly detailed critique of Hināyāna schools and a defense of Mahāyāna.

These are just the treatises involved. In the sūtras themselves the Buddha mentions many reasons why the path taught in the Agamas/Nikayas is incomplete and not the definitive meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Norwegian said:

I find it extremely tiresome that actual quotes from Mahayana sutras can be questioned, challenged, ridiculed, picked apart, and criticized on a Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism forum. Of all the places.

dzogchungpa said:

Do you think everything in every Mahayana sutra is literally true?

Malcolm wrote:

That is completely beside the point. But do you think that everything written about Buddhadharma in Western Academia is literally true? Do you think the account of the rise of Mahāyāna given by Western Academics is more true than the account traditionally given? Are people even aware of what the traditional account is?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 11:37 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

kirtu said:

We should also be able to defend the orthodox Mahayana position on it's own merits.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not allowed in this forum. In other words, in a Mahāyāna forum there is a subforum where people are barred from using that tradition's own texts as a means to defend the tradition when it is attacked:

Kim O'Hara said:

If you can point us towards some standards by which to judge the superiority or inferiority of a religious path - from outside that religion - I would be delighted. But if you can only argue Mahayana's superiority from within Mahayana, your arguments are fatally tainted by the stink of self-justification.

kirtu said:

Debating the teachings is also meritorious.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if there is a common basis for debate.

Actually, Mahāyāna texts do identify very specific Hināyāna positions that Theravadins continue to hold, and refute them precisely on the basis of what those Agama/Nikāya sūtras do or don't teach. In order to show how Mahāyāna is superior to Hinayāna it is precisely by relying on those texts that we do so, as Nāgārjuna indicates in the Ratnavali.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, unless I'm mistaken, DW is a forum where everyone, even non-Buddhists, can discuss Mahayana and Vajrayana. I think it's a sign of strength that the whole place doesn't have to be some kind of Mahayana safe space.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not mean we have to provide a sandbox for people to engage in non-virtue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Why would we, as a Mahāyāna forum, wish to encourage a subforum where people can engage in the unmeritorious activity of criticizing Mahāyāna Dharma?

Astus said:

People have questions whether they can post it or not. They also have disagreements to various degrees. Since the sections for specific traditions are meant to accept and maintain the given school's tenets - that is, as I imagine it, in a discussion those are the sources that take primacy over other. Therefore, Open Dharma means that no source whatsoever have primacy. Although in a way that is a straight way to chaos and confusion, it could also mean a 'pure reason' arena, where only the very basics of perception and logic counts. Except that very few, if any, can uphold such argument rules. Still, we can try.

Malcolm wrote:

Why should Mahāyānis have to defend Mahāyāna on a Mahāyāna forum?

Why should there be a subforum where people are allowed to challenge any and all Mahāyāna tenets with impunity?

There is plenty of debate in the specific traditions forums, debate that is open and grounded in sources.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

Have you met and interviewed Arhats, Bodhisattvas and Buddhas in order to understand what if any realization they have, or are you merely reporting what is said in various old texts of diverse origins? And on what grounds do you decide which of those texts, when they disagree, you will believe?

Reporting on, and discussing what is presented in old texts is called historical research, and is very interesting. Taking what they say as absolutely veridical without a shred of evidence is foolhardy.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we have that evidence in the form of the continued tradition of practice of Mahāyāna teachings for more than 2000 years.

We also have the evidence of the practice of Theravada, etc., for 2000 years.

We know quite well that for Theravadins, etc., nirvana is the end of the road, cessation. This point of view is strictly rejected in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Should the Open Dharma forum continue in its present form
Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

1. There is no need whatsoever for any member to view Open Dharma unless they actively choose to do so, and even less need for them to participate in it.

Malcolm wrote:

I have explained to you before that avoiding forums is not the way to go.

Kim O'Hara said:

2. That said, it is apparent from the stats on the Index page that a large number of members do value the forum.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it merely draws a high number of views because it is the forum in which there are the most controversies.

Kim O'Hara said:

3. The admin team did review both the existence and the guidelines for the forum quite recently and made them clearer but didn't change them in any substantive way.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, the language you chose ENCOURAGES CRITICISM OF THE DHARMA.

Kim O'Hara said:

4. One primary reason for retaining Open Dharma was precisely for discussing differences between schools - and not just Mahayana vis-a-vis Theravada, but Vajrayana vis-a-vis Pure Land, or Zen vis-a-vis Sufism, etc. For that discussion to be free, the guideline needed to be, as it is now, "... all Mahayana teachings are open to challenge." But that is quarantined from the rest of the board by the first half of that sentence, "The only forum on Dharma Wheel in which ..." (emphasis added).

Malcolm wrote:

Only a non-Mahāyāni would have written the rules of this subforum in this way. Why would we, as a Mahāyāna forum, wish to encourage a subforum where people can engage in the unmeritorious activity of criticizing Mahāyāna Dharma?

Kim O'Hara said:

5. Return to point (1) if (4) still bothers you.

Malcolm wrote:

This not the same as for example, avoiding going to white power forums, etc. Here, you are permitting a level of prejudice and polemics that is not tolerated on Dhamma Wheel.

In short, the principles of this "open dharma" subforum are neither open nor Dharmic. It is an embarrassment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 7:43 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Is this unreasonable?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is quite unreasonable to have a subforum in a Buddhist forum in which it is allowed for people to attack the very foundations of Buddhadharma, and secondly, in a Mahāyāna forum, to attack the foundation of Mahāyāna.

For example, Kim would like there to be some standard outside of Mahāyāna for Mahāyāna critiques of arhat path and so on. When evidence is provided from Mahāyāna Sūtras and treatises, it is dismissed as invalid. But this is quite ironic — here, in a Mahāyāna forum, evidence from Mahāyāna sūtras themselves are not counted as sufficient evidence for the Mahāyāna position. Amazing and disgusting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:39 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Please feel free to do so. All I am saying is that in the Open Dharma forum, saying you prefer the Mahayana POV is not much of an argument. Perhaps you object to the mere existence of such a subforum in a Mahayana forum, but that is a separate issue. As far as I can tell, the whole point of the Open Dharma forum is that it is open to other, possibly non-Mahayana, POVs, right?

Malcolm wrote:

I have objected to this forum often to the staff.

The fact that this is a Mahāyāna forum means that Mahāyāna standards should dominate. Having Open Dharma forum here is akin to a Black Lives Matter forum having a special area for the KKK.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

A) do some Buddhist texts represent the Buddha saying that Mahayana is superior to Hinayana? Yes.

B) did the historical Buddha ever say any such thing? No way of knowing, but doubtful.

C) are such sayings more likely nothing but triumphalist sectarian boasting issuing from much later Buddhist communities and put into the mouth of the Buddha as an attempt at legitimization? Almost certainly.

Malcolm wrote:

This assumes that you have decided there is no difference between the realization of an arhat, for example, and a Buddha. It also means that you have excluded the possibility of awakened bodhisattvas, ala Theravada.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... I prefer the traditional account of the rise of Mahāyāna. Given that this is a Mahāyāna forum, it is one that should receive the most respect.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but as I tried to point out earlier, apparently in a way that displeased some mod, this is the Open Dharma forum i.e. the "only forum on Dharma Wheel in which all Mahayana teachings are open to challenge" so your point here is irrelevant.

Malcolm wrote:

Can you imagine the shit storm that would ensue if I took your attitude to Dhammawheel? As far as I know, Mahāyanīs do not pester Theravadins with the Mahāyāna POV there. Why should anti-Mahāyāna sentiments be left unchallenged here?

If this is the Open Dharma forum, than this means that it is entirely appropriate for me to post any and all sūtras where Buddha discusses the difference between Hinayāna and Mahāyāna (there are many), as well as any commentaries which are germane to the point.

Further, this agenda of this forum is unfair. The Dhamma Wheel Open Dhamma Forum simple states, "An open and inclusive investigation into Buddhism and spiritual cultivation."

Why should we experience the discrimination of having "The only forum on Dharma Wheel in which all Mahayana teachings are open to challenge. Discuss 'hot topics' such as rebirth, karma and differences between schools..."?

It is simply wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Simon E. said:

There is no contradiction here. To establish the nature of the Great Vehicle it is not necessary to delineate other vehicles.

Malcolm wrote:

But they are delineated, as the Sūtra of Great Liberation states:

The Hinayāna is explained to narrow-minded śrāvakas. The Madhyayāna is explained to the broader-minded pratyekabuddhas. The Mahāyāna is explained to the bodhisattva mahāsattvas who have entered the great path.

And:

The example for the Mahāyāna is Sumeru,

the example for Hinayāna is an anthill.

The example for Mahāyāna is the sun and moon,

the example for Hinayāna is a spark.

Kim O'Hara said:

Sigh.

Standard sectarian polemics.

Malcolm wrote:

No, these are the words of the Buddha.

Kim O'Hara said:

Not even a trace of justification for them - or perhaps there is but you just didn't bother posting the continuation?

Malcolm wrote:

Why do I need to justify the words of the Buddha? Are you going to censor the Buddha's own words now as sectarian polemics?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That's a savagely truncated version of a long and interesting paper. The whole of it is worth reading.

Malcolm wrote:

It assumes that the Western Academic version of Buddhist history is the correct one.

Kim O'Hara said:

Do you have a better version, then?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a just so story, just like any history.

That being the case, I prefer the traditional account of the rise of Mahāyāna. Given that this is a Mahāyāna forum, it is one that should receive the most respect.

That being the case, I therefore assume that Mahāyāna was taught during the Buddha's career, irrespective of when Mahāyāna sūtras were set down in writing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Hmmm.. would appearances be equivalent with the dependent nature conventions equivalent with illusory nature

In the Yogacara view?

Bakmoon said:

I also would really like to know the answer to this question. The Yogacara teaching of the three natures has always been a bit confusing to me because different sources seem to present them differently (and that's just in a Cittamatra context, not even going into the Shentong version of the three natures).

Mostly I am confused because some sources make it sound like the dependent nature means the appearance of the object and the illusory nature is the designation applied to it, but in other places it sounds like the dependent nature refers to the mind, and the illusory nature is the appearance.

Also, is the idea of mapping the three natures onto the two truths with the illusory nature and dependent nature being subdivisions of conventional truth something that is laid out in Indian texts or is that a latter appropriation?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventions are the imputed nature. Appearances are the imputed nature in the dependent nature.

The mapping of the two truths to the three natures is a Tibetan thing.

There is no mention at all of the the two truths in the three of the five treatises of Maitreya. The two truths are mentioned briefly in the Uttaratantra and once in the Sutra-alamkara. Any discussions about relative and ultimate truth are generally confined to Vasubandhu's Yogacara commentaries, etc., apart from Asanga briefly discussing them in his Uttaratantra commentary.

Basically, it appears that Yogacarins tried to come up with an explanation of emptiness that completely bypasses the idea of the two truths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

Matt J said:

This is not an easy question to answer. Take this cup. Lots of appearances--- table, floor, cold feeling, tingling etc., but I select some of them and say "cup." So I can't say the appearance doesn't depend on the convention. On the other hand, if I close my eyes, the cup appearance vanishes, so I can't say that the appearance does depend on the convention.

Even worse, whatever one would call a convention is also an appearance--- a thought or set of thoughts, feelings, etc.

I would reject them both and say interdependent.

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty clear that conventions depend on appearances. In other words, there has to first be an appearance upon which a convention is settled.

Relative truths are appearances to a misapprehending mind, while conventions are designations made on the basis of appearances.

Thus, when it is said that something exists conventionally, this means no more and no less than a group of people have agreed that a given appearance bears the identity which has been agreed upon. Thus appearances do not depend on conventions, but conventions certainly depend on appearances. As such, they are a step removed from perception. Appearances are perceived, conventions are not, the latter are superimposed on appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

Matt J said:

I would say there is no convention apart from appearances, so what's with separating them?

Malcolm wrote:

Which is dependent on the other?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

Matt J said:

I vote for: appearances!

Malcolm wrote:

What precisely is a convention?

Let me ask you then. Does the convention arise before the appearance, with the appearance or after the appearance?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Ayu said:

I mean: whatever path one chooses, one should study that, understand it more and more, stick to it - and don't compare it.

SpinyNorman said:

I agree, but it's not me who is comparing one set of schools unfavourably to another set with an inbuilt assumption of superiority.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna has that inbuilt assumption, hence its name: "Mahāyāna."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 13th, 2016 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Simon E. said:

There is no contradiction here. To establish the nature of the Great Vehicle it is not necessary to delineate other vehicles.

Malcolm wrote:

But they are delineated, as the Sūtra of Great Liberation states:

The Hinayāna is explained to narrow-minded śrāvakas. The Madhyayāna is explained to the broader-minded pratyekabuddhas. The Mahāyāna is explained to the bodhisattva mahāsattvas who have entered the great path.

And:

The example for the Mahāyāna is Sumeru,

the example for Hinayāna is an anthill.

The example for Mahāyāna is the sun and moon,

the example for Hinayāna is a spark.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 11:26 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What precisely is a convention?

Taco_Rice said:

Obviously, it's the way things appear to ordinary people in ordinary daily existence.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean things appear to us as or through social contracts? No, I don't think so.

Taco_Rice said:

He's obviously using this word to signify what is referred to in T'ien T'ai stuff as "provisional positing," where the world is full of birds, trees, cars, cities, theme parks and data collators, whereas in Emptiness there is ultimately no car, no tires to go missing, no witnesses or authorities to report to nor any bat to strike any head nor trauma to overcome. Thusness; all that is is what everything is, whereas you thought it was what you thought—despite the fact that it is precisely because it isn't, which is why you thought that. That truth is everywhere, just like that bat.

Malcolm wrote:

So now you have three isolates to deal with provisional positing, emptiness and suchness.

One: are these three things the or different?

Two: Are emptiness and suchness not the same thing?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Consuming Honey = Stealing?

Content:

lucidaromulus said:

Is consuming honey considered supporting the act of committing Stealing?

Reason being, them bees spend their day gathering honey, whiles the bee guy/girl collects the honey without asking permission and seeking consent.

Malcolm wrote:

The bees are actually paying rent on nice condos built for them by beekeepers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

gad rgyangs said:

a Tibetan Lama told me in private once that people of lower intelligence as far as dharma goes are born in Hinayana countries, and those with higher capacity are born in Mahayana countries and of course those with the greatest intelligence and capacity are born in Vajrayana Tibet.

Conversely, a monk at a Burmese temple, after I told him I was a student of Tibetan Buddhism, invited me to come to his temple to "learn the real Buddhism".

what a bunch of wankers.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they have not understood that the people with the very most highest capacity are classical guitarists in NYC.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

"Enlightenment" (at least as we encounter and live such in the Zen corner of the Mahayana, others may define "enlightenment" some other way) can be encountered, embodied, expressed and lived.

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, it is just a belief that you hold, and ill-defined at that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Malcolm,

Again, conventionally, but not inherently.

Is Malcolm real?

Well, yes, conventionally it's the most real thing you know, your moment to moment qualia.

But ultimately, no, it is a conceptual construct that tries to "freeze" your ever-changing mindstream into a fixed independent entity.

Malcolm wrote:

What precisely is a convention?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

That's a savagely truncated version of a long and interesting paper. The whole of it is worth reading.

Malcolm wrote:

It assumes that the Western Academic version of Buddhist history is the correct one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 5:35 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Matt J said:

It seems like the whole enterprise falls apart without rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

It does, but then what to do with the fancy gear, robes, titles and students?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jundo:

You resort to the same fallacy twice in the course of a single day. Your wits need some sharpening.

You are so hilarious -- you accept "Enlightenment" with about the same evidence for it as there is for the FSM, and yet you reject rebirth since there is no evidence for it.

Well, what did someone say once? "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds..."

jundo cohen said:

And Malcolm, Also there are a huge number of assumptions in the above, themselves liable to be faulted.

Oh yes. Arguments against rebirth are "assumptions" while those in favor (no matter how "what if" and jumping through hoops to explain) are evidence ...

... and we should just believe. If I may offer (and I just propose the possibility, I could be wrong), the method of argumentation you employ is about the same as people in another corner of the religious world use to defend the earth being 5000 years old and made in 6 Days. The difference? Perhaps only that they are religious Christians defending a hard to swallow tenet of their religion via similar routes of defense. I must say about them as well, that "anything is possible" and more power to them.

Room in the great wide world (whether 5000 years old or not) for all of us, and no need to argue who is right.

Gassho, Jundo

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

rachmiel said:

Malcolm, ultimately yes, conventionally no.

Malcolm wrote:

And a convention, does it indicate something real?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Emptiness

Content:

rachmiel said:

But (imo) there IS no owner of these parts, there is only a set of processes that happen to exist in an interdependent web. Flower points to this web of processes.

SpinyNorman said:

A phrase I've found helpful is: "No things, only processes." Or perhaps just one big process?

Malcolm wrote:

There aren't even processes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

smcj said:

Sounds to me he was barking up the right tree. Too bad nobody ever told him that Rigpa was self-aware without any duality. It would have saved him a whole lot of work that was wasted believing the subject/object duality was unavoidable.

Malcolm wrote:

To be self-aware automatically implies duality...its an even worse duality, since consciousness needs to take itself as an object...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Happy Zhang Zhung Losar !

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- Could you explain the difference here between Tsulug and Phulug ?

Malcolm wrote:

Simply put, they are two different systems of calculating the calendar based on the information in the commentary on the Kalacakra Tantra called Vimalaprabha.

Bonpos identify three different Kalacakras: the Sūtra Kalacakra found in the Ziji, which I mentioned already, which details the formation of the eon and so forth. The Buddhist Kalacakra Tantra, and finally so called Kalacakra of oral instructions for calculating the years, months, days and hours, which is basically the elemental calculation we know today. In the Bon tradition, the last one was taught in China by the Bon version of Mañjuśrī, Mrawey Sengey, to Kongtse Trulgyal. In the Buddhist tradition, elemental calculation was taught by Mañjuśrī in China to Kongtse Trulgyal. The two systems are so similar, that in the Bonpo astrology manuals, constant reference is made to earlier Buddhist texts, especially a Karma Kagyu text called the Bumzang, which is very popular in Eastern Tibet.

Really, about the only real difference between Bon and Buddhist astrology is the origin myths, and even here, the Bonpos include Sakyamuni as being one of the teachers of Kalacakra in general. A second difference is that the name Kalacakra is applied also to elemental calculation in the Bon tradition, but in the Buddhist tradition, elemental calculation and Kalacakra are regarded as being distinct and as having separate origins.

kalden yungdrung said:

Shambala seems to be a non-Buddhist Tradition which was received by an Indian King. The text would be fallen on the roof of his palace..... Well this seems to be a serious story.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no. Sakyamuni is said to have taught Kalacakra in South India, and the Shambala king was present for that teaching, and he returned home with it and taught it in Shambhala widely.

Code: #

If Bön would follow the Tsurpu tradition, what would this mean ?

It means that they followed the Karma Kagyu system of calculating calendars, that's all. It is just a kind of math.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

smcj said:

But no, areligious humanists have put a huge amount of work into trying to establish a code of ethics that is fundamentally justified beyond simply saying "That's how I would like it to be". To the best of my knowledge they have not been able to do so.

Malcolm wrote:

You apparently have never heard of Kant.

smcj said:

Actually I prefer Sartre, who predicates his ideas on the duality of subject/object relationship of mind. In other words his philosophy is based on the idea that Mahamudra/Dzogchen is impossible, but its' still a worthy effort.

Malcolm wrote:

Sarte is not a serious philosopher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You then follow this up with "I just don't believe in rebirth." This is a statement of opinion, but it is not an argument.

jundo cohen said:

Hi Malcolm,

I have quickly spelled out some of the reasons why I doubt detailed, traditional models of Buddhist Rebirth. That is an argument.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are a list of qualms. Qualms and doubts are not arguments.

jundo cohen said:

However, putting aside my shorthand summary, some others have spelled out more detailed arguments and evidence against:

If we take that time period back to the aeons of cosmic contraction and expansion, the problems only ramify. Around 700,000 to a million lifetimes and we are into the pre-hominid.

At this point there is certainly no developed language, and the bodhisatta would have had no name. He could only have been one or another variety of animal, but even so, animals only go back about 600-700 million years.

Prior to that it's not clear the bodhisatta could have been reborn on Earth, at least that would be the case if we assume that only animals have the consciousness available for kamma and rebirth.

Of course, the Buddha could have been reborn on other planes or planets, but once again there is no mention of vast divergences in body plan, language, culture, or surroundings that would indicate such a rebirth. Indeed, the evidence provided in MN 39 is consistent with a world in which humans always existed in a way much as in the Buddha's own time. If this is evidence for rebirth, it is not very convincing. More convincing would have been some otherwise inexplicable stories about social, linguistic, and morphological change as the Buddha retreated into memories of the distant past.

<http://secularbuddhism.org/2013/05/29/a-secular-evaluation-of-rebirth/>

Malcolm wrote:

This amounts to saying, "Since Homer couched the events of Troy using the contemporary morays of his day, this should cause us to have great doubts about whether Troy existed."

Also there are a huge number of assumptions in the above, themselves liable to be faulted.

jundo cohen said:

Now let us go back to the case of young Lama Osel and his predecessor. Although one hypothesis to explain his appearance in Lama Zopa's dream, and his choice of the right rosary, is that he is the reincarnation of Lama Thubten Yeshe, could we not conceive of an alternative hypothesis that would be no less problematic than the theory of rebirth? One has to remember the environment in which Lama Osel has been brought up. From a very early age he has been immersed in images of Lama Yeshe and the world of Tibetan Buddhism (like the photo he referred to in the interview), subjected to high-profile media attention because of his having been identified as a tulku, and surrounded by people with a high investment in believing that he is the reincarnation of their teacher. Let us imagine that the child is simply responding to the expectations of the adults around him. He already knows that when he makes certain gestures or speaks in a certain tone of voice, those who care for him will exclaim with joy, "Oh, that's just like Lama Yeshe!" So when this sensitive child is confronted with a range of rosaries, could he not simply be responding to the hopes and expectations of his audience—none of whom are indifferent to the outcome? One wonders if the same tests were run under laboratory conditions in the presence of neutral observers whether the results would be the same.

<http://www.stephenbatchelor.org/index.php/en/rebirth-a-case-for-buddhist-agnosticism>

Malcolm wrote:

This is an irrelevant example. Buddha himself never spoke of such an institution of recognizing tulkus, but when Maudgalyāyana inquired of the Buddha where his mother had taken birth, the Buddha was able to answer him.

Thus, the institution of recognizing reincarnations has no bearing on whether or not rebirth is a fact of being a sentient being.

jundo cohen said:

However, I do not want to rehash the arguments, and simply point out that to some of us these beliefs are not necessary, and there is some basis in old texts for claiming the illusory nature of the whole thing.

Malcolm wrote:

And yet you refuse to take the illusory nature of the whole thing to its logical conclusion...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

smcj said:

But no, areligious humanists have put a huge amount of work into trying to establish a code of ethics that is fundamentally justified beyond simply saying "That's how I would like it to be". To the best of my knowledge they have not been able to do so.

Malcolm wrote:

You apparently have never heard of Kant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Happy Zhang Zhung Losar !

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Thanks for your explanation Malcolm.

The astrological calendar is important to know regarding time tables.

But it is amazing that we can speak here about two "different" systems.

The only time calculation i know until the very moment is the Kalachakra system.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and there are two systems of calculating the yearly calendar based on this, Tshulug and Phuglug.

kalden yungdrung said:

Kalachakra system is in Bön also known but not seen as highest Tantra etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, because it comes from the 20th chapter of the Ziji, and this text was a terma not revealed until the 14th century, nearly 400 hundred years after the Kalacakra Tantra was introduced to Tibet.

kalden yungdrung said:

So i guess that Kalachakra connects Bön with Kagyud maybe.

Malcolm wrote:

It seems the Bonpos follow the system developed at Tshurphu.

kalden yungdrung said:

But how are the astrological systems of the other Tibetan Traditions explained and why they maybe could differ, that would be interesting to know.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference lies in the calculations are made. No system of Tibetan astrology is actually based on how the stars move in the sky.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I think another point central to this topic is the question: why exactly do we feel the need to create a label "Buddhism" and then judge who is inside this circle and who isn't? I get that all of us are following teachings that are traced back to the same guy... But at some point, it seems like a little too much to have long debates about which labels apply to whom. Just my two cents.

Simon E. said:

I would suggest that no one is doing that. What some are doing is pointing to Buddhadharma as given. It is an individual matter whether one internalises that Dharma or substitutes something else.

tomamundsen said:

Doesn't the title of this topic assume that is going on to some extent? If we haven't created the label of Buddhism, then what are we talking about that is changing? And if we aren't labeling certain traditions or people as non-Buddhist based on their changes, then what exactly is this conversation about?

Malcolm wrote:

Some people will obviously depart from the Dharma because they adopt principles which run counter to the basic tenets the Buddha taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I think another point central to this topic is the question: why exactly do we feel the need to create a label "Buddhism" and then judge who is inside this circle and who isn't? I get that all of us are following teachings that are traced back to the same guy... But at some point, it seems like a little too much to have long debates about which labels apply to whom. Just my two cents.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not the point. But regardless of what anyone personally believes, rebirth is a tenet of Buddhadharma which is nonnegotiable. So when people express their lack of confidence in the Buddha's teaching, their understanding of those teachings are likely to be called into question, and even whether or not they are actually people who are following the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So far, you have not pointed out anything which represents a coherent negation of rebirth. So if you can't refute it, you should accept it.

jundo cohen said:

That is the logical fallacy of argument from ignorance.

Malcolm wrote:

No one said, "You should accept the flying spaghetti monster as real because you cannot prove it is false."

But we are discussing a premise the Buddha taught, and since you have not presented any coherent argument against this premise, you should accept it.

You have said only "The Buddha, while enlightened, might be wrong about this and other things." But this is also another fallacy, "Poisoning the well."

You then follow this up with "I just don't believe in rebirth." This is a statement of opinion, but it is not an argument.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am merely pointing out to you that you keeping placing limitations, mostly material, on the limitless.

jundo cohen said:

You are correct. However, although there is that which is limitless, it that does not mean that whatever fantastic thing human beings may imagine is necessary the actual state of affairs. It does not mean that Obama was born in Nigeria or that Jesus walked on water. 'Granted, perhaps in some alternate universe there is a Pres. Obama born in their Nigeria, etc.). Even if the Buddha and Jesus got together to say Obama was born in Nigeria, I do not think that would make it so (granted, I just doubt it and it is not central to Practice).

Thus "limitless" does entail everything being true.

Malcolm wrote:

So far, you have not pointed out anything which represents a coherent negation of rebirth. So if you can't refute it, you should accept it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Thank you, Malcolm. It may be so. I celebrate your tightly held religious beliefs and personal philosophical positions.

do not preclude

"Does not preclude" is not the same as "is thus necessarily". It could be, just not so important to all of us in the Buddhist world.

Gassho, Jundo

Malcolm wrote:

I am merely pointing out to you that you keeping placing limitations, mostly material, on the limitless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If there is no rebirth, there is no point to the Dharma, as Dogen makes very clear in Shobogenzo. It does not matter whether that rebirth is illusory or relative, in contrast to an ultimate state in which there is no birth or even death.

As long as we live in this illusion called birth and death, the point of Dharma practice is to put an end to the illusion of birth and death. As long as we are talking about illusory sentient beings, being illusory, their birth, death and transmigration functions from delusion about their own illusory nature. Otherwise, if rebirth is rejected, you are placing hard, material limitations on something which you argue is not actually real at all. This is an internal contradiction in your thinking.

jundo cohen said:
Hi Malcolm,

I have no trouble with any of this. This is what I teach in our little Sangha.

The only question I hold (and likely share with most skeptics on this issues in the Buddhist world) concerns very detailed models of rebirth in which, once this corpse is dumped in the grave, my soulless stream of Karmic effects comes back as a bunny rabbit, Asura, a god somewhere over Mt. Sumeru (another hard to defend model of reality that Buddhism has pretty much learned to survive without) or a prisoner of the ice hell.

Not important to Practice. Take that or leave that. If I come back as a bunny, please give me a carrot. We are dying and reborn in each moment, and we create endless little heavens and hells for ourselves and for others in this life by our volitional words, thoughts and acts. We need to see through all that, plus through the life and death of the grave. That's enough.

Gassho, Jundo

Malcolm wrote:

There is and only ever has been one model of rebirth in Buddhadharma. You keep conflating cosmology with the principle of punarbhāva, rebirth. The former is not necessary to the latter.

One, in Mahāyāna it is maintained that the three realms are mind only. This includes the six lokas, features such as Mt. Meru and so on, including the perception you have of your own sense organs, body and so on. According to Mahāyāna, all of these perceptions and experiences arise from traces activated in the all-basis consciousness.

Now that we have removed physicality and cosmology from the equation, we can understand that the apparent death of our physical body is not a death of a physical body, rather it is the cessation of the perception of a physical body we have now and in this life time. But given that we accept, as Mahāyānists, that all phenomena are only mind, the exhaustion of this life's appearances do not preclude the arising of the appearance of a new series of aggregates to our consciousness, whether or not we have any memory of a past life.

Descarte had it wrong, there is no demon in the mix; but there are afflictions in the mix, and for as long as the traces of those afflictions contaminate our minds streams, then for us there is no end to birth and death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Hi Malcolm,

Eyes and ears ... drowning or not drowning ...

I am still not sure what that has to do with whether very detailed models of rebirth are actually so, and whether it is central to Buddhist Practice.

A life preserver I can see and, dream or not, it seems to keep me afloat in the stormy sea (dream or not).

If someone else thinks that "rebirth" floats their boat and keeps them afloat in the stormy samsaric sea, then I salute them if they can clutch on to that. Good for them. Likewise for someone who believes in flying elephants that may swoop by and save one from drowning, good for them.

Whatever keeps you afloat.

Gassho, Jundo

Malcolm wrote:

If there is no rebirth, there is no point to the Dharma, as Dogen makes very clear in Shobogenzo. It does not matter whether that rebirth is illusory or relative, in contrast to an ultimate state in which there is no birth or even death.

One does not cling to rebirth as a raft. In this, you have it wrong. It is quite the opposite. Rebirth is itself the stormy ocean of samsara, from which one seeks rescue via the raft of Dharma.

As long as we live in this illusion called birth and death, the point of Dharma practice is to put an end to the illusion of birth and death. As long as we are talking about illusory sentient beings, being illusory, their birth, death and transmigration functions from delusion about their own illusory nature. Otherwise, if rebirth is rejected, you are placing hard, material limitations on something which you argue is not actually real at all. This is an internal contradiction in your thinking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So you do not believe the world to be illusory after all.

jundo cohen said:

This is a great Koan ... it is yet not yet it is ...

... and so many aspects of the world exist largely between the ears and behind the eyes
(I doubt an ant would worry about rebirth and all this debate) ...

Malcolm wrote:

So your eyes and ears are not illusory.

jundo cohen said:

The world is illusory but then some things are even more illusory!

Malcolm wrote:

You sound like a person who, while drowning, argues over whether some water is more watery than other water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Happy Zhang Zhung Losar !

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Phuglug Losar, followed by Gelugpas, Sakyapas, and Nyingmapas, comes next month.

tomamundsen said:

Nyingmapas from Eastern Bhutan observed it yesterday.

Malcolm wrote:

Then they too are following Tshurlug. Most Tibetans however will celebrate this on February 8th.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are on shaky ground with these citations, Jundo. If you accept illusory sentient beings, why not accept their equally illusory birth, death and transmigration?

No one can doubt that illusory elephants in shadow play never experience birth, death and transmigration, but no one doubts that appearance of illusory elephants arise, abide, perish and then reappear elsewhere in another show.

jundo cohen said:

Hi Malcolm,

I am not sure of your elephantine point here. Just because I dream of pink flying elephants who are reborn each night in my dreams, or read about them in an old sacred text (or see one in an old Disney movie which repeats when I put in a DVD) does not mean that there are actually pink flying elephants in this world born or reborn.

Malcolm wrote:

So you do not believe the world to be illusory after all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Happy Zhang Zhung Losar !

Content:

tingdzin said:

I wasn't aware there was a Losar different from the Tibetan one. More information, please!

Malcolm wrote:

The Bonpo Losar and the Karma Kagyu Losar fall on the same day. This is because Bonpo astrologers follow Tshurlug, rather than Phuglug.

The Phuglug Losar, followed by Gelugpas, Sakyapas, and Nyingmapas, comes next month.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 12th, 2016 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are on shaky ground with these citations, Jundo. If you accept illusory sentient beings, why not accept their equally illusory birth, death and transmigration?

No one can doubt that illusory elephants in shadow play never experience birth, death and transmigration, but no one doubts that appearance of illusory elephants arise, abide, perish and then reappear elsewhere in another show.

jundo cohen said:
Heart Sutra:

No old age and death, no [start nor] cessation of old age and death [because empty]

Vimalakirti Sutra

"The Dharma knows nothing of living beings, because it is removed from the defilement of such concepts as "living beings." The Dharma knows nothing of "I," because it is removed from the defilement of such concepts as "I." It knows nothing of a life span, because it knows nothing of birth and death. It knows nothing of individuality, because it is cut off from considerations of past or future lives. The Dharma is forever still and serene, because it has wiped out all characteristics.

...

Shariputra said to the goddess, "When your present existence comes to an end, where will you be reborn?"

The goddess replied, "The way the Buddha is born in his transformation body-that's how I'll be born."

Shariputra said, "When the Buddha is born in his transformation body, it is not a matter of birth or death.

The goddess said, "It's that way with living beings too-they are without birth or death."

...

The bodhisattva Good Will said, "The realm of birth and death and that of nirvana form a dualism. But if one sees the true nature of birth and death, one sees that there is no birth or death, no binding, no unbinding, no birth, no extinction. One who understands in this way may thereby enter the gate of nondualism.

...

Again, the sutras enable one to practice the teachings as the Law directs, to accord with the twelve-linked chain of causation, to set aside erroneous views and accept the truth of birthlessness, to realize once and for all that there is no ego, no existence of living beings, no deviating from or disputing with the law of cause and effect, thus removing all thought of personal possession. They teach one to rely on meaning, not on words; to rely on wisdom, not on consciousness; to rely on sutras that are complete in meaning, not on those that are incomplete in meaning; to rely on the Law, not on the person; to go along with the true form of things, realizing that there is no entering in and no destination. They teach that, since ignorance in the end does not exist, so too action in the end does not exist, and so on through the other links in the twelve-linked chain of causation down to the fact that, since birth in the end does not exist, so too old age and death in the end do not exist. And when one learns to see in this manner, the twelve-linked chain of causation will cease to have any form that comes to an end, and one will no longer entertain the view that it does. This is called the finest of all offerings of the Law"

Surangama Sutra

While the (illusory) knower became a living being. This is the origin of a living being.

Ever after, this living being grasped at his body and mind as his Ego. How then can he now recognize his (essential) boundless True Mind? So in delusion, he thinks that his mind is in his body. Since, nanda clung to a mind within his body, he mistook this (illusory) mind for True Mind;

hence he saw only the Buddha's excellent characteristics which he admired but failed to realize that neither body nor mind exist. As he relied on the five aggregates, he divided them wrongly into six sense organs with corresponding sense data. He further clung to the four elements that produced five sense data as his Ego's fields of activities, thereby (creating) six consciousnesses and indulging in discriminations, illusions and karmic acts.

This was the origin of the cycle of births and deaths caused by attachment to body and mind as an Ego.

...

ë, nanda, you are still not clear about the illusory appearances of all passing phenomena which vanish wherever they arise. These illusions in the shape of forms spring from (their underlying nature which is) the substance of wonderful

Bodhi. So also are the six entrances (organs), the twelve ðyatana (six sense organs and six sense data) and the eighteen realms of senses which falsely arise from the mixture and union of causes and conditions and which falsely vanish when the same causes and conditions are disconnected.

They are but creation and destruction appearing and vanishing within the permanent, wonderfully bright, immutable, all-embracing and profound Bhåtatathat (absolute) nature of the Tathðgata store wherein neither coming nor going, neither delusion nor enlightenment, and neither birth nor death can be found.⁵

The Korean Son Teacher Chinul:

: Birth and death are originally nonexistent; they exist because of a false notion. It is like a person with diseased eyes who sees flowers in the sky. If a person without this disease says there are no flowers in the sky, the afflicted person will not believe it. But if his disease is cured, the flowers in the sky will vanish naturally and he can then accept that they were nonexistent. Although the flowers he sees have not yet vanished, they are, in fact, still void. It is only the sick man who takes them to be flowers; their essence does not really exist.

In the same way, people wrongly assume that birth and death exist. If a man free of birth and death tells them that birth and death are originally nonexistent, they will not believe him. But one morning, if illusion is put to rest, and birth and death are spontaneously abandoned, they will realize that birth and death are originally nonexistent. It is only when birth and death are not yet ended that, although they do not really exist, they seem to exist because of this false conceptualization. As a sutra says:

Men of good family! Since time immemorial all sentient beings have been subject to all kinds of inverted views. They are like people who have confused the four directions. They wrongly assume that the four elements are their own bodies. They regard the shadows conditioned by the six sense-objects as their own minds. This is like diseased eyes which see flowers in the sky. Yet even if all the flowers in the sky were to vanish from space, it still could not be said that they actually vanished. And why is this? Because they never came into existence in the first place. All sentient beings mistakenly perceive an arising and a ceasing within this non-rising state. For this reason, it is called the revolving wheel of birth and death."

According to the text of this sutra, we can be sure that if we have a penetrating awakening to the true mind of complete enlightenment, then, as originally, there is no birth or death.

We know now that there is no birth and death; but still we cannot liberate ourselves from birth and death because our practice is imperfect. As it says in the texts, Ambapali once asked Mañjuśrī, "I can understand that birth is actually the unborn dharma, but why then am I still subject to the flow of birth and death?" Mañjuśrī answered, "It is because your power is still insufficient." The mountain master Chin asked the mountain master Hsiu, "I understand that birth is actually the unborn dharma, but why am I still subject to the flow of birth and death?" Hsiu replied, "Bamboo shoots eventually become bamboo. But can you use them now to make a raft?" Accordingly, to know that there is no birth or death is not as good as to experience that there is no birth or death. To experience that there is no birth or death is not as good as to be in conformity with the birthless and the deathless. To be in conformity with the birthless and the deathless is not as good as to make use of the birthless and the deathless. People nowadays do not even know that there is no birth or death, let alone experience, be in conformity with, or make use of the birthless and the deathless. Is it not only natural, then, that people who assume there really is birth and death would not be able to believe in the birthless and deathless dharma?

<http://terebess.hu/zen/mesterek/Collected-Works-of-Chinul.pdf>

One can find countless such passages in imaginary Sutras and Shastra within this dream.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Actually, Malcolm, the question (both in the OP and in this part of the discussion) was "really whether Theravada is superior or inferior," and you have skidded deftly away from it.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that before we can even begin to address the question of inferiority, etc., we first have to evaluate whether Theravada fits the Mahāyāna description of a Hināyāna school.

Kim O'Hara said:

Why on earth do you feel you need to do that?

As I just said, "as soon as a path (team, race, ...) is defined as "other" it is, almost automatically, defined as inferior" and 99% of the rest is mere rationalisation. It's another manifestation of good old-fashioned clinging, really - my path, my nationality, my identity.

If you can point us towards some standards by which to judge the superiority or inferiority of a religious path - from outside that religion - I would be delighted. But if you can only argue Mahayana's superiority from within Mahayana, your arguments are fatally tainted by the stink of self-justification.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, the first step is to see whether or not Theravada fulfills the criteria that the Mahāyāna lays out for what a Hināyāna path might look like.

This can be evaluated in two ways:

1) There are two results to which one can aspire in Buddhadharma, arhatship and buddhahood. The path of arhatship, as everyone knows, does not lead to buddhahood. The bodhisattva path does lead to buddhahood.

2) It is claimed that the bodhisattva path is superior to the arhat path because the former results in buddhahood while the latter does not.

The Agama/Nikāya sutras teach only the arhat path. The principles of the bodhisattva path are not taught not in those sūtras, as observed by Nāgārjuna in the Ratnavali. Only Mahāyāna sūtras teach the bodhisattva path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Saoshun said:

Many people do not realize even stream-entry so what is point to discuss inferiority of things if you do not realize even basics fruits of hinayana?

Actually everyone miss the point here, everyone. The question like this appeared back in history because people was realized not only on intellectual level like here, just talking. They have fruits of hinayana that's why buddha said that there is something more and put them on check. The question you raised is only raised to someone who realized fruits of hinayana no other ways. For regular person is does not matter.

Malcolm wrote:

For regular persons this is indeed an important issue. For example, as I mentioned before, if you take the bodhisattva path, according to Theravada ideas, you cut yourself off from the possibility of stream entry, and thus, if you elect to follow the bodhisattva path, you are barred from the basic fruits of the path for eons, until you achieve full buddhahood. Therefore, as a regular person, it is indeed important to know the differences in presentation between Mahāyāna and Śrāvakayāna schools like Theravada concerning such things the path and so on so one can make an informed choice.

It is just not the case at all that the paths of all common people are alike in every respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 10:45 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Actually, Malcolm, the question (both in the OP and in this part of the discussion) was "really whether Theravada is superior or inferior," and you have skidded deftly away from it.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that before we can even begin to address the question of inferiority, etc., we first have to evaluate whether Theravada fits the Mahāyāna description of a Hināyāna school.

Kim O'Hara said:

Why on earth do you feel you need to do that?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the question has been raised.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Actually, Malcolm, the question (both in the OP and in this part of the discussion) was "really whether Theravada is superior or inferior," and you have skidded deftly away from it.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that before we can even begin to address the question of inferiority, etc., we first have to evaluate whether Theravada fits the Mahāyāna description of a Hināyāna school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: A re-introduction

Content:

mindyourmind said:

Um, well...

I've been away so long that I feel that I should re-introduce myself. Due to the loss of loved ones and experiencing the daily and increasing suffering of my best friend, I spent the last three years pretty much in a dark hole, with lots of doubt, anger, experimentation, far too much intellectualization, self-pity and other very ugly sentiments. Through it all, thankfully, I have managed to hold on to my own daily Dzogchen and Mahamudra practices, even though I had hardly any contact with my teachers or dharma centers during this time. In a sense I feel that I could have dealt with this better, in another odd sense I however also sense some big breakthrough, some bigger understanding of many things.

Sorry for the boring personal stuff, just wanted to let you know where I've been, and that I'm back.

X

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

SpinyNorman said:

From a pan-Buddhist perspective claims of inferiority and superiority just look like sectarianism.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as a Pan-Buddhist perspective.

SpinyNorman said:

I've been involved with all the main Buddhist schools over a period of 35 years, that's what I mean by a pan-Buddhist perspective. I've seen too many claims of superiority over the years, frankly it's boring.

Malcolm wrote:

The question here is not really whether Theravada is superior or inferior. The question is whether it is fair to include Theravada among the schools counted as "Hinayāna" in Indian Mahāyāna polemical literature.

Caodmarte's contention is that it is anachronistic to make this claim because, according to him, Theravada did not exist to be a butt of those critiques. Of course, this contention is false, since the rise of Theravada coincides with the rise of Mahāyāna. The earliest self-conscious use of the term we know of is in the Dīpavamsa where Theravada is identified as one of the 18 schools.

There is a prevailing BC attitude where it is considered wrong to include Theravada among the other schools classically identified in Mahāyāna polemical writings as Hināyāna. My point is that this attitude is wrong. Anyone who belongs to any ordination lineage [of the three remaining] can be a Mahāyānist providing they reject certain points of view of the bodhisattva path which are shared among all eighteen schools, and accept the Mahāyāna account of the bodhisattva path in their stead since the two perspectives about this are mutually exclusive.

There are many different teachings for people of many different capacities in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 11th, 2016 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Music time

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: Advice to three-year retreatant

Content:

kirtu said:

Many people have had DI and yet are habitually unkind and harm others (esp. verbally). There is at least one great guru who actually seems to attract many people with this specific flaw.

Kirt

Virgo said:
Who would that be?

Kevin

Malcolm wrote:
I imagine that he is referring to Dzongsar Khyentse.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 10:24 PM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

Boomerang said:
Theravada Buddhists say that Mahayana Buddhists say that Theravada is an inferior vehicle, and that Theravadins are selfish or lacking in compassion. How well does this idea match the views of the Mahayana Buddhists on this forum? I don't feel like it's inferior; the best path is whatever you are drawn to. There may be Mahayana sutras which extravagantly expound that Hinayana is lesser, but I would be surprised and confused to go to a dharma talk and hear a Mahayana teacher give a whole lecture about how Mahayana is better than Theravada. There are also texts that say the Buddha cut off his flesh as a bodhisattva, but that doesn't mean Mahayanis like to cut off their flesh. So, when Theravada Buddhists say this I sort of feel like it's a sound bite and stereotype.

SpinyNorman said:
From a pan-Buddhist perspective claims of inferiority and superiority just look like sectarianism.

Malcolm wrote:
There is no such thing as a Pan-Buddhist perspective.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 9:00 PM
Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?
Content:

Caodemarte said:
Although phrased rather dramatically by Kalupahana (one of the giants of Buddhist studies), it is quite reasonable to argue that the ideas of the Mulamadhyamakakarika were in no way meant to be or seen to be revolutionary in any way, but were natural expressions of (or mild natural developments of) early Buddhist thought. It is almost certain that Nagarjuna would not have thought of himself as a Mahayanist although claimed as such after his death (reminds me of the truism that Jesus was not a Christian), but rather as a Buddhist intellectual expounding the orthodox wisdom of his day against those whose views had strayed into heretical error inconsistent with Buddhist thought. Of course, it is very difficult, if not flat out impossible, to believe that Nagarjuna or later Theravada or Mahayana Buddhist thinkers would have said anything that they thought contradicted orthodox early Buddhist thought.

Malcolm wrote:

Clearly Nāgārjuna thought of himself as a Mahāyānist, just read the Mahāyāna Vimsika, the Ratnavali, or the Surhaleka.

Just as clearly, Kalupahana's treatment of the MMK is severely flawed by his refusal to use the Indian commentarial tradition, and reading passages in direct opposition to what that maintains, breaking up the question and answer format of the MMK. For example, on egregious error DK makes is that he asserts that Nāgārjuna does not reject the four conditions outlined by the Sarvastivadins, the latter embraces them. There are many other interpretive mistakes that DK makes.

[

Caodemarte said:

Studies on comparative subjects like the Bodhisattva concept in Mahayana and in Theravada (yes, there is a bodhisattva concept in Theravada) have greatly increased our understanding of both Mahayana and Theravada as well as the deep connections between them.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is a bodhisattva concept in Theravada, just as there is one in all the Hinayāna schools. For example, the Abhidharmakosha narrates the career of the bodhisattva at the end of one chapter. It exists in Hinayāna schools because Buddha was once a bodhisattva. But their concept could not be more different than the Mahāyāna ideal.

But this is not the issue before us. The issue is: is there anything which exempts Theravada from Mahāyāna polemics which were aimed at its forbears? The answer is no. There nothing doctrinally unique about Theravada, as opposed to Sarvastivada, which renders it immune to inclusion among the Hinayāna schools.

There is however these days a BC (Buddhist Correctness) movement to try and pretend that Theravada does not belong to the Hinayāna schools based on some putative idea that since it was outside the main stream developments in India, it is also somehow outside these criticisms. Nothing could be further from the truth. The very ideas put forth in the Abhidhammapitika, the realism of the Visuddhimagga, etc., are exactly the targets of Mahāyāna theoretical polemicists like Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 11:03 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Are you saying that any non-Mahayanist is by definition a Hinayanist?

Malcolm wrote:

One, Hinayāna schools are defined by ordination lineage. Second, any person of any ordination lineage may adopt Mahāyāna, but all the eighteen schools and their offshoots are by definition Hinayāna schools because they favor pursuit of the arhat path over pursuit of full Buddhahood.

I already gave my definition of a Hinayāna practitioner above, i.e., someone who chooses arhatship over full Buddhahood. There are a number of other criteria, but the latter is the most important.

For example, while many people make much noise about the fact that indeed one can adopt the bodhisattva path in Theravada (as well as the rest of the Nikāya/Agamic schools), the barriers to doing so are no different than the barriers and conditions laid down in the Abhidharmakosha for someone who wishes to take up the bodhisattva path (must be male, must have been predicted by the Buddha during his lifetime, etc.). Such people are further barred from stream entry, etc. In other words, while compassion may not be lacking in the Theravada path, bodhicitta is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 8:58 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

I doubt anyone would claim Theravada was immune from criticism. However, there is no evidence that Theravada was one of the traditional 18 schools (or the 17 to 19 if you count differently).

It is often claimed by non-scholars in Theravada countries (Sri Lankans seem big on this) that Theravada is a direct descendant of Sthaviravada (both names mean the same thing). However, when you probe this it comes down to at best, "inspired" by Sthaviravada. Theravadins assume that Sthaviravada was the oldest Buddhist school and therefore assume it must be the most correct and therefore must have taught Theravada since Theravada is correct (all this may be true but is hardly an historical or convincing argument to non-Theravadins). It is akin to the claim that Theravada started at the 1st Council. Since this is impossible the claim becomes the more historical idea that the 1st council and what Theravada "reformers" thought was taught served as a distant inspiration, apparently primarily because the Theravada "reformers" had an interpretation of what happened which agreed with Theravadin theories!

"There is no historical evidence that the Theravada school arose until around two centuries after the Great Schism which occurred at the Council of Pataliputra" (Oxford Dictionary of Buddhism, 2003). To claim that they are the descendants of Sthaviravada is similar to claims you occasionally read that Sri Lanka has always been a Theravada country (which is true if you ignore the Tantric monuments and other obvious historical evidence!). But even that date is controversial and is probably too early.

So if you want to criticize Theravada (a school with many traditions, but let's treat it as a more or less coherent unit for our purposes) as a Hinayana school using your definition of what that means you will first have to understand what a Theravadin would describe as Theravadin goals and what is meant by "arhathood" and Buddhahood by the tradition. This is an immense task, but you simply can't claim with intellectual honesty that they believe what a far-distant critic or a 19th Century Western scholar outside the tradition with no direct knowledge asserts they believe unless we are doing simple sect bashing. Then you can see how they contrast or share points with the Mahayana. For example, you have written they were "influenced by Nāgārjuna." Although I don't think Kalupahana would quite agree on who influenced who when, he argues that the Mahayana concept of emptiness and the Theravadin no-self, no substance are extremely similar, if not developments of the same idea in different language. There has been a lot of fascinating recent work on this topic.

Malcolm wrote:

You should read more carefully. I said that some modern Theravadins have been very influenced by Nāgārjuna.

That aside, Theravada subscribes to a Nikāya model of Buddhadharma. This makes them a Hinayāna school by definition.

From a Mahāyāna point of view, the Theravada claims about the nature of Buddhahood and the nature of Arhatship really are no different than what can be found in the Pali Canon's Katthavatthu, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

...yet the Dharmakaya is the Dharmakaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here, Jundo admits that he really has no idea what he is talking about...

jundo cohen said:

Well, it is a Koan, but one I believe I know the solution to. As the Buddha arguably pointed out in some of his writings (where he begged off answering certain types of questions), he was fully enlightened in key aspects, with insight into great matters, but I would not ask him to tune my car or predict tomorrow's stock market ('probably beyond his expertise as a man of Iron Age India). As well, one can fully pierce some transcendent mysteries, be mistaken in the details. Again, Just a belief and I am not the last word in Buddhism (fortunately), nor do I fail to honor the possible truth of anyone else's beliefs on these matters.

Malcolm wrote:

When in doubt, rinse and repeat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Although there are varying definitions, it is clear that the term was very definitely applied to schools as a criticism, 17 to 19 specific schools by name, if memory serves. Theravada was not among the targeted schools as it did not exist at the time. In modern times Theravada has been misidentified being one of these specific schools or incorrectly categorized as holding the beliefs, as defined by ancient Mahayana critics, of one or another of the extinct schools. The question as to how Theravada as a school is fundamentally different in goals or philosophical beliefs from Mahayana in other than lineage and history is a surprisingly difficult and subtle question as Kalupahana and others kept and keep pointing out.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, this is not correct. Theravada is the descendent of Sthaviravādas, which itself is a descendent of Vibhayavādins.

The positions that modern day Theravadins hold, apart from where they are influenced by Nāgārjuna, are not significantly different than the positions held in the Katthavattu and so on. Claiming therefore that Theravadins are exempt from Mahāyana criticisms is a flaw in thinking. In reality, Theravadins are one of the so called eighteen schools, as they count their ordination lineage from Upali.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Chatral Rinpoche's passing

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Letter from Yangsi Dudjom Rinpoche Sangye Pema Zhepa:

http://www.vajrayana.org/media/files/box/3a87ed38/Yangsi_Rinpoche_on_Chatral_Rinpoche_s_parinirvana.pdf

Letter from Lama Sonam Rinpoche:

<http://www.vajrayana.org/files/556/>

Malcolm wrote:

I like his last testament:

First, do not search for a reincarnation after I have passed. Second, all of you must not be sad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 10th, 2016 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Is Theravada an inferior and selfish vehicle?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

So the the short answer is no. You or I can certainly be inferior or selfish. But then we would not be good practitioners of any form of Buddhism!

This all probably comes from the misidentification of the Theravada with Hinayana. Hinayana comes the early polemical wars in early Indian Buddhism and was a put down by Mahayanists of an attitude or a whole sect. The schools it was used against died out as did the polemics before Theravada came to be and I don't believe it was ever applied to (what became) Theravada in India. Western scholars originally thought Theravada was one of the old, extinct schools and that is how why introduced Theravada to the West (and to Japan) as Hinayana Buddhism in modern times. A lot of that got channeled back to Theravada countries and early modern Thai Buddhist writers would say we must be Hinayana. No one believes that now and Hinayana is applied to an attitude, regardless of sect, and not to a contemporary group.

Malcolm wrote:

Hinayāna applies specifically to the goal of attaining an Arhat's cessation, rather than a school. So you do the math. What is the primary goal of a Theravadin? If it is not full Buddhahood, than that practitioner has a Hinayāna motivation.

By inference, schools which do not advocate the attainment of full Buddhahood as a goal are Hinayāna no matter when they existed or in what country.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A Buddhas appearances are wisdom.

tomamundsen said:

Sure. But I thought appearances have ended for Buddhas, no?

Malcolm wrote:

No. What has ended for a Buddha are impure appearances.

tomamundsen said:

I thought that "appearance" implies a duality between the wisdom itself and the appearance of that wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

That is true only below the 13th bhumi. The difference between a buddha on the thirteenth bhumi and the eleventh and twelfth bhumi is that buddhas on the thirteenth bhumi experience appearances as their own wisdom, whereas the lower two stages of buddhahood experience wisdom and the appearances as distinct.

tomamundsen said:

Or are these "path appearances" something asserted by everyone aside from the guy on the path of Buddhahood himself? I'm having a hard time adding that one up too though, because I didn't think Dharmakaya is "seen" by anyone but a Buddha. Hmmm.

Malcolm wrote:

The path of Buddhahood is called "the path of no further training. " Hence Buddhahood is also a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Not a vegetarian debate!

Content:

Saoshun said:

In samadhi you are beyond skandhas in your experience.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am afraid this is a wrong idea.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 9:04 PM
Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
Was Kongtrul of lesser intelligence?

Malcolm wrote:
I was merely citing what Longchenpa stated, and his statement echoes what the Buddha says about tathāgatagarbha in the Lanka-avatara sūtra.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 8:51 PM
Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong
Content:

smcj said:
This principle is the pinnacle of all views of the vehicle of causal characteristics.
"Vehicle of causal characteristics" modifies the statement somewhat.

Malcolm wrote:
Right, and gzhan stong belongs to that vehicle.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 8:49 PM
Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva
Content:
conebeckham said:
Can one say it is a "result appearance?" as well?

Or, perhaps, it's more appropriate to say that the moment "it appears" then there are no more "appearances."

Hmmm...

Malcolm wrote:
No, it is a path appearance, the path of buddhahood spans three to six bhumis, depending on the system.

tomamundsen said:
Does "appearance" here mean the same thing it normally does? I am a little perplexed if so. How can a Buddha be said to perceive appearances? Don't appearances end when non-dual wisdom is completely realized? I thought that appearance implies a duality from wisdom itself and that Buddhas have eliminated that.

Malcolm wrote:

A Buddhas appearances are wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

Actually, Malcolm's critiques are more or less in line with those of Ju Mipham, who was a student of Kongtrul. Mipham rejects affirming negations and considers Longchenpa a Prasangika who likewise upholds the supremacy of non-affirming negations. Mipham's critiques are often squarely leveled at how Dolpopa constructs and separates his two truths, and not just the three natures. Mipham is no slouch, so I don't think he was just wiping away the distinction, but arrived at his conclusions carefully.

sherabpa said:

I finally took a look at Brunnholz's book, the one originally referenced in this thread, and was pleased to see a translation of Kongtrul's 'Vajra Moon' there. You can see on p832 where he references Longchenpa, and Brunnholz's note 2661.

Don't take anyone else's word for Kongtrul's opinions on this or any matter. Look for yourselves. If I have misrepresented him, you can see it for yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is indeed Kongtrul's opinion, no one disputed that this was his opinion. What is under dispute is whether his opinion about Longchenpa is correct. I don't think that it is, and I think there is ample internal evidence in Longchenpa's writings that he was not a gzhan stong pa. As we have already seen, he identifies Candrakīrti as the one who holds the definitive view of Madhyamaka on page 798 of the grub mtha' mdzod. He declares on pg. 821, in the section devoted to explicating Candrakīrti's perspective: This principle is the pinnacle of all views of the vehicle of causal characteristics. It is simply inconsistent to maintain that someone who clearly articulates that the pinnacle of cause vehicles views is Prasangika belongs to the gzhan stong persuasion. Longchenpa does state on page 900 that:

In response to including the needs of those of lower intelligence, this garbha is empty because it is empty of faults, conditioning and so on, but it is not an emptiness that discards the phenomena of its qualities, as already mentioned:

The characteristic of distinction is is that the element is empty of the temporary [afflictions], the characteristic of the absence of distinction is not being empty of unsurpassed phenomena.

The pure element that has the nature of the limit of reality is unconditioned like space.

The happiness and suffering of samsara (supported on karma and affliction) appear like clouds. Moreover, the suffering because of improper afflicted mental activity is like a cloud. Since karma appears without any nature, it is like the aspect of a dream. The aggregates generated by karma and affliction are explained to be like illusions and clouds to remedy the grasping to one extreme of clinging to self. After that, since there arise five faults of clinging to the reifications of grasping to extremes in emptiness, in order to remove that, the tathagātagarba is explained...."

But frankly, the above statement by Longchenpa is simply not sufficient to place him in the gzhan stong camp, especially with reference to his declaration of the definitive Mahāyana view above, and in light of the fact that he clearly indicates the purpose of the tathagatagarbha view is to make the Mahāyāna path acceptable to those of lesser intelligence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

Actually, Malcolm's critiques are more or less in line with those of Ju Mipham, who was a student of Kongtrul. Mipham rejects affirming negations and considers Longchenpa a Prasangika who likewise upholds the supremacy of non-affirming negations. Mipham's critiques are often squarely leveled at how Dolpopa constructs and separates his two truths, and not just the three natures. Mipham is no slouch, so I don't think he was just wiping away the distinction, but arrived at his conclusions carefully.

sherabpa said:

I finally took a look at Brunnholzl's book, the one originally referenced in this thread, and was pleased to see a translation of Kongtrul's 'Vajra Moon' there. You can see on p832 where he references Longchenpa, and Brunnholzl's note 2661.

Don't take anyone else's word for Kongtrul's opinions on this or any matter. Look for yourselves. If I have misrepresented him, you can see it for yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is indeed Kongtrul's opinion, no one disputed that this was his opinion. What is under dispute is whether his opinion is correct. I don't think that it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

smcj said:

What's the difference between the Nirmanakaya (a physical buddha) and Sambogakaya (a non-physical buddha)? Physicality.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, actually, the external sambhogakāya, the one in Akanistha, has a physical body, composed of very subtle matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

smcj said:

If some guy reads this on the internet and then goes and kicks one of your teachers because they are "only path appearances", what would you think is lacking in their understanding? Or would you think their understanding is correct and approve?

Malcolm wrote:

I think the person who wrote the question lacks some understanding of the principle involved.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here, Jundo admits that he really has no idea what he is talking about...

boda said:

If the Buddha was fully realized (no longer ignorant), how could he have been wrong about so many core teachings?

jundo cohen said:

Yes, he was fully realized. That is a Koan, is it not? Fully realized, yet how could he have been possibly wrong about a few core teachings (I assume he taught them, which he likely did).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

smcj said:

Is the Nirmanakaya expedient means? Is the Dharmakaya expedient means? If not, then why single out the Sambogakaya for any other reason that it raises issues about faith that are uncomfortable for us.

Malcolm wrote:

The three kāyas are just path appearances.

smcj said:

If some guy reads this on the internet and then goes and kicks one of your teachers because they are "only expedient means", what would you think is lacking in their understanding? Or would you think their understanding is correct and approve?

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say they were expedient means. I said they were path appearances. So your question is actually a non sequitur.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

conebeckham said:

Can one say it is a "result appearance?" as well?

Or, perhaps, it's more appropriate to say that the moment "it appears" then there are no more "appearances."

Hmmm...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a path appearance, the path of buddhahood spans three to six bhumis, depending on the system.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

smcj said:

Is the Nirmanakaya expedient means? Is the Dharmakaya expedient means? If not, then why single out the Sambogakaya for any other reason that it raises issues about faith that are uncomfortable for us.

Malcolm wrote:

The three kāyas are just path appearances.

conebeckham said:

The Dharmakaya is a "path appearance?"

No dispute regarding the form kayas, but.....

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, dharmakāya is also a path appearance. It appears on the path of buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Kilung Rinpoche - Practical Advice on Dzogchen Meditatio

Content:

Nosta said:

Nice instructions!

Should I get any transmission/empowerment whatever before doing that meditation?
The instructions are simple and direct, so, can I try it without any empowerment?

Malcolm wrote:

No direct introduction, no Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 9th, 2016 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

smcj said:

Is the Nirmanakaya expedient means? Is the Dharmakaya expedient means? If not, then why single out the Sambogakaya for any other reason that it raises issues about faith that are uncomfortable for us.

Malcolm wrote:

The three kāyas are just path appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva

Content:

smcj said:

Until then it is just our eagerness to fit Dharma into our comfort zones by negating the issue of faith...

Malcolm wrote:

Did you ever consider that your obsession with [other peoples'] faith is just a way of fitting Dharma into your own comfort zone?

smcj said:

The way my teacher have taught me, and they themselves practice, is what I consider Dharma. Since the purpose of this website is to discuss Mahayana and Vajrayana, it is appropriate to put forward the idea that there might be a problem with some of the interpretations expressed here that contradict the way I have been taught.

Malcolm wrote:
The horror...

smcj said:
I have never heard any of my teachers say anything even remotely like, "...but you don't need take that seriously because it is expedient means." I have heard that from Westerners and Westerners only.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, you probably just don't get out that much...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 11:12 PM
Title: Re: The "four methods" that prove the existence of future li
Content:

Aemilius said:
What is the source for these four logical reasons for future reincarnation?
The first and second sound slightly dubious. In the Sutra of the Seedling of Rice Maitreya says that a small cause can give a large result, like from a small seed a great tree grows. Is this a cause of the similar type or not? A seed is not a tree.
In the process of Dependent Arising name and form are preceded by ignorance, karma formations and consciousness, which are very different in character from a material body.
Ignorance etc.. do not constitute a substantial cause.
There is no substantial cause in Buddhism, for the arising of Samsara, the Wheel of Life.

Malcolm wrote:
It means that wheat seeds only give rise to wheat sprouts, rice seeds only give rise to rice seedlings.

A "substantial" cause means that in this case the mind, which is defined as a dravya itself, like water, fire, air and earth.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 11:01 PM
Title: Re: Samayasattva/Jnanasattva
Content:

smcj said:
Until then it is just our eagerness to fit Dharma into our comfort zones by negating the issue of faith...

Malcolm wrote:
Did you ever consider that your obsession with [other peoples'] faith is just a way of fitting Dharma into your own comfort zone?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Shakya Shri

Content:

gyamtsotrinle said:

Hii,

I would like to know if there is exists incarnation of great master Shakya Shri? And also is there still available some of Shakya Shri 'termas?

Thank you for answers

P

Malcolm wrote:

Hls termas still exist and are still transmitted.

heart said:

Who transmit them?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

You would have to go inquire among Drukpa Kagyus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Forgiveness

Content:

Malang said:

Easier said than, done, personally ive been through some very hard to forgive things, i try but i cant genuinely forgive these things, but this does not feel good, but its beyond me, anyone know what i mean?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it means that you still carry anger and resentment. As Chokyi Nyima says, if you cannot forgive, then forget.

Malang said:

Do you mean consciously say ' i'm not gonna think about it ' ? I feel if you do this , then you have not uprooted the problem ,and the anger is below the surface , how do you for example forget if you are by necessity forced to deal with daily those who have wronged you?

Malcolm wrote:

You just put it aside and move on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Adamantine said:

I'm assuming this is a relic of Bramhanic ideas of orthodox purity

Astus said:

The whole idea of 'contamination' seems like that. But it is quite possible that there is no actual connection, it's just that every culture has its own set of superstitions and taboos (e.g. in Japan women were not allowed on whole mountains because of fear of contaminating the holy places, like monasteries).

Malcolm wrote:

Hence the subaltern narrative of the charnel ground ḍākinī in the higher tantras as the fertile source of the Dharma, rather the sterile and male dominated environs of the monasteries...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Adamantine said:

Is there any reasoning to this, other than superstition? I can relate to the contamination from very negative people because after spending time with certain people or in certain places I have noticed its negative impact on my mind and subtle energetics-- just as being with a realized Lama or in a special pilgrimage place can have a powerful positive impact.

But menstruation I'm unclear about.. I suppose it's never been explained to me properly.. And I have no experiential corollary.

Malcolm wrote:

It is sexist bullshit.

Adamantine said:

Well that seems to be the take on it I've gotten from some western female Lamas I know! But it's pretty ingrained in the dharma culture. I'm assuming this is a relic of Bramhanic ideas of orthodox purity, despite Vajrayana supposedly blasting those to smithereens.

Malcolm wrote:

To put it bluntly — there are many Tibetan monks alive today who have no idea at all what female anatomy is and how it functions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 12:23 AM

Title: Re: Shakya Shri

Content:

gyamtsotrinle said:

Hii,

I would like to know if there is exists incarnation of great master Shakya Shri? And also is there still available some of Shakya Shri ´termas?

Thank you for answers

P

Malcolm wrote:

His termas still exist and are still transmitted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 8th, 2016 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Adamantine said:

Is there any reasoning to this, other than superstition? I can relate to the contamination from very negative people because after spending time with certain people or in certain places I have noticed it's negative impact on my mind and subtle energetics-- just as being with a realized Lama or in a special pilgrimage place can have a powerful positive impact.

But menstruation I'm unclear about.. I suppose it's never been explained to me properly.. And I have no experiential corollary.

Malcolm wrote:

It is sexist bullshit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

These are more connected with the Tibetan cultural ideas than the Dharma.

Astus said:

East Asian countries have their own versions of such contaminations (e.g. the <http://www.reed.edu/hellscrolls/scrolls/Aseries/A06/A06e.html>), as probably every culture.

Malcolm wrote:

Or the idea that menstruating women are impure and will for example contaminate and destroy the blessings of articles to be placed in sūpas and statues should the former come in contact with the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Forgiveness

Content:

Malang said:

Easier said than, done, personally ive been trough some very hard to forgive things, i try but i cant genuinely forgive these things, but this does not feel good, but its beyond me, anyone know what i mean?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it means that you still carry anger and resentment. As Chokyi Nyima says, if you cannot forgive, then forget.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here, the word is contamination ['grib] rather than obscuration [sgrib].

Astus said:

And what does contamination stand for? The description given sounds like 'ritual impurity', that might be relevant in Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is connected with having an incorrect partner and a resultant decline in some abilities, for example, clairvoyance.

One can be "contaminated" by any number of things, such as someone else's clothes, an antique that has come into ones possession, and so on. These are more connected with the Tibetan cultural ideas than the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

That's why the practices don't work for us.

krodha said:

Since this seems to be a reoccurring theme in your posts as of late, I must ask, why would you assume that practices do not work for westerners?

smcj said:

A conversation I had with a Tibetan retreat master for western retreatants.

Malcolm wrote:

Your Tibetan friend, retreat master or not, has not met all Westerners.

smcj said:

Let us not forget that masters of the past who have expressed opinions on such subjects did so from the standpoint of first having actually done the practice and gained results. This is qualitatively quite a different thing from just reading however many scriptures and voicing one's own prejudices.

Hence my admonition to not take anything said here seriously, and to ask an authentic lineage lama--especially in this specific subject.

Malcolm wrote:

More sour grapes, as usual...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

In order for the practice to work you need to have faith in the wisdom being. That's assumed to be true by a Tibetan. It is rejected by Westerners. That's why the practices don't work for us.

Malcolm wrote:

Why do you keep saying this? All four of your statements are false.

1) You do not have to have "faith" in the wisdom being. You merely have to understand what it is.

2) Tibetans do not assume a wisdom being has some kind of external existence, or to be any other than the nature of the mind, cast in an embodied symbolic form.

3) Westerns do not reject something accepted by Tibetans.

4) Who says practices are not working for Westerners? You?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Klesas are Bodhi & dating 18 y/o girls.

Content:

Adamantine said:

from a Tibetan perspective there is also a view that one can take on residual obscurations (drip) from another, most especially through sexual union.

Astus said:

That very much contradicts the whole meaning of karma. Following that logic, hunger could be lost around well fed people. Afflictions reside in one's own mind, generated and maintained through one's own actions. One may agree with or imitate others' actions, but that's still not the same as obscuration-transmission.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he is not being clear. Here, the word is contamination ['grib] rather than obscuration [sgrib].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this really just means a fairly elaborate creation stage with an Atiyoga view.

Or, practicing a sadhana in Ati style we have to consider Anu-ati because though we are resting in Dzogchen view at the end, still we are practicing some sadhana with an aim to get somewhere. We somehow still have the idea that our state needs to be fixed. We have not recognized the nature of our mind and elevated our mind correspondingly. We are still suffering from "the illness of effort", as it is put in Sems sde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Thanks, Malcolm. That was impeccably clear. That was actually what I meant about Mahayoga and I do know the difference from Kriya. I just botched my explanation. When I said that the deity is viewed as separate, I misspoke. I meant that you actually have you create the mandala and it's not primordially present. Of course when the mandala is created, one is a deity within that mandala. Seems to be congruent with what you said about viewing wisdom as something to be attained.

You've probably described all of this on this forum several times before. Thanks for your patience. I'm pretty confident this doesn't actually contradict what my teacher said.

Malcolm wrote:

The view of Mahāyoga is that even though the mandala is primordially present, we need to practice reconstituting it, as it were, building it up and then plugging it in over and over again. In the view of Anuyoga, we don't have to keep plugging the mandala in, we plug it in once, and then just remember it when we want to. If we are practicing a sadhana Ati yoga style, we don't even bother visualizing anything, we recite the words, knowing that just thinking about the deity is sufficient, there is no need to meditate on it, and then we recite the mantra resting in our natural state, which is all the deity is anyway.

tomamundsen said:

Ah, interesting nuance. I had thought that was the Maha-Ati approach and not pure Mahayhoga. If you don't mind, now that you've explained Maha, Anu, and Ati, can you clarify what the Maha-Ati style is? Same as Atiyoga style view, but doing all the visualization like in Mahayoga?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this really just means a fairly elaborate creation stage with an Atiyoga view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Thanks, Malcolm. That was impeccably clear. That was actually what I meant about Mahayoga and I do know the difference from Kriya. I just botched my explanation. When I said that the deity is viewed as separate, I misspoke. I meant that you actually have you create the mandala and it's not primordially present. Of course when the mandala is created, one is a deity within that mandala. Seems to be congruent with what you said about viewing wisdom as something to be attained.

You've probably described all of this on this forum several times before. Thanks for your patience. I'm pretty confident this doesn't actually contradict what my teacher said.

Malcolm wrote:

The view of Mahāyoga is that even though the mandala is primordially present, we need to practice reconstituting it, as it were, building it up and then plugging it in over and over again. In the view of Anuyoga, we don't have to keep plugging the mandala in, we plug it in once, and then just remember it when we want to. If we are practicing a sadhana Ati yoga style, we don't even bother visualizing anything, we recite the words, knowing that just thinking about the deity is sufficient, there is no need to meditate on it, and then we recite the mantra resting in our natural state, which is all the deity is anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

conebeckham said:

<http://www.elizabethmattisnamgyel.com/tag/shentong/>

Having a direct experience trumps all philosophical constructs.

Malcolm wrote:

Ironically, many gzhan stong commentators state that the difference between so called gzhan stong and rang stong is not the experience of equipoise, which is free from all extremes, but in post-equipoise analytical interpretation. This is one of the many reasons why I think we should basically ditch all these novel Tibetan philosophical trips and get back to the basics, ala Khenpo Shenga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The view that wisdom being is a real being invoked into you from some other place is a stunningly wrong view which is not even the view of kriya tantra, let alone the view of Mahāyoga. It is a skillful means of Secret Mantra meant to remind you of the innate wisdom which you have always possessed since the beginning.

tomamundsen said:

OK, I wasn't being specific enough. It wasn't taught that there is a being that is "invoked into" oneself in some kind of physical sense. But it was taught that the wisdom being is real, at least as real as we are.

Malcolm wrote:

The wisdom being is real in so far as it is symbol of your own innate wisdom which was awoken through the process of the descent of the blessing in the first part of the empowerment rite.

tomamundsen said:

And that sadhana practice is merging the samaya being and wisdom being.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you create yourself in the form of deity X, and then you activate your own wisdom by summoning the wisdom being as a symbol of that innate wisdom that was pointed out to you during the empowerment. You are not summing deity X from outside to come into you in real sense.

tomamundsen said:

I don't think that necessarily means "invoked into" like what you're saying here. It would mean that one is training to view themselves as inseparable from the deity. And at some levels of practice, we start out from a view where the deity is separate from us and then transition toward the view of union.

Malcolm wrote:

The view that deity is separate from us is the view of kriya, where we practice with the deity before us and slightly higher than we are. Otherwise, the view of yoga tantra is that when we are finished with our practice, the wisdom being is dismissed since in post-equipose we are engaging in impure activities. In higher tantra, since we are never separate from our innate wisdom, the nature of our minds, we remain in the form of the deity 24/7/365.

tomamundsen said:

From a higher view, there is no separation at all from the beginning and there would effectively be no "merging" at all.

Malcolm wrote:

In the practice of Mahāyoga, there is still a summoning of the wisdom being, because there is still an idea that wisdom, even though it is innate, is something to attain. In Anuyoga there is no summoning of the wisdom being because it is understood that the wisdom being and commitment being have always been inseparable as the basis and are nothing other than the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Even the summoning of the wisdom being into the commitment being is just a reminder that our real state has always been naturally perfected as a mandala, but there is no actual wisdom being that is summoned.

But my teacher just the other day taught that summoning the wisdom being is literally true. However, I believe that the view he was speaking from at the time was not the Atiyoga view. I think it would be a Mahayoga view. I could be wrong about this part, please correct me if so. Isn't it the case that both views are correct, depending on the capacity of the practitioner?

Malcolm wrote:

The view that wisdom being is a real being invoked into you from some other place is a stunningly wrong view which is not even the view of kriya tantra, let alone the view of Mahāyoga. It is a skillful means of Secret Mantra meant to remind you of the innate wisdom which you have always possessed since the beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 4:37 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

sherabpa said:

I'm saying that your knowledge of zhentong is autodidactic.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in fact your presumption is as false as your dissembling is outrageous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

gzhan stong is merely concerned with explicating the teachings of the Uttaratantra

sherabpa said:

Something I never claimed. The intensity of your bluster is increasing. Whatever, I know the zhentong I received from my own teachers. I don't need autodidacts to tell me what it is. As Sapan rightly says:

A false nose, a purchased child, a borrowed ornament, wealth gotten through stealing, and knowledge gained without a teacher. Though you have such things, others do not regard these highly.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, it is really outrageous for you to claim that I "stole" my knowledge. Just who the hell do you think you are?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

It took me less than 15 seconds to find citations by various masters, like Jigme Lingpa etc. that supports Malcolm's statement. Read the relevant literature (like Malcolm says, sadhana commentaries mention this) and you'll see for yourself.

My recommendation was not to click on an internet page, but to seek out a traditional Tibetan lama and ask him--but making sure to ask the proper question. What you get from a teacher that can look into your eye and what you get from a printed page can be quite different.

tomamundsen said:

Right. I can confirm that just the other day (Monday, the 25th), my teacher explained the wisdom being and samaya being in the same way as you're advocating. I don't think it was meant to be Atiyoga view, maybe it was Mahayoga. Anyway, it was definitely taught that it can be viewed in that way on some level of practice. And commentaries don't really mean anything compared to the guru's pith instructions.

Malcolm wrote:

Your writing here is anything but clear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

khroda said:

There's no source for Longchenpa being a gzhan stong pa, since he championed Prasanga Madhyamaka to be the definitive sūtra view in numerous places.

smcj said:

That's why it would be interesting to see why Kongtrul thought differently--if he actually did.

sherabpa said:

Of course he did. I didn't make it up. The texts where he calls Longchenpa a zhentongpa are the ones previously mentioned on this thread - Rays of the Vajra Moon and Uttaratantra commentary.

Calling Longchenpa a zhentongpa would not be controversial at all except that what 'zhentong' nowadays has come to mean is Dolpopa's specific interpretation of the Three Natures theory in accordance with Vasubandhu's Brhattika.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, no. That is what gzhan stong has meant all along. I suggest starting with Dolbupa [14th century], moving onto Shakya Chogden [15th century], then onto Taranatha [16th century], then onto Rigzin Tsewang Norbu [18th Century] and then Situ Panchen, and see how your contention stacks up [it doesn't.]

What is novel is your idea that gzhan stong is merely concerned with explicating the teachings of the Uttaratantra, but this perspective is incredibly anachronistic and wrong headed as we can see from the historical progression of the master who gave gzhan stong its foundation [Dolbupa] and the various scholars who followed his lead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

FWIW, I point out the following passage from "The Crystal and the Way Of Light": There are eight principal classes of Guardians each with many subdivisions. Some are highly realized beings, others not realized at all. Every place - every continent, country, city, mountain, river, lake or forest - has its particular dominant energy, or Guardian, as have every year, hour and even minute: these are not highly evolved energies. The various teachings all have energies which have special relationships with them: these are more realized Guardians. These energies are iconographically portrayed as they were perceived when they manifested to masters who had contact with them, and their awesome power is represented by their terrifyingly ferocious forms, their many arms and heads, and their ornaments of the charnel ground. As with all the figures in tantric iconography, it is not correct to interpret the figures of the guardians as merely symbolic, as some Western writers have been tempted to do. Though the iconographic forms have been shaped by the perceptions and culture of those who saw the original manifestation and by the development of tradition, actual beings are represented. (underlining added)

Malcolm wrote:

This has nothing to do with yidams.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

It took me less than 15 seconds to find citations by various masters, like Jigme Lingpa etc. that supports Malcolm's statement. Read the relevant literature (like Malcolm says, sadhana commentaries mention this) and you'll see for yourself.

My recommendation was not to click on an internet page, but to seek out a traditional Tibetan lama and ask him--but making sure to ask the proper question. What you get from a teacher that can look into your eye and what you get from a printed page can be quite different.

Malcolm wrote:

What makes you think our replies come from anyone other than traditionally trained Tibetan Lamas?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

Since you are the one who is confused, I think you are the one who needs to go and clarify this for yourself.

That sounds like you are worried about what a traditional lama would answer.

Malcolm wrote:

Why should I be? I have read hundreds of commentaries about this very issue. I know what they will say.

smcj said:

In a nutshell the question is: Does the ultimate nature of the deity negate its relative nature, and therefore make faith unnecessary?

Malcolm wrote:

This question is a non-sequitar. First of all, there is no ultimate "deity" — if it has hands, colors, eyes, legs, a torso, etc., it is something relative. If you are referring to the continuum of a bodhisattva like Mañjuśrī, it is not something which exists in one place that can be summoned to another place.

Secondly, Mañjuśrī's continuum cannot displace your own, no matter how hard you try to practice divine pride. But with practice, your continuum can become the same as Mañjuśrī's continuum, and depending on your chosen vehicle, with more or less effort.

And, the higher up you go in the yānas, more and more emphasis is placed on personal experience and direct perception, and increasingly less is placed on testimony and inference.

My personal opinion is that since Ati yoga places the most emphasis on personal experience and direct perception it is the best vehicle for westerners, among all the available Vajrayāna options. But that is just my orientation. Other people like imagining themselves as this and so on

And that is all well and good, very excellent paths, very excellent practices, all practiced with full attention and carefully can result in Buddhahood in a single lifetime, but Dzogchen is still faster and more direct...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Even the summoning of the wisdom being into the commitment being is just a reminder that our real state has always been naturally perfected as a mandala, but there is no actual wisdom being that is summoned.

smcj said:

IMO, that is precisely the idea that defeats the practice of Westerners.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a statement that is repeated in hundreds of commentaries on sadhana practice.

smcj said:

I think it is worth encouraging people to go to the effort to ask a traditional Tibetan lama about it. Don't you agree?

Malcolm wrote:

Since you are the one who is confused, I think you are the one who needs to go and clarify this for yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahahha, communing with nonhuman beings is the main point of Vajrayāna practice? What a joke. The main point of Vajrayāna practice is just the same as Mahāyāna practice, attaining buddhahood by eliminating the two obscurations, end of story.

Commune all you like, but if your afflictions and knowledge obscurations are not being reduced, you are wasting your time.

smcj said:

Do you think Manjushri is confused about emptiness? Do you think Chenrezi lacks compassion? If they were to merge with--or even displace your present awareness (as in having "divine pride"), do you think your obscurations would remain untouched?

Malcolm wrote:

Neither Mañjuśrī or Avalokiteśvara are concrete external entities at all in the context in which you mention them.

"Divine pride" is a temporary method belonging to the creation stage, and as such it is a conceptual meditation, prophylactic in nature, meant to replace our ordinary sense of self. But this is not the end of the path, in order to attain buddhahood, we still must depend on the direct perception of the nature of our minds that both Mañjuśrī or Avalokiteśvara symbolize. But there is no external Mañjuśrī or Avalokiteśvara that merges with our minds. To believe there are means that one has utterly missed the point of the teachings completely. Even the summoning of the wisdom being into the commitment being is just a reminder that our real state has always been naturally perfected as a mandala, but there is no actual wisdom being that is summoned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps the traditional way of teaching Tibetans is not suitable for Westerners. Have you thought of this?

smcj said:

In the year 2016 my thought is that the modernized way of teaching Westerners is ineffective, thus my pointing out the difference between a Western approach and a Tibetan approach.

Malcolm wrote:

What is the modernized way of teaching westerners, and who is teaching them this "ineffective" Dharma?

smcj said:

Which subject? Communicating with non-human beings being the main point of Vajrayāna practice?

Not "communicating". More like "communing".

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahahha, communing with nonhuman beings is the main point of Vajrayāna practice? What a joke. The main point of Vajrayāna practice is just the same as Mahāyāna practice, attaining buddhahood by eliminating the two obscurations, end of story.

Commune all you like, but if your afflictions and knowledge obscurations are not being reduced, you are wasting your time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

Ray's particular point of view is informed by something of an obsession with shamanism. But Tibetan Buddhism is not shamanism and is not principally concerned with communicating with non-human beings in general. But this seems to have become important to you somehow, an article of faith.

Do you object to the idea that people should go and ask a traditional lama about this subject?

Malcolm wrote:

Which subject? Communicating with non-human beings being the main point of Vajrayāna practice? Perhaps the traditional way of teaching Tibetans is not suitable for Westerners. Have you thought of this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

What is missing here is the understanding that ritual is a way of communicating with beings who, on the relative plane, really are there and really are important to us. This lively and compelling sense of ritual is, at present, sometimes hard to come by in Western adaptations of Tibetan Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the fact is that Vajrayāna rites seem dead to people because they have no understanding of Abhidharma at even a minimal level, and thus do not understand the process of mandala creation as being a means of ritually transforming one's continuum and its aggregates, elements and sense gates into a mandala of awakened beings. The process is entirely symbolic and is not magical or supernatural in anyway at all.

Ray's particular point of view is informed by something of an obsession with shamanism. But Tibetan Buddhism is not shamanism and is not principally concerned with communicating with non-human beings in general. But this seems to have become important to you somehow, an article of faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

smcj said:

So to be clear; when I say that faith is a fundamental element for Vajrayana practice in no sense do I believe that it prohibits the experience of enlightenment. It is a prerequisite for the practices to bear fruit, for us to experience things for ourselves. But we we discount or reject the issue of faith, so to paraphrase Yoda, "That is why we fail."

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, Ray is not an authority I would turn to.

Second, your definition of faith has nothing at all to with Vajrayāna practice. Faith here means simply that one has to be confident in the teacher and their teachings, that's all. It does not mean that one has to believe the sun shines from their keister. It is not a heavy emotional charge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, January 7th, 2016 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: What is faith?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Śraddha, which is often translated as faith, is defined in Abhidharma as the mental factor which brings clarity to the mind, and that is it. It is quite a bit different than the faith being extolled here by smcj.

Śraddha is a path dharma [part of the 37 adjuncts to awakening], one of the five powers and the five strengths — in other words, it is only relevant to our confidence in the path, and it has nothing to do with believing in ghosts, goblins, etc., including any and all supernatural powers of buddhas, bodhisattvas, siddhas, and dakinis. The existence or nonexistence of these phenomena are irrelevant to our progress on the path, and there is no way in which our belief or disbelief in them affects our path at all. The only "supernatural" things we need to accept are rebirth and karma, since without these, the path taught by the Buddha makes no sense at all.

Punya said:

Inspired by another thread, it would be interesting to explore, in a respectful way, what faith means in a general buddhist sense and in the different traditions (leaving aside the specific topic of guru yoga). These dictionary definitions seem like a reasonable starting point:

1. complete trust or confidence in someone or something
2. strong belief in the doctrines of a religion, based on spiritual conviction rather than proof.

It seems like you would need some faith in the beginning as a dharma student or is it just that you just need an open mind and an acceptance that you don't have a complete understanding yet? What does spiritual conviction mean?

And, if you accept the advice of teachers like HH the Dalai Lama about the complexity of karma, and you content yourself with a more basic understanding, is that just accepting it on faith. (There are more than enough threads here on karma so please confine the discussion to the faith aspect).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 9:50 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

None of that is "verifying knowledge". It is invalidating the erroneous beliefs of unawareness.

Malcolm wrote:

So it is a pure non-affirming negation?

smcj said:

Or, if you don't have a problem with faith, you can skip all that and proceed accordingly.

Malcolm wrote:

Faith has always been the problem that humans being face, because faith involves irrational attributions of authority, and once that starts, it plants the seeds of religious wars.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

But the Buddha never wanted anyone to merely have blind faith and leave it at that. Right. That's why earlier I made the point that in Christianity the objective is faith and in Vajrayana the prerequisite is faith. The Path starts there, but you've got to follow up with practice. That is very different than dismissing faith entirely.

Buddha wanted people to see for themselves.

Yes. However in the Vajrayana, until such time as they can see for themselves they must initially rely on faith. With realization direct knowledge replaces any need for faith.

Someone who has realized the Dharmakaya has no need for faith at all.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not at all true. The Buddha began all his teachings with something that everyone can see without having faith at all. Sarva dukkham, all is suffering.

In Buddhadharma we do not go from lack of knowledge to knowledge, we go from verifiable knowledge to verifiable knowledge.

The message of Dzogchen teachings is that one can have direct knowledge of one's primordial state, aka the basis, long before one can speak of realizing dharmakāya -- this direct knowledge is made into the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

So we agree that there is no ultimate refuge in the material world. And that until we realize the Dharmakaya ourselves we have take it on faith alone.

Right?

Malcolm wrote:

We don't need to fully realize the dharmakāya. We just need to have personal experience of the positive benefits of the Dharma, then we don't need "faith" because we have experience.

In any case, you are asking the wrong question; it is not about the material world, per se. It would seem to be about the conditioned vs. the unconditioned. However, we don't take refuge in space or cessation, so it is not a question of conditioned vs. the unconditioned.

In Dzogchen, for example, one goes for refuge in one's own knowledge, i.e., rang rig la skyab su mchi'o or something to this effect is very common in Anuyoga level sadhanas.

The real refuge is realization. When one begins to experience the positive effects of the Dharma in one's life, then one can have increased confidence in the Buddha's realization, and thus his Dharma. But the Buddha never wanted anyone to merely have blind faith and leave it at that. Buddha wanted people to see for themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... only the dharmakāya, or realization of a buddha, is a true refuge.

dzogchungpa said:

Is this not a statement of faith?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is perfectly reasonable deduction that can be made on the basis of understanding what the dharmakāya actually, is — one's own mind free from the two obscurations.

You might ask, well aren't you taking it on faith that the mind can be free of the two obscurations? No, because in my own lifetime I have observed a reduction in my obscurations through practicing the Dharma, which has resulted in a clearer appreciation of the things the Buddha has taught. Thus, I have come and seen for myself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

The whole point of the Madhyamaka is to convince us the seen world is unreliable.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean the Buddha's "seen world" is unreliable?

smcj said:

Can you show me a reliable refuge that is visible?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what level of refuge you mean, ultimate or relative?

If the former, no, since only the dharmakāya, or realization of a buddha, is a true refuge. As your favorite book, the Uttaratantra makes clear, neither the Dharma nor the Sangha are true refuges since they are impermanent and conditioned.

If the latter then there are all kinds of things that I can show you that are "true" refuges.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

The whole point of the Madhyamaka is to convince us the seen world is unreliable.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean the Buddha's "seen world" is unreliable?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

...his practice boiled down to a faith in things unseen.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. The Sangha is not unseen, the Dharma is not unseen, and as the Buddha said, "Whoever sees the Dharma, sees me."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The ... Three Roots are unseen?

dzogchungpa said:

Well, the last 2 are, by me anyway.

Malcolm wrote:

After a number of years trying to have a perfect visualization of his yidam, Mipham when to see his root guru, Khyentse Wangpo, and explained his difficulties — Khyentse replied that in all of his years of practicing yidams, he never once notice that the nature of his mind had rosy blush colored cheeks, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Obscuration in Dzogchen

Content:

Vasana said:

This is a great thread. Very helpful.

In regards to Dzogchen, where is the best place to start with Mipham?

Malcolm wrote:

There is very little that is published out there.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Obscuration in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

"The Uttaratantra" is full of analogies that use material objects to make its points: clouds covering the sun, gold in ore, a statue wrapped in rags, etc. It's one of the seminal texts for these kinds of ideas.

Malcolm wrote:

But if you take them literally, your view will be no better than the Hindu view of self, which is why they require interpretation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, January 6th, 2016 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Vasana said:

sorry to butt-in and steer off-topic, but;

Even if your main practice and modality is Dharma, i still think there's space for the Christian /Abrahamic pantheon [aswell as 'extraterrestrials'] within Buddhist cosmology. If one can believe in Indra and the possibility of god and deva beings , the idea of Archangels doesn't seem so far-fetched. Sure, they may also be embedded within samsara to some extent.

I suppose the cosmology of the 6 realms and the various kinds of beings your average practitioner has no perception of, may be one of those 'unseen' aspects that westerners reject in your view smcj?

Malcolm wrote:

SMCJ seems to be arguing for some emotive kind of faith, a bhakti approach, tears streaming, etc. While such descriptions are certainly to be found in every description of Guru Yoga in traditional manuals, reading them over and over again in a hundred manuals, one comes to understand that these are literary themes meant to instill the point that we should feel deep gratitude to our gurus. It certainly does not mean that everytime we think of our teacher we should be overwhelmed with emotions.

To illustrate my point further, most of the Tibetan teachers I have come into contact with deride the faith of simple Tibetans as being grounded in ignorance. They understand that kind of faith will never win with Western Buddhists who have a four hundred year history of the Enlightenment, and who, because of our vastly superior educational opportunities in the West, are never going to believe in Meru Cosmology merely because some teacher insists that we must.

We do not live in a world with a Christian worldview anymore, despite smcj's insistence that all problems Western Buddhists face is our rejection of Christianity [or in my case, an utter lack of interest and connection with it], we live in a world dominated by a scientific worldview, with all of the faults and qualities inherent to it.

Buddha's message is still "come and see for yourself." The further we get away from that message, the further away we get from the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Virgo said:

Buddhism is not a faith-based religion.

smcj said:

Some forms are, some forms aren't. If it is really a big deal for you, and you can't get over Christianity trauma, then avoid the ones that are.

Malcolm wrote:

There are those of us for whom Christianity is completely irrelevant, such as myself, never baptized, much less raised with any religion at all.

And still you have not defined what you mean by "faith," other than believing in things that are "unseen," which puts you in good company with the UFO conspiracy crowd.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 6:46 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

EXCEPT for the conclusion Westerners come to that we need not believe in things unseen and need not have unconditioned trust.

Malcolm wrote:

Can you find anywhere where the Buddha states we must have unconditioned trust in things unseen?

smcj said:

You mean besides the Pure Land teachings?

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha never says we must have unconditioned trust in Sukhavati, much less anything else. In fact, in quite a large number of places he says exactly the opposite.

smcj said:

In the Vajrayana simply "Taking Refuge" in the 3 Jewels and 3 Roots seems to cover that ground.

Malcolm wrote:

The Three Jewels and Three Roots are unseen?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: dharmapala vs yidam?

Content:

fckw said:

Can anyone knowledgeable explain me what the difference is between a dharmapala and a (don't know how to call it correctly: "full blown") yidam like, let's say, dorje drollo or hevajra? What's the qualitative difference, in other words why is it generally hold that one should not start a practice with the former if not already very advanced with the latter? I know that some dharmapalas are said to be not completely enlightened. With these, I understand that this could be potentially misleading at very subtle levels of mind. And there seem to be very worldly protectors or even demons. Yet other protectors are said to be completely enlightened. So, what would be the qualitative difference then to a yidam?

Malcolm wrote:

A dharmapāla is generally a bodhisattva in a wrathful, and usually non-human form, who has taken an oath to protect the Dharma.

A yidam on the other hand is a method of practicing the path based on a sambhogakāya manifestation of a buddha.

Some dharmapālas, such as Mahākāla also double as yidams, that is, they can be practiced as both depending on context and need.

Wisdom dharmapālas are considered dharmapālas who are on the pure bodhisattva stages. Worldly dharmapālās are those who are not on the bodhisattva stages at all. The latter are generally powerful beings of the preta class who have been bound to the Dharma as losers in a conflict with a mahāsiddha such as Padmasambhāva. They frequently need to be reminded of their vows.

conebeckham said:

Correct me if I'm wrong...but some Wisdom Dharmapalas are considered completely enlightened, i.e., Buddhas. These are often "reflex" emanations of yidams like Samvara, Kalacakra, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Mahākala is one such.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Kuntu Zangpo

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Could you please explain the above a little more ?

Have difficulties with the understanding of imputing.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Once one does not recognize the display as one's own appearances, then one imputes duality: subject, object, self, other, etc., and dependent origination is set in motion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Kuntu Zangpo

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Samantabhadra never reified the display as other, his ignorance was merely neither knowing it nor not knowing it as self-display.

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=37861#p37861>

krodha said:

Going by Malcolm's definition in the thread you have linked, Samantabhadra did indeed initially mistake his own display as other.

The definition of innate ignorance:

Malcolm wrote:

When the basis arises out of the basis, i.e. when the five lights of wisdom are stirred by vāyu after the shell of the youthful vase body is rent there is a neutral awareness [shes pa lung ma bstan] that does not recognize itself. That simple non-recognition is the innate ignorance.

krodha said:

Samantabhadra possessed innate ignorance:

Malcolm wrote:

Most people do not realize that Samantabhadra initially possessed the first ignorance. He never possessed the second.

There are two systems: one with three ignorances and one with two. In the first system (Vima Nyinthig, Khandro Nyinthig, etc.), the three ignorances are the ignorance identical with the cause, innate and imputing; in the second system (Gongpa Zangthal, Zhang Zhung Nyen Gyud, etc.) there are only the second two listed above. Samantabhadra never possessed imputing ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

EXCEPT for the conclusion Westerners come to that we need not believe in things unseen and need not have unconditioned trust.

Malcolm wrote:

Can you find anywhere where the Buddha states we must have unconditioned trust in things unseen?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, Buddha never said, "You must believe what I say without putting it to the test." Rather he said, "Ehipassiko," i.e., "Come and see for yourself." When one has seen for oneself, what is the role of faith?

Vasana said:

SMCJ , there are different kinds of faith.

"There are different levels of faith. First, "clear faith" refers to the joy and clarity and change in our perceptions that we experience when we hear about the qualities of the Three Jewels and the lives of the Buddha and the great teachers. "Longing faith" is experienced when we think about the latter and are filled with a great desire to know more about their qualities and to acquire these ourselves. "Confident faith" comes through practicing the Dharma, when we acquire complete confidence in the truth of the teachings and the enlightenment of the Buddha. Finally, when faith has become so much a part of ourselves that even if our lives were at risk we could never give it up, it has become "irreversible faith." - Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche from the book "The Excellent Path to Enlightenment: Oral Teachings on the Root Text of Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo Irreversible faith is more akin to complete confidence free of any doubts as apposed to any kind of blind-faith or unconditioned trust in something one has no personal certainty in.[but holds faith in none-the-less] When faith is irreversible, it's more akin to knowledge.

Devotion for the Guru can also arise in conjunction with confidence in the reasoning ,logic and direct-cognition of the dharma as one knows that the outer-guru is the living link for realizing the ultimate-guru. It can also be a method of practicing or emulating pure-perception which will in turn eventually leads to effortless and actual pure-perception/realization.

At this point it's not really the same as the devotion or 'clear-faith' we find at the beginning of the path before any direct-perception of one's nature has occurred.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

I really do not know what you mean by faith.

Sure you do, but you reject it.

IMO that's the problem.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I actually do not know what you mean by faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

I was going through some boxes in the garage and came across my own handwritten notes from a Deshung R. lecture. In my own handwriting I quoted Deshung R. as saying, "The reason we say that the Yidam is the same nature as your mind is because if we didn't the deity could become a demon." By that I assume he meant that having a direct experience of the deity can be so startling that it can precipitate a fear response if it is thought of as something other than one's own nature.

With that type of understanding you can see how saying that a deity is of the same nature as your own mind does not nullify the need for faith while doing deity practice.

Malcolm wrote:

I really do not know what you mean by faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Tulshuk Lingpa questions

Content:

Norwegian said:

Nosta,

Tulshuk Lingpa had the stamp of approval by both HH Dudjom Rinpoche, and Chatral Rinpoche. What else do you need when you have this?

As for the image of the footprint, it looks like how footprints in rock tend to look like, comparing it with other known instances of this phenomena. Here's the handprint of Guru Padmasambhava, above the entrance of a cave he did practice in:
http://www.dharma-media.org/media/general/dwnld/photos/drigung/monkey_year_teachings_2004/20040221/DSCF0658.JPG

Malcolm wrote:
I can tell you that Guru P had very small hands...

Adamantine said:
And Milarepa was so small he fit into a yak horn. . . his hands must have been sooo tiny

Malcolm wrote:
I don't think you get my point — I put my hand in that handprint, and my hands were much larger. All I am saying is that Guru P, physically, could not have been taller than 5' 4". He was a tiny guy by modern standards, though not by the standards of his day.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, January 5th, 2016 at 12:00 AM
Title: Re: Sutra Sources
Content:
Ray Rudha said:
Don't mind quoting sources.

Not gonna chop it up though.

Malcolm wrote:
Uh huh, so out of your laziness, you are going to make more work for moderators?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 11:02 PM
Title: Re: Kuntu Zangpo
Content:
Vasana said:
The confusion is probably because there are two different Samantabhadras spoken of.

One as the Adi-Buddha within Dzogchen, and one as a Bodhisattva.

If the adi-buddha is spoken of as attaining enlightenment, it's probably taken out of context or as an expedient means of communicating some facet of realizing Samantabhadra for one's self.

The kunjed gyalpo tantra is a great resource for understanding Samantabhadra.

Malcolm wrote:

There are actually five "Samantabhadras" spoken of in Dzogchen tantras: Nature Samantabhadra, Ornament Samantabhadra, Teacher Samantabhadra, Vidyā Samantabhadra, and Realization Samantabhadra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Tulshuk Lingpa questions

Content:

Norwegian said:

Nosta,

Tulshuk Lingpa had the stamp of approval by both HH Dudjom Rinpoche, and Chatral Rinpoche. What else do you need when you have this?

As for the image of the footprint, it looks like how footprints in rock tend to look like, comparing it with other known instances of this phenomena. Here's the handprint of Guru Padmasambhava, above the entrance of a cave he did practice in:

http://www.dharma-media.org/media/general/dwnld/photos/drigung/monkey_year_teachings_2004/20040221/DSCF0658.JPG

Malcolm wrote:

I can tell you that Guru P had very small hands...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: dharmapala vs yidam?

Content:

fckw said:

Can anyone knowledgeable explain me what the difference is between a dharmapala and a (don't know how to call it correctly: "full blown") yidam like, let's say, dorje drollo or hevajra? What's the qualitative difference, in other words why is it generally hold that one should not start a practice with the former if not already very advanced with the latter? I know that some dharmapalas are said to be not completely enlightened. With these, I understand that this could be potentially misleading at very subtle levels of mind. And there seem to be very worldly protectors or even demons. Yet other protectors are said to be completely enlightened. So, what would be the qualitative difference then to a yidam?

Malcolm wrote:

A dharmapāla is generally a bodhisattva in a wrathful, and usually non-human form, who has taken an oath to protect the Dharma.

A yidam on the other hand is a method of practicing the path based on a sambhogakāya manifestation of a buddha.

Some dharmapālas, such as Mahākāla also double as yidams, that is, they can be practiced as both depending on context and need.

Wisdom dharmapālas are considered dharmapālas who are on the pure bodhisattva stages. Worldly dharmapālās are those who are not on the bodhisattva stages at all. The latter are generally powerful beings of the preta class who have been bound to the Dharma as losers in a conflict with a mahāsiddha such as Padmasambhāva. They frequently need to be reminded of their vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He doesn't, actually. He stresses "real knowledge of one's primordial state [aka the basis]."

smcj said:

Right. And when that isn't workable, his backup suggestion is to do....what?

Malcolm wrote:

Discover that knowledge for yourself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Coincidence vs Tendrel

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Is there any way to determine if there is an auspicious (karmic) connection from past lives, other than "feeling" said connection? Deluded minds can invent all sorts of things, and it's not lost on me that apophenia occurs when we seek patterns/meaning. Recent revelations have come to light that have me thinking about this topic. Any scriptural basis or teachings from great masters that could help sort this out?

Malcolm wrote:

Mo, and perhaps calculation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

Mahamudra and the Great Perfection are realized through direct perception, rather than devotion or the fabrications of the intellect.

-- Namdrol, Heart Treasure of Samantabhadra

I guess that is why ChNN stresses the development of devotion in the Guru Yoga, right?

Malcolm wrote:

He doesn't, actually. He stresses "real knowledge of one's primordial state [aka the basis]."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

Just to be clear, my thesis is as Matt J said: On the other hand, the gzhan stongpas have a good explanation for how Buddhahood is both uncreated and "positive." If I'm understanding correctly, the gzhan stongpas would say that once the obscurations are removed, then the virtues of Buddhahood naturally manifest. So from that POV, compassion is natural while greed, hatred, and delusion are distortions based on ignorance. Once the distorting influences are removed, then compassion and so forth would come forth naturally and effortlessly.

Thus an intellectual understanding of Shentong can give the intellect an opportunity to let go of intellectuality.

Dilgo Khyentse, "The Heart Treasure of the Enlightened Ones" p. 76: The most profound of all teachings, the Mahamudra and the Great Perfection, are realized through devotion rather than through the fabrications of the intellect.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahamudra and the Great Perfection are realized through direct perception, rather than devotion or the fabrications of the intellect.

-- Namdrol, Heart Treasure of Samantabhadra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, January 4th, 2016 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

So I believe making an issue out of Shentong is important, not because it is important to have precision or orthodoxy about emptiness in the Vajrayana, but because it is necessary to get past intellectuality and proceed with faith...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is necessary to get past intellectualism and proceed with direct perception, that is the main point. There are two ways to approach that, the upāyamarga and mokṣamarga, i.e., the paths of method and liberation respectively. The former depends on empowerment, and the two stages; the latter depends in direct introduction — but the main point is illustrated in the following way. In sūtra — and this applies to gzhan stong as much as anything else — the understanding of dharmatā is like a painting of a moon. The understanding of dharmatā in the path of method is like seeing a moon in the water. The understanding of dharmatā in the path of liberation is like looking at the moon directly from the start.

Since gzhan stong is principally a sūtrayāna tenet, it requires a lot more faith. The teaching of sugatagarbha, for example, exists to remove five faults, it does not however mean that faith in sugatagarbha constitutes entering the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 3rd, 2016 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The first Tibetan to use the term was Kawa Paltseg, ninth century, and he used it refer to the Madhyamaka that was based on freedom from all extremes. More or less everyone had this usage until Dolbupa gummed up the works in the 14th century with his brand new "Uma chenpo."

Because of the popularity of Trungpa, when he introduced the gzhan stong/rang stong distinction in his seminaries, the term "Great Madhyamaka" became associated in western minds with gzhan stong. This was further reinforced by Hookham's book and by the Big Red Book, accompanied by a fairly aggressive campaign to promulgate gzhan stong as an alternative to Gelug Madhyamaka.

smcj said:

So therefore if one is discussing the writings of Kawa Paltseg, one will understand the term "Great Madhyamaka" to mean freedom from extremes. If one is discussing Dolpopa, one will understand "Great Madhyamaka" to mean Shentong, specifically his flavor of Shentong to be exact. If one is discussing Dudjom R.'s writing one will understand "Great Madhyamaka" to mean as per "The Big Red Book", etc.

As long as the context is explained the usage will be clearly understood, right?

Malcolm wrote:

The term is kind of meaningless at this point, since so many people claim it in their writings from so many different schools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 3rd, 2016 at 11:28 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

And as I have pointed out so many times, every single school of Madhyamaka in Tibet considers their view "Great Madhyamaka."

This, in order to use the term properly, clearly, and without confusion, one must attribute the context of which school and author's usage you are talking about. As such it is 100% valid to use the term when it is explained to be as used by a major author such as Dudjom R. In his "Big Red Book",

Right?

Malcolm wrote:

The first Tibetan to use the term was Kawa Paltseg, ninth century, and he used it refer to the Madhyamaka that was based on freedom from all extremes. More or less everyone had this usage until Dolbupa gummed up the works in the 14th century with his brand new "Uma chenpo."

Because of the popularity of Trungpa, when he introduced the gzhan stong/rang stong distinction in his seminars, the term "Great Madhyamaka" became associated in western minds with gzhan stong. This was further reinforced by Hookham's book and by the Big Red Book, accompanied by a fairly aggressive campaign to promulgate gzhan stong as an alternative to Gelug Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 3rd, 2016 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I am not arguing that the view of Dzogchen is gzhan-stong, or that there is little difference between them. Rather it seems to me that Dzogchenpas have really little regard for anything like philosophical consistency; they appear to use whatever is available at hand to deliver the One Thing Needful, with worrying about consistency or analytical rigour.

I don't mind in the least, btw.

Malcolm wrote:

You are assuming that Longchenpa's views and Mipham's views are monolithic, cut from the same mold. They aren't. You can't just paste them up side by side without taking into account the vast differences in environment that produced them.

Longchenpa is writing in a fairly polemic free environment, a full 100 years before the major controversies raised by Tsongkhapa and his opponents. He was mainly writing in an environment where Nyingma teachings in general were being somewhat neglected and provided a basis in scholarship for many of the teachings of Dzogchen. That being said, Longchenpa's writings also seem to have been neglected for quite a long while, perhaps because during this period Nyingma was institutionally weak.

Mipham is writing at the end of 400 years of trenchant polemics between Gelugpas and everyone else. The vast majority of his critiques in the Original Mind Trilogy are being leveled at Gelugpas who presume to interpret Dzogchen through the lens of their own educational background. For example, the main recipient of criticism of Mipham is a guy named Jawa Dö ngag, who was a student of Zhabkar and Paltrul, who also had a Gelug background.

The whole of the Original Mind series is a recording of Mipham's oral teachings in response to that fellow's interpretation of Dzogchen. Indeed, we can see a great deal of similarity between the ideas about Dzogchen that are being rejected by Mipham and some ideas about Dzogchen advanced today by HH Dalai Lama.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 3rd, 2016 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

Along the same lines Dudjom R. has said that when speaking about emptiness from an intellectual understanding Madhyamaka is best, but when speaking about it from an experiential perspective Great Madhyamaka (Shentong) is best.

krodha said:

Gzhan stong is not "Great Madhyamaka", really wish you would listen to what people say and stop referring to it as such.

anjali said:

In the for what it's worth department, calling Great Madhayamaka zhentong (rightly or wrongly) has historical precedent. For example,

Taranatha in The Essence of Zhentong, p. 9 said:

In Tibet, the Great Madhyamaka is the Madhyamaka of discerning cognition and is known as "zhentong."

Malcolm wrote:

And as I have pointed out so many times, every single school of Madhyamaka in Tibet considers their view "Great Madhyamaka."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 3rd, 2016 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Duckworth then provides lots and lots of Longchenpa to substantiate the claim that in Dzogchen potentiality manifests Buddha qualities. One of such snippets is as follows:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the qualities exist as potentials in the basis, but not as fully manifest. The manifestation of the potentiality of the qualities of the basis occurs because of realization. We see Mipham defining the presence of qualities based on a subjective criteria:

While maintaining the position, “This purification of any obscurations is the feature of the time of path. This total purification of obscurations is the feature of the time of the result,” is in accord with the mode of appearance of sentient beings, from the perspective of the mode of existence of dharmatā, it is not possible to move even slightly away from abiding in state of uniformity which lacks any divisions of dualistic phenomena such as division by three times, division into pure and impure, sentient beings and buddhas, and so on. Therefore, the unfixed mode of appearance (of not realizing the basis just as it) is not defined as if the basis was the time of the sentient beings, and the path was the phase of a bodhisattva. The extremely pure result is the dhātu of the basis that has always been free of obscuration in the sight of the Buddha, because that seer who sees the qualities as having always been perfect is the pristine consciousness that sees ultimate reality in which existence and appearance totally correspond.

From the perspective of seeing that ultimate sight of the ultimate, since this assertion by the treatises of the Great Perfection that all phenomena have always been buddhahood in the essence of the buddhahood of the result is proven with reasoning of ultimate investigation. it cannot be refuted by anyone as not being so. Therefore, since it is similar with the teaching in the Mahāyāna sūtras that the sugatagarbha has always been endowed with the qualities such as the ten powers and so on, it is also definitive in meaning.

He also points out:

Therefore, similarly, since there is no proliferation of any kind in the dharmatā of the mind, the naturally luminous self-originated pristine consciousness, the conventions of dualistic dharmas such as whether that is newly realized or not do not exist. Realization and nonrealization are dualities in the mind. Therefore, that dharmatā of the mind, the object to be realized with the path, is the suchness that has always been present. The realizer of that is the mind (blo), which is the wisdom of hearing, reflection and meditation. That is the mind (yid) at the occasions of the unceasing concepts of hearing and so on. When that mind (yid) is introduced to that dharmatā, the mind itself is also realized in the state of that dharmatā, and there is no difference between the subject and the object. Therefore, though the convention of realization and nonrealization do not exist in the dharmatā of the basis, this convention of realization and nonrealization is to be understood to be from the perspective of the mind of the sentient being that arises from the state of dharmatā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, January 3rd, 2016 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Casket Seal Dharani Sutra

Content:

conebeckham said:

Sutra Dharanis do not require empowerment, but secret mantra vehicle methods require transmission from a qualified guru to a qualified student. Ray, you're free to believe and practice whatever you want, but to deny this point is contrary to the tradition, and counterproductive for yourself and others.

Malcolm wrote:

You are wasting your breath.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not in Dzogchen, Lamdre, etc.

Anders said:

Why not? Wouldn't the alternative be then that you and I should be able to make use of omniscience in this moment?

Malcolm wrote:

The point of view of both Dzogchen and Lamdre is that qualities are present in the basis in the form of a potential, but are not present as fully expressed. The latter is the gzhan stong perspective, which you can read about in Mountain Doctrine and other places.

The difference is pretty well established in this way: in Dzogchen, the qualities are expressed by realizing the nature of the basis. Those qualities do not exist prior to realization.

In gzhan stong, the qualities already exist, and are revealed merely through the removal of afflictions.

In Dzogchen, afflictions become the five wisdoms through the process of realization; in gzhan stong the afflictions are absolutely different than the five wisdoms, the removal of the former reveals the latter.

Moreover, the gzhan stong pas, the basis and result are undifferentiable. Mountain Doctrine, ppg. 89 states, "These say that this which is the body of attributes, matrix-of-one-done-to-bliss, element of attributes, omnipresent in all three states, is the very perfection of wisdom, the undifferentiable entity of the basis and fruit, the buddha lineage, and say that it exists at all times and the basis of all phenomena..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

Or am I just making that up.

Malcolm wrote:

You are just making it up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

The first turning deals mostly with establishing the practice and presence of Bodhisattvas, and miraculous compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the first turning concerns the four noble truths, etc., as the Samdhinirmocana Sūtra very clearly states:

At first, since the Bhagavan demonstrated the aspects of the four noble truths to those correctly participating in the vehicle in the deer park called R̥ṣivadanam, the amazing Dharma wheel he turned first was amazing, a corresponding Dharma had not been turned in the past by any deva nor any human. However, that Dharma wheel that the Bhagavan turned was surpassable, contextual, of provisional meaning, and a basis for contention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The statement below refers to when a ārya bodhisattva is in equipoise. But only Buddhas are in equipoise 24/7/365.

Ray Rudha said:

The Lankavatara sutra clearly explains that the Bodhisattva is an illusion, only realizing his own illusory nature on the higher Bhumis, and thus realizing the Buddha nature itself.

...

You have no wisdom. None at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Coming from you, this is compliment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is this:

"The fully established true nature (parinirvana), nondual gnosis, the buddha-body of reality, and so forth, are real and existent."

Which means that the ten powers and so on are fully developed within sentient beings at present.

treehuggingoctopus said:

You can say that nondual gnosis and its Buddha qualities are fully developed but not fully manifest (in the sense of not fully cognised by those on the path) yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Not in Dzogchen, Lamdre, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

Yet you specifically mentioned the Lankavatara, which is higher than all these sutras that the quote is from,

Malcolm wrote:

Says, who? You? You are an authority on Mahāyāna sūtras, capable of telling us which is higher and which is lower? Ridiculous.

Ray Rudha said:

and I showed you all the applicable quotes from the Lankavatara, and they are a much higher level and more powerful discussion of the wisdom play of imageless bliss of Mind.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not address the fact that the Buddha taught in sūtra that buddhahood takes three incalculable eons.

Ray Rudha said:

And I could easily bring Prajnaparamita into the discussion, which doesn't even deal with kalpas, at it is the pure wisdom path.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it does. For example, the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā states: Those bodhisattva mahāsattva attained actual buddhahood in unsurpassed true perfect awakening after immeasurable countless eons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You need empowerment to enter Vajrayāna. If someone wishes to attain buddhahood in this lifetime, then they need Vajrayāna teachings, end of story.

Unknown said:

And there is the VAJRAVIDARANA SUTRA, which is called a SUTRA, and which states that the Vajravidarana dharani is the root of all tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

The text specifies it is a guhyamantra, this means it requires empowerment because it belongs to the Vajra family and should be kept secret.

Once again, this text, Ārya-mahābala-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra, though titled a "sūtra," clearly indicates it belongs to secret mantra, details the methods of granting the empowerment into the mandala, saying for example, "If one receives the empowerment into this, one will be free from all inauspiciousness, there will be glorious blessings...." and so on.

Thus, even your contention that if some dhāraṇi or mantra comes from sūtra, no empowerment is required is proven false:

Because one receives empowerment into this sūtra, hundreds and thousands of buddhas go there.

Unknown said:

And that's just the short mantra. The Dharanis are infinitely more powerful. But almost nobody around here even realizes that you can practice dharanis internally and gain samadhi with them, they are just like mantra, only longer, more powerful and more difficult.

Malcolm wrote:

The point of Vajrayāna is that its methods are easy and rapid, and for the more intelligent compared to methods in sūtra; but if you wish to adhere to the difficult and slow, that is your choice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

Where exactly are the three eons mentioned?

Malcolm wrote:

The Ārya-surataparipṛcchā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

In order for sentient beings to completely ripen into awakening, they must practice for three incalculable eons.

Ray Rudha said:

The play of the Bhumis is a play of an illusory body, the Bodhisattva, being embraced by the Buddhas in all directions, by Buddha nature, and realizing the imageless nature of Mind. The play itself is imageless and timeless, allegory, where the accumulation of time is an internal process which cannot be said to be an actual thing called time.

Malcolm wrote:

The Ārya-saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna states:

Very briefly, having known the suffering of samsara, once one attains omniscience by through arduous practice on the six perfections for three incalculable eons, there is parinirvana.

Ray Rudha said:

Anyone with true wisdom practice understands this. Also, a Bodhisattva gaining samadhi with a dharani instantly cuts through endless eons, internally and externally.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha states in the Ārya-gośṛṅgavyākaraṇa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

I demonstrated arduous practice for three incalculable eons.

The Buddhābhagavānaṣṭaśata-nāma-dhāraṇī states

Alas, the great qualities of buddhahood are accumulated for three incalculable eons.

Nāgārjuna write in the Aṣṭamahāsthānacaityastotra:
Having first generated the mind for supreme awakening,
then gathered accumulations for three incalculable eons, buddhahood was attained on the bodhimaṇḍa, and Māra was tamed, homage to the Mahābodhi Caitya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Trungram Gyaltrul incarnation/lineage?

Content:

Karma Jinpa said:

Does anyone know about Trungram Gyaltrul Rinpoche and his lineage?

Malcolm wrote:

He is on the Shamar side of the things...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, January 2nd, 2016 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

Actually in the Lankavatara he teaches non-discrimination attainment of Mind, and how to reach his own stage.

Now, you may believe that takes three incalculable eons, or you may practice mantra and wisdom.

Either way, the Buddha taught the dharani and mantra gate in sutra, and spoke of its incalculable benefits.

Which do not require empowerment.

The empowerment of the 10th Bhumi Bodhisattva is automatic.

In fact, the Treasure Chest Seal sutra, discussed here recently, speaks of receiving the empowerment of all Buddhas through that very dharani.

You are trying to reduce an incredibly complex sutra to a self-serving point that tries to elude the simple matter discussed here.

Sutra mantras do not require empowerment, and somehow people are making it sound different.

It's not.

Malcolm wrote:

The empowerment of tenth stage bodhisattvas occurs at the end of three incalculable eons, dhāraṇīs and all.

There is no method taught in any sūtra of going from the stage of a beginner to a fully awakened buddha in a single lifetime. That kind of teaching belongs to Vajrayāna alone. In order to practice Vajrayāna, one must receive empowerment. In order to receive empowerment, one must have a guru. There is no other way.

There is nothing at all wrong with reciting dhāraṇīs, but reciting them will not lead a beginner to fully awakening in this life.

Ray Rudha said:

The methods are many.

Malcolm wrote:

None of those methods in sūtra lead to Buddhahood in a single lifetime. There are very many reasons for this, but receiving empowerment is at the root of them all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

I would bet that Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche is a gzhan stongpa given that his root teacher is Khenpo Tsultrum Gyamtso Rinpoche and he is a lineage holder in both Dzogchen and Mahamudra, so I'm not convinced that Dzogchen is necessarily inconsistent with gzhan stong in all its formulations.

Malcolm wrote:

In Mantra, it is possible for people have a conceptual sūtrayāna view which is not consistent with how they practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Can I choose an enlightened deity as a protector?

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

You do not need anything to practice the mantras of the Great Bodhisattvas, as well as countless Buddha mantras which are available. It is always strange to hear people talking about needing empowerment for mantras found in sutras. If the mantra is in the sutra, that is your empowerment. The sutra itself is the matrix of all Buddhas. What other empowerment?

Just get samadhi with the mantra, that is the ultimate empowerment.

Need extra empowerment? Read a long dharani every day. Far more powerful than a human.

<https://medium.com/@johnnutah/vajrapani-98d2fbb7d37c#.qvxyir414>

<https://medium.com/@johnnutah/ksitigarbha-majestic-earth-king-of-vajra-freedom-57024e217e97>

Also, Avalokiteshvara, Cundi, the various mantras from the Golden Light sutra, and so on and so forth.

Johnny Dangerous said:

It's really irresponsible to hand out advice like this, you are (ironically) putting yourself in the place of a teacher.

In Vajrayana, many things require empowerment, and your own little theories on the matter are of little import, you're not in any position to be disputing what some people are taught by their teachers, while of course you're welcome to your own practice.

Some traditions of course have practices that require no empowerment, however, I wonder how many would say "sure just get it off the internet and start with no instruction". I'm sure there are a few (maybe pureland works like that?), but i'd imagine that it'd still be recommended to make some kind of connection, and get a walkthrough.

Ray Rudha said:

[Removed post]

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtras do not require empowerment, but becoming a Buddha does. One can either wait for three incalculable eons to attain the tenth bhumi and receive empowerment, as Buddha has taught in the Lankāvatara and other sūtras, or one can find a qualified guru and receive proper empowerment and attain buddhahood in this life as the Buddha has taught in many tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Have you read Stearns' book on Dolpopa, Malcolm? If Stearns is correct (i.e., if his translations of Dolpopa are accurate), then Dolpopa's version of gzhan-stong is indeed quite incompatible with Dzogchen -- but for entirely different reasons that the supposed inherent existence of intrinsic Buddha qualities:

Stearns' Dolpopa, in Buddha from Dolpo, 103 said:

Buddhahood is stated to be the buddha-body of gnosis, and the incidental impurities are stated to be the groups of consciousness. In that way gnosis and consciousness are stated to be extremely different, like light and dark, or nectar and poison. Nevertheless, the differentiation of those two is very rare. These days the majority maintains that this very mind-as-such is the buddha-body of reality, self-arisen gnosis, and the Great Seal, and many maintain that concepts are the buddha-body of reality, the afflicting emotions are gnosis, samsara and nirvana are indivisible, these appearances and sounds are the three buddha-bodies or the four buddha-bodies, and so forth.

treehuggingoctopus said:

Stearns' commentary is as follows:

Stearns, Buddha from Dolpo, 104 said:

For Dolpopa appearances cannot be the manifestation or self-presencing of gnosis (ye shes rang snang), or the buddha-body of reality, because ordinary appearances are completely fictitious, imaginary (parikalpita) and dependent (paratantra) phenomena, which are both actually nonexistent. The fully established true nature (parinispanna), nondual gnosis, the buddha-body of reality, and so forth, are real and existent.

treehuggingoctopus said:

That would indeed make gzhan-stong starkly different from Dzogchen. But the rest of the passage expresses the same understanding that Hookham champions:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is this:

"The fully established true nature (parinispanna), nondual gnosis, the buddha-body of reality, and so forth, are real and existent."

Which means that the ten powers and so on are fully developed within sentient beings at present.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: Western Tulku and adequate training.

Content:

kirtu said:

Even now we only have few structured Dharma educational activities (not even actual institutions with a couple of exceptions) available. So shedras in some form do have to be build out.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Studying at a Shedra might be a viable career choice for a Tibetan, but not for a westerner, unless it is accompanied by western academic credentials. Even then, the idea that a westerner is going to be able to make one's living as a professional Dharma educator is slim at best.

It is a vocation, and one that generally does not reward well.

kirtu said:

The structure of the traditional shedra has to be modified. There might possibly be some degree of accreditation in a western sense. But the primary thing is that the course of study should be available up to the geshe and equivalent level, esp. for monks and nuns but also for laypeople.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, just keep your day job.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Western Tulku and adequate training.

Content:

kirtu said:

Even now we only have few structured Dharma educational activities (not even actual institutions with a couple of exceptions) available. So shedras in some form do have to be build out.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Studying at a Shedra might be a viable career choice for a Tibetan, but not for a westerner, unless it is accompanied by western academic credentials. Even then, the idea that a westerner is going to be able to make one's living as a professional Dharma educator is slim at best.

It is a vocation, and one that generally does not reward well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: This is why you need a teacher!

Content:

Ray Rudha said:
The ultimate teacher is mantra.

Malcolm wrote:
No teacher, no mantra. Dhāraṇis are not mantras.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 5:38 AM
Title: Re: This is why you need a teacher!
Content:
Ray Rudha said:
Mantra does NOT depend on a teacher. That is an absolute wrong view. Mantra is the essence of Vajra, and the continuity of Buddha, Dharma, Sangha is always just Buddha nature, so to say mantra depends on a human element lacks wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:
Of course it does, the necessity of reliance on a teacher is taught in great detail in the tantras of Mantrayāna. It is sheer ignorance to pretend it is otherwise.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 5:02 AM
Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong
Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:
Not according to Shenpen Hookham...

Malcolm wrote:
According to Dolbupa. And it is for this reason that ChNN has explained many times that gzhan stong view is not actually compatible with Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 1:42 AM
Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
incidentally, it may seem like I care deeply about this topic, but I don't. All of this stuff is sūtrayāna. If one is a Vajrayāna practitioner, it does not really matter much what view one holds conceptually, since that is not and never will be the real view. The real view is the view introduced by the guru, either in a formal empowerment or as a intimate instruction, and personally known for oneself.

MiphamFan said:

Malcolm, so how much of all this study is necessary for a practitioner who is not really interested in becoming a teacher?

Malcolm wrote:

Not much.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Bön as the 5th Tibetan Tradition.

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek DW members and Admin / Mods,

What do you think, is Bön the fifth Tibetan Tradition?

I guess the Administrator of DW, did made a mistake when he did set up the Bön sub forum.

One can see here aboard, that Bön is the fifth Tibetan Tradition, that is a big mistake historical seen.

Bön was and is the first Tibetan tradition before the Indian Buddhism was imported in Tibet.

Maybe it would be great to change the text into: Bön the first Tibetan Tradition or only the name Bön without explanation.

KY

Malcolm wrote:

However, Bon, as an institutional entity, is rather late, with Menri being founded in the 15th century in response to the fact that most Bonpo lineages were in serious danger of being interrupted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

On the other hand, the gzhan stongpas have a good explanation for how Buddhahood is both uncreated and "positive." If I'm understanding correctly, the gzhan stongpas would say that once the obscurations are removed, then the virtues of Buddhahood naturally manifest. So from that POV, compassion is natural while greed, hatred, and delusion are distortions based on ignorance. Once the distorting influences are removed, then compassion and so forth would come forth naturally and effortlessly.

How is this handled from in Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

gzhan stong pas claim that the qualities of the result are fully manifested in sentient beings, from the beginning.

This is how Mipham characterizes it:

From the perspective of the mode of appearance, the basis itself never ripens as the result, and since that non-ripening is not the actual dharmakāya, since this present basis is not the buddhahood that manifest the ten powers from the mere cause of the dharmakāya, it may be considered that “dharmakāya of the basis” is not “the actual one.” Nevertheless, from the perspective of the just the time of the original basis, since the conventions of liberation and nonliberation do not exist, while there are no sentient beings, there are also no buddhas because liberation and delusion are totally impossible [in the basis].

When the appearance of the basis arises from that, there are two paths, liberation and delusion, that are produced from this appearance of the basis. Liberation arises from realizing the basis just as it is. Delusion arises from not realizing the basis. When the appearance of the basis arise, when one arrives at the liberation of the initial state of original purity, since realization is manifest buddhahood, the ten powers are actualized. Therefore, though the qualities of nirvana such as the ten powers and so on that do not exist in the basis exist as a primordial endowment, other than those who have reached the ultimate realization, buddhas, when even the bodhisattvas of the tenth bhumi cannot see the manifestation of all qualities, what need is there to mention ordinary sentient beings [being able to see them]? That being so, the difference between all the qualities of the basis being manifestly apparent or nonapparent is not from perspective of just the basis. [4/a] It is necessary to make a distinction in dependence on the appearances of a buddha, one who realizes the basis just as it is, and a sentient being, the one who does not realize that.

Hence we can see there is truly a great chasm between the view of gzhan stong and the view of Dzogchen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

In the same way the result is present in the path in all the yanas...

Malcolm wrote:

If the result is already present, there is no need for the path; this is precisely the place where gzhan stong gets into trouble and Dzogchen does not.

smcj said:

A while back you yourself had as your signature something to the effect that "all practices can be done from the Dzogchen perspective". I have simply restated the same in different language.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, all practices can be done from a Dzogchen point of view, but this does not mean that the result is present at the time of the basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, January 1st, 2016 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

In the same way the result is present in the path in all the yanas...

Malcolm wrote:

If the result is already present, there is no need for the path; this is precisely the place where gzhan stong gets into trouble and Dzogchen does not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 31st, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

The basis, path and result are not simultaneous in Dzogchen? I thought you said it was not gradual at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the basis, path and result are not simultaneous for Dzogchen. If they were, there would be no need for a path. Dzogchen is not gradual in the sense that it is a path where one gathers the two accumulations.

smcj said:

The basis is the basis because of non realization.

Exactly. But regardless of non-realization we are discussing things from the realized perspective (the "one yana perspective").

An enlightened being sees things the way things actually are as well as understanding how their appearances are mistaken by the unaware. That same level of enlightenment that teaches Dzogchen and Mahamudra also teaches all the yanas. There is no difference from the enlightened being's perspective, except for the degree of unawareness of the sentient being(s) in question.

Malcolm wrote:

This is like saying that because there is no difference in the teacher's perspective, there is no difference between kindergarten and a Phd program.

smcj said:

My assertion is that there is no such thing as a causal vehicle.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is, just as there is a resultant vehicle [general mantra], and a vehicle beyond causes and results [Dzogchen]

smcj said:

That is simply a presentation for that accommodates the level of unawareness of the practitioner. There is in actuality only one vehicle from the "one yana" perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, that is what yāna means, conveyance, etc. Thus, when we say there is one vehicle, it means that regardless of whatever path we choose to follow, rapid or slow, the overall goal is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 31st, 2015 at 10:20 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

And the Dzogchen idea that the basis, path and result are all present simultaneously is also understood to be true for all 9 yanas. There is no such thing as a "causal vehicle". That is upaya for the benefit of the appearance bound.

Malcolm wrote:

This not a Dzogchen idea. The basis is the basis because of non realization.

The cause yāna exists because some people think that one needs to accumulate causes to achieve buddhahood. This is a characteristic assertion of the cause vehicle, for example, the lam rim perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 31st, 2015 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: European Supplier of Vimala?

Content:

philji said:

On the Himalayan remedies website it says to take 1-2 pellets per day.. On the Siddhi energetically bottle it says 2.... Not sure if quality is different. Any advice???

Malcolm wrote:

I also sell Vimala, and will ship to Europe. Standard dosage is 2 pills. Himalayan Remedies sources their herbs from the same supplier I do.

go to <http://www.bhaisajya.guru>

Price to ship to Europe is higher than within the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 31st, 2015 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

Which is also how Dolpopa describes his "Great Middle Way".

Malcolm wrote:

...intrinsic awareness and everything that arises within it are free from all extremes
There cannot be something free from extremes.

Dolbupa's great middle way avoids extremes precisely in reverse of the way Tsongkhapa has it. For him freedom from extremes is arrived at in the following way. He tries to avoid eternalism by asserting that relative phenomena are never held to exist more than conventionally, being intrinsically empty; and he tries to avoid nihilism by asserting that ultimate phenomena are held to have always existed, being extrinsically empty.

Here, what Longchenpa is referring to is the standard four fold negation of the extremes found every in sūtra on up to to the Dzogchen tantras, like the Realms and Dimensions of Sound Tantra [sgra thal 'gyur]:

The amazing, miraculous pristine consciousness did not exist before, does not exist later, has not existed from the start;
is at present beyond all conceptual objects, having the nature of the emptiness that is free from extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 31st, 2015 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

Maybe it's quotes like this:

Dzogpa Chenpo's view is freedom from extremes is similar to Prasangika-Madhyamka's for the most part. [The main difference] is that the important basic view of Madhyamaka is of a spacelike empty aspect, while the principal basic view of [Dzogpa Chenpo] is of primordially pure and naked intrinsic awareness [rig pa] which is ineffable and unceasing. According to Dzogpa Chenpo, intrinsic awareness and everything that arises within it are free from all extremes, like the [nonexistence] of the limits to space. Ch'os dbyings mdzod kyi 'grel ha Lung gi gter mdzod, by Longchen Rabjam, translated by Richard Barron in A Treasure Trove of Scriptural Transmission, page x.

So if I were more Gelug minded (which I'm not), I might say this goes beyond the non-affirming negation of emptiness by positing something, namely rig pa which has the nature of clarity.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not an affirming negation, since Longchenpa states:

...intrinsic awareness and everything that arises within it are free from all extremes

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

sherabpa said:

Except that for Kongtrul, Rangjung Dorje was a zhentongpa, as well as others including Longchenpa, and I believe he was not unaware that their views were not entirely identical in all aspects.

Malcolm wrote:

I am aware of this, and I find no solid backing for Kongtrul's views regarding Longchenpa in particular.

As for Rangjung Dorje, he had an interesting approach to the three natures, but I don't really see how his writings show the same approach to the three natures as Dolbupa's and Tshan Khawoche. He also never uses the term 'gzhan stong" himself. The fact that in a 16th century commentary on the zab mo nang don one can read a defense of the Karmapa III as being a gzhan stong pa merely shows that this appellation is subject to doubt since it is not clear in his own writings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that there is only one vehicle, not many.

smcj said:

That's why I object to yana snobbery. All authentic teachings come from unsurpassed enlightenment, the ultimate perspective. It's not as if the lower yanas were taught from a lower level of realization. And every generation of realized masters, seeing things from that perspective, reaffirms the appropriateness of the entire path with all the yanas. Hence I consider the 4 Thoughts to be not different than Mahamudra. They come from Mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Each Yāna is a self contained path. The difference is length, not outcome.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, in sūtra, it very much matters whether one's post-equipoise view is in line with one's actual view in equipoise. In Mantra, it does not matter that much.

Anders said:

What makes the post-equipoise view more relevant in sutrayana?

Malcolm wrote:

Because the analytical view is used in meditation. If that analysis is not correct, one's meditation will not be correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

You should read the parable of the burning house in the Lotus Sutra...

I prefer Blofeld's "Bodhisattva of Compassion".

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that there is only one vehicle, not many.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

You guys are a little Dzogchen/Mahamudra fixated. For me as a lower yana practitioner it's a whole lot simpler if I have an "empty-of-other" view. There's something that's a "higher power", to borrow from 12 step terminology.

Malcolm wrote:

You should read the parable of the burning house in the Lotus Sutra...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 4:48 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Obscuration in Dzogchen

Content:

florin said:

I dont really understand this quote.

I think it needs some work.

Malcolm wrote:

Damn autocorrect....

All Mipham is saying is that there are two perspectives, how things are and how things appear. From the perspective of how things are, "it is necessary to propose that the universe and beings are primordial buddhahood and meditate in that way."

From the point of view of how things appear, the basis, path and result are divided up by wisdom according to their features: the basis concerns proving the validity of buddhahood. This is why, for example, we have the account of Samantabhadra's buddhahood and the account of the delusion of sentient beings. There is also a practice, and also the culmination of the purification of the delusion which gave rise to sentient beings in the first place. Since only deluded people are concerned with liberation, the path of Dzogchen is very much concerned with correcting the delusion that arises from ignorance [ma rig pa] by remaining in the knowledge [rig pa] of how things actually are, i.e. that the universe and beings are primordial buddhahood.

We are not approaching practice from the point of view of accepting something that is not true, i.e., that the universe and beings are impure, etc. But we must acquiesce that this is indeed how things appear to us, and that as long as things appear in this way to us, we are under the influence of the two obscurations, which while temporary and not innate, conceal from us our actual state.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Alright, cheers for your time Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

A snippet of Mipham for you:

Apart from that pristine consciousness of emptiness that is distinguished by great bliss, any other analysis of Madhyamaka is unnecessary because that [pristine consciousness of emptiness that is distinguished by great bliss] is the actual nonconceptual pristine consciousness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, tenets are analyzed in Dzogchen and Mantra in general since these conceptual views prevent people from appreciating and experiencing the real view.

Mother's Lap said:

Therefore shentong and Gelugpa madhyamaka can be called wrong views, but helpful wrong views (for secret mantra practitioners); aka masters do teach it for the benefit of beings and not out of faulty realisation.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I am not so sure they are helpful views at all; many argue that gzhan stong presents a distortion of the Yogacara school, and many argue that Gelug Madhyamaka presents a distortion of the Madhyamaka school. I don't think it is necessary at all to get involved with these Tibetan presentations of sūtrayāna tenets, especially because they involve issues that are never seen in the Indian milieu. It is really sufficient to practice Secret Mantra alone, since in any case its presentation of emptiness is superior to that of sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Ultimate analysis is irrelevant if shentong and Gelugpa madhyamaka are a-okay to Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

Whether one's view is eternalistic [like the gzhan stong pas, etc.], or annihilationistic [like the Gelugpas, etc.], as long as one is following the methods of Secret Mantra, it does not matter very much. But this does not mean as a consequence that people can feel free to disregard the consequences of conventional analysis, since then it would make no sense for Dzogchen tantras to exhaustively analyze various views for their deficiencies.

In other words, in sūtra, it very much matters whether one's post-equipoise view is in line with one's actual view in equipoise. In Mantra, it does not matter that much. Nevertheless, tenets are analyzed in Dzogchen and Mantra in general since these conceptual views prevent people from appreciating and experiencing the real view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Then it is absolutely kosher for Dzogchen masters to speak of Samantabhadra, in the analytical relative of course, as satcitananda.

Malcolm wrote:

No, because analytically, neither the sat, the cit nor the ananda can bear analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

Are shentong and Gelugpa madhyamaka cognitive obscurations?

Malcolm wrote:

All analytical views are conceptual, including the view of freedom from extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

incidentally, it may seem like I care deeply about this topic, but I don't. All of this stuff is sūtrayāna. If one is a Vajrayāna practitioner, it does not really matter much what view one holds conceptually, since that is not and never will be the real view. The real view is the view introduced by the guru, either in a formal empowerment or as a intimate instruction, and personally known for oneself.

Mother's Lap said:

And apparently this introduced view has an inherent existent quality. Or not.

How come aryas can't get away with it but vidyadharas can?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the view does not have an inherent quality, apart from the fact that it is based on one's own experience, rather than an intellectual analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

sherabpa said:

You mean Kunga Drolchok's gzhan stong lta khrid, which outlines Tshan Kawoche's views on the Three Natures and precisely this objectionable point about their relation to relative and ultimate. There are perhaps differences between Jonang and Kagyu in relation to the emphasis on the Uttaratāntra in what Kongtrul calls 'zhentong'. I had forgotten until now that whole discussion about the Three Natures in Stearns' 'The Buddha from Dolpo'.

If anyone has a link to Loppon Malcolm's earlier discussion, I would be grateful. Primarily I just want to read it, I am happy to leave the discussion as it is.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the summary by Jonang Kunga Drolchok, taken from Tsan Khawoche's book.

Also, it is very important to remember that the Palpung version of gzhan stong was drawn from Jonang, via the Kathok master, Rigzin Tsewang, who then conferred the teaching on Situ Panchen, and it is this direct lineage that Kongtrul is heir.

The whole gzhan stong project, beginning with Tshan Khawoche, was to reconcile the teachings of the three own natures with the two truths of Madhyamaka, with a view towards proving that the former illuminated the latter with respect to the notion that buddha qualities are inherent and not newly developed on the path.

incidentally, it may seem like I care deeply about this topic, but I don't. All of this stuff is sūtrayāna. If one is a Vajrayāna practitioner, it does not really matter much what view one holds conceptually, since that is not and never will be the real view. The real view is the view introduced by the guru, either in a formal empowerment or as an intimate instruction, and personally known for oneself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Obscuration in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus, florin and krodha are both correct. Florin is correct from the point of view of mode of reality [gnas tshul], kyle is correct from the point of view of the mode of appearances [snang tshul] for sentient beings.

krodha said:

Thanks. Although I suppose my gripe is that I'm willing to (and strive to) account for both sides of the equation (mode of reality and appearances) whereas Florin is solely clinging to the mode of reality and declaring that the mode of appearances is irrelevant and "not Dzogchen", which is essentially nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

The so called "primordial state" aka the original basis is called "the basis" because it has not been realized. When that is realized, it is given the name, "the result." "The path" is just the method of realizing that, which in the case of the Great Perfection, is the intimate instructions of the direct introduction and their application.

Florin's point of view is influenced very much by "sems sde", which is primarily about the basis. Your point of view is more influenced by man ngag sde, which is more concerned with the methods of realizing that basis.

Another useful snippet from Mipham:

According to that principle, though from the perspective of ultimate reality it is necessary to propose that the universe and beings are primordial buddhahood and meditate in that way, from the perspective of the conventions of the mode of appearances, the differentiation by wisdom into three — the basis, the reasoning that buddhahood is valid; the path, the time of practice; and the result, the culmination of purification — are asserted up to the Great Perfection. Also the treatises of the Great Perfection purpose buddhahood once the five paths of trekchö and the four visions of thögal are finished, but in terms of the mode of appearances, they never assert the accomplishment of buddhahood without finishing the path. When these two are differentiated, after the darkness of doubt about the topics that any of the vehicles of the cause and result have difficulty realizing, since there arises the appearance of confidence knowledge that cannot be diverted, this differentiation is very important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Bugs or People? from War in Buddhism

Content:

boda said:

Don't worry Jundo, I'm just pulling your leg. We all know you could never do anything wrong.

jundo cohen said:

Of course I could and sometimes do. And no none of us can and never shall.

I am surprised that Mahayana folks seem to struggle with that.

Gassho, J

Malcolm wrote:

It is the usual dissonance between the way things appears and the way things are. The former is a result of our karma and afflictions, then latter has nothing to with karma and afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 30th, 2015 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Obscuration in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty straightfoward according to Mipham:

In the realization of the Great Perfection that the three times are not time, there are no phenomena of the ten directions and three times that are not perfect. Therefore, this is the dharmakāya at the time of the basis, but because the temporary afflictions have not been purified it has not ripened into the nature of the result.

While maintaining the position, “This purification of any obscurations is the feature of the time of path. This total purification of obscurations is the feature of the time of the result,” is in accord with the mode of appearance of sentient beings, from the perspective of the mode of existence of dharmatā, it is not possible to move even slightly away from abiding in state of uniformity which lacks any divisions of dualistic phenomena such as division by three times, division into pure and impure, sentient beings and buddhas, and so on.

Thus, florin and krodha are both correct. Florin is correct from the point of view of mode of reality [gnas tshul], kyle is correct from the point of view of the mode of appearances [snang tshul] for sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 29th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Bugs or People? from War in Buddhism

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Fortunately, from that other non-perspective perspective, there is not you or I, termites and families, aliens or earthlings (or earth), not life or death, no space or place to fall.

Malcolm wrote:

Got to love the pretty words...

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, don't you get it? A Jundoless Jundo can kill all the termiteless termites he wantlessly wants.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, while the Jundoed Jundo can't kill any of the termites he wantonly wants. Good thing Jundo is Jundoless, for his families sake. A Jundoed Jundo would only benefit termites.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 29th, 2015 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Bugs or People? from War in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[

That is not a koan either, that is just prajñāpāramitā rhetoric used to justify one's own self interest.

jundo cohen said:

I agree with you. I want to kill the termites because I do not want the house falling on my and my family's heads.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't want your house falling on you or your families head either.

jundo cohen said:

Completely selfish on my part, so good that the termites are not allowed to vote on it. Were it not that I live in an earthquake zone (and recognizing too my selfish refusal not to move to an all cement structure), I would be very happy to share the rafters with the termites.

Malcolm wrote:

Unlikely.

jundo cohen said:

When the space aliens come someday, they may exterminate us earthlings in much the same way, as the inconvenience of a less intelligent life form.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps, like in Childhood's End.

jundo cohen said:

Fortunately, from that other non-perspective perspective, there is not you or I, termites and families, aliens or earthlings (or earth), not life or death, no space or place to fall.

Malcolm wrote:

Got to love the pretty words...

The characteristic of conditioned element and ultimate is the characteristic of freedom from being the same or different; whoever conceives them as being the same or different, they have entered in improper view.
-- Samdhinirmocana Sūtra

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 29th, 2015 at 3:22 AM
Title: Re: Bugs or People? from War in Buddhism
Content:

jundo cohen said:
Well, the Koany aspect is that one might also know that there where no termites to kill from the start, nor separate Jundo to kill them. Nonetheless, we seek to avoid killing.

Malcolm wrote:
That is not a koan either, that is just prajñāpāramitā rhetoric used to justify one's own self interest.

jundo cohen said:
As one drives down the highway leaving roadkill (although we try to avoid that as much as possible), we also know there is no coming or going.

Malcolm wrote:
It is easier to say that when one is doing the driving and the killing...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, December 29th, 2015 at 1:32 AM
Title: Re: having a drink
Content:
smcj said:

The way I understand how the Pratimoksha Vows define "no drinking alcohol" is "not even as much as a dewdrop on a single blade of grass." If someone takes the vow and breaks it, they break the vow.

Indrajala said:
My point is that you understand them as 'vows' whereas in Chinese, Sanskrit or Tibetan they might be understood differently. Remember that your definitions in English are not necessarily reflective of the meanings in other languages.

Malcolm wrote:
In Tibetan, they are sdom pa, (samvara) i.e., restraints.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 29th, 2015 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Bugs or People? from War in Buddhism

Content:

jundo cohen said:

I really feel the weight of having to kill those termites ... but somehow, whenever there is an earthquake and the heavy roof timbers start shaking over my family's heads ... I know it was necessary. That is the Koan.

boda said:

The koan is: if you really cared then why didn't you just move?

Malcolm wrote:

It is no koan; Jundo recognized that his self interest outweighed his interest in termite wellbeing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 29th, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in every single presentation of gzhan stong, the distinguishing explanation is based on a presentation of the three natures basically unique to the gzhan stong school.

sherabpa said:

is demonstrably false, which it is.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not false. For example, Tshan Kawoche's gzhan stong lta khrid in the gdams ngag mdzod is exclusively concerned with a presentation of the three natures.

Since we are repeating ourselves, and since I lost a longer post somehow, I am leaving it here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2015 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

it is completely disingenuous for you to claim that his presentation of gzhan stong excludes mention of the three natures.

sherabpa said:

Bluster. What I said was his text 'Rays of the Vajra Moon' excludes mention of the three natures, which is true.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it mentions the imputing nature, as I pointed out to you. Secondly, it does not rate as a major text of the gzhan stong tradition, not by any stretch of the imagination.

sherabpa said:

The fact that he once uses the term kun btags hardly refutes my main point, which is that one of the primary texts of the zhentongpas is the Uttaratantra.

Malcolm wrote:

I never disputed that Uttaratantra was an important text to gzhan stong traditon. What I dispute is your claim that the gshan stong tradition is built upon the Uttaratantra alone.

sherabpa said:

It is a gross simplification to regard zhentong as a kind of monolithic philosophy the essence of which is a divergent interpretation of the three natures.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a far grosser simplification to regard gzhan stong as kind of monolithic philosophy solely concerned with the teachings of the Uttaratantra.

sherabpa said:

Zhentong involves not just the three natures but also the Uttaratantra shastra and all of the five dharmas, and the Tathagatagarbha sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, the major point of deficiency for which gzhan stong is roundly and rightly criticized is its employment of the three natures doctrine which come from three of the five treatises of Maitreya.

sherabpa said:

However, in the lineage histories, preeminence is given to the transmission of Uttaratantrashastra from Maitripa into Tibet via Tsen Khawoche.

Malcolm wrote:

That is perfectly fine, and has nothing to do with the substance of my main point.

sherabpa said:

This explains why Kongtrul is able to say Rangjung Dorje and Longchenpa are zhentongpas, but you have to deny that.

Malcolm wrote:

Longchenpa clearly identifies Prasanga Madhyamaka as the definitive view in several places, not only one, even so far as saying in the lung gyi gter mdzod that it accorded with the view of the Great Perfection — and he was mostly certainly aware of Dolbupa. But according to gzhan stong, Prasanga is so called "rang stong," a deficient view.

sherabpa said:

His is a broad conception of a transmission lineage with a number of family resemblance features.

Malcolm wrote:

He does not overlook the novel gzhan stong presentation of the three natures; he, like all other gzhan stong authors, in fact spends quite a bit of time explicating them. Shakya Chogden, for example, wrote many hundreds of pages on the subject, as did Taranatha, and so on.

sherabpa said:

It is also why, in order to refute it, zhentong has to be narrowed down to one objectionable point concerning the three natures and most of the actual teachings have to be ignored.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are, like Dolbupa, etc., going to claim a) claim that all five treatises of Maitreya are definitive and b) present a version of the doctrines contained in three of those source texts which is at great odds with the very source texts you claim to follow, it is quite likely that you are going to be taken to task for your exegetical excesses. When this is noticed, you cannot fault the person who is noticing this. That would be similar to blaming a reader for a spelling error in your own composition merely because he or she noticed you made a mistake. The main point is that the three own natures are used by gzhan stong to try and prove the ultimate is empty of the relative (a key doctrine of the gzhan stong view) and so on, deforming both Madhyamaka and Yogacara simultaneously.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: War in Buddhism

Content:

boda said:

Ridiculous. We know that just by walking around every day that we kill countless insects. That being the case, our bad karma would continuously increase.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the point of view of the Jains, not the Buddha. They believe that karma is not related to volition. The Buddha however taught that karma is a synonym for volition.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

What Namdrol is laying out is completely bog standard mahayana - I don't know a single school or lineage that doesn't follow this line of reasoning as a matter of course. It's not even a little equivocal.

Lol, I've lost any idea of what it is we are discussing...

Malcolm wrote:

Luminosity vs. clarity at this point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I looked into this a little, and it appears that the practice of the "stroke of Ashe" is indeed new.

Malcolm wrote:

What's new about it? (Yes, I know what Ashe practice is).

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I actually don't know much about it, so I will defer to your greater knowledge. It's basically like a kind of calligraphy practice, I think. Are there similiar practices in previous terms?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is borrowed from Zen, hence, it is not new. It is a kind of integration practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 28th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I am really looking forward to reading your translation, Malcolm. The text does seem (to the ignoramus that I am, in any case) very important -- and, if Hopkins had decided to leave some core twilight language terms untranslated, it would be rather clear.

Btw, what does he mean by the 'Buddha body'?

Malcolm wrote:

This is how he is translated kāya [sku].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Except that Mipham, for example, devotes much energy to rejecting the idea that the so called fundamental or original mind [gnyug sems] is momentary. Just saying...

treehuggingoctopus said:

I have just stumbled upon it in Fundamental Mind.

Btw, Hopkins' translation is a bit of a nightmare... made worse by the fact that the glossary is incomplete. Without the Internet such terms as 'body of attributes' or 'mode of subsistence' would be a total enigma...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, his translation is certainly challenging.

I hope at some point to bring out a new translation of this this text, as well as the second of the trilogy, An Investigation into the Meaning of the Luminous Original Mind, the Differentiation of the Basis, Path and Result of the Great Perfection entitled Illuminating Wisdom.

The first text, which Hopkins translated, is very citation heavy; this text is very argument heavy, with not so many citations. The third text is a dated collection of various comments made over the years by Mipham on the subject, gathered into a single text. It is my hope to comb through that third text and present illuminating passages, perhaps as footnotes, which expand the topics in the first two texts. This is my present side project. I think that the gnyug sems skor gsum, aka the Trilogy on Original Mind, is a very important series of texts. In it, Mipham corrects many misconceptions about Dzogchen. One thing he especially attacks at length is the idea that the so-called "original mind" is a subtle mind, rather than what it actually is, the nature of the mind, whether that mind is subtle or coarse.

BTW, however challenging Hopkin's translations may be, he is to be highly commended for being the first to bring this into English, as well as Mountain Dharma by Dolbupa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Matt J said:

Thus, in the Highest Yoga Tantra system of the New Translation Schools, the fundamental mind which serves as the basis of all the phenomena of cyclic existence and nirvana is posited as the ultimate truth or nature of phenomena (dharmata, chos nyid); it is also sometimes called the “clear light” (abhasvara, 'od gsal) and “uncompounded” (asamskrta, 'dus ma byas). In Nyingma it is called the “mind-vajra”... This is the final root of all minds, forever indestructible, immutable, and of unbreakable continuum like a vajra [or diamond]. Just as the New Translation Schools posit a beginningless and endless fundamental mind, so Nyingma posits a mind-vajra which has no beginning or end and proceeds without interruption through the effect stage of Buddhahood. It is considered “permanent” in the sense of abiding forever and thus is presented as a permanent mind. It is permanent not in the sense of not disintegrating moment by moment but in the sense that its continuum is not interrupted—this being analogous to the statement in Maitreya’s Ornament for Clear Realization that a Buddha’s exalted activities are considered permanent in that they are inexhaustible. It is also non-produced in the sense that it is not adventitiously and newly produced by causes and conditions [since its continuum has always existed].
Dalai Lama, trans. by Jeffrey Hopkins, Kindness, Clarity and Insight, p. 239

Malcolm wrote:

Except that Mipham, for example, devotes much energy to rejecting the idea that the so called fundamental or original mind [gnyug sems] is momentary. Just saying...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 1:14 PM

Title: Re: War in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

However HHDL remains a pacifist to this day.

.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not a pacifist. He has at times supported military actions against this or that group.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 1:10 PM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

In all seriousness, isn't the Shambhala stuff considered to be terma? There must be new material in there.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? What new could there possibly be that is not already included in creation stage and completion stage, etc.?

dzogchungpa said:

I looked into this a little, and it appears that the practice of the "stroke of Ashe" is indeed new.

Malcolm wrote:

What's new about it? (Yes, I know what Ashe practice is).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

So it seems that the Yogacara facet of the Yogacara/Tathagatagarbha synthesis is still prominent in current Karma Kagyu presentation of Shentong.

anjali said:

See Traleg Rinpoche's book, https://www.amazon.com/Influence-Yogacara-Mahamudra-Traleg-Kyabgon-ebook/dp/B00WAK0KT4/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1451166859&sr=8-1&keywords=influence+of+yogacara+on+mahamudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahahaha:

A unique and interesting look at how Yogacara philosophy influenced tantra and mahamudra. Developed by Asanga and Vasubandhu as a reaction to over-theorization, Yogacara emphasizes that everything comes back to one's own practice and to one's own experience.

This is very funny. Yogacara is much more theoretically complicated than Madhyamaka. Just try giving the Madhyāntavibhanga a try, or the Mahayānasamgraha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not so long ago, my grandmother would kill a chicken for Sunday. I am pretty sure that if everyone in the family would have say to her: we won't eat the chicken, she wouldn't have killed it. Conversely, since no one told her that when it was possible to do it, each of the family member has a moral responsibility in the killing of the chicken.

It is not permissible for a follower of the Dharma to take the meat of an animal that has been expressly killed for them.

jerraj said:

My point exactly. To me there is no difference between my grandmother killing a chicken for her Sunday family gathering and the butcher.

Even though the butcher doesn't kill all the animals having specific clients in mind, when one is buying meat it is like taking meat expressly killed for this person. Why so? Because if the butcher doesn't have the specific piece of meat the client is looking for, the client will ask for it, complain about the absence of meat. Therefore, in the very act of buying meat-even already prepared, there is the actualization of an order placed implicitly and that reveals itself in plain words when the clients complains in case his favourite piece of meat is lacking in the store. In the economic field, it is duly called 'demand', and there is a reason for that it seems to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand your point, I just don't agree with it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Unknown said:

Not so long ago, my grandmother would kill a chicken for Sunday. I am pretty sure that if everyone in the family would have say to her: we won't eat the chicken, she wouldn't have killed it. Conversely, since no one told her that when it was possible to do it, each of the family member has a moral responsibility in the killing of the chicken.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not permissible for a follower of the Dharma to take the meat of an animal that has been expressly killed for them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

sherabpa said:

As for Brunnholz, I'm not sure what the point is, if any, of saying 'zhentong = yogachara + tathagatagarbha'. Why not just say its a lineage of the Five Dharmas of Maitreya?

smcj said:

Because that would just be Tathagatagarbha doctrine.

Shentong - Yoga Cara = Tathagatagarbha.

Malcolm wrote:

No, only one of the five dharmas is on tathāgatagarbha doctrine, the Uttaratantra; three are on cittamatra, one is on Prajñāpāramita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

sherabpa said:

That is definitely what Malcolm is saying. He notes a number of zhentong texts, including Kongtrul's Treasury of Knowledge, which delineate the three natures as a part of zhentong. It is interesting to note these chittamatra doctrines which Kongtrul says are free of the errors of chittamatra.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the way the gzhan stong pas use the three nature theory is not at all consistent with the way they are used by Maitreyanatha, Asanga, and Vasubandhu, etc. Not only does Tsongkhapa, Gorampa, Rongton and many others note this polemically, but even Khenpo Karl notes:

Though most followers of gzhan stong accept Vasubandhu's Yogācāra texts in general as belonging to the gzhan stong view, in light of his always using model (1), the frequent explanation in gzhan stong texts that model (1) is characteristic for sems tsam, while model (2) represents one of the most crucial features that distinguishes gzhan stong from sems tsam, then appears to be problematic not only with regard to Vasubandhu's works. This equally applies to the texts of Maitreya and Asaṅga (held to be the principal forefathers of gzhan stong) and all other Indian Yogācāras, since they all use model (1). In addition, Tibetan gzhan stong pas differ as to which ones among those Yogācāras they consider to be proponents of gzhan stong and which ones they merely regard as sems tsam pas.

<http://wordpress.tsadra.org/?p=1215>

Kongtrul falls into the same trap as all the other gzhan stong pas who preceded him when he tries to differentiate sems tsam and gzhan stong through the difference in the way they use the three natures.

sherabpa said:

Why deny this.

Malcolm wrote:

Because it is eminently deniable.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Lamas and Monks that Drink and Smoke - Is it Normal?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Not trying to equate those with smoking, I've just always found it odd that people make these assumptions about teachers that imply they are beyond cutting loose a little bit, not all Buddhist teachers are renunciates, and not all participation in the world indicates that someone is hooked by desire.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's true that not all Buddhist Teachers are renunciates, but they must at least be aspiring renunciates because renunciation is the essential meaning of all Buddha's teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: 70% of American Buddhists believe in God?

Content:

Gyurme Kundrol said:

This should read "70% of American Buddhists dont know what Buddhists believe"...

Malcolm wrote:

It comes from poll's question, "do you believe in God or a universal spirit?"

I think, phrased this way, many people who self-identify as Buddhist would answer yes to the universal spirit part of the question, especially uneducated ethnic Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The fact that he recounts different transmission lineages, for example, differentiating Ngog's from Zu, does not make his over all presentation gzhan stong, despite his own obvious preferences.

sherabpa said:

You are demonstrably wrong about Kongtrul's treatment of the Uttaratantrashastra not being zhentong. For example, in his text 'The rays of the vajra moon, a guide to the zhentong madhyamaka view', he says:

....

He refers again and again to the Uttaratantra in this text and does not mention the three natures.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, while it is true in this text of instructions on how to meditate gzhan stong view that he takes his primary scheme as the impure, partially pure and impure and the pure, derived from Uttaratantra, it is completely disingenuous for you to claim that his presentation of gzhan stong excludes mention of the three natures. For example, even in this text, he resorts to the use of the term parikalpita, kun btags, on page 599, vol 8 of the Palpung blockprint of the text in question.

More to the point, in his formal presentation of the gzhan stong view in the Treasury of Knowledge, Frameworks of Buddhist Philosophy, ppg. 249-269, he devotes a good two pages to outlining the three natures as a key doctrine in this system, but in fact, the use of the three natures pervades his explanation of the system in the twenty or so pages he devotes to it.

So while it may be the case that in this meditation manual you bring up there is no full explication of the three natures, in fact the three natures are vital feature of gzhan stong theory that cannot be ignored. As I pointed out, this one difference between Longchenpa, who, while a huge fan of the Uttaratantra, happily consigns the three yogacara treatises of Maitreya to Yogacara-cittamatra; and Dolbupa, who believes that all five treatises of Maitreya have the same intention and that they cannot be placed on a scale.

Indeed, this is a key ingredient to understanding gzhan stong thought, for not only are its exponents willing to try and understand all the treatises of Maitreya as definitive in meaning, not only do they interpret the three natures in a way substantially different than Maitreyanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu, but they also, unfortunately, adhere to a historical interpretation of the three turnings of the wheel that does not even come from India, but rather, Korea [i.e. Won'chuk's Three Volume Commentary on the Saṃdhinirmocana Sūtra], widely popularized by Buton in his history of Dharma.

sherabpa said:

So you should not keep telling yourself and everyone else that zhentong is essentially or primarily about the three natures, notwithstanding a few apposite comments by Rangjung Dorje.

Malcolm wrote:

I think I shall, since it is demonstrable.

sherabpa said:

Essentially your 'zhentong' is a straw man. It was no more refuted by Nagarjuna than the Uttaratantrashastra was refuted by Nagarjuna, since it does not go beyond what was taught by Maitreya.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have a problem with the Uttaratantra. I accept it as a definitive summary of the Buddha's teaching in sūtra, just as I accept Nāgārjuna's Madhyamaka as the definitive statement of Sūtra Mahāyāna Buddhist view. There is no contradiction between them.

What I can't accept is 1) any hermeneutic based upon the so called three turnings of the wheel interpreted as historical epochs in the life of the Buddha, since this hermeneutic is directly contradicted by Maitreyanatha in the Sutralamkāra 2.1, and thus is a still born hermeneutic; 2) I cannot accept the gzhan stong presentation of the three natures which is demonstrably distorted and incorrect. In other words, I do not accept the basic groundwork upon which the gzhan stong view is erected.

To enlarge on the first point, there is no Indian source, none at all, for any of the various schemes to bracket this or that Mahāyāna sūtra into the second two turnings mentioned in the Saṃdhinirmocana Sūtra. Therefore, to say that the "Yogacara" sūtras belong the third turning, or the "Prajñāpāramita" Sūtras belong to the second, or the "Tathagātagarba" Sūtras to the third etc., is entirely speculative. All we can say is that the Agamas belong to the first, and Mahāyāna sūtras belong to the second and third; but of the latter, we have no inkling of what sūtras are to be included in the second and third turnings, since as Maitreyanatha points out in the Sutrālamkāra 2.1.a: Not previously predicted, arising simultaneously... And that is where we stand.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 27th, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Luminosity is not equivalent to mere clarity. Luminosity is the ultimate nature of the mind, according to the Perfection of Wisdom tradition, which you accept as definitive.

Tsongkhapa said:

The Perfection of Wisdom Sutra does not say that luminosity is the ultimate nature of mind. The mind being clear light is not dealt with in Buddha's Sutra teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

You are quite wrong. According the Perfection of Wisdom Sūtra in 8,000, not only is the nature of the mind luminous [clear light, 'od gsal ba], everything is luminous, from the material aggregate all the way on up to omniscience. Luminosity pervades everything, but the clarity [gsal ba] of the mind does not.

For example, the Play of Noble Mañjūsri Sūtra states:

Afflictions are temporary, they cannot simultaneous with the realization of emptiness; they cannot simultaneous with the knowledge of the absence of characteristics and the absence of aspiration; they cannot simultaneous with natural luminosity.

Or for example, the Ornamental Illumination of Pristine Consciousness that Enters the Domain of the Noble Buddhas Sūtra states:

Awakening [bodhi] is the natural luminosity of the natural luminosity of the mind. If it is asked why [bodhi] called luminosity, whatever is natural, that is without affliction, equal with space, possessing the nature of space, properly included within space and like space, because it is very luminous by nature.

Here we have a very clear equivalence: bodhi = clear light/luminosity.

Further, the Śūramgamasamādhi Sūtra states:

All phenomena nonabiding, because they are naturally isolated. Because they are nonabiding, they are called nonabiding; since all phenomena are naturally luminous, they are not entities.

The Pratyutpanna Sūtra states:

Because all these phenomena are naturally luminous, they are equivalent with nirvana.

The Vajra Essence Dhārani Sūtra states:

Mañjuśrī, the absence of affliction is awakening, natural luminosity is always nonarising.

The Sūtra that Explains The Manifestation Into the Domain the Method of Of the Sphere of Bodhisattvas states

The mind for unsurpassed true perfect awakening is the mind without afflictions because the turmoil of afflictions has been removed; is the mind of luminosity because it is luminous by nature...

The Sūtra of The Definitive Explanation of the Compassion of the Tathāgata states:

Because the mind is naturally luminous, awakening is naturally luminous. If it is asked for what reason it is naturally luminous, what is natural, that without afflictions, equivalent with space, the nature of space, remains equal with space, is even because it is even with space. That nature is very luminous. Since childish ordinary people do not comprehend natural luminosity, they are afflicted by temporary afflictions. The tathāgatas engage sentient beings with compassion, thinking, "They should comprehend natural luminosity."

The Sūtra of the Intimate Instructions of Mahāyana state:

Due to all sentient beings being like illusions and all sentient beings being naturally luminous, because one's mind is the same, comprehend that the minds of all sentient beings are the same.

In fact the tantras use the same terminology as the above to describe natural luminosity.

Tsongkhapa said:

Even in the Tantras where the ultimate nature of phenomena is asserted as the union of bliss and emptiness a distinction is made between mind and its emptiness - they are not one and the same.

Malcolm wrote:

U huh, so for you, the nature of one thing is inserted into another thing. Like stuffing an olive with pimento. For you, things are not empty, they just have to have emptiness inserted into them.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Mind cannot be emptiness because then there would be no union of the two truths - there would be only one truth.

Malcolm wrote:

If mind is not emptiness, there is no union of the two truths.

Tsongkhapafan said:

The fourth profundity of the aggregate of form is:

Emptiness is not other than form; form also is not other than emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

"Not other than" means "is the same."

Tsongkhapafan said:

In relation to mind we can read this as "Emptiness is not other than mind; mind also is not other than emptiness"

But that does not mean that they are the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it does, just as wetness and water are the same thing, heat and fire are the same thing.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Mind cannot be emptiness - why not? Because there would be no union of the two truths and mind could not function because emptiness is unconditioned and, as I said, there is no valid cognition of an unconditioned mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, you are in trouble then.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 6:48 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is such a thing as unconditioned pristine consciousness or wisdom [jñāna]. You certainly accept, as the Perfection of Wisdom sutra states:

The original nature of the mind is luminosity.

The Nirvana Sūtra states very simply:

Luminosity is pristine consciousness [aka wisdom].

In the Bhavyakīrti's commentary on Aryādeva's Clear Lamp states:

"Freedom from arising and ceasing" is luminosity, because it is unconditioned.

M

Tsongkhapa said:

Let's examine these quotes.

'the original nature of the mind is luminosity' - if luminosity is equivalent to clarity, this statement is true. The original (conventional) nature of mind is luminosity, but this is not its ultimate nature. The luminosity of mind is therefore not unconditioned.

Malcolm wrote:

Luminosity is not equivalent to mere clarity. Luminosity is the ultimate nature of the mind, according to the Perfection of Wisdom tradition, which you accept as definitive.

Tsongkhapa said:

'Luminosity is pristine consciousness' - this statement alone doesn't prove that consciousness is unconditioned because the meaning of 'pristine' needs to be defined. It could mean conventionally devoid of obstructions which doesn't prove that it's unconditioned. Also, not all statements made in Sutra are definitive, some are interpretative.

Malcolm wrote:

The term is ye shes, you normally would see it translated as "wisdom."

Tsongkhapa said:

"Freedom from arising and ceasing" is luminosity, because it is unconditioned." - this is not definitive. Bhavyakīrti was a Chittamatrin and the Chittamatrin view is not definitive because it derives from the Third Turning of the Wheel of Dharma which is not definitive. The Perfection of Wisdom Sūtras are definitive.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in fact he was not a Chittamatrin. He was a follower of Candrakīrti, and the text I cited was his sub commentary on Candrakīrti's Explanation of [Aryadeva's] Clear Lamp.

Tsongkhapa said:

Regardless of what the scriptures say, it's impossible for consciousness to be unconditioned for reasons I have explained. Unconditioned consciousness has never been an object of valid cognition.

Malcolm wrote:

The Samadhirāja states:

The eye, nose and ear are not authorities,
the tongue, body and mind are not authorities, if these sense organs were authoritative of what use is the noble path?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Actually Jesse, as Malcolm and I pointed out...a big chunk of your list are actually results of sexism which affect both men and women, so seeing it as some kind of 'contest' where women have 'won' due to some of these things is flawed. Both sexes suffer due to many of the things you mentioned. In my example, the idea that raising children is exclusively women's job contributes to the idea that men being involved with their children is "creepy" or unmanly, which let me tell you is a very pervasive attitude in middle class America. Of course, it isn't even a consideration at all as you go down the rung, since men are often absent or nearly so.

Malcolm wrote:

This is what happens when you a) watch Fox News too much b) read paranoid conservative web sites:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

I have demonstrated female privilege pretty well.

Malcolm wrote:

I think not.

Jesse said:

No, it points out that when men make similar claims the general opinion is 'men can't be raped, men would just enjoy being raped, you can't rape the willing, women can't rape men'

Malcolm wrote:

When a man is raped, it is usually, though not always by other men. Rape cases against women generally involve statutory rape charges. Not forceful sexual assaults.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

One right women have is deciding the fate of the child in any relationship. Men have no real input ultimately, it's totally up to the female, and if the relationship ends with the woman giving birth men are always liable to pay child support, even if the guy didn't want to have a child. Basically it's a consequence without being able to change anything, except to not have sex at all. While females ultimately do get to choose.

Malcolm wrote:

This is so far removed from reality, it is not even funny. Women do not have this right — when a couple decides to get a divorce, what happens is that they lose the right to decide for themselves how to treat their children. They give this right to the courts. Now, it is true, based on a long, sexist precedent that the women's work of raising children is beneath men, and so therefore, custody of children in contentious divorces are often, but not always awarded to mothers. But this state of affairs actually arises from a sexist attitude towards the work of raising children.

Jesse said:

Sexism also ends up working in women's favor occasionally, namely men being polite to women, opening doors for them.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahaha, this is so lame dude. We do not live in a society where men open doors for women anymore.

Jesse said:

They occasionally do get jobs, and college acceptances because institutions need to fill quotas.

Malcolm wrote:

We, in the US, do not have gender quotas for employment, it violates anti-discrimination laws here.

<https://www.littler.com/publication-press/press/gender-diversity-european-quotas-and-us-law>

Jesse said:

Think of the stereotypes men face, they should be strong, unemotional, not cry or whine about circumstances, they shouldn't display feminine traits, boys who like pink or act like girls are most definitely discriminated against.

Malcolm wrote:

Because of male sexist attitudes about women!!! Really, this should be obvious to you.

Jesse said:

Gay white men are still white men, and nobody would argue they face discrimination, and the simple fact they are gay would instantly counteract any benefits from there white maleness.

Malcolm wrote:

Gay men, whether white or not, still experience a great deal of discrimination. And the discrimination they face is a result, principally, of sexist attitudes towards women.

Jesse said:

Mentally ill people are still discriminated against no matter what color, ethnicity or gender they are, and when discrimination occurs Nobody would defend them like people jump to defend feminism or females.

Malcolm wrote:

Mentally ill people are not 51% of the population. That said, discrimination against mentally ill people is a crime and where it happens, it should be remedied.

Jesse said:

The same goes for fat people, people these days think discriminating against fat people is a GOOD thing. After all they are costing us money in healthcare, they don't take care of themselves, there lazy, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote]

Same as for the above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I've stayed home with my kids (due mainly to childcare cost) for a number of years while I work on my education/career change. I get a lot of shit from other men (though none will ever say so to my face, only online etc.) about "woman's work" (like caring for your kids is only woman's work), surprisingly though, I also have caught a ton of flack from women/Moms...many of whom seem to believe that a man who likes kids is somehow creepy - this kind of attitude is pervasive enough for me to agree that this is an area where there is definitely some sexism directed towards men. I also agree that the default attitude towards men in the legal system is often problematic.

The difference of course....it is basically my choice whether or not to do this, that is not so for women, and the amount to which it ceases to be a choice increases the further you go down the socioeconomic ladder.

Malcolm wrote:

But this is not female privilege, this is an example of male sexism towards women, such that you get criticized for doing "women's work." So you are experiencing sexism from men based on the fact that they devalue their mother's own job. How sick is that?

Moreover, the default attitude towards men in the justice system is based on the high incidence of men in the legal system being there because assault and rape are perpetrated by men on women. That being said, according to the Bureau of Justice itself, between 2006 and 2010 65 percent of all rapes and sexual assaults go unreported. In general, nearly half of all violent crimes in this period went unreported.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

1. Female privilege is being able to walk down the street at night without people crossing the street because they're automatically afraid of you.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, not being regarded as a threat is a privilege? Since when?

Jesse said:

2. Female privilege is being able to approach someone and ask them out without being labeled "creepy."

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm, I have been hit on by some creepy women. Nope.

Jesse said:

3. Female privilege is being able to get drunk and have sex without being considered a rapist. Female privilege is being able to engage in the same action as another person but be considered the innocent party by default.

Malcolm wrote:

When someone gets drunk and forces his penis into someone's mouth, rectum, or vagina, this is rightly considered rape, whether the woman involved is drunk or not.

Jesse said:

4. Female privilege is being able to turn on the TV and see yourself represented in a positive way. Female privilege is shows like King of Queens and Everybody Loves Raymond where women are portrayed as attractive, competent people while men are shown as ugly, lazy slobs.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are leaving out a lot of other stereotypes of women. Anyway, nothing you have brought up illustrates female privilege.

Jesse said:

5. Female privilege is the idea that women and children should be the first rescued from any sort of emergency situation. Female privilege is saving yourself before you save others and not being viewed as a monster.

Malcolm wrote:

So now you are including children as part of female privilege? Anyway, this does not fly. The women and children who get rescued first are the women and children of white men, always, in every emergency.

Jesse said:

6. Female privilege is being able to decide not to have a child.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I agree, their body, their privilege.

Jesse said:

7. Female privilege is not having to support a child financially for 18 years when you didn't want to have it in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? What do you mean?

Jesse said:

8. Female privilege is never being told to "take it like a man" or "man up."

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

Jesse said:

9. Female privilege is knowing that people would take it as a gravely serious issue if someone raped you. Female privilege is being able to laugh at a "prison rape" joke.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so if someone commits a crime against you, and this is taken seriously, this is a "privilege," rather than a right to be free from assault?

Jesse said:

10. Female privilege is being able to divorce your spouse when your marriage is no longer working because you know you will most likely be granted custody of your children.

Malcolm wrote:

You do understand that when men and women divorce, it used to be the case that the standard of living for divorced women with children declines 37% while a man's improved. This has changed in the last decade or so because of improvements in pay equity. These days both men and women can expect a decrease of about 25% in standard of living following a divorce. Some privilege.

Jesse said:

11. Female privilege is being able to call the police in a domestic dispute knowing they will take your side. Female privilege is not having your gender work against where police are involved.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a privilege, this based on the fact that men beat women and children. It is a preventative measure which prevents a great number of assaults and murders. So, not a privilege.

Jesse said:

12. Female privilege is being able to be caring or empathetic without people being surprised.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, you are really reaching on this one.

Jesse said:

13. Female privilege is not having to take your career seriously because you can depend on marrying someone who makes more money than you do. Female privilege is being able to be a "stay at home mom" and not seem like a loser.

Malcolm wrote:

This is so wrong on so many levels. This is not reflected in today's economy on any level.

Jesse said:

14. Female privilege is being able to cry your way out of a speeding ticket.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, no, this is a result of male sexism.

Jesse said:

15. Female privilege is being favored by teachers in elementary, middle and high school. Female privilege is graduating high school more often, being accepted to more colleges, and generally being encouraged and supported along the way.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is really nonsense.

Jesse said:

16. Female privilege being able to have an opinion without someone tell you you're just Misogynist."

Malcolm wrote:

No, they just get, "Why are you being such a bitch?"

Jesse said:

17. Female privilege is being able to talk about sexism without appearing self-serving.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is a result of the fact that there is sexism against women, it is pervasive, and it is damaging to the people who experience it and perpetrate it, both.

Jesse said:

18. Female privilege is arrogantly believing that sexism only applies to women.

Malcolm wrote:

You have yet to demonstrate any so called female privilege at all. A women's right to her own body is a right, not a privilege. Since the legal definition of life begins in the second trimester, in this country women have the right to choose. I support the right to choose, but not abortion itself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

I don't know any feminists. The only experience I have with them is online. Like I said if there are more moderate feminists, I have never heard from them. I thought feminism was a good idea until I started reading articles written by them, because they do indeed reek of an anti-men sentiment, entitlement, and pure generalized judging of all 'white men'. Which I find it incredibly stupid.

There was an article not too long ago where a group of feminists wanted their school principle to be fired unless he made a public announcement at his school acknowledging and apologizing for his 'white male privilege', etc.

Malcolm wrote:

But there is such a thing as white male privilege.

Jesse said:

There forums are filled with questions on how to 'educate' men in their lives of how privileged they are etc. If you go and point out the ways in which women are privileged, you'll instantly be cast a misogynist, verbally attacked and usually quickly banned.

Malcolm wrote:

White women are privileged with respect to their race, but not their gender.

Jesse said:

Women also have privileges in society which men do not. I'm sure everyone can think of at least a few.

Malcolm wrote:

For example?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

There is no such thing as systematic sexism against women...

Malcolm wrote:

There absolutely such systematic sexism against women:

In a different vein, Professor Marsha Freeman notes with regard to the constitution of the United States of America: "The US constitution, 14th Amendment, has been read to prohibit discrimination against women, but the test is not as rigorous as it is with respect to race discrimination-that is, women's protection is to a lesser standard." She later asserts: "The effort to expand the constitutional protection died a generation ago."348 Other shortcomings were identified in the shadow report submitted to the Human Rights Committee prior to its consideration of the second and third reports of the United States of America:

"The Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection provision has not been consistently interpreted as protecting women from sex discrimination, and it has not been interpreted to require strict scrutiny of sex-based classifications. Instead, the standard ranges from requiring a 'rational basis' for sex-based distinctions to requiring an 'exceedingly persuasive' justification. The Fourteenth Amendment has not been] interpreted to apply to sexual orientation or gender identity discrimination. Nor does it protect women from discrimination on the basis of pregnancy or childbirth. Further, the amendment has been interpreted to require a demonstration of discriminatory intent; it is not sufficient that a law or policy has a disproportionate impact on one sex.

http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Publications/laws_that_discriminate_against_women.pdf

This is why we still need an equal rights amendment [ERA].

Jesse said:

There are plenty of women who disagree with feminism.

Malcolm wrote:

Generally conservative, generally white Christian, who have generally thrown in their lot with defense of patriarchy.

Jesse said:

As I recall there were numerous points made, not a single one.

Malcolm wrote:

In general all of the points raised were a result of sexist policies promulgated by men, and not women.

Jesse said:

The only feminism I see anymore is extremist feminism as shown in the first two links in the OP. IF there are more moderate feminists out there it's rare to hear from them, and most feminists would call them 'fake feminists' anyways.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to get out more.

Jesse said:

Men experience similar sexism from society.

Malcolm wrote:

Only as a Fox News anti-feminist talking point. Otherwise, this idea is plain nonsense.

Jesse said:

Yet men are seen to have no right to question feminist principles without being ostracized, judged, and called misogynists. Equality means equal, it doesn't mean women get more rights than men, or women get to do things men can't do.

Malcolm wrote:

Women have same rights as men, but experience discrimination because of their gender. Men do not experience discrimination because of their gender, even though some of them may wish to believe it is so.

Jesse said:

men aren't discriminated against, you are generalizing and discriminating.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote]

Men certainly experience discrimination, but not because of their gender.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

[

Women point out sexism towards them = hero's, victims, deserve sympathy.

Males point out sexism towards them = Misogynist, racists, deserves condemnation

Any criticism of feminism automatically makes you prejudiced, and racist, and deluded. There's no need to examine facts, or counterarguments because the forgone conclusion is that anyone who challenges feminism is bad and in need of correction.

Malcolm wrote:

Sexism and racism are a function of power differentials. Sexism is not just biases like "A women's place is in the kitchen." That is too simplistic.

Gender disparity includes all kinds of issues, like unrecognized household work, the fact that there are very few women in STEM occupations, which are 90% men; that professions where women dominate are sorely underpaid, and even then, women in these positions make less than their male counterparts.

In order to prove that there is systematic sexism against men in our society, you would have to also demonstrate the power differentials through which such disparities happen. Claiming for example that most military casualties are male, for example, is a clear result of barring women from active combat duty until just a couple of weeks ago.

There is no sexism against white men. There are consequences for white men, such as a diminishing power differential in our society that causes some white men to feel discriminated against, but anyone who thinks that there is sufficient gender parity in this society to make the claim that there is a serious problem of discrimination against men is just laughable, the sort of ignorant silliness one sees on Fox and Friends.

And yes, there is a connection between racism and sexism, both are a result of patriarchy, so indeed sexism and racism do go hand in hand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Taco_Rice said:

I commented on the past lives of Feminists and stated that these ideologues exploit four things in men to maintain their political power:

Malcolm wrote:

hahahahahahaha. Political power?

Congress is only 20% women, in other words, there are only 2 women for every 8 men in the House and the Senate, yet they are the majority population in the US. So please...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think the entire usage of the three own natures is entirely problematical, and even though they interpret it differently than Maitreya, Asanga and Vasubandhu, it still causes their doctrine to be involved in internal contradictions. Longchenpa avoids these problems by adhering both to Prasanga Madhyamaka as the definitive view and the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras the definitive sūtras.

sherabpa said:

I accept this, but I do not take the incorporation of the 3 natures as the sine qua non of zhentong. It is a transmission lineage focussing on certain sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

You can call it that if you want, I call it a distorted presentation of the three natures theory.

The other problem I have with gzhan stong is their overly dogmatic adherence to a historical scheme of the three turnings, a scheme which is not derived from Indian Buddhism at all, but rather from Wonho's vast commentary on the Samdhinirmocana Sūtra. There is absolutely no evidence that the tathāgatagarbha sūtras should be considered part of that turning at all. The only people who make this claim are Tibetans. I have done a lot of research in the canon on three turnings, and the way it is used by Buton on down basically is without any Indian precedent.

Very interesting! But if we agree the BN sutras are definitive, it is a moot point.

It is not a moot point at all, since it is the way these sūtras are interpreted defines whether they are definitive or provisional.

Kongtrul's commentary is basically just a rewrite of Rongton Sheja Kunrig's, and cannot be considered a gzhan stong presentation, despite Shenphan Hookham's best attempt to force it into one.

Except for his direct quoting of Mikyo Dorje's Zhentong text, and Dolpopa, and the first Karma Thinleypa, as well as his detailed lineage history in the introduction, i.e the transmission from Maitripa to Zu and Tsen, which he explicitly calls zhentong.

The fact that he recounts different transmission lineages, for example, differentiating Ngog's from Zu, does not make his over all presentation gzhan stong, despite his own obvious preferences. Likewise, Dolbupa's commentary on the Uttaratantra is pretty disappointing if you are looking for some defining gzhan stong feature in it, which it utterly lacks.

The rangtong-zhentong dichotomy was invented by gzhan stong pas themselves, decades before Tsongkhapa wrote a single word. Rang stong is straw man invented by the gzhan stong pas. Nobody accepts that the distinction actually exists apart from gzhan stong pas.

The distinction between affirming and non-affirming negation obviously exists, only the terminology is in dispute. If you think it is not useful at the present time, that is another matter. My (Kagyu) teachers think it is useful.

[/quote]

These negations are not necessarily understood the same way by everyone. But it has become fashionable to assume that the Gelug definition of a non-affirming negation is the one that is universally meant. For example, Rongzom clearly defines the affirming negation as a proof of your own position, whereas a non-affirming negation is the rejection of another's position. So for him, the Madhyamaka only uses the non-affirming negation, they do not use an affirming negation at all since they have no position to prove, viz existence or nonexistence. {He criticizes Madhyamaka however, also, for other reasons}.

Basically both rang stong and gzhan stong are easily refuted just by looking at the MMK. The refutation of rang stong is:

If there were something subtle that was not empty there would be something subtle to be empty;

but as there is nothing not empty, where is there something to be empty?

The refutation of gzhan stong is:

Since arising, abiding and ceasing are not established, the conditioned is not established, if the conditioned is not established, how can the unconditioned be established?

There is no object of refutation not included in these two stanzas of the MMK, and they are unassailable. Simply put, gzhan stong is a view more crude than real Madhyamaka. It can be a stepping stone to a more subtle view, but it is not itself that subtle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

5 Feminist Myths That Will Not Die

<http://time.com/3222543/5-feminist-myths-that-will-not-die/>

Malcolm wrote:

Written by a conservative shill.

Jesse said:

No, Women Don't Make Less Money Than Men

<http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2014/02/01/no-women-don-t-make-less-money-than-men.html>

Malcolm wrote:

Written by the same conservative shill

Jesse said:

5 Ways Society Discriminates Against Men

<http://thoughtcatalog.com/janet-bloomfield/2014/08/5-ways-society-discriminates-against-men/>

Malcolm wrote:

And for this one, well:

Bloomfield, A Voice for Men's "Director of Social Media," was recently booted from Twitter (again) for "targeted abuse" — evidently her harassment of feminist writer Jessica Valenti, which included making up inflammatory fake quotations and attributing them to her.

<http://www.wehuntedthemammoth.com/2015/01/01/janet-judgybitch-bloomfield-tries-to-lie-her-way-out-of-a-twitter-suspension-heres-proof-of-her-targeted-abuse/>

Jesse said:

<http://www.realsexism.com/>

Malcolm wrote:

None of these statistics are a result of sexism of women towards men. All of these stats are a result sexism of men towards women.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in every single presentation of gzhan stong, the distinguishing explanation is based on a presentation of the three natures basically unique to the gzhan stong school.

sherabpa said:

Not so, e.g. Kongtrul's commentary on the Uttaratantrashastra.

Malcolm wrote:

Kongtrul's commentary is basically just a rewrite of Rongton Sheja Kunrig's, and cannot be considered a gzhan stong presentation, despite Shenphan Hookham's best attempt to force it into one.

There is no reason to consider oneself a gzhan stong pa, even if one accepts the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras definitive.

sherabpa said:

Except that our lineage masters styled it this way.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean Kagyus?

sherabpa said:

You have pointed out that, apart from the 3 natures, there is nothing very distinctive about this view. This is correct. However, place that view in the context of hundreds of years of the Ganden non-affirming negation hegemony, and the rangtong-zhentong dichotomy and vocabulary starts to look quite appealing.

Malcolm wrote:

The rangtong-zhentong dichotomy was invented by gzhan stong pas themselves, decades before Tsongkhapa wrote a single word. Rang stong is straw man invented by the gzhan stong pas. Nobody accepts that the distinction actually exists apart from gzhan stong pas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is really, really accurate. For example, Longchenpa regards the ten tathāgatagarbha sūtras as definitive, but nowhere in his explanation of tathāgatagarbha does he resort to the use of the three own natures to explain tathāgatagarbha theory with respect to the two truths.

sherabpa said:

Is this an aspect of Zhentong you have a problem with? I can think of only a couple of times where the three natures are mentioned in Zhentong texts, i.e. Rangjung Dorje mentions them in the Zabmo Nangdon and the Nyingpo Tenpa. As I recall you don't accept Rangjung Dorje as a Zhentongpa anyway, so is there a problem?

Malcolm wrote:

I think the entire usage of the three own natures is entirely problematical, and even though they interpret it differently than Maitreya, Asanga and Vasubandhu, it still causes their doctrine to be involved in internal contradictions. Longchenpa avoids these problems by adhering both to Prasanga Madhyamaka as the definitive view and the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras the definitive sūtras.

I would not really consider Rangjung Dorje a gzhan stong pa. But he was one of the first Tibetans to use the three own natures novel ways in his texts.

The other problem I have with gzhan stong is their overly dogmatic adherence to a historical scheme of the three turnings, a scheme which is not derived from Indian Buddhism at all, but rather from Wonho's vast commentary on the Samdhinirmocana Sūtra. There is absolutely no evidence that the tathāgatagarbha sūtras should be considered part of that turning at all. The only people who make this claim are Tibetans. I have done a lot of research in the canon on three turnings, and the way it is used by Buton on down basically is without any Indian precedent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

So it seems to me that as of this posting the Tathagatagarbha should be considered a "view" in its own right. I personally am not so attached to the 3 natures paradigm for instance.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in every single presentation of gzhan stong, the distinguishing explanation is based on a presentation of the three natures basically unique to the gzhan stong school.

There is no reason to consider oneself a gzhan stong pa, even if one accepts the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras definitive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

Brunnholz does include how things developed historically to support his thesis, including what he calls Indian writers who were precursors to the later Tibetan writers. His view seems credible to me. However I've not heard a detailed presentation to the contrary.

sherabpa said:

Jamgon Kongtrul gives a lineage in his introduction to the Uttaratantrashastra. I'm sure Brunnholz is quite correct in his tracing of the lineage. I'm just stressing for Zhentongpas the origins are the sutras on the Buddha nature, as well as Maitreya's 5 shastras, especially the Uttaratantrashastra. So to say it is a combination of yogacara - which normally means the teachings of Asanga and Vasubhandu - and tathagatagarbha, is not really accurate.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is really, really accurate. For example, Longchenpa regards the ten tathāgatagarbha sūtras as definitive, but nowhere in his explanation of tathāgatagarbha does he resort to the use of the three own natures to explain tathāgatagarbha theory with respect to the two truths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Lamas and Monks that Drink and Smoke - Is it Normal?

Content:

Ayu said:

The worst thing about tobacco smoking is its addictive power.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the worst thing about tobacco is that it takes up the radioactive isotope Polonium 210, which is why habitual smoking of tobacco causes lung cancer.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

All men are violent, anti-feminist, misogynists, racists, rapists, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not all, just the ones that are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Jesse said:

Sorry, you're full of it, and so are these women. Women are pretty damned equal.

Malcolm wrote:

Educate yourself:

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/ariel-smilowitz/for-us-women-inequality-takes-many-forms_b_7064348.html

Jesse said:

Common complaints are 'white male privilege' don't make me laugh. As if every single white male is somehow automatically treated better than women. In fact women have it much easier than men in many areas. Women in general are treated better than men.

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously, what planet do you live on? Generally speaking, white men have it easy in this country. I am one.

Jesse said:

Men who feel the need to defend the honor of uptight, spoiled egocentric women need to have their heads examined, honesty.

Malcolm wrote:

This a pretty sexist remark, which itself is telling. I don't need to defend the "honor" of any women, as if somehow we are discussing someone's chastity which needs defending. No, I am pointing out the bare fact that women have not achieved parity in our society, not by a long shot.

Jesse said:

I'm not threatened by feminism. Hypocrisy, idiocy and entitlement piss me off. I have no problem pointing it out.

Malcolm wrote:

I suppose you are against affirmative action as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Male victimhood....yawn.

Jesse said:

Same thing I think every-time I read feminist rants.

Malcolm wrote:

The reality is that women do deal with discrimination all the time. They make 30 percent less than men in the same exact jobs, on average; they are discriminated against still in so many areas of society. Anyone who does not think we do not live in a patriarchal society where women are severely disadvantaged at every turn needs to wake up.

Those men who find themselves threatened by feminism need to have their heads examined.

Jesse said:

It's all nothing but hypocrisy.

Malcolm wrote:

This kind of totalizing dismissal is exactly the problem women face everyday.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 26th, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Medicine Buddha Sutra in Tibetan

Content:

kirtu said:

I did have links to the ACIP material but either their server is down or they reorganized the links (I'll check later today).

ACIP is in the process of moving their Tibetan texts to the Red Hat Cloud. And they are unavailable during this process.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

They are all here:

<http://tibetan.works/etext/>

And the Tengyur interface is here:

<http://www.aciparchive.org/ace/#col%28tendg%29>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: 70% of American Buddhists believe in God?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Merry Christmas everyone, it's a wonderful day to celebrate the precious human rebirth of Jesus / Isaa, since it seems quite likely he was a Buddhist yogi and his references to God had the same connotations as the American Buddhists here :

http://www.thezensite.com/non_Zen/Was_Jesus_Buddhist.html

Malcolm wrote:

Very unlikely he was a Buddhist of any stripe at all, and there is absolutely no credible evidence for any of the Jesus in Indian legends. Jeez, you are starting to sound like Michael Roach.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 10:34 PM
Title: Re: What is wrong with feminists these days?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Male victimhood....yawn.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 11:07 AM
Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong
Content:
Mother's Lap said:
AFAIK

Yogacara:
Imputed Nature - False
Dependent Nature - True
Perfected Nature - True

Shentong:
Imputed Nature - False
Dependent Nature - False
Perfected Nature - True

Malcolm wrote:
Correct.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 11:07 AM
Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong
Content:
sherabpa said:

Also, if you are bothered by the fact that Maitreya doesn't mention 3 natures of 8 consciousnesses in the Uttaratantrashastra, consider equally why these are mentioned by Buddha in the Sandhinirmochana or Lankavatara sutra but not in the sutras of the second turning. The 84,000 teachings of Buddha are given for different capacities and inclinations, it is that simple.

Malcolm wrote:
Maitreyanatha mentions both in the Sūtrālaṃkāra, which is his grand synthesis of the three main strands of Mahāyāna sūtra: Prajñāpāramita, Yogacara and Tathāgatagarbha. Uttaratantra is solely focused on explicating tathāgatagarbha sūtras; the two vibhaṅgas are focused on Yogacara, and the Abhisamayālaṃkāra is focused on explicating the Prajñāpāramita sūtras. It is that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 11:03 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

sherabpa said:

Shentong has some of the same sources as yogacara and the tathagatagarbha 'doctrine'. This does not mean Shentong is a combination of yogacara and tathagatagarbha.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Lamas and Monks that Drink and Smoke - Is it Normal?

Content:

Nosta said:

Is it acceptable for a Lama or a Monk to get drunk?

Malcolm wrote:

It is never acceptable to get drunk such that one loses mindfulnesses. That being said, most of the Lamas I have known over the years have been lay people, and most of them drink moderately.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 25th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha's mind is the Dharmakaya. If the Dharmakaya is unconditioned, Buddha is inert, and his merit is therefore inert, but he produces emanations?

Malcolm wrote:

You are making a false equivalency, i.e., unconditioned = insentience. What is the basis for such a claim?

Tsongkhapafan said:

There's no such thing as an unconditioned mind...

Malcolm wrote:

There is such a thing as unconditioned pristine consciousness or wisdom [jñāna]. You certainly accept, as the Perfection of Wisdom sutra states:

The original nature of the mind is luminosity.

The Nirvana Sūtra states very simply:

Luminosity is pristine consciousness [aka wisdom].

In the Bhavyakīrti's commentary on Aryādeva's Clear Lamp states:

"Freedom from arising and ceasing" is luminosity, because it is unconditioned.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Buddha's mind is the Dharmakaya. If the Dharmakaya is unconditioned, Buddha is inert, and his merit is therefore inert, but he produces emanations?

Malcolm wrote:

You are making a false equivalency, i.e., unconditioned = insentience. What is the basis for such a claim?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: Yale Students sign petition to repeal 1st amendment

Content:

Tenso said:

Very disgusting to see what academia has become. Nothing but left leaning brain washing institutions run by washed up hippies from the 60s.

Malcolm wrote:

You really are out of it. Universities in the US have swerved right since the late 70's. This idea that American universities are filled with hippy professors is complete and total nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in sūtrayāna, they maintain that it is the merely the absence of inherent existence of things, a natural purity, for example, the way Gyaltsab Je describes it in his commentary in the Uttaratantra.

cloudburst said:

Gyaltsab Je indicates that it has three characteristics, pure, clear and luminous.

The Seventh Dalai Lama says that tathagatagarba is the union of clarity and emptiness.

Even Sakyas like Deshung Rinpoche and Khyentse Wangchuck say that the tathagatagarbha is clear light, conditioned and conventional.

All phenomena have two natures.

Malcolm wrote:

The Sakya position, at least as outlined by Gorampa, is that neither clarity nor emptiness can be considered suitable basis for tathāgatagarbha, i.e. a suitable basis for liberation. It can't be clarity, because in the Sakya system, clarity is considered conditioned; it can't be emptiness, because that would be the same as an arhat's cessation. The union of clarity and emptiness can be considered tathāgatagarbha because that union itself is unconditioned. But Gorampa would never admit that tathāgatagarbha is conditioned. To claim so is to contradict the Buddha directly. Why? For the simple reason that the tagāthagarbha is a just a name for dharmakāya encased in afflictions; but that dharmakāya is always unconditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

MiphamFan said:

I thought you said there was some new stuff in the Khandro Nyingthig?

Malcolm wrote:

There appears to be some instructions in the KN which are shared with the Five Stages of Ghantapāda. Other than that, nothing "new."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

In all seriousness, isn't the Shambhala stuff considered to be terma? There must be new material in there.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? What new could there possibly be that is not already included in creation stage and completion stage, etc.?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

cloudburst said:

Am I not remembering correctly that last year around this time you lamented that the blessings of the Guhyagharba were lost due to the publication of some new translation?

Malcolm wrote:

Not me.

cloudburst said:

To clarify, you think it is ok for someone who has not received, let's say a particular transmission and empowerment, to read a sealed text? For example, if someone had received Guhyasamaja empowerment in sarma, could they read a restricted commentary on the khandro nyingthig, without fearing adverse consequences?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not my job to decide what is ok and what is not ok for individuals. If they were to follow my example, they would seriously try and get the transmission for whatever interested them. On the other hand, do I think that some dharmapāla is going to split open the head of someone who reads it, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no doubt terms are important, but not because of the information contained in the texts. They are important because of the shortness of the lineage. Such revelations actually contain nothing new or different than what has come before and is older.

dzogchungpa said:

I'm curious, would you be able to hazard a guess as to the last time new information was actually revealed, if ever?

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, 11th-12th century or so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Problems in a lineage come when a) the guru is not a qualified one, b) students fight with each other.

Mother's Lap said:

Say Tertön A passes down his terma down through to the seventh generation lineage holder. All these lineage holders were perfect in practice and commitments, and only they gave empowerments out to various disciples. All the 'branch' disciples were bad apples without exception. Does the terma continue to have blessings considering it has a 'white trunk' but the branches are all rotten, if that makes sense?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no idea and don't want to speculate.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are no secrets anymore.

kirtu said:

Sure there are.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there really aren't, not of any substance. Some apotropaic practices may be secret, but they hardly represent the main point of the teachings.

Things have changed. In 1990, many things were secret. Now everything has been published.

kirtu said:

However, pertaining to the original question, in the mid-late 1000's, Sherab Tsultrim started* the Sakya lineage over exactly this issue. Prior to this period the Khön family had been Nyingma. But after some tantric practices were demonstrated publicly as if they were an athletic contest, he said that the blessings had left and told his younger brother, Khön Konchok Gyalpo, to study the Sarma tantras.

Malcolm wrote:

Specifically it was Mamo dances performed at a harvest festival. Nevertheless, to this day the main practice of the Khon remains Nyingma. The reason for this is that once Khon Khonchog Gyalpo buried all these Nyingma teachings in a stupa, he had a dream where the protectors told him to remove Kilaya and Yangdag from concealment and to maintain the practice in the Khon family in perpetuity. The main eight deity Sakya protectors also come from terma lineages, as witnessed by their inclusion in the Rinchen Terzö. \

So are we going to maintain that all of these formerly secret practices that have now been published, such as Mahamudra, Lamdre, Dzogchen, Kalacakra, Lama Chopa, etc., are all finished because their details can be found in any major library? I think not. The teachings of the Dharma do not become ineffective because they are disseminated. They become ineffective, if, like medicine, they are not taken.

In any case, what causes problems in the lineage is not publishing books, that is the least of it. Problems in a lineage come when a) the guru is not a qualified one, b) students fight with each other.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 24th, 2015 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: Do tantrās lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

tingdzin said:

This may also be the reason that, as Dudjom Rinpoche said, these days Nyingmapa practice is especially dependent on the tertons, as tertons go to the source as it were, and get a fresh start. Frequently termas are referred to as "still having the warm breath of the dakinis attached to them".

Malcolm wrote:

There is no doubt termas are important, but not because of the information contained in the texts. They are important because of the shortness of the lineage. Such revelations actually contain nothing new or different than what has come before and is older. And we should keep in mind what Nyangral Nyima Ozer writes in his catalogue for the Dharma of the Great Ḍākinī [Mkha 'gro chen mo'i chos]:

In the future, there will be very many Treasure Dharmas with little blessing.

tingdzin said:

And yes, there are still some secrets. I have a friend who has been trying for years to get certain transmissions, but even the most generous lamas refuse to give them.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not mean the contents of those teachings are actually "secret" in the sense that the information in them is not contained in a hundred different texts. It just means that the lamas in question value the integrity of the lineage to a certain degree and wish to give it only to a few disciples. An example of this is the Sde gsum teachings of the Choling Tersar. Lineage is regarded as more important than the actual information in the body of the teachings, upadeshas are favored over tantras, etc.

tingdzin said:

Probably at least in part because they know that these teachings would show up on the internet within a month if they gave them to a Westerner...

Malcolm wrote:

Rather than getting down on westerners, we should remember that it is Tibetans who have published all these "secret" teachings openly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: At what age is it appropriate to discuss Emptiness/No-Se

Content:

Techno Yogi said:

This article discusses emptiness from a Madhamikya perspective, and uses a concrete example (growing carrots) to explain it:

If phenomena don't independently exist then how do they exist? The Middle Way tells us that they dependently exist in three fundamental ways. First, phenomena exist dependent upon causes and conditions. For example, carrots depend upon soil, sunlight, moisture, freedom from rodents, and so forth. Second, phenomena depend upon the whole and its parts. Carrots depend upon its greens, stem, root hairs, and so on and the totality of all these parts. Third, and most profoundly, phenomena depend upon mental imputation, attribution, or designation. From the rich panoply of experience, I collect the sense qualities, personal associations, and psychological reactions to carrots together, and name them or designate them as "carrot." The mind's proper functioning is to construct its world, the only world we can know. The error enters because along with naming comes the false attribution of inherent existence, that foundation for desire and aversion.

For the Middle Way, dependent arising is a complementary way of describing emptiness. We can understand them as two different views of the same truth. Therefore, contrary to our untutored beliefs, the ultimate nature of phenomena is its dependency and relatedness, not isolated existence and independence.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a completely incorrect explanation of the Madhyamaka. There is no such thing as "dependent existence" in Madhyamaka teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Yale Students sign petition to repeal 1st amendment

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Part of the problem is that no one can write today, 20 years ago my writing skills were c+, these days they earn me automatic A's.

Malcolm wrote:

No one has been able to write since the 1970's. For example, the first thing I did when I went to school [Harvard Extension] was take a mandatory year of grammar and focused on writing intensive courses. I literally could not write effectively until then.

The problem does not begin in high school, it begins in grade 1.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Yale Students sign petition to repeal 1st amendment

Content:

Paul said:

Time for a moratorium on non-STEM courses in western universities. Give it ten years and then we can start up the liberal arts courses again, hopefully without all the Marxist nonsense that's embedded itself in academia for decades.

Malcolm wrote:

Ahh....the right wing myth of Marxism dominating Academia. That has not been true in the US Academy for at least thirty years.

Paul said:

Well that's me convinced.

Malcolm wrote:

Be informed:

Although we would not contest the claim that professors are one of the most liberal occupational groups in American society, or that the professoriate is a Democratic stronghold, we have shown that there is a sizable, and often ignored, center/center-left contingent within the faculty; that on several important attitude domains – and in terms of overall political orientation – moderatism appears to be on the upswing; that, according to several measures, it is liberal arts colleges, and not elite, PhD granting institutions that house the most liberal faculty; and that there is much disagreement among professors about the role that politics should play in teaching and research.

<http://citeseerx.ist.psu.edu/viewdoc/download?doi=10.1.1.147.6141&rep=rep1&type=pdf>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Yale Students sign petition to repeal 1st amendment

Content:

Paul said:

Time for a moratorium on non-STEM courses in western universities. Give it ten years and then we can start up the liberal arts courses again, hopefully without all the Marxist nonsense that's embedded itself in academia for decades.

Malcolm wrote:

Ahh....the right wing myth of Marxism dominating Academia. That has not been true in the US Academy for at least thirty years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't. Dharmakāya is realized for one's own benefit. The two rūpakāyas are realized for the benefit of others.

Tenso said:

Sambhogakaya is also for one's own personal benefit, no? If not then why is it called the body of bliss/enjoyment?

Malcolm wrote:

It is realized for the benefit of ārya trainees on the eighth bhumi and beyond. Sambhoga means "enjoying together." Enjoying what? The Mahāyāna Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Yale Students sign petition to repeal 1st amendment

Content:

Jesse said:

This has to be about the stupidest thing I've ever seen. Yale students are totally for repealing the first amendment in order to 'create a safespace' where no one's feelings get hurt. What the hell is wrong with kids these days?

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Malcolm wrote:

You do realize that Ami Horowitz is a right wing satirist?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

There are two parts to the Dharmakaya - the Wisdom Truth Body and the Nature Body, which correspond to the functioning omniscient mind of Buddha and the emptiness of that mind respectively. The Nature Body is unconditioned because it's an ultimate truth and the ultimate true cessation.

Malcolm wrote:

This is according to the interpretation of Haribhadra. This is not actually found in the sūtras, per se.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Can you please explain to me how an unconditioned Dharmakaya functions to benefit sentient beings?

Malcolm wrote:

It doesn't. Dharmakāya is realized for one's own benefit. The two rūpakāyas are realized for the benefit of others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

pemachophel said:

In any case, I live in a place where there is a very large Tibetan Buddhist community and has been for 40 years. Sorry to say, I don't get much of a sense of accomplishment from many really long-time practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

Unless one is clairvoyant, one's sense of the progress of other practitioners is bound to be sheathed in misconceptions. Anyway, all that really matters is that one wakes up in the bardo of dharmatā. Exhibiting signs of realization in this life is just not that important. And if one has received proper instruction in Dzogchen teachings, waking up in the bardo is a certainty, not a guess or an aspiration.

Happy Solstice!!!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 23rd, 2015 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

pemachophel said:

The way many Tibetan Lamas teach Vajra Armor, They make it sound (at least to me) that one can expect results in a single retreat.

Malcolm wrote:

The original text revealed by Dorje Lingpa specifies a short retreat of a few days. I know many practitioners who have undertaken the Dorje Gotrab retreat and experienced positive benefits from using this mantra, myself included. It is a Dzogchen related practice, so there is no particular visualization and so on that one needs to do.

There are also later revelations of Dorje Gotrab that are more related to Anuyoga, with visualizations and so on. But the root text is strictly a Dzogchen practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 10:50 PM

Title: Re: Deleting of Samayas

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek DW members,

Maybe a strange thing, but how can we delete some taken Tantric Samayas ?

We all know how to maintain Samayas and how to restore these commitments, but how to delete them to the roots, that is to me not so known.

KY

Malcolm wrote:

If you break your root samayas, you delete them from the root. But this is really hard to do.

Basically, there only real samaya is being committed to liberation, one's own and all others. If you abandon this commitment, you abandon the rest. If you keep this commitment, you keep the rest.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This might be an issue with some of the more ritually oriented tantras, but not Dzogchen tantras, in general. After all, what harm can one inflict with the nature of the mind?

tingdzin said:

Well, we are talking about tantras in general here.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I addressed these concerns as well. There is also other factors — why, for example, do we need to keep information like the function of the five or ten vāyus, channels and cakras secret, when they are basically open for discussion in Yoga and so on, as well as Ayurveda and Tibetan medicine? It does not make any sense at all.

The fact is the cat is out of the bag (was it ever in?). Yidams are on tshirts. Mantras are on bumperstickers. Many of the major tantras are in English translation, available on Amazon. If you want to go have a dip in Tantric Exoticism, just go to the Rubin in NYC, buy a glass of bubbly, and wander the exhibits where the transgressive art of Genesis Bryer P-Orridge rubs shoulders with ancient masterpieces of Tibet.

There are no secrets anymore.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For example, The Ārya-dharmasaṃgīti-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

The real is the dharmakāya of the Tathāgata; the unconditioned is the parinirvana...

The Avatamska Sūtra states:

The dharmakāya is the kāya that never comes nor goes, it is the indestructible kāya because it is unconditioned.

Abhakaragupta states in his Moonrays commentary on Perfection of Wisdom in 18,000 lines:

The dharmakāya is the unconditioned ultimate of the bhagavans.

Or Jñānacandra's commentary on Nāgārjuna's Praise to the Three Kāyas states:

The dharmakāya is exclusively permanent by nature, and because of that, it is therefore unconditioned.

Advayavajra writes in his Five Natures:

The unconditioned mind is dharmakāya, permanence is the characteristics of the sambhogakāya, diversity itself is the nirmanakāya,
the original state is the nature of everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

A conditioned dharmakāya is extremely unacceptable in Mahāyāna. It also directly contradicts all of the Buddha's teachings, more tomorrow.

Nope. It's according to the Second Turning of the Wheel of Dharma and Buddha's Tantric teachings which are definitive.

Malcolm wrote:

Citation please?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 8:48 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in sūtrayāna, they maintain that it is the merely the absence of inherent existence of things, a natural purity, for example, the way Gyaltsab Je describes it in his commentary in the Uttaratantra.

There are also problems with Vajrayāna definition given by the Gelugpas, since this subtle mind is conditioned, whereas tathāgatagarbha is clearly unconditioned.

Tsongkhapa said:

No, in Sūtrayāna, Buddha nature is compassion. Emptiness, lack of inherent existence, cannot be Buddha nature because it's not a mind.

Buddha nature, according to you,

Malcolm wrote:

according to the Buddha.

Tsongkhapa said:

...is unconditioned but this is impossible.

Malcolm wrote:

Not the first time you have been at odds with the Buddha's actual teaching.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's impossible because permanent things cannot produce effects so if Buddhanature were unconditioned it would be impossible to go from being a sentient being to a Buddha and it would be impossible for a Buddha to benefit any living being, which would negate the whole point of attaining enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

You have no idea how incoherent this argument, and the mass of ignorance upon which it is founded. But I am watching TV tonight, so I will have to correct you tomorrow.

Tsongkhapafan said:

The very subtle mind is conditioned and this is the point - once purified of obstructions it transforms into the Wisdom Truth Body of a Buddha and is thereby able to benefit each and every living being without exception. An unconditioned Buddhanature is inert and pointless.

Malcolm wrote:

A conditioned dharmakāya is extremely unacceptable in Mahāyāna. It also directly contradicts all of the Buddha's teachings, more tomorrow.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 7:14 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only people who maintain this point of view are the Gelugpas, no one else.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's not true that Gelupas maintain that Buddhanature is sheer emptiness. I think Brunnholzl is incorrect: 'sheer natural purity' is a bit vague and also inaccurate. Gelugpas maintain that Buddhanature is the very subtle mind of clear light and its mounted wind; this is according to Highest Yoga Tantra.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but in sūtrayāna, they maintain that it is the merely the absence of inherent existence of things, a natural purity, for example, the way Gyaltshab Je describes it in his commentary in the Uttaratantra.

There are also problems with Vajrayāna definition given by the Gelugpas, since this subtle mind is conditioned, whereas tathāgatagarbha is clearly unconditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

Brunnholz has a short synopsis of that too. He quotes Sakya Chogden. (p.79)

II. Asserting that sentient beings do not possess buddha nature. (Sakya Pandita, Buton, and others)

Malcolm wrote:

Sakya Chogden is wrong w/regards to Sapan.

smcj said:

In sum, though there are numerous specific differences between the views of all these Tibetan masters, they can be said to fall into two camps--those who assert the tathagata heart as sheer emptiness (be it as the dharmadhatu, the nature of phenomena, or a non implicative negation) and those who regard it as the union of mind's emptiness and luminosity (which includes the buddha qualities).

Malcolm wrote:

Sapan actually adheres to the latter position, i.e. that tathagatagarbha is the union of union of mind's emptiness and clarity. This is the general Sakyapa position.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 22nd, 2015 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

muni said:

When available for worldly pursuit, yes. Then they are toy of samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

This might be an issue with some of the more ritually oriented tantras, but not Dzogchen tantras, in general. After all, what harm can one inflict with the nature of the mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Do tantras lose their power when they're exposed publicl

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, they certainly lose their mystery. But this is not a bad thing.

One, we have to recall that these texts were never secret from an elite set of people in India and Tibet.

Second, we have to realize that tantras as texts are artifacts, books written down by human beings, with all the limitations that entails.

Third, masters such as HHDL has said that tantric secrecy can actually be harmful to the teachings in the present epoch, because secrecy inspires fear.

Fourth, texts like Dzogchen tantras are very tame in comparison with some of more "anti-nomian" Indian tantras. The former have virtually no erotic imagery, virtually no descriptions of rites of magic and sorcery, unlike say Hevajra or Kalacakra, or even Guhyasamaja and many of the lower tantras. If Dzogchen tantras were kept secret, it is because they present a narrative of liberation and buddhahood that is not consistent with the gradualist Buddhism that became the state religion of Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2015 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarbha = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

In any event, further discussion of Longchenpa in the Nyingma or Dzogchen forums should be able to accept the Tathagatagarbha as definitive, minus the synthesis with Yogacara.

Malcolm wrote:

Everybody, Sakya, Kagyu, Nyingma and Jonang, accept tathagatagarbha as definitive. How it is understood in these schools may differ considerably.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: False/Wrong View in Dzogchen

Content:

AilurusFulgens said:

The reason why I have been opening a new topic is, because of a recent exchange I had with an acquaintance of mine, who is an Advaitin and at the same time practices Dzogchen.

I have a very odd feeling with the whole arrangement; especially with his argumentation that lines between Buddhism and Hinduism are not so clear-cut as it may appear and that Buddhism anyway adopted many texts and teachings from Hinduism. One example he gives is the fire-ritual or homa (although I do not understand what relevance does this have for Dzogchen). He also admits that Hinduism in turn took over some Buddhist elements.

Still, it all sounds very strange.

I would like to request the participants in this discussion to focus strictly on the false view in Dzogchen i.e. how it is being defined, the relevant quotes from primary sources (authoritative and accepted Dzogchen texts), the words of authentic and also living Dzogchen masters as well as the consequences of such false view for the practice of Dzogchen itself (the last point is of particular importance).

I do not want to sound bigoted or parochial when discussing with my friend. But on the other hand there are certain things one cannot simply explain away - even for the superficial purposes of some "religious" harmony or tolerance.

Malcolm wrote:

False view in Dzogchen is quite simply any view of existence or nonexistence. For example, the Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra states:

Such false views as those are held to be gathered into four:
tīrthikās, extremists,
hedonists and cārvākas.

The system of explaining these is as follows:

tīrthikās maintain permanent eternalism;
extremists maintain partial eternalism, partial annihilation;
hedonists maintain that annihilation is total annihilation;
Cārvākas maintain the annihilation of karmic results.

As such, the three hundred and sixty views as well can be gathered into four categories.

Further those can be included in eternalism and annihilationism.

Those can also be included in meaningless nihilism.

This is the extent of the worldly views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 21st, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Yogacara + Tathagatagarba = Shentong

Content:

smcj said:

I'm reading "When Clouds Part" by Brunnholzl and he has clarified something that was a bit confusing to me. He basically says that the Tibetan Shentong is a combination of Yogacara, specifically the 3 natures and 8 consciousnesses, plus an interpretation of the Tathagatagarbha doctrine. I had been confused about that and sort of thought that Yogacara and Tathagatagarba were the same.

Malcolm wrote:

You should trust what I tell you. I have made this point to you repeatedly over the years.

smcj said:

It also explains why a major text like Uttaratantra lacks the three natures schema yet is a mainstay of the Shentong view. Basically it was retroactively co-opted by the Shentongpas, although there were precursors in India.

Malcolm wrote:

It also explains why, for example, Longchenpa is not a gzhan stong pa. He considers tathāgatagarbha definitive, but places the teaching of the three natures within Yogacara and never uses them to explicate the meaning of the tathāgatagarbha, since they are not necessary. There is no discussion of these in the Uttaratantra, per se. The Yogacara masters were not that interested in tathagatagarbha, quite frankly.

smcj said:

Brunnholz makes another point that makes things convenient for a Kagyu Shentongpa like me, which is that... Virtually all Kagyu masters hold the tathagata heart teaching on buddha nature to be of definitive meaning and deny that the tathagata heart is just sheer emptiness or a non implicative negation.

(p.69)

.

Malcolm wrote:

The only people who maintain this point of view are the Gelugpas, no one else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 20th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Mental Continuums, Rebirth, and the Brain

Content:

Matt J said:

The point I don't fully accept is this:

For that reason, when we talk about our "individual mental continuum," it doesn't come from the body – in other words, from matter and energy. Each moment of our individual mental continuum has to come from a previous moment of an individual, subjective experiencing of things. And it can't come from somebody else's individual, subjective experiencing of things, such as that of our parents. It can only be part of the continuum of our own individual, subjective experiencing of things.

Obviously, there is a relationship (and ultimately non-duality) between body and mind. And it is true that as far as we know, physical phenomenon don't become mental and vice versa. But why is it not possible for physical phenomenon to give rise to mental phenomenon? For example, when you hit my body with a piece of wood, pain arises. So while the wood doesn't become pain, it certainly produces it in a conventional way. So why can't physical phenomenon likewise "cause" the mind-stream to arise?

I feel that this is a key argument to understand. Any thoughts?

Malcolm wrote:

It is very simple, because of the homogeneity of causes and their effects, insentience cannot give rise to sentience.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 20th, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

dreambow said:

Whilst the input has been very interesting and people have shown themselves to be very erudite ...never the less the topic was ND Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta. Could we please get back on track?

Malcolm wrote:

By demonstrating that there is no transpersonal basis in Dzogchen, it has been shown that there is a huge difference in meaning between what the term "nondual" means in Dzogchen and other systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 20th, 2015 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The gzhan stong/rang stong distinction is irrelevant to Dzogchen. Dzogchen negates the two truths, so of what use would there be in a distinction between gzhan stong and rang stong? As the Soaring Great Garuda states:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an "ultimate phenomenon."

M

smcj said:

Well, for starters a lot of perpetual ideas begin to make sense, like the spontaneous appearance of buddhas apropos of people's karma.

Malcolm wrote:

No. If buddhas appear "apropos" of people's karma, that means buddhas are just delusions. Indeed, as Vidyādhara Mañjuśrimitra wrote in his seminal Meditation of Bodhicitta:

Because the awakening of the sugata does not exist, his magical apparitions appear to the deluded, similar to an illusion.

For those of you who do not know who Mañjuśrimitra was, he was Vidyādhara Garab Dorje's main disciple, credited with dividing Dzogchen tantras into three series according to emphasis.

So, therefore, the two truths, and the whole gzhan stong/rang stong debate along with them, remains completely irrelevant to Dzogchen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 19th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Matt J said:

Although he is the teacher of the current Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche, who says that many Nyingma and Kagyu Dzogchen teachers are shentongpas.

Malcolm wrote:

The gzhan stong/rang stong distinction is irrelevant to Dzogchen. Dzogchen negates the two truths, so of what use would there be in a distinction between gzhan stong and rang stong? As the Soaring Great Garuda states:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an "ultimate phenomenon."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 19th, 2015 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Nazis?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is really no evidence that Hitler was influenced by Buddhism at all.

odysseus said:

No official scientific or research evidence, but there's something called "word of folk mouth". As a Buddhist, you know for yourself Malcolm...

Malcolm wrote:

There isn't even any evidence in his writing that would lead one to suspect so. He was utterly dismissive of Himmler's occult obsessions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 19th, 2015 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist Nazis?

Content:

odysseus said:

Hitler was a Buddhist - it's embarrassing...

Malcolm wrote:

No, he did not care for religion of any kind at all, much less Buddhism.

odysseus said:

Hitler believed in a perfect world like Utopia, by ideas he got from amongst others Buddhism. But his delusions were too much, so he never got enlightened.

Malcolm wrote:

There is really no evidence that Hitler was influenced by Buddhism at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist Nazis?

Content:

odysseus said:

Hitler was a Buddhist - it's embarrassing...

Malcolm wrote:

No, he did not care for religion of any kind at all, much less Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

I like the story about how buddhas spontaneously appear according to the karma of sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

So you are not going to answer the question?

smcj said:

I'm reading the book looking for that. And in doing so I am reminded that the entire book is basically about "how the universe is" (Mt. Meru, etc.). It has various cosmologies, that's why it is called "Myriad Worlds", which would be entirely in keeping with my interpretation of the basis as a basis for the universe. Also the chapter in question is titled "Primordial Purity of the Universe".

Malcolm wrote:

The title, Myriad Worlds, is a western title, not Kongtrul's title. It is just the first part of the Shes Bya Mdz od, lit., The Treasury of the Knowable.

Now then, if we take your line of reasoning, that the whole book is about the basis, how do you cope with the absurd consequence that Vajrasana, Vulture Peak, will exist in the basis, but the rest of the world will not? [see 143].

Instead, the notion of a basis [gzhi] is really only brought up in chapter iv. It begins on 173 by saying:

It is taught in scriptures that worlds and beings

Are created by various actions influenced by subtle and proliferation [emotions].

He then continues by listing the various approaches to the how the world and beings are created in various tenet systems. He then gives the Kalacakara account on 176:

"Most agree that in the formation [of the world], the mind is the agent..."

This whole section, up to page 181, takes the individual mind as the basis for the formation of the universe.

He then shifts to Hinayāna and Mahāyāna cosmology from 182 until 195.

He then introduces what he terms the ultimate view concerning the origin of samsara and the Dzogchen view.

The first is a detailed presentation of dependent origination. On 198, in the section on the relationship between dependent origination and the eight consciousnesses, he writes:

"The beginningless nature of the mind is clear, empty, [and] unobstructed, but its nature is not recognized..."

Thus far, the basis described in the whole book is the mind or the nature of the mind.

It is only at the conclusion of this section that Kongtrul begins a description of the Dzogchen teaching on the basis. And there is nothing there which validates your interpretation that it is a so called transpersonal basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 12:29 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

I like the story about how buddhas spontaneously appear according to the karma of sentient beings.

Malcolm wrote:

So you are not going to answer the question?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 12:00 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

How does an individual mind come about, in the Dzogchen scheme of things?

dzogchungpa said:

Do tell.

Malcolm wrote:

I have countless times...but people don't listen...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 11:31 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

So my understanding is that "all the things of relative reality, your mind included" is transpersonal. If so Dudjom R. is also reading too much into it.

Malcolm wrote:

Sarvadharma does not refer to all instances of every phenomena in the universe. It is a term which means all the phenomena of one's aggregates, sense bases and elements. All phenomena, for every sentient being, are restricted to these thirty-five dharmas.

smcj said:

So not only is it transpersonal, it is pre-personal. There are no sentient beings or buddhas present, so therefore there are no minds present at all. .

Malcolm wrote:

How does an individual mind come about, in the Dzogchen scheme of things? Is it created ex nihilo, out of nothing? Or is there something you may have perhaps overlooked? If you assume a transpersonal basis, then you have to explain how all these different minds arise from a uniform substance. And of course, you will get all caught up in the intellectual skeins of trying to reconcile the two truths, and all the other pyrotechnics that arise from incorrect interpretations of the Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 11:16 AM

Title: Re: Alcohol

Content:

Queequeg said:

Malcolm - are those authentic passages?

Malcolm wrote:
Of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Alcohol

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Let's not forget that alcohol is both a poison and known carcinogen, and therefore not appropriate for "this precious human body".

Malcolm wrote:

It balances the humors and is beneficial for all illnesses, in particular, since it removes kapha, wind and combination illnesses, among medicines, it is the supreme medicinal amrita:
the qualities of delicious booze are perfect.

dharmagoat said:

There is also the negative effect it has on mindfulness, something that a serious practitioner would be fully aware of.

Malcolm wrote:

Because it gathers the assembly of dakas and dakinis, delights the assembly of yogesvaras,
and is the samaya substance that perfects the two accumulations,
the qualities of delicious booze are perfect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Alcohol

Content:

odysseus said:

The point is not to indulge.

Malcolm wrote:

The conceitedly clever Kadampa vināyadharas, and the logicians, the Jodanpas and so on,
drink in secret, so whose craving is greater?
the qualities of delicious booze are perfect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

Yes, it is being used as an analogy. Why? Because it is making the point it is all-pervasive. Why else use the analogy?

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not the point that is being made. The point is being made the self-originated pristine consciousness has always been present just as space has always been present. It is a temporal metaphor here, not a spatial metaphor, as you take it to be.

smcj said:

The nature of everything else is ascertained to be mind in the Great Perfection teachings. The reason it is not the same as Yogacara is that the eight consciousnesses themselves arise from the delusion of not recognizing the basis when it arises. This is also covered on 212, paragraph three onward until we hit the end of this section on 215.

Ok, so "the 8 consciousnesses themselves arise from the delusion of not recognizing the basis when it arises". So the basis is more fundamental than the 8 consciousnesses, right? And the basis is what is not recognized "when it arises", right?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis is nothing other than the self-originated pristine consciousness mentioned above. Also the ignorance that gives rise to the eight consciousnesses, etc. is just the ignorance [ma rig pa] which is the manifestation of rig pa itself, as mentioned on 215. So for example, he states on 222 that the five wisdoms of rig pa manifest as the five aggregates and so on. Not the five aggregates of all sentient beings, just your own five aggregates. Likewise, they then arise as the five afflictions, etc. Paragraph 2 on pg. 224., summarizes the six sets of five that arise from and are present in rig pa.

I think you are reading too much into the word gzhi, basis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Alcohol

Content:

Queequeg said:

Yay or nay and why?

Malcolm wrote:

Longchenpa says, among other things, in his Praise to Booze:
Since it increases the pure essence, the body and mind are happy, since it generates bliss and heat, it increases samadhi, and because realization arises since it produces knowledge,
the qualities of delicious booze are perfect..

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

However if he is talking about "self-existing wisdom, primordially present like space " in a context that excludes both sentient being and enlightened beings--which he is--you've got a problem.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no problem here at all. Why?, because space is merely being used here as a metaphor.

smcj said:

You've still got to discover it for yourself as the nature of your own mind. But it's the nature of everything else too. To say otherwise would be to take the Yogacara view, which is not what we are talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

The nature of everything else is ascertained to be mind in the Great Perfection teachings. The reason it is not the same as Yogacara is that the eight consciousnesses themselves arise from the delusion of not recognizing the basis when it arises. This is also covered on 212, paragraph three onward until we hit the end of this section on 215.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

1. Is the basis devoid of samsara and nirvana?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, just as it is devoid of realization and non-realization.

smcj said:

2. Is the basis beyond causes and conditions?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because it is original purity [ka dag].

smcj said:

3. Is interdependent origination merely a delusion when seen from the Dzogchen view?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since it is produced by the imputing ignorance.

smcj said:

4. Does the basis have the attributes of clarity, unimpededness, and energy?

Malcolm wrote:

It is more accurate to say that the basis is a pristine consciousness or wisdom [ye shes] that possesses three attributes, essence, nature and compassion, or emptiness, clarity and the inseparability of the two.

smcj said:

5. Does the basis arise as the universe when unrecognized?

Malcolm wrote:

Only in a manner of speaking, it does not actually arise as the universe. The way this happens is summarized on 212, paragraph three.

smcj said:

6. Does the universe arise as the basis when recognized?

Malcolm wrote:

Again, only in a manner of speaking. The universe does not actually arise as the basis.

smcj said:

7. Are there any phenomena other than the basis expressing itself as appearance?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, delusion. This question is addressed in the paragraph mentioned above. There is no delusion in the basis, but there is delusion about the basis.

smcj said:

8. Is mind (sems) the basis?

Malcolm wrote:

No, mind is not the basis, but the mind arises from the what is described as the "creative dynamic of energy" in the forgoing paragraph.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it is. Compare top of 206 to the pages I mentioned.

smcj said:

The first paragraph of 206 concludes with:

Kongtrul said:

It is great self-existing wisdom, primordially present like space.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not make it transpersonal, it just makes it a self-originated pristine consciousness, rang byung ye shes, i.e., one that one must discover for oneself as the nature of one's own mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 3:46 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

So it's not applicable.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it is. Compare top of 206 to the pages I mentioned.

The fact is that this is standard presentation found in many places. The fact that you have badly misunderstood it merely points to the need for people to rely on qualified teachers. Otherwise, misunderstandings like yours [that the buddhanature present in all sentient beings is one transpersonal entity] are sure to happen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Tobacco

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nay. Polonium 210.

http://www.nytimes.com/2006/12/01/opinion/01proctor.html?_r=0

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

He is discussing the ground without the minds of any beings present whatsoever--either sentient or enlightened. That is transpersonal.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you really do not understand this teaching. You are entitled to your misunderstandings, but you are not entitled to your own facts.

If you carefully read ppg. 222-224 of the book you cite, you will see how impossible your transpersonal position actually is.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

Having just quoted both of them saying that, I am going to disagree with you.

Malcolm wrote:

You are misreading them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Matt J said:

Not to speak for Malcolm, but after having a long thread about this, he said that the basic difference is that the base is empty and not established, unlike Brahman.

smcj said:

Since we are talking about things that are not manifest phenomena, and both are said to be "beyond conceptuality", as far as I'm concerned it is basically a difference in semantics and linguistic convention.

Malcolm wrote:

No, since the Dzogchen tantras explicitly reject Advaita Vedanta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 18th, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

My understanding is that it is transpersonal. Kongtrul and Dudjom both seem to say it.

Malcolm wrote:
Neither of them make this claim.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 9:50 AM
Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen
Content:
smcj said:

My reading of the above is that Longchenpa is using the analogy of a mirror to explain something different than what the Dudjom R. quotation is about. So although they both use the analogy of a mirror, they are actually talking about apples and oranges.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, and when I brought up the example, I was using it differently than you are.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 5:25 AM
Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen
Content:
Matt J said:
So there are external objects after all for Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, as Longchenpa famously quips, when we stop looking at a mountain, it does not just disappear.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 3:48 AM
Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen
Content:
smcj said:
Uh, no. The premise of the analogy specifically disallows that interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:
Uh yes, the premise of the analogy requires that interpretation.

smcj said:
Uh, no, it doesn't. Specifically the line... These things appear naturally on the "magic" mirror,
..is unambiguously making that point. They appear naturally. There are no referents. In the analogy there is nothing besides the images and the mirror, as Dudjom R. explains: There is no third reality of a truly existing mind or objects juxtaposed to the ultimate reality of the mirror and the relative reality of the images in it.

So that sentence includes the absence of referents and the appearance of the images-- in the same sentence. That's kinda hard to work around.

Malcolm wrote:

This does not address my point. You are so caught up in your opinions, you cannot see outside of your own reflection.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

Uh, no. The premise of the analogy specifically disallows that interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Uh yes, the premise of the analogy requires that interpretation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Cycles

Content:

shanehanner said:

Hi,

I keep seeing different teachers with different "cycles" of teachings and would like to know what the differences are?

For example, this is from Tara Mandalas website...

"He also said that the Dzinpa Rangdröl cycle was very complete starting with Ngöndro, followed by the yidam practices of Tsogyel Karmo (White Tsogyel) and Tröma, and then proceeding through the six yogas, and ending with Dzog Chen in a section very similar to Tri Yeshe Lama (Jigme Lingpa's Dzog Chen cycle from Longchen Nyingtig) which includes complete Trekchö and Tögal instructions. He also mentioned that Dzinpa Rangdröl contains several Chöd practices and many Dzog Chen men-ngags (pith instructions)."

So, what are the different cycles? Is there a certain period that they start? Are some considered better than others? Any background info would be great!

Malcolm wrote:

"Cycle" is a translation of the Tibetan "skor." This word means something like cycle, and in this sense, we are using the term like in the Wagner's Ring Cycle, a series of interrelated but independent works.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Are there appearances without signs?

smcj said:

Insisting that the appearances require some third thing outside the mirror to reflect, which is what I understand you are doing, is not accepting the premise of the analogy.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, a third thing is required, secondary conditions. For example, in order for a red ball to show up in a mirror, there has to be a red ball from which a reflection is derived.

What exactly is an "appearance" in your mind?

In the context of this discussion, "appearances" are the basis arising as the universe. And how does that happen?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 17th, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

Let me ask you, smcj, do mirrors bother looking into themselves?

No, of course not. However the premise of the analogy is that there are images in the mirror without referents. You are ignoring the premise of the analogy and taking it too literally.

What you are talking about seems to me to be more appropriate for completion stage/Anu Yoga practice. Ati Yoga (roughly equivalent to "Non-Dual Tantra in HYT) is about appearances simultaneously present with emptiness, not the absence of appearances.

Malcolm wrote:

Are there appearances without signs? What exactly is an "appearance" in your mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 16th, 2015 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Father Francis Tiso Dzogchen & Early Christianity Connec

Content:

tingdzin said:

Guenther was also of the view, which I happen to share, that Dzogchen is rather anomalous to Indian Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see how this could possibly apply to so called sems sde texts. The rhetoric of "bodhicitta" in sems sde is identical to that found for example in the Guhyasamaja.

Second, we have no evidence whatsoever of any thögal like teachings being written down by anyone until the early 11th century, whether Buddhist or Bon.

In terms of unique doctrines, the most unique thing in Bonpo Dzogchen is ZZNG's emphasis on sounds, lights and rays, which really only figures in the ZZNG, and it pretty much absent from other Bonpo Dzogchen cycles, based on a electronic word search conducted on the other two main cycles of Dzogchen in Bon.

While I would have no complaints about sourcing Dzogchen in Central Asia, within the sphere of Indian cultural influence, I see absolutely no evidence which links Dzogchen doctrines with teachings generally outside of Buddhadharma and the Indian context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Tsongkhapa Madhyamaka

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

I remember posting in a thread called: "Gelug View of Dzogchen?", my point was that Khenpo Achos a Gelugpa Abbot achieved rainbow body. The person I was talking with is a Gelugpa monk at Sera Je, so you'd probably enjoy reading it:

Topic: <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=52&t=10207&start=20#p128727>

Tsongkhapafan said:

A wonderful achievement but the rainbow body can be achieved by practising the two stages of Highest Yoga Tantra. Maybe this is what he was practising. It would be more typically Gelug.

Malcolm wrote:

Dudjom Lingpa's Meteoric Razor Vajrakīlaya cycle actually, and its associated Dzogchen instructions. I have read through his collected works, apart from a very long important commentary he wrote on Dudjom Lingpa's Vajrakīlaya cycle. When he was young, he was a student of Trijang Rinpoche, but then he met Dudjom Rinpoche and his practice became centered around Vajrakīlaya and Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Unknown Buddhist Images - Please help in identifying the Content:

Richard Egan said:

I got these image f rom a friend of a friend who bought them in Tibet. They have a front and back and I am trying to identify what they represent. Any help at all will be appreciated. Thanks.

<http://vps30393849.123-vps.co.uk/img/Buddhist-images-1A.jpg>

<http://vps30393849.123-vps.co.uk/img/Buddhist-images-1B.jpg>

<http://vps30393849.123-vps.co.uk/img/Buddhist-images-2A.jpg>

<http://vps30393849.123-vps.co.uk/img/Buddhist-images-2B.jpg>

<http://vps30393849.123-vps.co.uk/img/Buddhist-images-3A.jpg>

<http://vps30393849.123-vps.co.uk/img/Buddhist-images-3B.jpg>

Malcolm wrote:

They are initiation cards, and are standard deities from the general preaceful and wrathful mandala, the buddhas of the six realms and so on, but in this case look connected to some kind of Avalokiteshvara empowerment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Tsongkhapa Madhyamaka

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There have been practitioners of Dzogchen among the Gelugpas from the time of Tsongkhapa onwards. Never everyone in Tibet was a Sarma bigot.

smcj said:

Although that may be true, the degree to which it is true is reflected by the amount of pushback HHDL has had when he invites Nyingma lamas to teach at his monasteries.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a more modern issue. Mostly a twentieth century issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Tsongkhapa Madhyamaka

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Gelugpas practise the two stages of Highest Yoga Tantra as the direct path to enlightenment and there's no need to practise anything else. Tsongkhapa never taught Dzogchen and it's not part of the Gelugpa tradition.

swooping said:

But some Gelugpas do practice it.

smcj said:

These days. That's new.

Malcolm wrote:

Not that new. There have been practitioners of Dzogchen among the Gelugpas from the time of Tsongkhapa onwards. Never everyone in Tibet was a Sarma bigot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 15th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Aside from liturgy, Vajrasattva and mandala offerings appear as preliminaries when? We're they done in India?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they are mentioned in Guhyasamaja Tantra, etc. Mandala offerings are strictly part of Vajrayāna, in origin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 14th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

madhusudan said:

Can you describe your confidence in the state so that I might begin to understand?

Malcolm wrote:

You should read Nozick, Anarchy, State and Utopia, where he sets out the minimum conditions for a state, and why this is more desirable than anarchy.

We have discharged our task of explaining how a state would arise from a state of nature without anyone's rights being violated. The moral objections of the individualist anarchist to the minimal state are overcome. It is not an unjust imposition of a monopoly; the de facto monopoly grows by an invisible-hand process and by morally permissible means, without anyone's rights being violated and without any claims being made to a special right that others do not possess. And requiring the clients of the de facto monopoly to pay for the protection of those they prohibit from self-help enforcement against them, far from being immoral, is morally required by the principle of compensation adumbrated in Chapter 4.

Nozick, Robert (2013-11-12). Anarchy, State, and Utopia (pp. 114-115). Basic Books. Kindle Edition.

madhusudan said:

Thank you for your reply. I will move that book up to the top of my reading list and process its arguments. As my perspective shifts, however, I am beginning to see political circumstances as an expression of people's delusions, and so I find myself viewing solutions more from a spiritual outlook.

As an aside, what would you view as being more fruitful: reading Nozick (becoming more informed), or admitting my own attachment to debates and thought constructs, admitting I am wrong and delusional, taking refuge and spending more time with the cushion? I guess each sickness has its own particular medicine, but a long running dichotomy for me has been between philosophy and experiential intuitive definitive knowledge (direct perception?). Thanks for any words on this.

Malcolm wrote:

I think that Dharma is good for personal evolution, but we do not inhabit a world of Dharma practitioners, and Dharma ethics do not translate to those who do not follow the Dharma. Therefore, we need to develop robust, positive secular understandings and doctrines and as Dharma practitioners, advocate for them and support them. Its the Mahāyāna thing to do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 14th, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

madhusudan said:

Can you describe your confidence in the state so that I might begin to understand?

Malcolm wrote:

You should read Nozick, Anarchy, State and Utopia, where he sets out the minimum conditions for a state, and why this is more desirable than anarchy.

We have discharged our task of explaining how a state would arise from a state of nature without anyone's rights being violated. The moral objections of the individualist anarchist to the minimal state are overcome. It is not an unjust imposition of a monopoly; the de facto monopoly grows by an invisible-hand process and by morally permissible means, without anyone's rights being violated and without any claims being made to a special right that others do not possess. And requiring the clients of the de facto monopoly to pay for the protection of those they prohibit from self-help enforcement against them, far from being immoral, is morally required by the principle of compensation adumbrated in Chapter 4.

Nozick, Robert (2013-11-12). Anarchy, State, and Utopia (pp. 114-115). Basic Books. Kindle Edition.

ovi said:

While I completely agree that 'anarcho'-capitalism would recreate the state, there are 3 flaws with your argument:

- anarcho-capitalists are not anarchists
- anarchists are not market fundamentalists; the vast majority completely reject the market economy

- the problem that anarchists have with the state isn't that it originates in an immoral way, but that it is a hierarchical and authoritarian organization

Malcolm wrote:

I never mentioned anarcho-capitalists.

No one can reject a market economy, there have and always will be markets.

Nozick proves that these hierarchies are inevitable. The monopoly he is talking about it is a monopoly of force, not trade. You should read his book in detail. I don't agree with everything he says, because it is too idealistic, being the idealism driving modern day "small gvt." Republicans like Rand Paul. But he has given a good account of why a state is preferable to anarchy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 14th, 2015 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

heart said:

Interesting info Malcolm, thank you. So is the Samantabhadri Tantra of the Sun of the Luminous Expanse (kun tu bzang mo klong gsal nyi ma'i rgyud) as old as the other 17 tantras?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by old. Chronologically, it is a terma that was probably revealed during the 13th century. That being said, I have never seen a clear account of its revelation anywhere, unlike say, that of the 17 tantras. However, the Khandro Nyingthig is a self-described commentary on it, and since it dates to the early 14th, it is a good guess that this tantra was revealed in the 13th. It seems the first cycle of teachings that mention its existence is the Khandro Nyingthig. Also, in the 14th century, Dorje Lingpa revealed further tantras with similar names.

heart said:

So is there an earlier example of ngondro instructions than this 13th century Dzogchen tantra?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

There are examples of texts called chos spyods, "Dharma Practice" texts which generally consist of various regular and general prayers, including refuge and bodhicitta formulas and so on, but as a system of liturgy, we don't really to see what we would recognize as "ngondro texts" until the thirteenth century and fourteenth centuries. There is a guy who posts here, Zim Pickens, who spent a lot of time studying the issue of the origins of Ngondro liturgies. If he sees this post, maybe he will have more info.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

That's why I think it is important to recognize the nature of the mind as soon as possible for someone who wants to practice Dzogchen.

Karma_Yeshe said:

Although certain people don't understand this, in a real sense, this is a no-brainer. There is no practice of Dzogchen without recognition of rigpa at all.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not exactly true. It is more accurate to say that without introduction there is no practice of Dzogchen. There are practices that are part of the path of Dzogchen for people who have not yet recognized the basis such as rushen, semzin and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Chan, Mahamudra, and Tibet

Content:

mzaur said:

Hi everyone,

I was just listening to a Dharma Ocean podcast (130: Pure Awareness) and Reggie Ray said some things which he said may be a bit heretical to some but actually are historically accurate. To me it sounds very odd, and I haven't heard these things before. I was hoping someone with more experience can comment about the points he makes? I typed up the relevant stuff. Is any of it true? Is there any evidence of Chan influence on Mahamudra?

What we call Mahamudra tradition is result of profound interaction of Daoism, Chan Buddhism, and Dzogchen. Mahamudra came out of that. There's a lot of Daoism in Mahamudra, and a lot of Chan Buddhism in Mahamudra.

In the 8th century in Tibet, there was a very famous conversation about what is the best Buddhism for Tibet, and an edict which has been found in the Dun Huang documents buried and survived. The edict says the most important tradition for Tibet and the meditative tradition everyone should practice is Chan Buddhism. What happened later was the Indian crew showed up and they took over the power in Tibet. This was like in the 11th/12th century and they made it illegal to practice anything that was from China. So all of the records were rewritten to show that everything that was good in Tibet came from India but actually this was a complete fabrication. There is extensive evidence that Mahamudra is the result of the confluence of Chan Buddhism, Daoism, and Dzogchen. They were part of the same tradition. Well you can say what is that tradition? It's the practice of pure awareness. They were all doing it, and they were talking to each other.

There's a tradition called Sutra Mahamudra taught by Gampopa which has now been more or less proved was a Chan lineage in Tibet but because of the politics they could not acknowledge their source.

I called up my friends and academic friends, and they said, yeah that's how it is. The history of Tibetan Buddhism promoted in Tibet is a complete fabrication.

It's often said that Chan Buddhism is Daoism in a Buddhist form . . . What happened was, the Buddhists saved Daoism in China. Because Daoism after the Han Dynasty began to become very conventional religion. The Buddhists showed up from India and realized like holy shit, these people understand more about awareness than we do. And they incorporate the depths of Daoism, and they gave Daoism the container and practice and gave Daoism a way to survive.

Malcolm wrote:

There are so many inaccuracies and exaggerations here, it is hard to know where to begin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 6:41 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Kelwin said:

Maybe recognition isn't so special. But when recognition is there, doing ngondro etc might still be the best option. Just recognizing the essence every now and then doesn't mean there's no gradual path anymore. In fact, ego and arrogance are still very much available afterwards. Going from experience to realization is much more work than going from nothing to the first experiences. One lama told me that the real work actually begins after recognition.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no gradual path at all in Dzogchen. If it is a gradual path, it is not the path of Dzogchen.

Kelwin said:

The truly rare thing, is the first recognition immediately resulting in stable realization.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

Only very special practitioners recognize that nature of the mind when the first introduction happens. It's something very rare.

Malcolm wrote:

No, what I would say is rare is a teacher who is able to give confidence to such people (who are not actually so rare) that their recognition is in fact a true recognition. The reason for this is that while the methods work, there are not many clairvoyant teachers out there, so those who are not clairvoyant are unable to ascertain without long observation whether their students have really understood the main point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

madhusudan said:

Can you describe your confidence in the state so that I might begin to understand?

Malcolm wrote:

You should read Nozick, Anarchy, State and Utopia, where he sets out the minimum conditions for a state, and why this is more desirable than anarchy.

We have discharged our task of explaining how a state would arise from a state of nature without anyone's rights being violated. The moral objections of the individualist anarchist to the minimal state are overcome. It is not an unjust imposition of a monopoly; the de facto monopoly grows by an invisible-hand process and by morally permissible means, without anyone's rights being violated and without any claims being made to a special right that others do not possess. And requiring the clients of the de facto monopoly to pay for the protection of those they prohibit from self-help enforcement against them, far from being immoral, is morally required by the principle of compensation adumbrated in Chapter 4.

Nozick, Robert (2013-11-12). Anarchy, State, and Utopia (pp. 114-115). Basic Books. Kindle Edition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Chod in gelug buddhism

Content:

Manjushri Fan said:

Hi

I'm not sure if this is in the wrong section, so I apologise to Mods if it is.

My questions are:

Is chod practiced in gelug buddhism, and if so, do you know any examples of teachers.

And are any empowerments required to praactice chod.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer to both questions is yes. Lama Zopa teaches it, among others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Conception and Contraception

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, IUD's create a situation where the sperm is basically poisoned.

fckw said:

Which is therefore not much different from what antibiotics do.

Malcolm wrote:

A spermatozoa is not, so far as we known, sentient, it is a tissue.

The issue of bacterial sentience on the other hand is complicated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Adamantine said:

thanks for the link Magnus.

Malcolm wrote:

I feel it is important to point out that it is not so simple as the way EPK presents it. For example, prior to the common and uncommon preliminaries, the tantra describes conferral of the elaborate vase empowerment [chapter 61]. Chapters sixty-two through through eighty-eight describe all of the preliminaries from contemplating the time of death through the separation of samsara and nirvana. Chapter eighty-nine explains the secret empowerment, and ninety covers creation and completion, while chapters ninety-one through ninety-eight cover trekchö. Chapter ninety-nine covers the third empowerment and the practice connected with passion. The rest of the tantra concerns thogal. In other words, the tantra maps various practices in relation with the four empowerments — elaborate, unelaborate, very unelaborate and extremely unelaborate.

So what are the first sixty chapters about? All kinds of things. Chapters 1-46 are concerned exclusively with Dzogchen theory. Chapters 47-60 are all about the guru and disciple and conditions for transmission.

M

heart said:

Interesting info Malcolm, thank you. So is the Samantabhadri Tantra of the Sun of the Luminous Expanse (kun tu bzang mo klong gsal nyi ma'i rgyud) as old as the other 17 tantras?

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by old. Chronologically, it is a terma that was probably revealed during the 13th century. That being said, I have never seen a clear account of its revelation anywhere, unlike say, that of the 17 tantras. However, the Khandro Nyingthig is a self-described commentary on it, and since it dates to the early 14th, it is a good guess that this tantra was revealed in the 13th. It seems the first cycle of teachings that mention its existence is the Khandro Nyinthig. Also, in the 14th century, Dorje Lingpa revealed further tantras with similar names.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 12th, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

heart said:

Semdzins, rushens and lojongs are Dzogchen preliminaries (ngondro). Rushan is practiced in all Dzogchen cycles I know about and lojongs in all cycles that comes through Vimalamitra. Just learned recently that there are no inner Rushan (six lokas) in the Vima Nyingtik so that exist only in cycles coming from Padmasambhava.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever told you this is mistaken. The rushan of purifying the six lokas is found in the first of the three Last Testaments of The Buddhas in the first volume of the Vima sNying thig.

Since this body was created by the ignorant mind stream, within it are the seeds of the six lokas. Because vidyā is the real three kāyas, the three kāyas arise as the three syllables. Separation is gaining proficiency in the syllables.

The syllables of the six lokas are well known from various mahāyoga and anuyoga tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: In search of a specific verse

Content:

timtim2016 said:

This may be a long shot but here it goes: A few years back I remember reading a classic text which contained a verse in a criticism/response format, where a generic "Theravadan" make a criticism of the authority of Mahayana texts. The "Response:" was something along the lines of how the Theravadan texts were not written by the Victor nor could they reliably relay his teachings. I believe later in the text it talked about knowingly and intentionally prefacing Mahayan texts as if they relayed teachings taught by the Victor, but doing so specifically to draw new followers and protect these people from thinking the Theravadan texts were more authoritative because they were prefaced in a similar way (as if they were reliably relaying teachings traceable to the Buddha).

I think it may be Dharmakirti or Nagarjuna, and as mentioned the verse is structured like:

Theravadan/Hinayan: so and so

Response: so and so

I am sorry if this is far too vague. Thank you all for your time.

Malcolm wrote:

It is in the Ratnavali of Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: Conception and Contraception

Content:

Kelwin said:

And when does this transference take place, related to conception? (I heard at the moment of meeting of essences, but also heard after 3 months or so)
Conception can only occur if three things are present, a bardo being seeking rebirth, healthy sperm and healthy ovum.

Conception has already taken place, in the sense that sperm and egg have united.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not accurate.

Another form of contraception approved by the FDA – the copper Intrauterine Device CuT380A (Cu-IUD) – is effective as an EC when inserted up to five days following intercourse. Copper ions released from the IUD create an environment that is toxic to sperm, preventing fertilization.¹⁴ Copper can also alter the endometrial lining, but studies show that this alteration can prevent implantation, but not disrupt implantation.

Because Cu-IUDs prevent rather than disrupt pregnancy, they too are properly classified as contraceptives, not abortifacients.

<http://www.acog.org/-/media/Departments/Government-Relations-and-Outreach/FactsAreImportantEC.pdf?dmc=1&ts=20150127T1149330103>

In other words, IUD's create a situation where the sperm is basically poisoned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

paël said:

Finland.

Malcolm wrote:

You should contact Tulku Dagpa. He lives in Helsinki and speaks English well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Adamantine said:

Even ChNN's uncle Togden Urgyen Tenzin who was one of the few well documented cases of modern rainbow-body did like 10 million prostrations to purify the obscurations of the body according to his Guru Adzom Drukpa's instructions..

Malcolm wrote:

It is well known that Togden Urgyen Tenzin was mentally ill when he first went to see Adzom Drugpa.

Adamantine said:

Who knows, if he didn't follow his Guru's advice because he didn't think that prostrations were Dzogchen enough of a practice maybe he would not have displayed rainbow body and we wouldn't have this incredible source of inspiration.

Malcolm wrote:

I am certain he achieved rainbow body by following Adzom Drugpa's advice.

Adamantine said:

What's always emphasized is that the most important thing is Guru Yoga, which involves faith in the guru and following the wisdom of their insight and instructions. So if ones Guru tells you to do ngondro, or if they tell you not to do ngondro, or to do 10,000 of each accumulation not 100,000 or just to do it until signs arise, etc..

Malcolm wrote:

If you have no faith in a guru who tells you to do ngondro, ngondro is not going to work for you. If you gave faith in a guru who tells you that you don't need ngondro, ngondro is not going to work for you. Faith is not something you should contrive. You either have it or you don't. If you don't have faith in a teacher, why should you do what he or she says?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Conception and Contraception

Content:

tingdzin said:

The classical Buddhist approach is to say that three things are necessary: white essence of the father, red essence of the mother, and the presence of a "gandharva". This theory has often seemed to me to be based on fairly crude data from a scientific viewpoint: someone once worked out that the size of a sperm cell is many times smaller than that given for the size of the male essence in the scriptures -- I believe it is said to be the size of a sesame seed there. Further, a gandharva -- the name means "feeds on fragrance" -- is some sort of discarnate being, though how precisely this gandharva is supposed to relate to the vijnana, which is said to be that aspect of a person's mental functioning that is carried over from one life to the next, is something I have never seen well explained -- perhaps someone here will have a better idea.

Malcolm wrote:

The gandharva is the name for the series of five skandhas in the bardo, according to the Kośha.

The Vajramāla Tantra explains that ālayavijñāna inseparable from mahāprāṇavāyu is what transfers in the bardo between bodies.

IUD's do not kill a fetus. They prevent conception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

smcj said:

Did you discuss it with your teacher?

Seriously, how do you know that your reaction wasn't exactly what was supposed to be happening? Only someone that has successfully gone through the process and has come out the other side has any understanding of it. Going into it, all your reference points are nothing more than your own opinions/preferences/ignorance and invalid. The fact you didn't like matters nothing at all.

Malcolm wrote:

You do understand you are being pretty disrespectful?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Tongnyid Dorje said:

interesting post and opinions. although ChNNR doesnt teach necessity of ngondro in general, he requires it at SMS training, and he is trying to make it meaningful, not to count numbers, but have a real experience. especially at first level,

Paul said:

Do you specifically mean the 4 * 100,000? There is of course Dzogchen specific ngondro: semdzins, rushens and kumbhaka. I know that's definitely in the SMS program.

Malcolm wrote:

In the first level, one is to do a bit of the ngondro practice described by Sogdog pa Lodo Gyaltsen, beginning with refuge, bodhicitta, etc. One to three weeks of each, in retreat if one can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

pael said:

So, is my body mandala complete? I have muscle dystrophy. I can't walk.

Malcolm wrote:

In Dzogchen, the tantric idea of the body mandala is not important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

pael said:

How do they rose? Where is Ananda? Who arises them out of cessation?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhas rouse them from cessation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 11th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Matt J said:

Yes but isn't the goal of Mahayana omniscience as opposed to cessation?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. This is why arhats are roused out of cessation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Dechen Norbu said:

It's just another soundbite claiming Dzogchen practitioners forcefully need to practice ngondro if they wanna get it right and anyone saying otherwise is just creating bad karma. Nothing new really. As old as the religious version of Tibetan history in fact. And probably as bogus. (now I'll run for cover fast!)

(although more often than not I find myself thinking how great is ngondro practice when compared to others...)

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is the traditional way, and teachers who continue to teach the traditional way are going to teach that way.

It is up for everyone to find their own path. It is never a good idea to tell people they do not need to do Ngondro [since clearly someone is telling them they should]. It is a good idea to tell people they should go and receive Dzogchen teachings. Once they have received Dzogchen teachings, they can decide for themselves whether they wish to make use of the methods of the lower yānas or not, depending on their circumstances. It is not our job to condition people. If they have the karma to meet Dzogchen teachings, they will. If not, there is nothing we or they can do about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: question on the types of blessing pills

Content:

jmlee369 said:

In Gelug, I am not aware of any generic nectar (dudtsi) pill. Rather, we have the inner offering pill (nangchö rilbu) which is pretty much a requisite for those practising Highest Yoga Tantra, and vase pills of HYT and kriya tantra, which are different formulations of the 25 vase substances in pill form. There is also the chulen pill for doing chulen practice, and the famous mani pills which are blessed with recitations of mani mantras. It seems that HH the Dalai Lama's temple does produce a dutsi chömen pill as part of a medicine retreat, but I'm not clear what the nature of that pill is. I also happen to possess some pills from Ganden Jangtse which contain various substances such as tormas used in rituals performed by HH the Dalai Lama, substances from the two tutors, substances such as blessed vase water from the practices of deities of the four classes of tantra and the extensive consecration ritual, etc etc.

As for the Tamdrin dudtsi, it could be made from a collection of substances that were blessed through the practice of Hayagriva, most likely made at Sera Je.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a Nyingma system, so ultimately done according to the Nyingma tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: question on the types of blessing pills

Content:

pemachophel said:

Loppon,

Do you know if all texts for the manufacture and consecration of dudtsi are terma?

The only ones I know for sure are.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there are texts in Sakya written by Dragpa Gyaltsen and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Matt J said:

This is what is more or less espoused by many modern followers of the Suttas/Theravadins. I've also been slowly reading through Jamgon Kongtrul's Myriad Worlds and I find it interesting that in the Hinayana worldview he describes a descent from the formless samadhi realms to the lower, the higher the better and the lower being more blissful than the one above it. Which makes "neither perception nor non-perception" the pinnacle of samsara.

But this POV seems to be rejected in the Mahayana and beyond.

Malcolm wrote:

if you follow Peter Harvey's reasoning, what the Buddha intended by the term nirvana was a stream of unconditioned consciousness after the conditioned aggregates ceased. Well, it is and it isn't. According to Mahāyāna, arhats are roused out of their samadhi and returned to the bodhisattva stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Ngondro

Content:

Adamantine said:

thanks for the link Magnus.

Malcolm wrote:

I feel it is important to point out that it is not so simple as the way EPK presents it. For example, prior to the common and uncommon preliminaries, the tantra describes conferral of the elaborate vase empowerment [chapter 61]. Chapters sixty-two through through eighty-eight describe all of the preliminaries from contemplating the time of death through the separation of samsara and nirvana. Chapter eighty-nine explains the secret empowerment, and ninety covers creation and completion, while chapters ninety-one through ninety-eight cover trekchö. Chapter ninety-nine covers the third empowerment and the practice connected with passion. The rest of the tantra concerns thogal. In other words, the tantra maps various practices in relation with the four empowerments — elaborate, unelaborate, very unelaborate and extremely unelaborate.

So what are the first sixty chapters about? All kinds of things. Chapters 1-46 are concerned exclusively with Dzogchen theory. Chapters 47-60 are all about the guru and disciple and conditions for transmission.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

tingdzin said:

There is a story in the Nyingmapa tradition about a man who was so old and not in control of his body that he had to use a support to keep his chin up in meditation. By practicing single-mindedly, he is supposed to have attained the ultimate.

Malcolm wrote:

The fact that he had Vairocana as his teacher and Dzogchen Longde as his path helped considerably as well...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Matt J said:

Well, I don't know. For instance, some schools describe never-ending blank nothingness as the final goal, which sounds really depressing. Also, it doesn't sound very Buddhistic--- practicing to achieve some type of eternal cessation.

But if I ask, are there aggregates in nirvana? Someone might say "No!", and I would think "Oh man, blank nothing!" but perhaps they really mean "But there are wisdom lights" or something along those lines.

Malcolm wrote:

if you follow Peter Harvey's reasoning, what the Buddha intended by the term nirvana was a stream of unconditioned consciousness after the conditioned aggregates ceased.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: question on the types of blessing pills

Content:

ngodrup said:

The answer was, "its because the view, the ritual and substance standards are higher for doing this in the Nyingma." .

Malcolm wrote:

The reason is that the theory is different. It has nothing to do with standards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

The status of the images is just what you said, they are the potential of the mirror to reflect.

Malcolm wrote:

The potential of the mirror is there whether there are images or not. The images [sems] that form out of the potential [rtsal] of the mirror [rig pa] are not intrinsic to that mirror's potential.

Secondly, I have to ask: you have long declared you are not interested in Dzogchen, so I really have to wonder why you bother commenting on these issues???

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

All phenomena of relative reality are void by nature. Deceptively they appear truly to exist, but do not really do so. Yet from voidness various distinct appearances do arise, for instance forms. They are reflections of the "magic" mirror, voidness, and appear distinctly as your aggregates and as the consciousness, cognitive power and objects of your mind and senses.

Malcolm wrote:

Are there aggregates in nirvana?

You are not asking the right question -- of course, for sentient beings there are images in the mirror. As our friend here reminds us, we are not trying to recognize the mirror, we are the mirror. Whether or not there are appearances in the mirror, the nature of the mirror, its potential, always can reflect. That is what we are interested, not the status of the images, if there are any.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

My understanding is that, as Malcolm points out, there are no referential objects anymore. Having referential objects creating the reflections would be positing some third thing besides the mirror and the images on it. That's taking the analogy too far. However the analogy does not deny that there are images on the mirror. What were thought to be phenomena are now understood to be nothing more than images on the mirror, as per your quoted post above Vasana. But somehow Malcolm goes from that to something like "there are no images at all". That is like saying that nothing appears ever. That's one step too far for my understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Images require signs, where can there be signs in a signless state?

smcj said:

They are the display of the potential of bodhicitta, as per your post:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus, bodhicitta, potentiality and the display are neither single nor plural in terms of their essence, nevertheless, just like the reflections in the mirror cannot be said to be either the same nor different than the mirror's power to reflect, it is understood that the imputations which are the display of the potential of bodhicitta also do not exist either inside or outside of, and hence these appearances are called "nonexistent, clear appearances." Indeed, nothing at all is established in anyway.

Let me ask you, smcj, do mirrors bother looking into themselves?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

My understanding is that, as Malcolm points out, there are no referential objects anymore. Having referential objects creating the reflections would be positing some third thing besides the mirror and the images on it. That's taking the analogy too far. However the analogy does not deny that there are images on the mirror. What were thought to be phenomena are now understood to be nothing more than images on the mirror, as per your quoted post above Vasana. But somehow Malcolm goes from that to something like "there are no images at all". That is like saying that nothing appears ever. That's one step too far for my understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

Images require signs, where can there be signs in a signless state?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

cloudburst said:

but we can't call a chair unconditioned just because it is a union of form and emptiness. Similarly it makes no sense to call Vidya an unconditioned thing when it is a union, no different.

If vidyā is conditioned and impermanent, then buddhahood would be conditioned and impermanent.

The third Dodrupchen claims claims the osel of annuttaratantra is the same as vidya. Whether you call the dharmata of mind compounded or uncompounded is a matter of perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

Od' sal taught for example in the Jñānavajrasammucaya tantra is the same thing we are discussingL:

That which arises from luminosity is "mind," [citta] "intellect," [manas] and consciousness" [vijñāna] which forms the foundation of all phenomena.

And:

Further, luminosity is nonabiding, does not cease nor does it arise, ultimate, the limit of reality.

Here, in order to explain the reality [gnas lugs] of all phenomena, since that which arises from luminosity is a nonconceptual knowing awareness arising (at the same time as a subtle vāyu) from dharmatā, the dhātu of naturally pure luminosity, the mind is the basis of everything [aḷaya, kun gzhi]. The mental consciousness [manovijñāna] expands and contracts. Consciousness possesses an eight-fold group.

The foundation of all phenomena is bodhicitta, an unchanging vajra that is equal with space.

This is basically the same thing that Dzogchen is getting at, with the difference that here in this tantra, bodhicitta is defined as the union of the relative and ultimate. Dzogchen however dispenses with the distinction altogether, regarding it as a deviation. An ancient commentary found in the Bairo brgyud 'bum on The Soaring Great Garuda [one of the five earlier extracts translated by Vairocana] explains:

[T]o demonstrate the deviation of madhyamaka: here, since the two truths have been inseparable from the beginning, the two truths are not presented individually even conventionally. Having divided up the dharmatā and dharmin into relative and ultimate, training in the ultimate as supreme is the deviation of madhyamaka, as it is said: Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an “ultimate phenomenon”.

Needless to say, the luminosity discussed above is not the luminosity discussed in the completion stage of the Guhyasamaja.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

Uh huh. So what about all that "samsara and nirvana are seen as the same" idea? Why even call it "non-dual" if all there is is a singularity?

Malcolm wrote:

Because there isn't even a singularity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 10th, 2015 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We already have such a text, it is called bsam gtan mig dgron by Nubchen Sangye Yeshe. The advantage to that text is that it has many citations from seminal early Chan texts already translated into Tibetan by Tibetan and Chinese Chan practitioners during the 8th century.

Astus said:

Is there an English translation already? Although, it certainly has no information on Huangbo.

Malcolm wrote:

No, but the point is that Chan section, for example cites more than forty passages from Chan texts. It has 68 pages alone devoted to the so called cig car approach to view, meditation and conduct.

He summarizes the basic difference between Chan and the sutra gradual path as follows:

"From the beginning, the sudden approach is to train on the non-arising ultimate without alternating [with relative truth]."

He then goes on to quote Bodhidharma:

Abandon bias and concepts about the real. If one remains vividly, neither self nor other exists, commoners and āryas are equivalent and the same. If one remains in unchanging stability, from then, on do not follow letters and scriptures. Without concepts, remain in the actual state of the real meaning, peaceful, without activity. That is non-egagement with objects.

He compares and contrasts Chan texts and approaches with Mahāyoga and Atiyoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: a few thoughts about Satanism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"The Devil" is, historically, the God of any people that one personally dislikes..."

-- Aleister Crowley

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

Maybe so, but I think your caution bears repeating. Literary Chinese presents its own challenges and possibilities as a medium for Dharma transmission. Context matters tremendously, so someone attempting a comparative study would need to have a very firm grip on how Huang Po uses this concept throughout his known writings.

Astus said:

Choosing Huangbo is a good start. Now for comparison's sake we also need a single Dzogchen text to work with, one that's been translated a few times to English and contains enough information (e.g. definitions).

Malcolm wrote:

We already have such a text, it is called bsam gtan mig dgron by Nubchen Sangye Yeshe. The advantage to that text is that it has many citations from seminal early Chan texts already translated into Tibetan by Tibetan and Chinese Chan practitioners during the 8th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 9:56 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

Emptiness means conditioned, interacting. Sentience is living, connecting with events, phenomena influencing phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean there is no emptiness of the unconditioned? Emptiness means being free from all extremes, it does not mean being "conditioned." If it did, that would be a very inferior kind of emptiness.

Astus said:

Mind is sentient, perceptive, because impressions, emotions and thoughts move.

Malcolm wrote:

Wind moves, but it is neither sentient nor perceptive. Waves move, they are neither sentient nor perceptive. Clouds move, they are neither sentient nor perceptive. So it seems you definitive of sentient and perceptive because of the movement of thoughts, and so on is inadequate.

Are thoughts the same thing as the mind or are they different? If they are latter, how can a mind move inside of itself? Of they are different, how does their movement give the mind sentience?

Astus said:

If consciousness were unconditioned, it had no effect on anything and could not sense anything, that is, it were insentient.

Malcolm wrote:

Did anyone say consciousness [vijñāna] was unconditioned?

Astus said:

How is consciousness interdependent? Does it come from the sense organ or the object? Without either?

The 18 dhatus is a basic description of how consciousness is interdependent, further elaborations are found in abhidharma and yogacara materials. The mind-stream continues from the preceding mind to the present mind.

Malcolm wrote:

The eighteen dhātus does not actually explain how the mind is interdependent. It is a hinayāna model that assumes that a consciousness arises from the contact of sense object with a sense organ. In other words, it does not explain perception, it merely provides a taxonomy of our sensory apparatus.

Astus said:

Who said anything about an independent knower?

What you called the unconditioned knowing, the core and basis of mind and all appearances. It is unconditioned, therefore independent. It is knowing, what knows, so it is a knower, pure awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

This fault does not apply, just as the mind of which it is the core is not established, also the unconditioned vidyā is not established, is empty by nature and is not something real or truly existent.

Astus said:

This still does not explain the origin of consciousness, that is, how there can be a mind/consciousness at all.

Is there a situation where there is no mind?

Malcolm wrote:

Is there a situation in which the mind can be found?

Astus said:

Can consciousness occur from non-consciousness? Samsara is without a beginning, so is the mind-stream of beings.

Malcolm wrote:

This presumes two things, one, that there is fact a distinction between sentient and nonsentient. Two, it presumes that time exists independently.

Astus said:

Self-originated pristine consciousness is nondual emptiness and knowingness, termed "the nondual dharmadhātu and vidyā." Pristine consciousness [ye shes, jñāna] is the core of the mind, self-arisen, unconditioned, uncontaminated, unaffected by the three times. When it is not recognized, then through that ignorance its potentiality becomes mind, dependent origination and all the phenomena of samsara. When it is recognized, one is the peer of Buddha Samantabhadra.

Since it is unconditioned and unaffected, it cannot recognise or forget itself. So a second perceiver is required that is conditioned, and its core cannot be the unconditioned knowing.

Malcolm wrote:

Since unconditioned self-originated pristine consciousness is the core of a conditioned mind, it indeed can be forgotten by that conditioned mind, or as it more accurately the case, not recognized. It is just like someone who looks for their keys all over the house not recognizing that they are holding those very same keys in their hand.

Emptiness is unconditioned, but we have no problem describing it as the dharmatā of entities. Likewise, unconditioned, empty, self-originated pristine consciousness is the dharmatā of the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The basis appears as the universe under the influence of ignorance.

The universe appears as the basis under the influence of knowledge.

smcj said:

Sounds like you're not going to get away from those pesky images.

Malcolm wrote:

When the universe arise as the basis, there are no referential objects anymore, so how can there be images?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

cloudburst said:

It mentions "unconditioned vidya." Does that imply there is a conditioned vidya, or is the author simply being descriptive?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, the mind that knows and engages conditioned things is has conditioned vidyā.

cloudburst said:

Why is it necessary to say there is a dharmata OF 'the union of clarity and emptiness' aka the dharmata of the mind ? Your formulations seems unnecessarily complicated.

Malcolm wrote:

It is necessary because in this case clarity and emptiness are an indivisible whole; it is not the case that there is a relative side, clarity; and an ultimate side, emptiness — together they form the dharmatā of the mind, hence "the dharmata OF the union of clarity and emptiness."

cloudburst said:

Better to say that the dharmata of the mind is the union of clarity and emptiness. So ... unconditioned vidya is the union of clarity and emptiness. But of course, this union has a conditioned aspect, the clarity or knowingness aspect.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not actually what is being said here. Self-originated jñāna is unconditioned, clear, and empty.

If it is as you say, rig pa would merely be a subtle mind.

A subtle mind is a subtle union of emptiness and clarity. So it would seem there is good reason to state that the vidya of the great perfection is a subtle mind

Only if you are not familiar with the teachings of the Great Perfection.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

cloudburst said:

if it is than it must not be a consciousness

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a mind included among the eight consciousnesses, as explained above already.

cloudburst said:

... but generally I find Hopkins to be the most obfuscatory translator I have ever read, excepting Thurman, of course.

Malcolm wrote:

The substance of it is this:

My contemporary, Jawa Do Ngag, seized on the explanation of others that in the context of the luminosity of the meditation of the isolation of the mind in the Guhyasamāja's Five Stages, original mind means a subtle mind. Beginning from that, he claims, "The vidyā the Great Perfection introduces is a subtle mind. Since that subtle mind is conditioned because it arises from four conditions, the Great Perfection is conditioned.” Also there are those who repeat this very inappropriate statement.

In general, since the original mind [gnyug sems, ādyacitta] is the unconditioned luminous nature of the mind, that is also the sugatagarbha, but maintaining that is a conditioned mind is very erroneous. Since the luminosity of the completion stage of the Guhyasamaja is explained to be conditioned, [15/a] if this is the special feature to be revealed, color that however you like. Though I have no wish to express a refutation of that [the completion stage of Guhyasamaja], don’t mix that up with the Great Perfection.

It is well known through the Dharma of the tantras, agamas and upadeśas of the Great Perfection, the teachings of Omniscient Longchenpa up to the lineage of gurus of Kama and Terma of the present day that unconditioned vidyā is introduced as the dharmatā of the union of clarity and emptiness.

If it is as you say, rig pa would merely be a subtle mind.

seems like a real possibility

See above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Self-originated pristine consciousness is nondual emptiness and knowingness, termed "the nondual dharmadhātu and vidyā." Pristine consciousness [ye shes, jñāna] is the core of the mind, self-arisen, unconditioned, uncontaminated, unaffected by the three times. When it is not recognized, then through that ignorance its potentiality becomes mind, dependent origination and all the phenomena of samsara. When it is recognized, one is the peer of Buddha Samantabhadra.

treehuggingoctopus said:

Malcolm,

so we seemingly filthy eternalists are actually not filthy eternalists at all because self-originated pristine consciousness is empty -- even though its emptiness is not the emptiness of Madhyamaka, but experiential emptiness, such as the (nature of) mind's unfindability?

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness of the mind and the knowingness of the mind, called the dharmatā of the mind are ultimate, not relative. Emptiness is indivisible with knowingness, knowingness is indivisible with emptiness. There is no cause or condition for this indivisible empty knowingness that is the dharmatā of the mind. It is completely different than the idea of "the subtle mind" advanced by some Gelugpas who seek to unify the five stages of the Guhyasamaja system with Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you are a Gelugpa — ordinary people assume inherent existence, all they assume is existence.

cloudburst said:

Quite wrong, I sense this is one of your core misunderstandings. An inherently existent thing would be a thing that exists by nature, and this is precisely what ordinary people understand by existence, ergo they assume inherent existence, just not as a matter of discourse.

Malcolm wrote:

No one but philosophers engaged in 2nd century Indian philosophical discourse believed in svabhāva.

For ordinary people, bhāva is enough. They were not stupid, they saw things change, come into existence, perish., etc., without believing there was a potness in pots or a cowness in cows.

Self-originated pristine consciousness is nondual emptiness and knowingness, termed "the nondual dharmadhātu and vidyā."

right, non-dual emptiness and awareness, the union of the two truths. Emptiness is the ultimate nature of awareness. Astus is doing a good job.[/quote]

Vidyā [rig pa] is ultimate, not relative; unconditioned, not conditioned; etc. Mipham addresses this issue. You can read about in Fundamental Mind, translated by Hopkins. If it is as you say, rig pa would merely be a subtle mind. Mipham rejects this for many reasons, not only a few. I suggest you read what he says there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness, how then is the mind not something inert? How does consciousness arise? From itself? From other? From both? Dependent origination is just the perception of the deluded.

Astus said:

Inert would be something unconditioned and without interaction.

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, "inert" means "without sentience". Emptiness is not sentient. Thus, if emptiness were solely the nature of the mind, the mind could not be sentient.

Astus said:

Consciousness is interdependent, changing, and that's how it can sense objects, how there can be perception.

Malcolm wrote:

How is consciousness interdependent? Does it come from the sense organ or the object? Without either?

Astus said:

An independent knower is without any object, consequently it does not sense anything, it is unknowing, unaware, unconscious.

Malcolm wrote:

Who said anything about an independent knower?

Astus said:

As an interdependent consciousness it does not need an origin, and that origin would mean an ultimate cause without a cause.

Malcolm wrote:

This still does not explain the origin of consciousness, that is, how there can be a mind/consciousness at all.

Astus said:

Also, this original knower is a position discussed in the 9th chapter of MMK. Dependent origination is what the deluded does not realise, instead they assume inherent existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you are a Gelugpa — ordinary people assume inherent existence, all they assume is existence.

Astus said:

How come they don't apply to jnana?

Malcolm wrote:

Great Tantra Clarifying The Meaning of Freedom From Proliferation states:

In the context of explaining the illustrative examples of that basis, it is said to be empty and pervasive like space; immaculate like a crystal; unchanging like a vajra; the source of all blessings like a jewel; unimpeded illumination like the heart of the sun and so on. It is the opposite of ignorance [avidyā] and inertness, existing as nature of a veridical consciousness, it is knowledge [vidyā]. Since it is beyond cause and condition, it is self-originated. Since it does not arise adventitiously, it is the pristine consciousness that has become the nature of the vidyā that has always existed. It is the basis from which all samsara and nirvana appear.

Self-originated pristine consciousness is nondual emptiness and knowingness, termed "the nondual dharmadhātu and vidyā." Pristine consciousness [ye shes, jñāna] is the core of the mind, self-arisen, unconditioned, uncontaminated, unaffected by the three times. When it is not recognized, then through that ignorance its potentiality becomes mind, dependent origination and all the phenomena of samsara. When it is recognized, one is the peer of Buddha Samantabhadra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

That explanation still sounds like "just images on the mirror" still to me.

Malcolm wrote:

There aren't any images on the mirror...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

Dependent origination is just the perception of the deluded.

Because it's all just "images on the mirror"?

Malcolm wrote:

No, because dependent origination starts from not seeing your own state.

Many followers of Dharma perceive dependent origination to be an external fact or law that governs the production of phenomena.

But from a Dzogchen point of view, dependent origination only begins from the phase of ignorance called the imputing ignorance [kun brtags ma rig pa]. Prior to this, there is no dependent origination to speak of. For example, for a buddha who sees things just as they are, there is no dependent origination at all. The Guhyagarbha states:

Buddhas themselves never find a phenomena other than buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

To add a knowing/awareness as the source of the experiencing function of the mind sounds very much like denying the functionality of dependent origination and establishing a substance separately from appearances. How is that not the case?

Malcolm wrote:

If the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness, how then is the mind not something inert? How does consciousness arise? From itself? From other? From both?

Dependent origination is just the perception of the deluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Huang Po's One Mind & Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

心 translates the Sanskrit citta, correct? if so, then there's some basis for working out a textual comparison between Dzogchen and Ch'an on the basis of "mind."

Astus said:

I wouldn't go there. Chan is mainly about translating the Dharma to common Chinese and not about transplanting Indian Buddhism, as that's already happened through other channels. Although Chan teachers were (almost?) exclusively educated elite monastics, so references to texts and concepts of Indian origin is not unusual, but it is not the main characteristics of the tradition. There is even a slight division between the so called eight schools to Chinese (Tiantai, Huayan, Chan, Jingtu (Pure Land)) and Indian (Madhyamaka (Sanlun), Yogacara (Faxiang), Vinaya (Lu), Mantra (Zhenyan)), that signifies mostly their origin in a sense.

Xin (心) can mean all sorts of things, even contradictory ones within the same sentence. Or as an illustration for its versatile use, here is the entry from the Soothill-Hodous dictionary of Chinese Buddhism:

心

hrd, hrdaya 汗栗太 (or 汗栗馱); 紀哩馱 the heart, mind, soul; citta 質多 the heart as the seat of thought or intelligence. In both senses the heart is likened to a lotus. There are various definitions, of which the following are six instances: (1) 肉團心 hrd, the physical heart of sentient or nonsentient living beings, e. g. men, trees, etc. (2) 集起心 citta, the ālayavijñāna, or totality of mind, and the source of all mental activity. (3) 思量心 manas, the thinking and calculating mind; (4) 緣慮心; 了別心; 慮知心; citta; the discriminating mind; (5) 堅實心 the bhūtatathatā mind, or the permanent mind; (6) 積聚精要心 the mind essence of the sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

All of these usages map to sems [citta] in Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 9th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Self-originated jñāna is the unconditioned essence of the eight consciousnesses, as Mipham puts it: [The] unconditioned self-originated wisdom of the original empty knowing dharmatā of the mind of the eight consciousness is the mind of luminosity. However, one needs to take care to understand what this "mind" is. Again, Mipham states: Here, dharmatā is called "original mind [ādyacitta]." Though it is explained with the name mind or vidyā from the aspect of being intrinsically clear, it is not the mind included with the conditioned eight consciousnesses.

Astus said:

All it seems to say is that the eight consciousnesses have the attribute of consciousness, and that is their inherent quality; and that quality is not any singular instance of being conscious of something, but it is true for all eight, so in a sense it is unconditioned and nothing in particular at the same time. Did I miss something?

Malcolm wrote:

If that were true, it would be a tautology and there would be no point.

It is saying that vijñāna/citta/manas has a dharmatā that is more than emptiness, which would render the dharmatā of the mind inert if all it was is emptiness. According to everything you have said, you maintain that the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Mipham might say: Since there is nothing to designate as being produced from a cause or generated by condition because the great emptiness that has always been self-originated is intrinsically luminous, it is self-originated pristine consciousness. That is the mind of dharmatā or the luminous pristine consciousness.

Astus said:

"Therefore, thought of the unreal from the outset is calmed, and sense objects from the outset are void. The mind of voidness and calm is a spiritual Knowing that never darkens. This calm Knowing of voidness and calm is precisely the mind of voidness and calm that Bodhidharma formerly transmitted. Whether you are deluded or awakened, mind from the outset is spontaneously Knowing. [Knowing] is not produced by conditions, nor does it arise in dependence on sense objects. Even during delusion the depravities are Knowing, but [Knowing] is not the depravities. Even during awakening the divine transformations are Knowing, but Knowing is not the divine transformations."

(Zongmi: Chan Letter in "Zongmi on Chan", p 88)

Malcolm wrote:

This just says that a mind knows in the same way that a fire is hot. This is more consistent with Mahāmudra presentations of the nature of the mind, where clarity in general is regarded as the characteristic of the mind, while emptiness is regarded as the nature of the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty defective buddhanature, I'd say.

Astus said:

What special features would you add?

Question: "What is called Buddha Mind?" Answer: "Mind's having no mark of variation is called Thusness. Mind's unchangeableness is called the Dharma Nature. Mind's not being connected to anything is called liberation. The mind nature's unimpededness is called enlightenment. The mind nature's quiescence is called nirvana."
(Bodhidharma Anthology, p 16)

Malcolm wrote:

Mipham might say:

Since there is nothing to designate as being produced from a cause or generated by condition because the great emptiness that has always been self-originated is intrinsically luminous, it is self-originated pristine consciousness. That is the mind of dharmatā or the luminous pristine consciousness.

The Tantra Gathering The Definitive Meaning Of The Great Perfection states:

Due to the three times existing in the mind, before, after, and present occur in life.

Due to transmigrating existing in the mind, therefore, birth and death arise for the body.

Due to various illness, happiness and suffering being one's mind, it ripens as samsara.

Therefore, the mind is not buddha...

Unrealized confused people claim "the dharmakāya is my mind."

Therefore, other than the words, they do not understand the meaning.

The one who understands the definitive meaning from names is rare.

Therefore, mind is not buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

Without digressing into philosophical disputes, buddha-nature in Zen is just one's own mind. What is mind? This mind reading and thinking. Thoughts, emotions, impressions come and go. One doesn't have to do anything, as experiences are already ungraspable and naturally non-abiding. In other terms, the mind is free and aware just as it is.

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty defective buddhanature, I'd say.

monktastic said:

Is it different than what Rangjung Dorje says?

The heart-mind of all the Buddhas of the past, the present, and the future, widely renowned as Dharmakaya, as Mahamudra, as enlightened mind, is precisely your own mind, which thinks of this and that.

Malcolm wrote:

If buddhanature is your own mind, which thinks of this and that, then that buddhanature would be conditioned, and thus, defective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For you, the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness. For Mipham, the dharmatā of the mind is unconditioned jñāna.

Astus said:

Is jnana knowing, an active awareness of appearances? Or is it without knowing of objects? If the former, it is conditioned. If the latter, it is unaware. Or is it perhaps the stream of experiences that can be described as equally empty and conscious, but still without falling into being conditioned by subject and object?

Malcolm wrote:

Self-originated jñāna is the unconditioned essence of the eight consciousnesses, as Mipham puts its:

[The] unconditioned self-originated wisdom of the original empty knowing dharmatā of the mind of the eight consciousness is the mind of luminosity.

However, one needs to take care to understand what this "mind" is. Again, Mipham states:

Here, dharmatā is called “original mind [ādyacitta].” Though it is explained with the name mind or vidyā from the aspect of being intrinsically clear, it is not the mind included with the conditioned eight consciousnesses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Tanaka & Robertson on Ch'an vs Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

Without digressing into philosophical disputes, buddha-nature in Zen is just one's own mind. What is mind? This mind reading and thinking. Thoughts, emotions, impressions come and go. One doesn't have to do anything, as experiences are already ungraspable and naturally non-abiding. In other terms, the mind is free and aware just as it is.

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty defective buddhanature, I'd say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: question on the types of blessing pills

Content:

pemachophel said:

Loppon,

Are you saying dudtshi doesn't have a liberation through taste function? That would seem to contradict a number of my Teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

Myong grol is one thing, bdud rtsi is another. For example, the Sakyapas have bdud rtsi pills for the inner offering, but they do not have myong grol.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 3:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen master's perspective [from The Sacred...]

Content:

Vasana said:

but you really are in the direct presence of Samantabhardas enlightened intent when reading and abiding with this text.

Malcolm wrote:

No, one is not, despite the hyperbole which may lead one to think so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Madhyamika & Yogacara: Which Was Popular First?

Content:

Boomerang said:

I've heard people say that Yogacara used to be the most popular philosophy, and then people switched over to Madhyamika. Seeing as Nagarjuna lived a few hundred years before Asanga, how did this switch come about? Was Madhyamika not popular when Nagarjuna was alive, or did the popular preference go back and forth between Madhyamika and Yogacara?

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka first, then Yogacara.

M

Boomerang said:

But now in Tibetan Buddhism Madhyamaka takes the center stage, doesn't it? So it did go full circle?

Malcolm wrote:

No, Madhyamaka was always dominant in India, Yogacara was studied for its presentation of the path, Madhyamaka was studied for the definitive view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Madhyamika & Yogacara: Which Was Popular First?

Content:

Boomerang said:

I've heard people say that Yogacara used to be the most popular philosophy, and then people switched over to Madhyamika. Seeing as Nagarjuna lived a few hundred years before Asanga, how did this switch come about? Was Madhyamika not popular when Nagarjuna was alive, or did the popular preference go back and forth between Madhyamika and Yogacara?

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka first, then Yogacara.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Anders said:

This might be a can of worms, but are you effectively saying Vasubandhu et al were not aryas?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no way for me to know this as there is no way for me to know what their actual view and realization was.

Astus said:

Nevertheless, if they taught an incoherent and incorrect teaching, that is intentionally misleading people, something that's unfit for any bodhisattva.

Malcolm wrote:

I see no reason to suspect their motives, but it is pretty clear that Madhyamakas, including Shantarakshita, found the Yogacara explanations of mind-only to be riddled with realist presumptions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

It is only as incoherent as dependent origination, since dependent nature is just that: causality.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an incoherent account of causality, unlike dependent origination.

Astus said:

Because that is how they attempt to explain the meaning of mind-only. It's not even mentioned in the Vimsatika that talks about consciousness only.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not exactly true, since the subject of Vimsatika is principally an explanation of the imagined nature. The three natures are discussed at length by Vasubandhu in the Trisvabhāvanirdeśa.

Astus said:

Yes, and for this reason, you don't really get the sense of Dzogchen. Mipham writes: Do you mean that Dzogchen posits a consciousness of the type that's independent, unconditioned, removed from the five aggregates? If yes, it's difficult to maintain how that's not like an atman. If no, then I see no difference between what I said and what Mipham talks about.

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

For you, the dharmatā of the mind is only emptiness. For Mipham, the dharmatā of the mind is unconditioned jñāna.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 8th, 2015 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: question on the types of blessing pills

Content:

pemachophel said:

Chulen is for the practice of rasayana, rejuvenation, health, and longevity and also forms a part of the completion stage practice of going beyond physical sustenance. Dudtsi/men/jinlob is for liberation by taste. Although it contains many healing medicinals and one of its names is men /"medicine", it's spiritual power is pre-eminent. It contains many things besides herbs and minerals, including many, many sacred substances. It is used as an inner offering (as in the men of me-rak). It is also what physically consecrates the amrit in the kapala at a tshog. It is also used to consecrate "permanent" tormas and is also an essential ingredient in consecrating statues. It is also take just before or at the time of death when all life-saving medicine is useless. The virtues of dudtsi/men are truly various and wonderful!

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Dudtsi is for the inner offering;

myong grol, liberation through taste, does not exist outside of Dzogchen tantras.

People often conflate the two, but they are not actually the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

On this note, is it possible for sutra practitioners that hold to eternalist/substantialist views, such as those of Yogacara, to become Aryas and still hold those views post-attaining the first bhumi?

Malcolm wrote:

No. It is not possible.

Anders said:

This might be a can of worms, but are you effectively saying Vasubandhu et al were not aryas?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no way for me to know this as there is no way for me to know what their actual view and realization was.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there are.

Astus said:

Just as Madhyamaka affirms a conventional dependent origination and does not claim total non-existence, the same is stated by saying that there is a dependent nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Unlike Yogacara, Madhyamaka removes claims for existing existents.

Astus said:

Candrakirti's critique does not apply, when it is understood that the lack of subject and object means the incorrect reification is no more, otherwise it would be self-defeating, asking for a self to perceive no-self.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it applies — he proves that the other-dependent is incoherent.

Astus said:

Yogachara and Madhyamaka did not "come together" in Shantarakshita because the latter never uses the scheme of the three own natures, which is the key doctrine of the Yogacara school.

Why is that the key doctrine? They also have quite a few other unique ideas. I'd say the teaching of mind only is an equally important teaching for instance.

Malcolm wrote:

Because that is how they attempt to explain the meaning of mind-only.

Astus said:

What is the difference? Or if you have a book reference, that might be enough as well.

Malcolm wrote:

In brief, MAV merely state that the absence of the imagined in the dependent is the perfected.

gZhan stong pas by contrast try to map the three natures onto the two truths, thereby distorting both doctrines, claiming that perfected nature [ultimate] is empty of both the imagined and the dependent [relative].

Astus said:

What Tibetan term do you mean for awareness? Rig pa?

Malcolm wrote:

It's nothing like that. You can change that word to consciousness or mind. What I try to highlight is that the quality of consciousness/awareness is already and necessarily present in the mind (mental aggregates), and generally in the whole realm of experience, since without being aware/conscious of something, one cannot say that it is experienced.[/quote]

Yes, and for this reason, you don't really get the sense of Dzogchen. Mipham writes: [The] meaning explained by the term, "Great Perfection, the luminous mind essence" is the dharmatā of the mind, self-originated pristine consciousness, nothing other than the dharmadhātu, the reality of the original basis, and the total uniformity of union. Since it does not change with the three times, it is totally unconditioned, but there is no chance for there to arise here the subject, a momentary impermanent conditioned mind, and the unreal sole emptiness that is a mere object to refute by reasoning. Therefore, the Great Perfection of the basis or this totally unconditioned union of the luminosity of the basis, is the ultimate reality of all phenomena.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

As long as you think the unconditioned nature of the mind is merely emptiness, for that long you will never understand either Dzogchen or Mahāmudra.

Mind, per definition, is conscious. To say that the mind is empty is to say that awareness is empty. It's not denying awareness, nor is it reducing it to insentience. Awareness is the interdependent stream of experiences, and it is not separate from its insubstantiality. Mind is conditioned, that's why it is without essence, otherwise it would not function at all. So being conditioned is the unconditioned, and unconditioned is the conditioned itself. How is that wrong for Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:

What Tibetan term do you mean for awareness? Rig pa?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, December 7th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

In the basic works of Asanga and Vasubandhu there is no attack against Nagarjuna's teachings...

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there are. Take for example, the Summary of the Great Vehicle [BDK edition], chapter 2, section 25. states "Since the other-dependent does not really exist as it appears, how does one know that it is not entirely nonexistent? If there were no other-dependent pattern, the reality pattern would also be nonexistent and then one would come to affirm universal nothingness. And then, if the other-dependent pattern both did not exist, one would fall into the error about the being and nonbeing of defilement and purification. But since these states can be known not to be nothing, it is not true that all is nothing." [pg. 51]

Candrakirti's rebuttal to this is quite famous between MAV 6.72...

If there is an entity such as the dependent, empty of duality lacking apprehended objects, devoid of an apprehending subject, by whom is the existence of this entity known?

It is not reasonable says that which cannot be apprehended "exists."

...

If there exists such an entity as the other-dependent nature that is nonarisen and unknowable, the existence of this cannot be known by anyone,
like the harm caused by the son of a barren woman to others.

When the other-dependent does not exist at all,
what can be a cause of the relative [in your system]?
On the other hand, the presentation which is known to the world is destroyed.

Astus said:

While there were people in the later centuries who thought in terms of opposing views, there were others who could put the two into a single system.

Malcolm wrote:

For example? Who did you give in mind? If you gave in mind Shatnarakshita, he never uses the scheme of the three natures. If you have in mind Ratnakarashanti, he destroys the distinction between the two truths in his attempt to harmonize the two systems and never escapes the fundamental inner contradiction found in the Yogacara presentation of the three natures.

Astus said:

Just as the dependent is the ultimate without the imagined, so is seeing the inseparability of interdependence and emptiness, the conventional and the ultimate, is called the middle way. Not reifying appearances is seeing their dependent-empty nature for both Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

This reasoning is destroyed by Candrakirti.

Astus said:

Regarding their differences, Yijing's summary (quoted by Malcolm David Eckel in his "Bhavaviveka and His Buddhist Opponents", p 95; and "Undigested Pride" in "Madhyamaka and Yogacara - Allies or Rivals?", p 133) sounds nice and succinct: "For Yogacara ultimate (真) is (有), conventional (俗) isn't (無). They use the three natures as the foundation. For Madhyamaka ultimate isn't, conventional is. Indeed the two truths is primary [for them]. The Prajnaparamita's great teaching contains both ideas." (T40n1817p783a29-b1)

Malcolm wrote:

Eckel is a nice guy. I remember being in his office one day where he confided in me he was much relieved that he was not a Buddhist. So...

Astus said:

their coming together in the teachings of for instance Shantarakshita and Kamalashila.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogachara and Madhyamaka did not "come together" in Shantarakshita because the latter never uses the scheme of the three own natures, which is the key doctrine of the Yogacara school.

Astus said:

Please give us a specific example of how Yogacara doxology influences Vajrayāna? You surely are aware that Tantras such as the Hevajra subordinate Yogacara to Madhyamaka? And are you sure that it is not merely a case of Madhyamakas using terminology found in Yogacara but repurposing it?

Malcolm wrote:

Look at this thread as an example:

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=100&t=13491>.

Astus said:

There's also the whole Shentong teaching among Nyingmapas and Kagyupas, of which Brunnholzl writes: "what is called Shentong is nothing other than the Yogacara (Yoga Practice) system of Maitreya, Asanga, and Vasubandhu, also called "the lineage of vast activity.”” (Center of the Sunlit Sky, p 445)

Malcolm wrote:

No, even Karl B recognizes that the system of the three own natures used by Maitreya, Asanga and Vasubandhu [type a] is not the system used by the gzhan stong pas [type b].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 10:20 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 10:19 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

This thread is tripping.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 10:17 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Mother's Lap said:

On this note, is it possible for sutra practitioners that hold to eternalist/substantialist views, such as those of Yogacara, to become Aryas and still hold those views post-attaining the first bhumi?

Malcolm wrote:

No. It is not possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 9:45 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

Unless Dzogchen posits something beyond the possible realm of experience (body-mind), the difference you mention is non-existent.

Malcolm wrote:

As long as you think the unconditioned nature of the mind is merely emptiness, for that long you will never understand either Dzogchen or Mahāmudra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 9:43 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

With respect to the Yogacara school, they do indeed posit an ultimate consciousness — it is the meaning of line of Madhyantavibhaga, "The imagination of the unreal exists..." and so on, though I understand it is fashionable these days to try and rescue Yogacara from being hoisted on its own petard.

Astus said:

As I read it, the Madhyantavibhaga there says nothing different from what Nagarjuna writes about the equality between dependent origination and emptiness. It is also repeated in how the three natures are explained. If that means Yogacara is at fault, then so is Madhyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

The Madhyantavibhaga is basically asserting that the perfect is the absence of the imagined in the dependent. The dependent however is never refuted. It is the emptiness that exists in which no duality exists.

Frankly, I am a little surprised that you don't understand the difference between Madhyamaka and Yogacara. Yogacarins and Madhymakas in India certainly understood the differences between their respective schools, and there is an extensive polemical literature which exists between them detailing the differences.

Astus said:

That's quite a huge point, putting Yogacara into the position of not only a less developed view, but actually means that they massively failed in setting up a coherent system.

Malcolm wrote:

There are indeed some glaring internal contradictions in the Yogacara system of Maitreya, Asanga, Vasubandhu and their followers. For example, Arya Vimuktesena directly take his teacher, Vasubandhu, to task for some of those inconsistencies.

Astus said:

Then it is certainly strange how Yogacara has such a big influence on virtually every Mahayana (incl. Vajrayana) school. So, I'm still doubtful about that interpretation's validity.

Malcolm wrote:

Please give us a specific example of how Yogacara doxology influences Vajrayāna? You surely are aware that Tantras such as the Hevajra subordinate Yogacara to Madhyamaka?

And are you sure that it is not merely a case of Madhyamakas using terminology found in Yogacara but repurposing it?

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You just took a drug.

odysseus said:

No, "you" didn't. You rather took an overdose of Cosmic medicine, but you were reckless in your evaluation beforehand.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

This is a typical linguistic game. First he lists statements that he wants to suggest as relevant for the term "arising". But why should these be relevant for arising? These are totally irrelevant for the fact that the term arising is a term of conventional language.

Malcolm wrote:

Every negation you find in Nāgārjuna is based on a metaphysical position that someone actually held either in a Buddhist school or a non-Buddhist school. The Sāṃkhya school, as well as some Buddhist schools [Sarvastivāda] actually did assert that existent causes create existent effects. Other schools maintained that existent effects are produced from causes that no longer exist, and so on.

Herbie said:

So instead of delivering a definition for "arising" or the different connotations of the term
"arising" which can be found in dictionaries he plays one of his silly games.

Malcolm wrote:

You are acquainted with dictionaries and semantics of 2nd century classical Sanskrit?
You are quite certain that Nāgārjuna is not writing for a milieu in which the nuances of the term "jati," arising, etc., are well known?

Herbie said:

Everybody knows that "arising" is a developmental process.

Malcolm wrote:

You are assuming a lot for "everyone", particularly since the context we are discussing is 2nd century India.

How is "arising" a developmental process? When does something make the transition from being a nonexistent to being an existent? How does that process come about? What are the components of that process?

Herbie said:

As a whole the verse is irrational and the question makes it even worse.

Malcolm wrote:

Since you refuse to give credit to the context in which Nāgārjuna's treatise was composed, the only one irrational here is you, much like Humpty Dumpty in Through the Looking Glass.

Herbie said:

His opening statements are just meant to confuse readers.

Malcolm wrote:

They obviously confuse you, but instead of taking the time to understand them, you react to them with bilious irrationality. It really appears that you have only a superficial acquaintance with the subject matter and are totally ill-equipped to carry out a reasoned discussion of it. You cannot even address a single point that in Nāgārjuna's writings other than claiming that this and that is irrational. You seem totally incapable of a rational analysis of Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

whatever is known to exist according to worldly convention, the Buddha states that exists. Whatever is known to not exist according to worldly convention, the Buddha states that does not exist.

This is not a position that Nāgārjuna is setting forth. He is merely reporting the four alternatives the Buddha provided in different contexts to different students for different reasons.

Sorry but you cannot explain away the irrationality of this linguistic expression.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not something which is meant to be taken literally. In other words, you think it means that Nāgārjuna is claiming the Buddha said that everything is simultaneously real, unreal, both and neither. If that is what he meant, I would agree with you that such a statement would be irrational gibberish.

Fortunately, there is plenty of evidence to show this is not what Nāgārjuna meant.

Buddhapalita explains that what is meant by this statement is that whatever is known to exist according to worldly convention, the Buddha states that exists. Whatever is known to not exist according to worldly convention, the Buddha states that does not exist.

Whatever is known to be true according to worldly convention, the Buddha states that is true. Whatever is known to be false according to worldly convention, the Buddha states that is false.

Whatever is stated to be true and false in worldly convention the Buddha states that is true and false. Buddhapalita gives the following example: two men who go into a temple have a dispute about the murals in the temple; one man wrongly claims that Vishnu holds a trident and Shiva holds a wheel. The other man correctly claims Shiva holds a trident and Vishnu holds a wheel. Thus in this case the Buddha in accordance with worldly convention will disagree with the former and agree with the latter.

And finally, as example of the last, there is one man outside who says to them both, you are neither right nor wrong, those are paintings, and so according to mundane convention, the claim of former man is not true and neither is the claim of the latter man. Both of their claims are false since Shiva and Vishnu are not present in the temple at all.

Buddhapalita continues by saying that the Buddha, who sees the emptiness of all things, can say "this is true; this is not true; this is both; this is neither" and so on in accordance with worldly conventions.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

MiphamFan said:

I wasn't aiming at you specifically Malcolm, just wanted to point out that DMT/ayahuasca isn't particularly intense either, at least not in my experience.

Malcolm wrote:

You just took a drug. It is not the same at all as a properly done ayahuasca ceremony with mestizo shamans in the Amazon, which involves fasting, special diet, etc.

You would have had more fun on acid. Or Peyote.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

smcj said:

Irrational because the laws of logic are not followed: identity, non-contradiction, exclusion of the middle

Au contraire.

Herbie said:

Aha ... and what about that?

xviii.8

Everything is real and not real,

Both real and not real,

Neither real nor not real.

The is the Lord Buddha's teaching.

Malcolm wrote:

Here, Nāgārjuna is merely reporting four different kinds of statements to Buddha made with regard to all phenomena. In one place the Buddha said they were real; in another place he said they were unreal; in still another he said they were both; and in a fourth place he said they were neither.

This is not a position that Nāgārjuna is setting forth. He is merely reporting the four alternatives the Buddha provided in different contexts to different students for different reasons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

[

What? That I said that his tetralemma is irrational? Well it is. If you prefer to call it rational then we do not share a convention as to the division rational vs irrational.

Malcolm wrote:

What is irrational about it, and which tetralemma do you mean?

Herbie said:

you can take any of his.

Irrational because the laws of logic are not followed: identity, non-contradiction, exclusion of the middle

Malcolm wrote:

This would only be true if the tetralemma were a position that Nāgārjuna holds, rather than a series of negations he uses.

For example, he says:

An existent does not arise from an existent;
an existent does not arise from a nonexistent;
a nonexistent does not arise from an existent;
a nonexistent does not arise from a nonexistent;
where can there be arising?

There is nothing irrational about these four negations — and they certainly are not a position.

So, thus far, you have claimed Nāgārjuna is irrational, but you certainly have not shown that this is so by taking a given statement of his apart and showing where it violates the principles you mention above. Until you make the effort, it is impossible to take you seriously.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

MiphamFan said:

I never tried LSD, but after trying pharmahuasca, honestly I was rather underwhelmed.

While on it I just had disorientated motor control and had some slight visual phenomena, but it's nothing mind-blowing, nothing that changed my universe or life or whatever.

It doesn't compare to meditation at all.

I think the youth of today have more than enough distractions leading them in different directions (games, internet, youtube videos, blogs, etc) that the risk of "a stubborn attachment to the nonplasticity of their mental continuum" is fairly minimal. There is a greater danger in being too distracted.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, not recommending anyone take entheogens, just saying it should not be demonized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 1:12 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The idea svasaṃvedana takes itself as an object is an problematic conclusion. There is not much evidence that this is what the term means in those systems that use it.

PD4U said:

That's what I said: it makes it circular (a sword that cuts itself) and it leads to an infinite regression (what part of the mind takes the part of the mind that takes itself as object, as object... ad infinitum)

Malcolm wrote:

I guess I am not making my self clear. Let me try again. The systems that use the term rang rig do not use it to mean that that mind takes itself as an object. They use it only to prove that a mind is inherently knowing — in other words, that a mind does not become knowing because it arises as a result of a sense organ meeting an object.

PD4U said:

To prove? It is to show it is not (dual) consciousness, but a primordial (non dual) awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, to prove. We are talking about Yogacara and Pramana here.

PD4U said:

It is not gross mind, but subtle mind. It is not mind, but nature mind. It is not cognitive but experiential. That's the point, as I see it.

Malcolm wrote:

You keep conflating rang rig (svasaṃvedana) with so sor rang gi rig pa'i ye shes (pratyatmyavedanañāna)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You don't have to believe me, but you might want to believe his wife — here is just one occasion.

https://books.google.com/books?id=ec8-HH-hxwkC&pg=PA419&lpg=PA419&dq=trungpa+LSD&source=bl&ots=Kkt4dP1JHU&sig=F1nNbsIEACnCa84_Z8UNXTnGinM&hl=en&sa=X&ved=0ahUKEwjK1dCrIcXJAhUEqx4KHe4eBXw4ChDoAQgrMAM#v=onepage&q=LSD&f=false

kirtu said:

And if you read that, you would see that Trungpa was trying to save Thomas Rich from his entrenched fixations.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think that was what prompted their little acid party.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

kirtu said:

All poison is also medicine for something.

Malcolm wrote:

LSD has no known toxicity level. However, overdose levels are considered to be in the 1000 to 7000 microgram amount, that is ten to seventy times the standard 100 microgram dosage. It is also completely nonaddictive.

Psilocybin has a very low toxicity rating. A one hundred and thirty pound person would have to eat 37 pounds of Psilocybe cubensis mushrooms for the dose to be fatal, i.e, about 6 grams. The effective dose of Psilocybin for such a person is 6 milligrams.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

[

What? That I said that his tetralemma is irrational? Well it is. If you prefer to call it rational then we do not share a convention as to the division rational vs irrational.

Malcolm wrote:

What is irrational about it, and which tetralemma do you mean?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 12:48 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

smcj said:

Whatever the relative potential spiritual merits there may be to psychedelics, there's nothing ambiguous about the effects of sustained exposure to crack and meth. It ends up only in one place. If you want to know what it's like to be demonically possessed, go ahead and get addicted.

Malcolm wrote:

Were we talking about cocaine and meth?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Trungpa did a lot of acid and frequently gave it to his students.

odysseus said:

I don't believe you, it's only an urban legend to dirtify him... lol

Malcolm wrote:

You don't have to believe me, but you might want to believe his wife — here is just one occasion.

https://books.google.com/books?id=ec8-HH-hxwkC&pg=PA419&lpg=PA419&dq=trungpa+LSD&source=bl&ots=Kkt4dP1JHU&sig=F1nNbsIEACnCa84_Z8UNXTnGinM&hl=en&sa=X&ved=0ahUKEwjK1dCrIcXJAhUEqx4KHe4eBXw4ChDoAQgrMAM#v=onepage&q=LSD&f=false

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

kirtu said:

Yes. I can't prove it but when HHPR told an audience the Nyingma legend of tobacco wherein a dying demoness vows to be reborn as substances in order to make war against Dharma and virtue, it made sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Tobacco was introduced to Tibet in the 17th century.

Tobacco is not a result of the menstrual blood of an evil demoness, it is nice story for religious propaganda purposes

It is a sacred plant to the First People in the Americas, all over the Americas. I personally do not use it, but I don't demonize it either. And in the US, I would put real native tobacco in a sang offering, no problem.

Me

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

kirtu said:

Obviously. But Americans and other westerners in particular seem to have a false narrative that drugs "will save them". In part this may be from Huxley or he may only have been documenting the tendency.

Malcolm wrote:

It cannot be denied that taking psychedelics have radically changed the course of people's lives, mostly for the better. There were studies being conducted on the whether or not LSD, etc., increased empathy or not. Unfortunately, those studies were shuttered. The fact is that I have known hundreds of people who have taken these kinds of drugs, many Buddhists in fact, and none of them reported any long term ill effects, and often they report long standing confirmations of their insights gained through use of psychedelics with their subsequent Buddhist practice. Virtually everyone I know in my generation who is a Buddhist began their spiritual journey through the Psychedelic movement. Also that is where I started. LSD, rock and roll, etc. I first dropped acid when I was 13. Never regretted it.

kirtu said:

It's his error but it can be a problem for the Dharma transmission to the west (he is not well known, BTW).

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt it. As far as I know, there is no LSD tantra.

That said, there have been people using psychedelics for spiritual purposes in all kinds of cultures all over the world for thousands of years. Is it Dharma? No. Is it spiritually invalid? No.

kirtu said:

When administered in a safe, controlled environment, there is nothing to fear....
Now you switch this to therapeutically controlled usage.

Malcolm wrote:

I mentioned this at the outset.

kirtu said:

Nonetheless as seeker242 above noted there is really no point for spiritual insight (the person I referred to above advocating LSD usage insists in fact that LSD usage promotes insight

Malcolm wrote:

There can be advantages for some people in terms of spiritual insight with use of psychedelics. For example, Garab Dorje mentions that for those who have a stubborn attachment to the nonplasticity of their mental continuums, it can be very useful to take psychedelic substances in order to break their attachment to the mind being something fixed and permanent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, December 6th, 2015 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

PD4U said:

Svasamvedana is often translated as "reflexive awareness" or "selfawareness", and -as you say- that awareness does not depend on an external object but takes itself as object. So it is a dual consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea svasamvedana takes itself as an object is a problematic conclusion. There is not much evidence that this is what the term means in those systems that use it.

Instead, the term is used to prove that consciousness is not inert. The Śrīguhyasamājālaṃkāra states:

Consciousness arises contrary to an insentient nature;

that whose nature is not insentient that alone is intrinsically knowing [rang rig].

PD4U said:

But the point is that "so so rang rig pa'i ye shes" is a non dual awareness and not a (dual) consciousness. If it would be a consciousness then "rang rig" would be circular (a sword that cuts itself) and lead to an infinite regression.

Malcolm wrote:

So sor rang gi rig pa simple means "known for oneself", that's all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: help please - what to expect from none Buddhist partners

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

The only way to have a comfortable, stable and satisfying relationship is to give up on the wish for your partner to make you happy and to focus on their happiness instead. The more you love them and try to make them happy, the happier you will be and your relationship will be more likely to last.

Malcolm wrote:

What if making them happier means giving up the Dharma?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Does the difference boil down to the dharmata being understood differently in Ch'an and Vajrayana/Dzogchen?

If so, how are their understandings different?

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

In sūtra there we only talk about dharmatā śūnyatā; in Dzogchen we also talk about dharmatā vidyā. In other words the mind is not just something that is empty, like a rock or stone. The reason there is a difference is because minds also have clarity in addition to emptiness. Mipham discusses this issue at length in his Original Mind, translated by Hopkins as " Fundamental Mind."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

kirtu said:

LSD experience can just be attached to and this will harm your practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Anything can be attached to...

kirtu said:

I know a person who actually acts as a teacher and advocates LSD drug use (he is in his late 60's/early 70's and he does identify with the former so-called Counterculture). He further grasps at spiritual experiences. However he firmly believes that people are incapable of going beyond mere attachment to materiality without LSD experience.

Malcolm wrote:

That is his problem and his error.

kirtu said:

There's a lot wrong here and there are apparently many people like him (one of my Zen/Seon teachers admitted to starting out like this).

So physically there may be little harm. However there are still physical dangers as people can apparently react in many different ways to these kinds of drugs.

Malcolm wrote:

When administered in a safe, controlled environment, there is nothing to fear. As I said, there is increasing evidence that psilocybin, for example, can help memory loss, PTSD, etc., by regenerating brain cells. I am not saying anyone should take these drugs, I am saying however, that there is no reason to be hysterical or judgmental about it. There are much worse things in life than LSD, like assault rifles.

kirtu said:

I trust Trungpa on this who says that taking LSD is "double samsara" (but from his description he meant to say LSD is samsara squared).

Malcolm wrote:

Trungpa did a lot of acid and frequently gave it to his students.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

The reason I brought that citation is to show that the difference between knowing and unknowing lies in the presence or absence of dual vision. Self-awareness is another matter.

Malcolm wrote:

The term svasaṃvedana does not mean "self-aware," it means that knowing is an intrinsic capacity for the mind to does not depend on an external object, in contradistinction to the Vaibhashika and Sautrantika contention that an instance of knowing depends on an object and a sense organ to arise.

With respect to the Yogacara school, they do indeed posit an ultimate consciousness — it is the meaning of line of Madhyantavibhaga, "The imagination of the unreal exists..." and so on, though I understand it is fashionable these days to try and rescue Yogacara from being hoisted on its own petard.

Astus said:

That would mean that they still maintain a real subject, contradicting themselves.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, that is the whole point.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:12 PM
Title: Re: Robert Thurman
Content:
dreambow said:
Listening to Robert Thurman, man can he talk! He was discussing Shankaracharya and Nagarjuna and basically said there's no real difference between Shankara's non dualism and Nagarjuna's teachings on sunyata 'emptiness, ' they are pretty much saying the same thing.

Malcolm wrote:
He can talk, but he is wrong...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:28 PM
Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?
Content:
Herbie said:
it is an irrational position.

Malcolm wrote:
The tetralemma is not a position, it is an analysis of positions [held by others].

Herbie said:
linguistically existent and not ultimately existent

Malcolm wrote:
Oh, so you are a follower of Tsongkhapa. Figures.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 9:05 AM
Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?
Content:
Herbie said:
Let me tell you about the rational tetralemma:

- 1) linguistically existent and ultimately existent
- 2) not linguistically existent and not ultimately existent
- 3) linguistically existent and not ultimately existent

4) not linguistically existent and ultimately existent

Now one of these options must be valid and more than one option cannot be valid.

Malcolm wrote:

You did not define what you mean by "linguistically existent" and "ultimately existent."
You also introduce yet another unsupported assertion, viz, "one of these options must be valid and more than one option cannot be valid."

Your assertion is that one of these options must be valid. So, which one are you choosing?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 9:00 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

smcj said:

But in any case Nagarjuna wasn't into that way of thinking. He arrives at his tetralemma through logic and language. The validity of both is accepted as a given.

Herbie said:

No. His tetralemma is sheer irrationality, the negation of logic.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is actually a systematic refutation of positions other people held. Some people hold a position of existence; others, non-existence; still others both; and still others, neither.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

This is funny. All traditionalists seek refuge in sense perception of the five (not six) senses (seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching) to base their exposition of conventional truths on. However they completely ignore their linguistic truths not based on sense perceptions of the five senses which clearly dominate their system of thought and therefore their linguistic system.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, a truth is a cognition. That's all. It is either veridical or non-veridical. A conventional truth is a common sense perception [one moon in the sky].

Linguistic truths, as you call them, are not what Madhyamaka is concerned with at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

yeah, demonstrable in writings that accept the mere linguistic truths as convention.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. You really do not understand Madhyamaka at all.

Herbie said:

My concern is intellectual honesty

Malcolm wrote:

Well, so far all you have been is dishonest, so I find it hard to believe you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

they hold that as truly existent

I don't see that accusation valid, at least not against Vasubandhu.

Malcolm wrote:

it is definitely valid

Astus said:

Dzogchen: "empty knowing dharmatā of the mind of the eight consciousness"

Yogacara: "empty intrinsically knowing pristine consciousness"

Both sound to me like a non-abiding mind.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the second is svasamvedana [rang rig] that is merely empty of subject and object, but truly exists -- standard Yogacara.

Astus said:

Also,

"What is the difference between ordinary wisdom, which arises from a mind endowed with subject/object grasping, and individually selfcognizant wisdom?"

Malcolm wrote:

This latter term "individually selfcognizant wisdom" is incorrectly translated. The term is so sor rang gi rig pa'i ye shes or pratyatmyavedanañāna.

There is an important citation in the Inlaid Jewels Tantra that clarifies the difference between these two:

Untainted vidyā is the kāya of pristine consciousness.

Since intrinsic knowing [rang rig, svasaṃvedana] is devoid of actual signs of awakening, it is not at all the pristine consciousness of vidyā [rig pa'i ye shes].

You should read this:

<http://blogs.dickinson.edu/buddhistethics/files/2010/04/kapstein001.pdf>

Might I suggest that if you are going to argue about Tibetan traditions, you do so on the basis of understanding Tibetan and the etymologies of Sanskrit terms in Tibetan?

One of the reasons you rarely see me in Zen or Chinese Buddhism discussions is that I have no expertise in those languages, and I really cannot check any translations I might be using.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

smcj said:

Animals believe is subjective "self" and objective "other" without language.

Herbie said:

First, to make claims about a species one does not belong to is by its nature extremely speculative.

Then, next, designators are not absolutely dependent on language because "imputation" stands for a psycho-mental event (designator) being imputed to another psycho-mental event.

Malcolm wrote:

You are not even in the same area as Nāgārjuna's concerns. At this point, your comments are off topic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

I know that in buddhist linguistic system the term "mind" usually is preferred. In science based system one often chooses "brain" instead. In contrast to "mind" "brain" is based on a visual sense impression independent of belief but only dependent on correct application of a term of conventional language. From the perspective of the two truths, both mind and brain do not exist through the power of their own characteristics but through the power of imputation.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would this be from the perspective of the two truths? What does ultimate truth [a veridical object of cognition] have to do with this?

Herbie said:

Everything I write is a linguistic truth and it can only become a conventional truth for you if you agree with the linguistic expression I am applying.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, this is what you do not understand about Madhyamaka. Madhyamaka is not about linguistic assignments. It is about shared perceptions which are then, only after the fact, given labels.

For example, we have human eyes, we see the same sets of colors because humans have evolved to see a certain range of light on the electromagnetic scale [we can regard this as self-evident].

My and your ability to see red, yellow and blue is not predicated on our having words for these colors before we see them. It is only after we see them, and come together, that we have together given them linguistic assignments. "Truths" are defined in Madhyamaka as perceptions, not linguistic designations.

"given percept", "the objects of deluded cognitions", "the percept" are your linguistic truths. I do not think that we share a convention as to these linguistic expressions. These are not mere "linguistic" truths -- these facts are demonstrable in Madhyamaka writings. For example, Nāgārjuna writes:

If a name and its meaning were not different,
the name "fire" would burn the mouth;

if they were different, nothing could be comprehended.

Here, Nāgārjuna is pointing out that so-called conventional truth is not merely dependent upon names, as he writes:

Without an object to be felt,
feeling would not exist,
therefore, it is without a self.

You maintain that object to be felt lacks a nature.

At this point, this conversation is like two old guys at the docks at sunset — one guy looks at the sunset, and says "this is amazing", the other guy looks at it and says. "I've seen better."

The conventional truth they share is the fact that they both see a sun going down, they share a perception. Their "linguistic truth" is their subjective opinion about the aesthetic quality of the sunset. However, it is a little worse than that. This conversation is actually like two guys seeing the same sun set, and one of the guys claiming there is no sun setting at all — and not because the sunset is produced by the rotation of the earth, rather than the sun rising and falling in the sky.

It is examples such as these which shows you have deeply misunderstood the meaning of Nāgārjuna.

You may be entitled to your own "linguistic truths", however mistaken they may be; but you are not entitled to your own facts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just that is, according to Mipham, "...the ultimate state of the sublime Dharma."

Astus said:

Seems to be no different from the Yogacara term citta-dharmata, that is actually the same as emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not the same as the Yogacara concept, they hold that as truly existent, albeit empty of subject and object, as Mipham says here in Liquid Gold:

The Cittamatrins deconstruct both subject and object in a mere empty intrinsically knowing pristine consciousness.

The difference is, as he says:

When the pairing of the dhātu and vidyā is deconstructed, there is no focal point upon which to grasp. Once it is understood that the final premise, "this is ultimate," is deconstructed in the state of inexpressible emptiness, one enters into the nondual pristine consciousness that all phenomena of the inseparable two truths are of the same taste.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

smcj said:

infinitely more complicated.

.

Malcolm wrote:

My life only became more complicated when I made the mistake of turning off, tuning out and dropping in. Once I saw the effect of that, I returned to my former irresponsible, albeit, much more stress-free, turned on, tuned in and dropped out existence [albeit sans acid, etc.]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

And what is the dharmata of the mind?

Malcolm wrote:

Glad you asked. According to Mipham in his Commentary On Liquid Gold:

Dharmatā is the self-originated pristine consciousness that is the ultimate state of the sublime Dharma. It is not a conclusion arrived at by mental analysis and intellectual examination because such a conclusion is something arrived at and defined intellectually.

In Original Mind, he says:

[T]he unconditioned self-originated wisdom of the original empty knowing dharmatā of the mind of the eight consciousness is [8/a] the mind of luminosity [‘od gsal ba’i sems] that is to be introduced.

Just that is, according to Mipham, "...the ultimate state of the sublime Dharma."

Astus said:

How is that any different from simply calling it "realising emptiness"?

Malcolm wrote:

Realizing emptiness isn't sufficient for buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

I know that in buddhist linguistic system the term "mind" usually is preferred. In science based system one often chooses "brain" instead. in contrast to "mind" "brain" is based on a visual sense impression independent of belief but only dependent on correct application of a term of conventional language. From the perspective of the two truths, both mind and brain do not exist through the power of their own characteristics but through the power of imputation.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would this be from the perspective of the two truths? What does ultimate truth [a veridical object of cognition] have to do with this?

Herbie said:

Well taking into consideration the development of a human person: being born, learning language, cognitive capacities arising dependent of this I think the primacy can make sense.

Malcolm wrote:

Relative truths [the objects of deluded cognitions] are not linguistic, they do not arise from names. Names are given subsequent to the arising of a given percept. The percept is not itself derived from a name.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there is:

In the first statement, you claim that objects are external to the brain;

in the second statement, you claim that objects are produced by linguistic signs or sounds. Thus, you directly contradict yourself.

Herbie said:

No, in the first statement I am saying that projected objects which are objects known that are immediate direct products of the brain do not enter the brain because they cannot.

Malcolm wrote:

That may be what you meant to say on reflection, but that is not what you actually said.

Herbie said:

And in the second statement I am naming causes for the production of objects known by the brain which are linguistic signs or sounds.

Malcolm wrote:

Which causes an infinite regress because linguistic signs and sounds are just objects known by whatever it is you believe knows objects.

That may be unsupported for a person completely denying today's conventional reality.

No, it is unsupported because you assume that it is self-evident. Thomas Nagel would have a field day with you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I am thinking that he is trying to say that the sum total of our experience exists only in the brain.

Herbie said:

I am saying that what is known is the direct product of the brain.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is another unsupported assertion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This:

Herbie said:

the objects do not enter the brain to be known by it but are its immediate direct products. With that nothing is said about the indirect causes.

Malcolm wrote:

Contradicts this

Herbie said:

Objects are products of the brain upon seeing linguistic signs or hearing linguistic sounds. So "essential nature" has to be sought in these objects as products of the brain not in their projections. Seeking "essential nature" in the projected objects nothing will be found.

you may delve into neuro science but actually it is just a matter of common sense of an educated person of present times to see that the immediate, direct cause of all phenomena known is the brain.

No there is no contradiction.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you trying to say that the cause of knowing phenomena is the brain?

Herbie said:

i am saying that phenomena known are products of the brain.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there is:

In the first statement, you claim that objects are external to the brain; in the second statement, you claim that objects are produced by linguistic signs or sounds. Thus, you directly contradict yourself.

In the third statement, you make claim that phenomena that are known are products of the brain, another unsupported assertion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This:

Herbie said:

the objects do not enter the brain to be known by it but are its immediate direct products. With that nothing is said about the indirect causes.

Malcolm wrote:

Contradicts this

Herbie said:

Objects are products of the brain upon seeing linguistic signs or hearing linguistic sounds. So "essential nature" has to be sought in these objects as products of the brain not in their projections. Seeking "essential nature" in the projected objects nothing will be found.

you may delve into neuro science but actually it is just a matter of common sense of an educated person of present times to see that the immediate, direct cause of all phenomena known is the brain.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you trying to say that the cause of knowing phenomena is the brain?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Objects are products of the brain upon seeing linguistic signs or hearing linguistic sounds.

Malcolm wrote:

This is an unsupported assertion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

smcj said:

Throughout history are there not fully realized Dzogchen masters that, from that perspective, reaffirm the appropriateness of the 9 yana system?

Malcolm wrote:

No one said it was inappropriate, it just does not apply to Sarma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What else is to be realized? Vidyā.

Astus said:

What more does vidya include?

Apparently not, otherwise, Mipham would not have taken it to task.

I am not familiar with Mipham's intellectual-cultural context, where such terminology was a problem, but I can imagine such a situation. Still, it doesn't look like that everyone in Tibetan Buddhism stopped using it.

Malcolm wrote:

Mipham writes in his Original Mind:

Once one has realized the meaning of the Great Perfection (the conclusion of the Dharma of the eight vehicles that make mind into the path) which makes pristine consciousness into the path, it is explained that buddhahood will not be attained until the vidyā of the Great Perfection, self-originated pristine consciousness, is realized. In other words, buddhahood does not come about solely from realizing emptiness, the dharmatā of emptiness, buddhahood requires realizing vidyā, the dharmatā of the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Look, if I say that this is my view who except myself could say so? Merely saying so supports that this is my view.

Malcolm wrote:

Your view is a claim about someone else's work [Nāgārjuna] and you have made no effort to support it. This renders your claim irrational, i.e., devoid of reason.

Herbie said:

No my view is my view. The only thing I claim is that my view is my view. you may call it whatever you like but that doesn't change my view.

Malcolm wrote:

Your view, such as you call it, is seated in irrationality since you refuse to support it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Really? Than please tell us what is to be realized.

Astus said:

The emptiness of self and phenomena, what else?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not all that is to be realized. This point of view is very heavily criticized in Dzogchen. What else is to be realized? Vidyā.

Astus said:

That is exactly what "union" means, tying two things together, for example, the union of a man and a woman.

For educational purposes it is fine to talk of emptiness, appearances and their unity. Then eventually it becomes clear that all three terms are conventional expressions.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently not, otherwise, Mipham would not have taken it to task.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Look, if I say that this is my view who except myself could say so? Merely saying so supports that this is my view.

Malcolm wrote:

Your view is a claim about someone else's work [Nāgārjuna] and you have made no effort to support it. This renders your claim irrational, i.e., devoid of reason.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As to Knotty Veneer's contention that there is a link between schizophrenia and taking LSD, this is a problematic conclusion because no solid research has been done in this area given that LSD research was banned 50 years ago, and we understand the the brain and brain chemistry much better now, a full half century later.

The latest [2013] population study on psychedelics concludes:

We did not find use of psychedelics to be an independent risk factor for mental health problems.

<http://journals.plos.org/plosone/article?id=10.1371/journal.pone.0063972>

Knotty Veneer said:

Well I have anecdotal evidence from my own acquaintances whose mental health has been negatively impacted by LSD use. I'd say - even if the jury's out - your mental health is too precious to risk losing for the thrills of a brief trip. Too risky for too little benefit.

Malcolm wrote:

The evidence shows that people who feel they have had negative impacts from LSD in terms of their mental health had mental health issues to begin with. The reality is that there is no evidence that LSD use makes people go crazy or causes schizophrenia. I am not saying anyone should use psychedelics; the choice to do so or not should be based on fact and reason, not anecdote.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Who are you to say what I can write here?

Malcolm wrote:

Malcolm

Herbie said:

Hi Malcolm

my user name is Herbie and my view is that Nāgārjuna's linguistic games do not uncover anything but may indicate to a reader of his verses that he, the reader or his brain, is inappropriately processing linguistic expressions.

Malcolm wrote:

You did not support this view at all, therefore, it is a purely irrational claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus the view in Dzogchen is the direct perception of pristine consciousness introduced by the guru, it is not a result of intellectual analysis.

Astus said:

That's at best a difference in method, of how to relinquish attachment, but not in what is realised.

Malcolm wrote:

Really? Than please tell us what is to be realized.

Astus said:

Or it is about criticising those who mistake emptiness for a reified concept of emptiness, a position already rejected by Nagarjuna and his followers.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not that.

Astus said:

Tying together would need two things to be tied together.

Malcolm wrote:

That is exactly what "union" means, tying two things together, for example, the union of a man and a woman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Who are you to censor me?

Malcolm wrote:

No one is censoring you. I am pointing out however it you are being very irrational by making unsupported claims.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Who are you to say what I can write here?

Malcolm wrote:
Malcolm

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:52 AM
Title: Re: LSD
Content:
DGA said:

Our friends in Silicon Valley will do anything to get a leg up. It's a highly competitive environment. I'd figure that DMT would be a more appealing substance there than LSD, given that the user can get in and out in half the time it takes to endure a guest lecture on "mindfulness" at the Google campus.

Malcolm wrote:
It's too incapacitating.

DGA said:
Even when smoked?

Malcolm wrote:
Yup. It gives you a ten minute buzz from which you come down rapidly; but it is a really, really intense high, much more intense than acid.

If you take ayahuasca, this trip lasts much longer [note: I have not done ayahuasca].

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:46 AM
Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?
Content:

Herbie said:
No it is based on rational analysis of the linguistic expressions he uses in the context of linguistic conventions.

Malcolm wrote:
As long as you continue to make this claim without providing support, it is an irrational claim. Just because this is in the "Open Dharma" cesspit, it does not mean you can make unsupported claims.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

DGA said:

Now, do discussions like this belong on a Buddhist board? I leave that to the current moderating team to consider. The argument against is that it may be construed to encourage illegal activity (remember that this is an international board, and drugs that may have tacit acceptance here may be cut-your-hands-off illegal for some of our participants). Even in the first world. Are you familiar with the drug laws in Japan, for instance? yeowza... they thought of all that tentacle stuff just on sake.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they do, since there indeed classic Buddhist texts which discuss the use of hallucinogens and their effects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

DGA said:

Our friends in Silicon Valley will do anything to get a leg up. It's a highly competitive environment. I'd figure that DMT would be a more appealing substance there than LSD, given that the user can get in and out in half the time it takes to endure a guest lecture on "mindfulness" at the Google campus.

Malcolm wrote:

It's too incapacitating.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

Well that depends on the system of thought you are applying. your system is not everybody else's system so when you say "real" that may not be "real" in another one's understanding.

Bakmoon said:

I'm not just talking about philosophical systems, but about the underlying cognitive assumption of reality that underlies human mental processes. When I hold my hand out in front of my face, it looks to me like there is a real hand there. This isn't a philosophical position I've cooked up for myself, but rather is an innate human bias. It is this underlying error which Nagarjuna refutes.

Herbie said:

you are applying a system of linguistic expressions which is based on a system of thought. if you deny the relativity of your linguistic expressions then you are applying an essentialist system of thought.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just the Humpty Dumpty argument:

'When I use a word,' Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, 'it means just what I choose it to mean — neither more nor less.'

'The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make words mean so many different things.'

'The question is,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'which is to be master — that's all.'

Alice was too much puzzled to say anything; so after a minute Humpty Dumpty began again. 'They've a temper, some of them — particularly verbs: they're the proudest — adjectives you can do anything with, but not verbs — however, I can manage the whole lot of them! Impenetrability! That's what I say!'

'Would you tell me please,' said Alice, 'what that means?'

'Now you talk like a reasonable child,' said Humpty Dumpty, looking very much pleased. 'I meant by "impenetrability" that we've had enough of that subject, and it would be just as well if you'd mention what you mean to do next, as I suppose you don't mean to stop here all the rest of your life.'

'That's a great deal to make one word mean,' Alice said in a thoughtful tone.

'When I make a word do a lot of work like that,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'I always pay it extra.'

'Oh!' said Alice. She was too much puzzled to make any other remark.

'Ah, you should see 'em come round me of a Saturday night,' Humpty Dumpty went on, wagging his head gravely from side to side, 'for to get their wages, you know.'

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

Terms like appearance and emptiness are meant for guidance...

Malcolm wrote:

What single entity ties them together? You still did not answer the question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

What higher view can be presented than not being bound by any view? It would be falling back to clinging to views.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Mipham addresses this. One, the problem is what is meant by "view." In the Commentary On Liquid Gold he states:

Though all the objects of analysis of other kinds of analysis are doors for getting near pristine conciseness, pristine consciousness cannot be seen with them in and of themselves. All the activity of intellectual analysis obscures the pristine consciousness that is beyond thought by shackling it in the web of mind, just as a caterpillar spins its own cocoon.

He continues later by stating:

In the same way, when examined from the perspective of the emptiness that is free from all proliferation of the four extremes that is explained in the Perfection Vehicle, since there are no phenomena not pervaded by that emptiness, there indeed is a good argument that confirms that if there is a view better than that, that view would become a proliferation.

However, when examined from the perspective of realizing the dhātu (the object to be realized), or the method (great bliss), the view of mantra is very superior because the mind is very near the reality of the object [the dharmadhātu].

Why is the mind very near the reality of the object? After the first statement I presented above, Mipham claims:

Here [in the Great Perfection], since the pristine consciousness that exists within oneself is immediately apprehended just as it is with the intimate instruction of the critical point of the introduction, it becomes intrinsically clear to oneself without the need to be involved in a huge net of conceptual fabrications. That being so, once the result of all progress is attained, there is no rationale in hoping for another vehicle. Thus the view in Dzogchen is the direct perception of pristine consciousness introduced by the guru, it is not a result of intellectual analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

smcj said:

Apparently too there is a new practice of micro dosing with LSD [10 micrograms] to enhance creativity.

They tried that at Milbrook back in the day too, but then again it was just one of many "experiments" they tried on themselves. The lab rats had already been contaminated by other experiments.

Malcolm wrote:

It has been revived in Silicon Valley.

<http://www.rollingstone.com/culture/features/how-ld-microdosing-became-the-hot-new-business-trip-20151120>

Even though it is has been decades since the last time I tripped, I can definitely say I turned on, tuned in, and dropped out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

smcj said:

Nay.

This is a public forum with some underage and a certain percentage of unstable members. We don't want anybody harmed or getting sued.

Malcolm wrote:

So is a library. I read Electric Kool-aid Acid Test when I was eleven, along with Teachings of Don Juan. I also did more than my fair share of acid, mushrooms, and so on, before meeting the Dharma.

As to Knotty Veneer's contention that there is a link between schizophrenia and taking LSD, this is a problematic conclusion because no solid research has been done in this area given that LSD research was banned 50 years ago, and we understand the the brain and brain chemistry much better now, a full half century later.

The latest [2013] population study on psychedelics concludes:

We did not find use of psychedelics to be an independent risk factor for mental health problems.

<http://journals.plos.org/plosone/article?id=10.1371/journal.pone.0063972>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, December 5th, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: LSD

Content:

Queequeg said:
Yay or nay and why?

Malcolm wrote:
The precept police will be all NAY! NAY! NAY! NAY!

The hippy squad will be all YAY! YAY! YAY!

Those with more level heads will say LSD is not going to help your practice at all, so there is not much point; but, taken safely, wont hurt your practice at all, so there is not much reason to object.

That being said, there is significant evidence that Shrooms in low doses has relieves PTSD, and may even encourage regeneration of neurons. Apparently too there is a new practice of micro dosing with LSD [10 micrograms] to enhance creativity.

So, there are no rules but those we impose upon ourselves.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 11:44 PM
Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion
Content:

MiphamFan said:
Malcolm, so do you now accept the 9-yana characterization of different views for different yantras?

Malcolm wrote:
Depends on the context. The main difference between the three yāna system of gsar ma and the nine yāna system of snying ma has to do with the three inner tantras. I am not convinced it is valid to analyze the mother and nondual tantras from the perspective of the nine yāna system.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 11:14 PM
Title: Re: DW and Political Bias
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
To see how very little US Politics has changed [depressingly so] in the past 50 years, watch this documentary, Best of Enemies. Trailer:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s = document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); }
```

<https://phpbbex.com/> [video]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

Yes, both good and bad dharmas are empty, kleshas are bodhi, and samsara is nirvana. That is not the same as refuting/denying the conventional existence of wholesome and unwholesome for deluded beings, as the driving forces behind the various forms of birth, as stated in the referenced aspiration prayer for instance. I did not say that Dzogchen uses specific antidotes, just that it recognises the function of various mental inclinations.

Malcolm wrote:

Your statement was:

Dzogchen maintains the distinction between wholesome and unwholesome, otherwise it'd be in denial in a way they accuse Hashang's doctrine. It's just that in terms of view one realises that all phenomena are empty, thus no need to grasp or reject. Same is taught in Theravada with the contemplation on the three characteristics.

You used this phrase in order to somehow make Theravada and other Hinayāna paths compatible with Dzogchen. It is not that they are incompatible, per se, but they don't reach the point of view of Dzogchen teachings. They are incomplete, from a Dzogchen point of view.

Second, who are the "they" making accusations. What denial are you claiming would be a result if Dzogchen does not make this distinction?

Astus said:

We were on your point about union of appearance and emptiness.

And they are so, nobody claimed otherwise. What you seemed to object against was summing up the ultimate view as the two kinds of selflessness, I guess because it may be mistaken for some annihilationist extreme, while Dzogchen likes to equally emphasise awareness and emptiness as the inseparable nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

In point of fact, Ju Mipham, since you invoked him, is not comfortable with the idea that there is a "union" or "nonduality" of appearance and emptiness, this is why he questions the idea.

The ultimate view of Dzogchen is not merely the two kinds of selflessness. It goes beyond that. Mipham's perspective, again, since you brought him up, is that the view of sūtra does not approach the view of mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

i don't agree that Nāgārjuna's linguistic games uncovers anything but the readers inappropriate processing of language.

Malcolm wrote:

To return to this statement: this statement, without any support, is by itself an irrational claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

No. I think that my understandig is common if not inflicted by irrational views.

Malcolm wrote:

Your understanding itself is beset with an irrational view since you are merely making unsupported assertions without providing any serious analysis to bolster your claim. It amounts to trolling, really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

All the big names in DC say folks should purify negatives and accumulate virtues. This is that view conduct thing.

Malcolm wrote:

While there is certainly a normative drive in the Nyingma school, The Mind Mirror of Samantabhadra states:

Do not engage in the root of conditioned virtue; if one engages in the root of conditioned virtue, it will perish.

As for whether or not one should engage in virtues or misdeeds, it is said that while there is no imperative to engage in virtue, there is also no reason to engage in misdeeds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

So says everyone else in Buddhism. Skilful and unskilful acts bring about karmic results within samsara, and I see no denial of that in Dzogchen either, since it does talk about the lower and higher realms.

Malcolm wrote:

The demonstration of the freedom of vidyā from virtue and non-virtue: “Freedom from virtuous and non-virtuous actions” means the yogin who perceives his own vidyā. Since this vidyā is connected with the oral instructions of a Guru, in reality, even a paṇḍita learned in the tripitika will not come into contact with even an iota [of this vidyā] if it is not demonstrated. Therefore, it is called “relying upon the methods of secret mantra.” If demonstrated, it can even be seen by a poor cowherd. Therefore, it is “without good and bad karma”. If it is not practiced, not even Vajrasattva will be liberated. Therefore, “familiarity with the intimate instruction meets its measure”. Having practiced, even one who has committed the five limitless deeds will be liberated in this life. Therefore, it is called “unaffected by the benefit or harm of good and bad actions”.

When vidyā is seen, since that alone is buddhahood and nothing else, one who nominally designates buddhahood is deluded. When vidyā is practiced, since hells do not exist, the one who designates hells has been taken by Māra. When vidyā reaches its full measure, it is shown that neither buddhas nor hell beings were ever established.

Therefore, it is shown that there is not the slightest difference between Buddha Samantabhadra and the King of Hell, Dharmarāja.

-- Vimalamitra

Astus said:

You have not eliminated the reification of oneness and manyness, that is the point of the question.

Are we still on the subject of selflessness?

Malcolm wrote:

We were on your point about union of appearance and emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

as the Soaring Great Garuda states:

Butchering, prostitution, the five uninterrupted deeds, immoral behavior and that avoided by the world, are totally perfect, the nectar of Dharma —

there is nothing other than great bliss.

Astus said:

It clearly says they are immoral behaviour. So there is awareness of a difference between good and bad.

Malcolm wrote:

Your contention was that:

Dzogchen maintains the distinction between wholesome and unwholesome...

But clearly it does not.

Astus said:

Still it maintains that for the deluded beings of the world those are unwholesome activities.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dzogchen point of view is that delusion is just delusion, and there is no liberation through engaging in deluded virtue, let alone avoiding deluded nonvirtue.

Astus said:

The question assumes that appearances and emptiness are two and need holding together. I do not hold such an assumption.

Malcolm wrote:

You have not eliminated the reification of oneness and manyness, that is the point of the question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

But, as I said before, the teachings do not say that within samsara there are no good and bad, it's just that for a dzogchenpa the solution to that is the ultimate approach of neither grasping nor rejecting.

Malcolm wrote:

You said:

Dzogchen maintains the distinction between wholesome and unwholesome...

As I said, Dzogchen does not maintain a distinction between the wholesome and unwholesome, as the Soaring Great Garuda states:

Butchering, prostitution, the five uninterrupted deeds, immoral behavior and that avoided by the world,
are totally perfect, the nectar of Dharma —

there is nothing other than great bliss.

Astus said:

I used the word unity, as in "one" and "single". There is no selflessness or emptiness as a thing or being anywhere, it's just how appearances are. Otherwise it would be assuming a self outside the aggregates, or taking the aggregates as one thing and emptiness another.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup, but you did not answer Mipham's question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But I have no investment in whether you understand Nāgārjuna properly or not, so I will leave it here.

Herbie said:

No problem since I understand and that's why I have done away with Nāgārjuna.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you evince no understanding of Nāgārjuna at all through your posts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but where is anything defined as wholesome or unwholesome? Something to be accepted as opposed to something to be rejected?

Astus said:

The text goes on about the five poisons and how they're remedied by recognising the natural state. It also mentions the six realms here and there. Since it recognises the various types of births, as they depend on good and bad inclinations, it includes the system of the wholesome and unwholesome states. Of course, it is not really a text to get into the details of karma, but it is obviously presupposed.

Malcolm wrote:

The text says that there is a single basis, two paths and two results. It does not go into an analysis of accepting conditioned good things and rejecting conditioned bad things. It merely says that the difference between affliction and wisdom is vidyā and avidyā. It describes the state of samsara, but it does not recommend some practice of accepting and rejecting wholesome and unwholesome things. From the same text, my translation:

[M]ay all the sentient beings with clinging of desire attain the pristine consciousness that realizes everything, having mastered their own vidyā through relaxing awareness into its own pristine state, without externally giving up the torment of desire,
without internally adopting the clinging of desire.

Astus said:

The quote from Anyen Rinpoche talks about the unity of emptiness and appearances as the correct view, and not to take them separately. I see no contradiction between the two quotes.

Malcolm wrote:

In the Commentary on Liquid Gold, Ju Mipham asks the question:

Also, in terms of the claim, “appearance and emptiness are nondual,” what is the single identity holding both appearance and emptiness together as one thing?

One can say that appearances and emptiness are 'du bral med, that is, they cannot be put together ['du] or separated [bral], in other words, they are whole and indivisible, but to say they are a union, well, that involves a whole other set of problems as Ju Mipham points out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, December 4th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Theravadin looking for a bit of suggestion

Content:

Astus said:

"It is the very state of unawareness, which is the cause of delusion. In that state you suddenly lose consciousness, and from that unclear state fear comes into being. From that arises clinging to self and clinging to other as enemy. This habitual tendency gradually grows, and from this a progressive entry into samsara occurs. Next, the five poisons of the passions develop, and the karma of these five poisons is unceasing."
(http://www.vajrayana.org/media/files/files/d74e3a90/Kunzang_Monlam_letter_format.pdf)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but where is anything defined as wholesome or unwholesome? Something to be accepted as opposed to something to be rejected? As the Tantra of Buddhahood as an Intrinsic Attribute states:

Again, Guhyapati said, “Oh Buddha Great Mass of Light, please teach the three things unnecessary for buddhahood.”

The reply: “Guhyapati, listen! Since appearances automatically reversed, there is no need to purify bad karma and negative traces. Since pristine consciousness returns to its hidden nest, there is no need for deliberate meditation. Since there is no birth or death in one's vidyā, there is no need to avoid the suffering of samsara.

Astus said:

"Mipham Rinpoche tells us that we should not understand what appears and what is empty in the way that we understand light and darkness. The proper way for us to understand them is as fire and warmth. In this way, we become skillful at understanding emptiness and dependent arising, dependent arising and emptiness. There is no more profound understanding of the view of Dzogchen than this."

(Anyen Rinpoche: Journey to Certainty, p 134-135)

Malcolm wrote:

[T]he emptiness arrived at through the power of analysis does not rise above a nonaffirming negation, it does not become the view of Mantra...Someone who maintains that emptiness is good and maintains that existence is bad places great importance on the nonaffirming negation. The Bhagavan said that it is better to abide in a view of the personality complex the size of a mountain. The view of the nonexistence of the personality complex is wrong.

Commentary on Liquid Gold by Ju Mipham.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Wholesome and Unwholesome in Dzogchen

Content:

Astus said:

Dzogchen maintains the distinction between wholesome and unwholesome...

Malcolm wrote:

Citation please, from an original Dzogchen text.

Astus said:

Rigpa is the knowing of reality, and such knowledge is the goal of Theravada as well. Assuming a self (an absolute) beyond the five aggregates is denied not only in Theravada but in Mahayana as well. There is also no disagreement in that it's not the skandhas themselves that are the problem but the attachment to them based on ignorance. So once reality is seen (no self inside, outside or in between the aggregates), there is no clinging, and without clinging there is liberation. Although that doesn't mean that there is no difference in terminology and in some methods.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think Dzogchen can be summed up by the two kinds of selflessness [persons and phenomena], you have not understood Dzogchen at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land Buddhism and the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Queequeg said:

In other words, there must be some fundamental truth reconciling all the various teachings attributed to the Buddha; that all of the teachings come from a single source, with a single aim - and so essentially being the same teaching, are differentiated only by the exigencies of the circumstances of particular beings.

Malcolm wrote:

It can't be found in any book, it can only be found in realization.

Queequeg said:

A little vague there...

"It" being what? "some fundamental truth"?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

i don't agree that Nāgārjuna's linguistic games uncovers anything but the readers inappropriate processing of language. you may draw your conclusions and impute these to him but these are you conclusions but they may be correct nevertheless ... or wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not my imputation, they are what he actually says in more than one place. But I have no investment in whether you understand Nāgārjuna properly or not, so I will leave it here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, December 3rd, 2015 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Can objects attain enlightenment?

Content:

Matt J said:

This quote makes me think that Padmasambhava is advocating a monism of consciousness, like Advaita. For one, he says the sign is that the body disappears into pristine consciousness. The other is that non-dual means "sameness." But I would think this is not the case?

Malcolm wrote:

[T]he insentient and sentient both appear, but don't believe it...As such, the sign of non-duality is [the body] disappearing into pristine consciousness without any effluents because the critical point of the non-duality or sameness of the insentient and the sentient was understood according to the Guru's intimate instruction.

— Guru Padmasambhava from the Ḍākinī's Heart Essence

Yes, but that is not correct. Pristine consciousness [ye shes] cannot be monadic because out of it a diversity appears.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

He indicated inappropriate processing of language. that's it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not just it. What he exposes is the essentialism that causes people to misunderstand the meaning of "arising from conditions."

Herbie said:

I see no contradiction to what I said. It is just about inappropriate or appropriate processing of language as signs and sounds which are free from meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. This misunderstanding may be expressed in language, but the misunderstanding itself is not linguistic, it is cognitive. Nāgārjuna's critique of language uncovers the cognitive errors which come when one's view is bound up in metaphysical assumptions about the existence or nonexistence of putative entities. It is for this reason that all his examples are about error-inducing perceptions such as illusions, mirages, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: do you need empowerment to practice vajrayana?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

why do we see so much objection on dharmawheel to simply doing it the old fashion way-- that is finding a good buddhist teacher and following their instructions start to finish?

Malcolm wrote:

We don't.

Fortyeightvows said:

maybe it is better to learn mahayana from a good teacher then to learn dzogchen/tantra, etc on your own

Malcolm wrote:

It is not possible to practice Dzogchen or the two stages without a guru. It is also not really possible to practice Mahāyāna without a teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

It is. And in the first chapter of the Immeasurable Meanings Sutra—which, of course, is considered a kind of preamble to the Lotus Sutra—this is described in a listing of the Buddha's attributes.

PorkChop said:

Just when I thought I was done buying books, I just realized that I have no copy of a sutra which actually lists those marks, even though I have a few that stress trying to visualize those marks (though I may not spend too much time on the horse weiner)... Thanks for the heads up.

Malcolm wrote:

There is not much point in doing that, as the Vajracchedika sūtra points out, the tathāgata cannot be known from signs and marks,

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land Buddhism and the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Queequeg said:

In other words, there must be some fundamental truth reconciling all the various teachings attributed to the Buddha; that all of the teachings come from a single source, with a single aim - and so essentially being the same teaching, are differentiated only by the exigencies of the circumstances of particular beings.

Malcolm wrote:

It can't be found in any book, it can only be found in realization.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

garudha said:

Rather than thinking "Men are made from blue modelling-clay (and have male bodies) & Women are made from pink modelling-clay (and have female bodies)"...

I think it might be helpful to imagine that there is only one colour of modelling-clay and this clay is shaped into the appropriate form.

Therefore; I'm suggesting that only the nirmanakaya appears to be Male or Female but the dharmakaya and sambhogakaya are asexual.

Malcolm wrote:

Sambhogakāyas also have gendered appearances.

garudha said:

Okay, So would I be correct in thinking that the Vimalakirti Sutra explains a sambhogakaya of one gender appearing as a nirmanakaya of the other gender ?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a parody of Hinayāna attitudes about women's potential to awaken. There is a doctrine that in order to become a Buddha, one first must be born with a penis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, December 2nd, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Can objects attain enlightenment?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[T]he insentient and sentient both appear, but don't believe it...As such, the sign of non-duality is [the body] disappearing into pristine consciousness without any effluents because the critical point of the non-duality or sameness of the insentient and the sentient was understood according to the Guru's intimate instruction.

— Guru Padmasambhava from the Ḍākinī's Heart Essence

dzogchungpa said:

Can you dumb that down a bit?

Malcolm wrote:

It means simply that the appearance of the insentient and the sentient is a delusion, and that in reality there is no such distinction at all. This is why I replied to Rita's question, "I've read some references to insentient life being enlightened. What does this mean?" with "Nothing." From a Dzogchen point of view it is meaningless to say that the insentient, living or otherwise, becomes enlightened since the categories of insentient/sentient are themselves predicated on a dualistic error and vanish in the state of buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

garudha said:

Rather than thinking "Men are made from blue modelling-clay (and have male bodies) & Women are made from pink modelling-clay (and have female bodies)"...

I think it might be helpful to imagine that there is only one colour of modelling-clay and this clay is shaped into the appropriate form.

Therefore; I'm suggesting that only the nirmanakaya appears to be Male or Female but the dharmakaya and sambhogakaya are asexual.

Malcolm wrote:

Sambhogakāyas also have gendered appearances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Can objects attain enlightenment?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[T]he insentient and sentient both appear, but don't believe it...As such, the sign of non-duality is [the body] disappearing into pristine consciousness without any effluents because the critical point of the non-duality or sameness of the insentient and the sentient was understood according to the Guru's intimate instruction.

—— Guru Padmasambhava from the Ḍākinī's Heart Essence

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen and Time

Content:

steve_bakr said:

If you don't mind, I would like to state my understanding of time, and have someone comment on that, affirming or correcting my understanding.

Our conventional experience of time is that neither the past nor the future exist.

Similarly, the present cannot be located, because as soon as we try, it is already gone.

So, how does this square with intrinsic awareness in the "present moment"--or the here and now?

Malcolm wrote:

It does not -- the fourth time is beyond the three times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 8:57 AM

Title: Re: Can objects attain enlightenment?

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

I've read some references to insentient life being enlightened. What does this mean?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

rory said:

You are either flip or ignorant, neither of which bodes well for the discussion. I have to run to class so I can't go into this famous topic more but great Ch'an master Ta-hui and celebrated Dogen used the example of the Naga girl to show women's ability to become Buddha's among many others. For those with an interest I suggest you put Naga girl buddha into "Google Books" and find out more.

gassho

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

We have been over this before. There is no doubt that the message of the Lotus Sutra is that women can become Buddhas. Nevertheless, the Nāga princess changes her gender to male, and then proceeds to Buddhahood. She does not attain Buddhahood in a female form:

At that time the members of the assembly all saw the dragon girl in the space of an instant change into a man and carry out all the practices of a bodhisattva, immediately proceeding to the Spotless World of the south, taking a seat on a jeweled lotus, and attaining impartial and correct enlightenment. With the thirty-two features and the eighty characteristics, he expounded the wonderful Law for all living beings everywhere in the ten directions.

<http://nichiren.info/buddhism/lotussutra/text/chap12.html>

Then the assembly there all saw the daughter of the nāga king instantly transform into a man, perfect the bodhisattva practices, go to the vimalā world in the south, sit on a jeweled lotus flower, and attain highest, complete enlightenment, become endowed with the thirty-two marks and eighty excellent characteristics, and expound the True Dharma universally for the sake of all sentient beings in the ten directions.

https://web.archive.org/web/20150521183528/http://www.bdkamerica.org/digital/dBET_T0262_LotusSutra_2007.pdf

As I said, people clearly don't read very carefully.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, December 1st, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

odysseus said:

No, enlightenment is not about adapting to the circumstances all the time - enlightenment is about taking a stand, that's why Buddha was male and not a female "due to sexist dominated society". It's not his fault, it just couldn't be any other way in his days.

Malcolm wrote:

That is pretty much the definition of adapting to circumstances...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 1:10 PM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Some make a big deal out of the dragon king's daughter becoming a Buddha in the Lotus Sutra. Please forgive me if I'm wrong, but doesn't she become a man in the process?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, she transforms her gender, much to the astonishment of the retinue.

Serenity509 said:

If so, why is it used as evidence that women can become Buddhas, if she's actually becoming a man?

Malcolm wrote:

Because people don't read carefully.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 12:36 PM

Title: Re: important buddhist text may have been authored by a woma

Content:

pael said:

How? Could you say, please. I'm curious.

Malcolm wrote:

All people suffer from the three poisons, how that manifests is to a large extent dependent on culture, in the same way that symptoms of mental illness are largely dependent on culture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 12:13 PM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Some make a big deal out of the dragon king's daughter becoming a Buddha in the Lotus Sutra. Please forgive me if I'm wrong, but doesn't she become a man in the process?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, she transforms her gender, much to the astonishment of the retinue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen master's perspective [from The Sacred...]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The mirror does not reflect truth. It reflects secondary conditions.

smcj said:

The mirror is purity and clarity. So it purely and clearly reflects the secondary conditions.

Malcolm wrote:

Relatively, when it is not recognized, it is called "the basis appears as the universe."

smcj said:

The pure/clear basis appearing as the universe? Purely and clearly? Truthfully.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that the mirror does not judge the appearances in the mirror, and reflects will reflect "real" and and "illusory" elephant without any judgement.

The basis appears as the universe under the influence of ignorance. The universe appears as the basis under the influence of knowledge. The basis itself has no judgment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

well then... can you name the eightfold path and the twelve links?

no need to respond here.

only you know the answer

Malcolm wrote:

Can you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: The sacred in Buddhism 2

Content:

kirtu said:

Kongtrul Rinpoche, delogs and others report classical Indian forms (because they are steeped in that imagery).

Malcolm wrote:

So, here you are suggesting that buddhas are conditioned?

kirtu said:

No, the beings reporting their visions are conditioned to some extent (including Jamgon Kongtrul, reportedly a 7th bhumi Bodhisattva). And we are conditioned as well. So great lamas like Jamgon Kongtrul and Chatral Rinpoche use conditioned language to talk to us about their experiences (for example, Chatral Rinpoche's reported visions).

Awakened beings view the world from a purified perspective and that's the point (and since the form isn't a mere emptiness it is able to engage in the world so other teachings dealing with other aspects such as spontaneous arising, etc. are not excluded from the use of the image).

But for whom are these images, those to be tamed or those taming?

For those to be tamed and for teachers within a specific cultural milieu (see above - lamas reporting visions and otherwise communicating with us). People who have "adopted" Buddhism also sometimes see images from within this cultural filter.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

But mandalas, for example, are supposed to be reflective of the state of Buddhahood, not seventh stage bodhisattvas and so on. Therefore, it is impossible to believe that they are to be taken literally.

Since this bodhicitta, the essence of everything, has always been the naturally perfected intrinsic nature, there is no need for searching and practice with the ten natures.
-- Kun byed rgyal po

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

What is "sacred" about the mirror?

It is Truth (Clarity).

Malcolm wrote:

No, since it reflects truths and and falsity without discrimination.

smcj said:

The Truth of what? The Truth of the actions of sentient beings being made clear by becoming experience, meaning the law of karmic cause and effect.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no karma in the mirror. The images in the mirror are not part of the mirror.

smcj said:

It is Love. How so? Because Love animates the images on the mirror. Even hate is love that has been twisted and corrupted by unawareness.

Malcolm wrote:

If loves animates the images in the mirror, it is not the mirror. The mirror is not capable of generating its own images. Images arise from secondary conditions.

smcj said:

It is Freedom (emptiness). With nothing fixed by having own-nature the images are 100% free to take on whatever form is appropriate to demonstrate the Truth.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, the images do not come from the mirror. The mirror does not reflect truth. It reflects secondary conditions.

smcj said:

And it is Purity. There no phenomena of either samsara or nirvana at all present in the mirror.

Malcolm wrote:

Then there are no images that come from the mirror.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: The sacred in Buddhism 2

Content:

kirtu said:

Kongtrul Rinpoche, delogs and others report classical Indian forms (because they are steeped in that imagery).

Malcolm wrote:

So, here you are suggesting that buddhas are conditioned?

kirtu said:

Awakened beings view the world from a purified perspective and that's the point (and since the form isn't a mere emptiness it is able to engage in the world so other teachings dealing with other aspects such as spontaneous arising, etc. are not excluded from the use of the image).

Malcolm wrote:

But for whom are these images, those to be tamed or those taming?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 30th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

What I was trying to work towards, without much luck, is saying it is the mirror itself that is sacred. Thus a true Dzogchenpa would see everything as such, regardless of how painful or ugly it may appear. Everything would be both "non-dual" and "perfect just as it is".

florin said:

But why apply labels such as sacred to that which is beyond any labels and categorisations ?

I don't know what others dzogchenpas see but I am pretty sure that sacred doesn't come into it..

MiphamFan said:

Exactly.

To say something is sacred implies that there is something not-sacred to contrast it with.

If there is nothing that is "not-sacred" then to say something is "sacred" is meaningless.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, for SMCJ, sacrality is important. Not sure why. For others of us, such as myself, the word "sacred" is not really part of my thinking. Sublime, profound, etc., these words are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: The sacred in Buddhism 2

Content:

kirtu said:

The use of Indian deity images is said to be literal by some teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

And I question this. It does not make sense.

kirtu said:

However if we assert that they are at least metaphorical*, then their intention is still clear as purified forms of offering and and active purification through transformation.

Malcolm wrote:

It is one thing to see sadhanas as methods of transformation, it is quite another to assert that awakened beings experience their senses as this or that mandala decked out in 7th century finery.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: The sacred in Buddhism 2

Content:

kirtu said:

Our tantric sadhanas tell us how enlightened beings experience sense objects.

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt very much whether enlightened beings experience sense objects as half-naked little Indian goddesses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

odysseus said:

Shakyamuni was a male, but he had plenty of female followers - because his Dharma is very real that women also can become enlightened.

seeker242 said:

Yes, like his mother/aunt. But my point was that him being born as a male was a "skillful means" and has nothing to do with abilities of men or women. If the society was a female dominated society, where all men were seen as lesser, he would have been born as a woman because that would be the most skillful means to teach.

Malcolm wrote:

We can see this possibility because we live in an open, secular, liberal society that values equal rights and civil rights— but it was not a possibility seen in the world of classical India, which is why there is so much patriarchal and misogynistic rhetoric in so many [but not all] Hinayāna and Mahāyāna sūtras, as well as the tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

What I was trying to work towards, without much luck, is saying it is the mirror itself that is sacred.

Malcolm wrote:

It is just a mirror — it will reflect a golden Buddha statue or a golden bedpan with equal indifference. It will not discriminate this image and say "This is sacred" and reflect it more brightly, nor will it discriminate another image and say, "This is profane" and dim the image. The mirror reflects everything equally well without discriminating whether it is good or bad, large or small, etc. Why? Because the function of a mirror is to reflect anything placed before it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 10:59 AM

Title: Re: Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche & No Female Tibetan Rinpoches

Content:

kirtu said:

However as we know there have been some teachers and some current male teachers have studied with them.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

A few, mostly obscure, and known to us only through their renowned male students, consorts or relatives. Tibetan Buddhism, despite its many virtues, is still grounded in a heavily patriarchal and sexist system which reflects the acute gender biases which predominate Tibetan culture as a whole. Of course, we in the West need to understand the flaws and strong traces of patriarchy and gender bias which informs ourselves as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

OK, so now what do we mean by "non-dual"?

Malcolm wrote:

It depends, but for Madhyamaka, it means freedom from all extremes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

Who said? Only buddhas have nondual experience 24/7/365.

This is a thought experiment.

What do we mean by "non-dual"? (I tried to start a thread about that a while back.)

"Without any references" sounds like there is still a subject. How is that not simply half of dualism?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no subject in nonreferential compassion because it is nonreferential.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

dharmagoat said:

I would expect he sees the suffering of beings in a compassionate light, acknowledging that pain is a cause of suffering, knowing that suffering is just a thought away.

smcj said:

How is that "non-dual"?

dharmagoat said:

(Let's try that one again...)

Compassion is about as non-dual as it gets.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what kind of compassion: compassion without any references is nondual.

The rest are dualistic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

How is that "non-dual"?

dharmagoat said:

You got me there. Must the experience of a Dzogchen master always be non-dual?

smcj said:

Yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Who said? Only buddhas have nondual experience 24/7/365.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

As a thought experiment, I'd like to see what people think a Dzogchen master sees. Given that theoretically for a Dzogchenpa everything is perfect "just as it is". Obviously by "everything" they mean "everything", even the most ugly and painful things in life.

dharmagoat said:

As I understand it, a Dzogchenpa/Chagchenpa master feels the same sensations as others but perceives them differently. For example, without the conception of "this pain is causing me suffering", they may experience the sensation of pain without perceiving it as suffering.

smcj said:

Ok. And how does he see the suffering of others? And in what sense is it "non-dual"?

Malcolm wrote:

A Dzogchen master is just someone who has the capacity teach the path of Dzogchen. It does not mean he is realized. Chogyal Namkhai Norbu denies he is realized constantly; but he does not deny he is a Dzogchen master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

byamspa said:

I respectfully disagree. HE Garchen Rinpoche said that "If you don't live nearby and cannot come, but with all your heart would like to, that is the right motivation for receiving the empowerment over the internet.

Whoever has faith and devotion will receive the empowerment regardless of where they are, because the dharmakaya pervades like space. Even if you come to the temple to receive an empowerment, if you have no devotion you still will not receive it."

Its really up to the aspirant and the aspiration generated. if you want it badly, then receiving it over ustream or skype can work. If your motivation is questionable, the results will be 2.

Karma_Yeshe said:

Yes. That is why I wrote full Vajrayana Empowerment. This is not only about the Dharmakaya. There are substances involved and you should make a connection not only with your mind-aspect but also with energy and body (all of them being inseparable). Also you should receive the ritual implements and so on. How is that possible via Skype/internet?

All the best
Karma Yeshe

Malcolm wrote:

You will find, if you do further research, that these general conditions are not agreed to, sometimes, even within the same school.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 4:43 AM

Title: Dzogchen master's perspective [from The Sacred...]

Content:

smcj said:

As a thought experiment, I'd like to see what people think a Dzogchen master sees. Given that theoretically for a Dzogchenpa everything is perfect "just as it is". Obviously by "everything" they mean "everything", even the most ugly and painful things in life.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen masters are generally just practitioners who have their fair share of pleasure, pain, suffering, happiness, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In return, I ask, how is blind adherence to scripture, i.e., Buddhist fundamentalism, genuine faith in the Buddha?

Tenso said:

I strongly believe that the Mahayana sutras were spoken by an enlightened being. Do you disagree?

Malcolm wrote:

Even if one believes that every word in the sūtras was spoken by the Buddha, this does not mean they all need to be accepted. Otherwise we are no better than fundamentalist theists who insist that every word of their holy scriptures was spoken by God.

In any case, since the appearance of Buddhas and the words that they speak are delusions conforming to the expectations and inclinations of those to be tamed, if the Buddhas enunciate sexist things, it is the flaw of the disciple to be tamed, not the Buddhas. Even if this is the case however, and we use this a rationale to excuse the Buddhas of culpability for such words and attitudes, those words and attitudes must still be confronted, not wished away with platitudes and vain apologetics.

That said, when we find things in the sūtras and tantras that are injurious to our sisters in the Dharma, they should be confronted, no matter who is supposed to have said them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is clearly chauvinistic and merely perpetuates androcentrism and misogyny in the Dharma.

Astus said:

Yes, and before that section in the Nirvana Sutra it talks about how women are full of insatiable desire. However, the reason I quoted it is, that it can be taken as one way of Buddhist scriptures tackling widespread misogyny prevalent in texts and societies. Instead of reading the negative characteristics of female birth as referring to biology, it transforms that to a spiritual level.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is even worse, since it engenders understanding and misunderstanding.

Astus said:

Sure, it's not that same as what one finds in the Soma Sutta and others claiming sex to be another mistaken self-identity, but as tathagatagarbha teachings are transitory teachings from self-view to no-self, it fits well into the scheme of gradually eliminating sexism.

Malcolm wrote:

Then it apparently failed in its job, in this instance.

The Vimalamirti-nirdesha's farce with the Goddess of the Ganges is a much more effective parody of endemic Buddhist doctrinal misogyny.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is clearly chauvinistic and merely perpetuates androcentrism and misogyny in the Dharma.

Tenso said:

You would rather cherry pick parts of the sutras that you like and throw out everything else that you personally disagree with? How are you able to have genuine faith in the Buddha?

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say that passage in question should be edited out — instead, it should be confronted and engaged for what is actually is — Buddhist misogyny.

In return, I ask, how is blind adherence to scripture, i.e., Buddhist fundamentalism, genuine faith in the Buddha?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Herbie said:

He indicated inappropriate processing of language. that's it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not just it. What he exposes is the essentialism that causes people to misunderstand the meaning of "arising from conditions."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Astus said:

"Anyone who thinks 'I'm a woman' or 'a man' or 'Am I anything at all?' — that's who Mara's fit to address."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn05/sn05.002.than.html>)

"Good man, it is in this sense that good men and good women who listen to this Mahayana Great Nirvana Sutra will always decry the marks that characterize a female and seek to be male . Why? Because this Mahayana scripture has the characteristic of manliness (pauruṣa). I am referring to buddha-nature. If someone does not understand buddhanature, then he does not have male characteristics. Why do I say this? Because he cannot grasp the fact that the buddha-nature exists within himself. I would say those unable to know the buddha-nature are to be called women. I would say those who are able to know themselves that the buddha-nature exists are characteristically male. If a woman is able to know definitively that the buddha-nature exists within herself, you should know that this constitutes her as male."

(Nirvana Sutra, p 301-302, tr Blum, BDK Edition / p 135 in tr Yamamoto)

Malcolm wrote:

This is clearly chauvinistic and merely perpetuates androcentrism and misogyny in the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

Semantics. Scientific materialists reject it.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not make rebirth supernatural.

smcj said:

Karma is not moralistic; it is eudaemonic — in other words, the teachings of karma state that positive intentions and acts lead to positive outcomes.

Positive actions result in positive experience. Negative actions result in negative experience. In other words the truth of the nature of the action is made manifest/apparent as experience. That quality of "demonstrating the truth of the nature of the act" as either suffering or happiness is moralistic.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. Positive acts lead to positive sensations; negative actions lead to negative sensations — that is all the doctrine of karma-vipaka entails, nothing more.

smcj said:

Not judgmental per se, but divine justice nevertheless.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing divine about it.

smcj said:

The clarity of the basis shows the "truth" of the action.

The love of the basis animates that appearance.

The emptiness of the basis allows for limitless freedom for that expression to manifest.

Malcolm wrote:

These are all just pretty conventions.

smcj said:

Thus all 6 realms can be seen as the expression of the basis, or "The Truth".

Malcolm wrote:

No, the six realms expressions of delusion, not "the truth" in anyway shape form.

smcj said:

What do you mean by faith?

Belief in and reliance on things unseen.

Malcolm wrote:

The faith is not required.

smcj said:

The cheap shot would be to simply say "emptiness". But there is more than that. If, as the texts state, the universe came into being because of the karma of sentient beings left over from the last universe, that would mean that everything that is, is here because beings are working out their karma. But even if you ignore that cosmology, what is going on in life is both the creation and ripening of karma. As I've said above the workings of karma is itself the "Truth" demonstrating the nature of actions.

Malcolm wrote:

Emptiness is also not "true".

smcj said:

True, primordial purity, a Refuge for our suffering and an answer to the cycle of life and death.

Malcolm wrote:

None of this entails "sacredness", unless you want it too.

smcj said:

Actually you are worse than me on this score. I say that the Tibetans have their Dharma down better than us, and you say that the Tibetans in India don't have it down as well as the ones that stayed in Tibet. That's taking it even one step further!

Malcolm wrote:
I wasn't talking about realization.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 12:25 AM
Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur
Content:

conebeckham said:
Well, in Vajrayana we all start out as children, and play is a good thing. Necessary, even.

Malcolm wrote:
He was saying actually the opposite...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 12:23 AM
Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
And I read it like this — ancient India was a patriarchy, and had a cultural doctrine that women had inferior births.

seeker242 said:
I agree! Which is precisely why the Buddha was born as a male to begin with. It would be detrimental to the dharma to put himself in a place of perceived inferiority, even if that inferiority is not true to begin with.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, that was then, and this is now. We do not need to continue to cater to ancient chauvinism, or imagine it is somehow universal and will always be applicable.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, November 29th, 2015 at 12:13 AM
Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?
Content:

Serenity509 said:
There are several texts which suggest that, for a woman to become a Buddha, she must first be reborn as a man.

seeker242 said:
I don't read it like that personally. I read it like this...

Malcolm wrote:

And I read it like this — ancient India was a patriarchy, and had a cultural doctrine that women had inferior births.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

Karma_Yeshe said:

Yes. That is why I wrote full Vajrayana Empowerment. This is not only about the Dharmakaya. There are substances involved and you should make a connection not only with your mind-aspect but also with energy and body (all of them being inseparable). Also you should receive the ritual implements and so on. How is that possible via Skype/internet?

Malcolm wrote:

As my guru, a tertön and a great Dzogchen master, once told us, "Empowerments are the play of children."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche & No Female Tibetan Rinpoches

Content:

ngodrup said:

Have you not heard of the 14 downfalls of tantric samaya? What is the 14th?

Malcolm wrote:

Because in fact there are so many places in the sūtras as well as classical sūtra literature that claim a woman is incapable of Buddhahood. The 14th downfall proves the presence of sexism in Vajrayāna, not its absence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

Rebirth is supernatural.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not. In order for it to be supernatural, it would have to have been brought about by some supernatural agency. Instead, rebirth is just about as natural as one can get.

smcj said:
Karma is moralistic.

Malcolm wrote:
Karma is not moralistic; it is eudaemonic — in other words, the teachings of karma state that positive intentions and acts lead to positive outcomes.

smcj said:
Faith is required.

Malcolm wrote:
What do you mean by faith?

smcj said:
There is an "Universal Truth".

Malcolm wrote:
Huh? No, there isn't.

smcj said:
There is "sacredness".

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, there is such a word, but it does not mean much, considering that "the sacred" means something different for virtually everyone. For example, for Hindus, cows are sacred; for Muslims, they are food.

smcj said:
Asians don't object to these issues. That's why their Dharma practices are more fruitful than ours.

Malcolm wrote:
Asians don't even have this language to begin with. And who says their Dharma practice is "more" fruitful?

smcj said:
It's not about race. It is about our additional cultural obscurations.

Malcolm wrote:
It is a pity that so many Western Dharma practitioners have this strange cultural inferiority complex.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 6:55 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

Brave New World was a parody of America, if such a thing is possible.

Malcolm wrote:

While indeed contemporary American culture served as his artistic point of departure, the world he created owes everything to the Republic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth, Karma & Emptiness

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

If HHDL suggested that the "very very subtle mind and body" goes on between lives, he has just taken the eternalism position. He has just suggested a soul.

Malcolm wrote:

No, since this subtle mind and body is not a permanent entity, it is a series of impermanent moments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Fascists love Plato's Republic, for they see in it a image of how they imagine themselves, philosopher kings all.

maybay said:

That is as much a reason to call Plato a fascist as it is to call someone wearing burberry a chav football hooligan.

Malcolm wrote:

You do understand that Brave New World is Huxley's parody of the Republic?

maybay said:

Whatever personal bias he might have revealed in his writings are almost inconsequential.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, they are crucial to understanding his whole program.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Sacred and profane are categories that are only used in Abrahamic religions.

Malcolm wrote:

Exactly.

MiphamFan said:

The outer tantras are about external purity, not sacredness.

Malcolm wrote:

Exactly.

MiphamFan said:

Buddhist morality is not about good/evil, it is about kusala/akusala. It is a far more realistic, positivistic morality.

Malcolm wrote:

Exactly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: An American Buddhist on Thanksgiving

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am not saying we need to feel some kind of white guilt about it all. I certainly don't. I am saying that we need to remember and never forget where our "blessings" come from and how they were gained.

Serenity509 said:

I don't know, dawg. It would be unfair to judge American history from a different standard than we would judge any other country's history. Furthermore, I think you are neglecting the immense good that America has done for the world. Why is America, for example, the preferred destination for the world's immigrants? Also, why do immigrants in the United States own small businesses at a higher rate than the general population?

Malcolm wrote:

I think you really need to look into the history of US foreign policy and incursions, and evaluate "all the good" we have done in that light.

Rome had a pretty brutal track record in the ancient world, but it sure did not stop people from wanting to be close to the center of world power, back in the day.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 2:12 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As for my contention, you yourself know that Plato's Republic starts with an "aristocracy" and concludes with a tyranny. I don't share Plato's pessimism.

maybay said:

Plato seemed quite optimistic about the possibility of rule by those who love wisdom, not by those who love honour. The condition under which successful democracies function today is the fact that those who love honour have a limited term, while those who love wisdom get to rule, albeit at a distance — the rule of law.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is, as always, that it is the very fascist element itself imagines itself to be Aristos, and tries to enforce this tiered and class centered system on the populace.

Fascists love Plato's Republic, for they see in it a image of how they imagine themselves, philosopher kings all.

Our democracy is not founded on such Platonic ideals, and owes, in its political forms, much more to the Roman Republic than the Athenians, and formed out of similar colonialist expansionism. The formation and authorship of our government is in reality an expression of the Scottish Enlightenment, whose own roots are too complicated to merely sum up and lay all at Plato's door.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

The Buddha will teach whatever aspect of the Dharma is suitable to the situation. You are suggesting he would repudiate his teaching on unattractiveness and never teach it again. This sutta does not suggest that.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am suggesting that he was surprised and appalled at how badly he was misunderstood by his students. He certainly indicates he had no idea of what was going on during his retreat in his absence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

How about this: <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn54/sn54.009.than.html?>

maybay said:

In this sutta his first teaching was on unattractiveness and his second on mindful breathing. Teaching the latter does not contradict the former, nor require the Buddha to revise it. Why would you think it does?

Malcolm wrote:

I think dzogchungpa was referring to the fact that the Buddha was surprised that so many monks committed suicide because they misunderstood his teachings on the unattractiveness of the body, and modified his teaching accordingly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

My point is, that there is no word in either Buddhism or Hinduism that maps to the adjective.

Point taken.

Now let us discuss English. Do you believe Dharma in general, and Vajrayana in particular do not have:

"sacred rites" dedicated to a religious purpose and so deserving veneration (of writing or text) embodying the laws or doctrines of a religion: a sacred text.

regarded with great respect and reverence by a particular religion, group, or individual; an "(whatever)" sacred to Tibetans

If these definitions conform to the practice of Dharma then it is appropriate to us the word when discussing Dharma in English, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Quite honestly, the word never crosses my lips nor comes to mind with regard to the Dharma. I think in terms of what is liberative and nonliberative. I don't think that there really is anything in Buddhadharma that is "inviolable", "sacrosanct", etc. In fact, I think the term "sacred" is pretty dualistic. In order for something to be sacred, there has to be something profane.

Of course I respect what other people hold to be "sacred," as long as it is not harmful to sentient beings. But since all phenomena are already perfect, where is there any room at all for the sacred or the profane? If you argue that we don't live in such knowledge and therefore, it is important that we have "sacred texts," "sacred rites," etc., you have just rendered your "sacred rites and texts" profane and mundane since they are only relevant to the ignorant and deluded.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

It occurs to me that since the same terminology is used between Hinduism and Buddhism that "sacred Hindu text" may be very relevant.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is, that there is no word in either Buddhism or Hinduism that maps to the adjective. If you look in any Sanskrit dictionary you will find hundreds of things that are described as "sacred" — sacred this, sacred that, etc., not one single word maps to the word "sacred."

I suspect it is because the Buddhist/Hindu world view does not have heavily demarcated categories of sacred/profane.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: An American Buddhist on Thanksgiving

Content:

Serenity509 said:

As an American Buddhist, I am thankful for the blessings we often take for granted, despite our country's imperfections. Even when adjusted for differences in currency value between countries, the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people, and the median household income is higher than 93% of the world's people.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, at the expense of 400 years of systematic ethnic cleansing and genocide of an indigenous population.

Serenity509 said:

Let's begin by asking whether the white man was guilty of genocide against the native Indians. As a matter of fact, he was not. As William McNeill documents in Plagues and Peoples, great numbers of Indians did perish as a result of their contact with whites, but, for the most part, they died by contracting diseases—smallpox, measles, malaria, tuberculosis—for which they had not developed immunities. This is tragedy on a grand scale, but it is not genocide, which implies an intention to wipe out an entire population. McNeill points out that, a few centuries earlier, Europeans themselves contracted lethal diseases, including the bubonic plague, from Mongol invaders from the Asian steppes. The Europeans didn't have immunities, and the plague decimated one-third of the population of Europe, and yet, despite the magnitude of deaths and suffering, no one calls this genocide.

<http://www.heritage.org/research/reports/2006/02/whats-great-about-america>

Malcolm wrote:

In the beginning, Anglo settlers organized irregular units to brutally attack and destroy unarmed Indigenous women, children, and old people using unlimited violence in unrelenting attacks. During nearly two centuries of British colonization, generations of settlers, mostly farmers, gained experience as “Indian fighters” outside any organized military institution. Anglo-French conflict may appear to have been the dominant factor of European colonization in North America during the eighteenth century, but while large regular armies fought over geopolitical goals in Europe, Anglo settlers in North America waged deadly irregular warfare against the Indigenous communities. Much of the fighting during the fifteen-year settlers’ war for independence, especially in the Ohio Valley region and western New York, was directed against Indigenous resisters who realized it was not in their interest to have a close enemy of settlers with an independent government, as opposed to a remote one in Great Britain. Nor did the fledgling US military in the 1790s carry out operations typical of the state-centered wars occurring in Europe at the time. Even following the founding of the professional US Army in the 1810s, irregular warfare was the method of the US conquest of the Ohio Valley and Mississippi Valley regions. Since that time, Grenier notes, irregular methods have been used in tandem with operations of regular armed forces.

The chief characteristic of irregular warfare is that of the extreme violence against civilians, in this case the tendency to seek the utter annihilation of the Indigenous population. “In cases where a rough balance of power existed,” Grenier observes, “and the Indians even appeared dominant— as was the situation in virtually every frontier war until the first decade of the 19th century—[settler] Americans were quick to turn to extravagant violence.”

Many historians who acknowledge the exceptional one-sided colonial violence attribute it to racism. Grenier argues that rather than racism leading to violence, the reverse occurred: the out-of-control momentum of extreme violence of unlimited warfare fueled race hatred. “Successive generations of Americans, both soldiers and civilians, made the killing of Indian men, women, and children a defining element of their first military tradition and thereby part of a shared American identity. Indeed, only after seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century Americans made the first way of war a key to being a white American could later generations of ‘Indian haters,’ men like Andrew Jackson, turn the Indian wars into race wars.” By then, the Indigenous peoples’ villages, farmlands, towns, and entire nations formed the only barrier to the settlers’ total freedom to acquire land and wealth. Settler colonialists again chose their own means of conquest. Such fighters are often viewed as courageous heroes, but killing the unarmed women, children, and old people and burning homes and fields involved neither courage nor sacrifice.

So it was from the planting of the first British colonies in North America. Among the initial leaders of those ventures were military men— mercenaries— who brought with them their previous war experiences in Britain’s imperialist, anti-Muslim Crusades. Those who put together and led the first colonial armies, such as John Smith in Virginia, Myles Standish at Plymouth, John Mason in Connecticut, and John Underhill in Massachusetts, had fought in the bitter, brutal, and bloody religious wars ongoing in Europe at the time of the first settlements. They had long practiced burning towns and fields and killing the unarmed and vulnerable. “Tragically for the Indian peoples of the Eastern Seaboard,” Grenier observes, “the mercenaries unleashed a similar way of war in early Virginia and New England.”

Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne (2014-09-16). An Indigenous Peoples' History of the United States (ReVisioning American History) (pp. 58-60). Beacon Press. Kindle Edition.

There is one feature in the expansion of the peoples of white, or European, blood during the past four centuries which should never be lost sight of, especially by those who denounce such expansion on moral grounds. On the whole, the movement has been fraught with lasting benefit to most of the peoples already dwelling in the lands over which the expansion took place.

—Theodore Roosevelt, “The Expansion of the White Races,” 1909

I did not know then how much was ended. When I look back now from this high hill of my old age, I can still see the butchered women and children lying heaped and scattered all along the crooked gulch as plain as when I saw them with eyes still young. And I can see that something else died there in the bloody mud, and was buried in the blizzard. A people’s dream died there. It was a beautiful dream ... the nation’s hoop is broken and scattered. There is no center any longer, and the sacred tree is dead.

—Black Elk, 1930, on the massacre at Wounded Knee

Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne (2014-09-16). An Indigenous Peoples' History of the United States (ReVisioning American History) (p. 162). Beacon Press. Kindle Edition.

You said:

As an American Buddhist, I am thankful for the blessings we often take for granted, despite our country's imperfections. Even when adjusted for differences in currency value between countries, the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people, and the median household income is higher than 93% of the world's people.

The word "blessing" is very apt here. Why? The verb "to bless" comes from:

Old English bletsian, bledsian, Northumbrian bloedsian "to consecrate, make holy, give thanks," from Proto-Germanic *blodison "hallow with blood, mark with blood," from *blotham "blood" (see blood (n.)). Originally a blood sprinkling on pagan altars. So, yes, our "blessings" comes from the blood our ancestors spilt on the altar of European incursions into the the new world.

Serenity509 said:

It would be wrong to say that whites never killed natives. But again, we must judge American history by the same standards we'd judge any other country's history. For example, wasn't India, the country in which Buddhism was born, established by Aryan invaders who displaced the native peoples? Does that make India or Buddhism all bad?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for in fact Europeans frequently killed natives, more often than not. As for India, we do not have an accurate historical record of the movements of Indo-aryans into India, all we have is myth and guesswork. But Europeans were so callous in their disregard to the First Peoples here, they willingly wrote down accounts of murder and pillage without a second thought.

Documented policies of genocide on the part of US administrations can be identified in at least four distinct periods: the Jacksonian era of forced removal; the California gold rush in Northern California; the post– Civil War era of the so-called Indian wars in the Great Plains; and the 1950s termination period, all of which are discussed in the following chapters. Cases of genocide carried out as policy may be found in historical documents as well as in the oral histories of Indigenous communities. An example from 1873 is typical, with General William T. Sherman writing, "We must act with vindictive earnestness against the Sioux, even to their extermination, men, women and children ... during an assault, the soldiers can not pause to distinguish between male and female, or even discriminate as to age." As Patrick Wolfe has noted, the peculiarity of settler colonialism is that the goal is elimination of Indigenous populations in order to make land available to settlers. That project is not limited to government policy, but rather involves all kinds of agencies, voluntary militias, and the settlers themselves acting on their own.

Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne (2014-09-16). An Indigenous Peoples' History of the United States (ReVisioning American History) (pp. 9-10). Beacon Press. Kindle Edition.

Our blessings also come from the fact that as Americans, our colonial policies are so successful that indeed "the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people" as you note. America is thus far the most successful experiment in European colonialism ever tried. It is important that we remember how we arose as a country, and not smother it in Hallmark sentiment.

I am not saying we need to feel some kind of white guilt about it all. I certainly don't. I am saying that we need to remember and never forget where our "blessings" come from and how they were gained.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: An American Buddhist on Thanksgiving

Content:

Serenity509 said:

As an American Buddhist, I am thankful for the blessings we often take for granted, despite our country's imperfections. Even when adjusted for differences in currency value between countries, the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people, and the median household income is higher than 93% of the world's people.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, at the expense of 400 years of systematic ethnic cleansing and genocide of an indigenous population.

Serenity509 said:

Let's begin by asking whether the white man was guilty of genocide against the native Indians. As a matter of fact, he was not. As William McNeill documents in Plagues and Peoples, great numbers of Indians did perish as a result of their contact with whites, but, for the most part, they died by contracting diseases-smallpox, measles, malaria, tuberculosis-for which they had not developed immunities. This is tragedy on a grand scale, but it is not genocide, which implies an intention to wipe out an entire population. McNeill points out that, a few centuries earlier, Europeans themselves contracted lethal diseases, including the bubonic plague, from Mongol invaders from the Asian steppes. The Europeans didn't have immunities, and the plague decimated one-third of the population of Europe, and yet, despite the magnitude of deaths and suffering, no one calls this genocide.

<http://www.heritage.org/research/reports/2006/02/whats-great-about-america>

Malcolm wrote:

In the beginning, Anglo settlers organized irregular units to brutally attack and destroy unarmed Indigenous women, children, and old people using unlimited violence in unrelenting attacks. During nearly two centuries of British colonization, generations of settlers, mostly farmers, gained experience as "Indian fighters" outside any organized military institution. Anglo-French conflict may appear to have been the dominant factor of European colonization in North America during the eighteenth century, but while large regular armies fought over geopolitical goals in Europe, Anglo settlers in North America waged deadly irregular warfare against the Indigenous communities. Much of the fighting during the fifteen-year settlers' war for independence, especially in the Ohio Valley region and western New York, was directed against Indigenous resisters who realized it was not in their interest to have a close enemy of settlers with an independent government, as opposed to a remote one in Great Britain. Nor did the fledgling US military in the 1790s carry out operations typical of the state-centered wars occurring in Europe at the time. Even following the founding of the professional US Army in the 1810s, irregular warfare was the method of the US conquest of the Ohio Valley and Mississippi Valley regions. Since that time, Grenier notes, irregular methods have been used in tandem with operations of regular armed forces.

The chief characteristic of irregular warfare is that of the extreme violence against civilians, in this case the tendency to seek the utter annihilation of the Indigenous population. “In cases where a rough balance of power existed,” Grenier observes, “and the Indians even appeared dominant— as was the situation in virtually every frontier war until the first decade of the 19th century—[settler] Americans were quick to turn to extravagant violence.”

Many historians who acknowledge the exceptional one-sided colonial violence attribute it to racism. Grenier argues that rather than racism leading to violence, the reverse occurred: the out-of-control momentum of extreme violence of unlimited warfare fueled race hatred. “Successive generations of Americans, both soldiers and civilians, made the killing of Indian men, women, and children a defining element of their first military tradition and thereby part of a shared American identity. Indeed, only after seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century Americans made the first way of war a key to being a white American could later generations of ‘Indian haters,’ men like Andrew Jackson, turn the Indian wars into race wars.” By then, the Indigenous peoples’ villages, farmlands, towns, and entire nations formed the only barrier to the settlers’ total freedom to acquire land and wealth. Settler colonialists again chose their own means of conquest. Such fighters are often viewed as courageous heroes, but killing the unarmed women, children, and old people and burning homes and fields involved neither courage nor sacrifice.

So it was from the planting of the first British colonies in North America. Among the initial leaders of those ventures were military men— mercenaries— who brought with them their previous war experiences in Britain’s imperialist, anti-Muslim Crusades. Those who put together and led the first colonial armies, such as John Smith in Virginia, Myles Standish at Plymouth, John Mason in Connecticut, and John Underhill in Massachusetts, had fought in the bitter, brutal, and bloody religious wars ongoing in Europe at the time of the first settlements. They had long practiced burning towns and fields and killing the unarmed and vulnerable. “Tragically for the Indian peoples of the Eastern Seaboard,” Grenier observes, “the mercenaries unleashed a similar way of war in early Virginia and New England.”

Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne (2014-09-16). An Indigenous Peoples' History of the United States (ReVisioning American History) (pp. 58-60). Beacon Press. Kindle Edition.

There is one feature in the expansion of the peoples of white, or European, blood during the past four centuries which should never be lost sight of, especially by those who denounce such expansion on moral grounds. On the whole, the movement has been fraught with lasting benefit to most of the peoples already dwelling in the lands over which the expansion took place.

—Theodore Roosevelt, “The Expansion of the White Races,” 1909

I did not know then how much was ended. When I look back now from this high hill of my old age, I can still see the butchered women and children lying heaped and scattered all along the crooked gulch as plain as when I saw them with eyes still young. And I can see that something else died there in the bloody mud, and was buried in the blizzard. A people’s dream died there. It was a beautiful dream ... the nation’s hoop is broken and scattered. There is no center any longer, and the sacred tree is dead.

—Black Elk, 1930, on the massacre at Wounded Knee

Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne (2014-09-16). An Indigenous Peoples' History of the United States (ReVisioning American History) (p. 162). Beacon Press. Kindle Edition.

You said:

As an American Buddhist, I am thankful for the blessings we often take for granted, despite our country's imperfections. Even when adjusted for differences in currency value between countries, the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people, and the median household income is higher than 93% of the world's people.

And:

The word "blessing" is very apt here. Why? The verb "to bless" comes from:

Old English bletsian, bledsian, Northumbrian bloedsian "to consecrate, make holy, give thanks," from Proto-Germanic *blodison "hallow with blood, mark with blood," from *blotham "blood" (see blood (n.)). Originally a blood sprinkling on pagan altars.

So, yes, our "blessings" comes from the blood our ancestors spilt on the altar of European incursions into the the new world.

Serenity509 said:

It would be wrong to say that whites never killed natives. But again, we must judge American history by the same standards we'd judge any other country's history. For example, wasn't India, the country in which Buddhism was born, established by Aryan invaders who displaced the native peoples? Does that make India or Buddhism all bad?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for in fact Europeans frequently killed natives, more often than not. As for India, we do not have an accurate historical record of the movements of Indo-aryans into India, all we have is myth and guesswork. But Europeans were so callous in their disregard to the First People's here, they willingly wrote down accounts of murder and pillage without a second thought.

Documented policies of genocide on the part of US administrations can be identified in at least four distinct periods: the Jacksonian era of forced removal; the California gold rush in Northern California; the post– Civil War era of the so-called Indian wars in the Great Plains; and the 1950s termination period, all of which are discussed in the following chapters. Cases of genocide carried out as policy may be found in historical documents as well as in the oral histories of Indigenous communities. An example from 1873 is typical, with General William T. Sherman writing, "We must act with vindictive earnestness against the Sioux, even to their extermination, men, women and children ... during an assault, the soldiers can not pause to distinguish between male and female, or even discriminate as to age." As Patrick Wolfe has noted, the peculiarity of settler colonialism is that the goal is elimination of Indigenous populations in order to make land available to settlers. That project is not limited to government policy, but rather involves all kinds of agencies, voluntary militias, and the settlers themselves acting on their own.

Dunbar-Ortiz, Roxanne (2014-09-16). An Indigenous Peoples' History of the United States (ReVisioning American History) (pp. 9-10). Beacon Press. Kindle Edition.

Our blessings also come from the fact that as Americans, our colonial policies are so successful that indeed "the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people" as you note. America is thus far the most successful experiment in European colonialism ever tried.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

By the way this is a ridiculous assertion. You seem eager to promote the idea of a revelatory American politics free from European heritage, but this attempt at obfuscating history only signals your contempt for the past. An intelligent person without faith and respect will only see what he wants to see, no matter how hard he looks.

Malcolm wrote:

The only one who is obfuscating things here is yourself, who seems incapable of resisting the urge to engage in ad hominem fallacies.

That said, you are wrong. I really understand quite well how grounded the American revolutionaries were grounded in the contemporary thought of their day [The Scottish Enlightenment] and all the controversies and debates that raged in intellectual circles during their time.

As for my contention, you yourself know that Plato's Republic starts with an "aristocracy" and concludes with a tyranny. I don't share Plato's pessimism.

Arguably, however, it is Epicurus, through Lucretius's De rerum natura, who was perhaps the most influential Greek thinker during the revolutionary period.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 28th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

tingdzin said:

This is NOT to say that rationality is not crucial in Buddhism; the acuity of the Buddhist teachers of the past in pointing out humanity's mental landscape is IMO one of two factors that have enabled Buddhism to continue over the centuries; the other factor is that individual practitioners of Buddhism have made their own the experience of what the sophisticated descriptions of reality are aiming at. And this leads back to the original theme of this thread, the sacred.

Malcolm wrote:

That which is considered inviolable is that which considered sacred: a shrine, a trust, a place, a word, bond, etc., generally because it has been blessed, but also because there may be some inherent quality which some place or thing seems to hold: such as a tree, a mountain, a spring, a river and so on., which will be ruined if it is despoiled.

The thing is, there is no adjective like "sacred" in Dharma texts (with perhaps the possible exception of brahma, i.e. brahmacarin, etc.) This, I submit, accounts for why there is so much disagreement among Western Buddhists about what is sacred and what is not, precisely because there is very little guidance on the subject from key source texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

tingdzin said:

Let's discuss the advantages and disadvantages of governmental forms in another thread, please. There are enough such threads going on, or people could start another one.

Malcolm, in your post (Nov. 26, 10:04, too far back to use quote function) You say that "In Buddhadharma . . .there does [sic] not exist, nor could exist, any entities which lie, in principle, beyond the scope of Dharma explanation". This sounds to me like you are saying that there is nothing that cannot be, "in principle", conceptually explained. Is this an accurate assessment or not?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am saying there are no entities [dngos po, vastu] which in principle lie beyond the scope of Dharma explanations.

But even when we come to such things as Dzogchen and so, there are also example wisdoms which are given in the form of conceptual explanations. However, a conceptual explanation of sweet, no matter how detailed, will never substitute for putting something sweet on your tongue. So, while I think everything can indeed be rationally explained, even buddhahood, I maintain this is not a substitute for experience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Can women become Buddhas?

Content:

Serenity509 said:

There are several texts which suggest that, for a woman to become a Buddha, she must first be reborn as a man. However, the biographical sutras refer to several women who attained arhantship. What is the difference between a woman attaining Buddhahood and a woman attaining arhantship? Why one and not the other? I am confused.

Malcolm wrote:

Its just sexist bullshit in the sūtras, there is no need to pay it any serious mind. The remedy for this can be found in the Vimalakirtinirdesha sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: An American Buddhist on Thanksgiving

Content:

Serenity509 said:

As an American Buddhist, I am thankful for the blessings we often take for granted, despite our country's imperfections. Even when adjusted for differences in currency value between countries, the bottom five percent of Americans have a higher standard of living than 68% of the world's people, and the median household income is higher than 93% of the world's people.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, at the expense of 400 years of systematic ethnic cleansing and genocide of an indigenous population.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

The first king, Mahasamatta, was elected by consensus.
So?

Malcolm wrote:

So, it shows that leaders derive their authority from the people. Democracy merely enshrines that value as a norm.

And as I already noted, Aryadeva cogently points out the defect of kingship in his 400 verses. There is no divine right of Kings advocated in Buddhadharma.

Does he speak about democracy?

It is not necessary, it is long standing tenet in Buddhism that leaders derive their rule from popular consent, not from some inherent authority.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

HH Dalai Lama exemplifies this view with his confidence that indeed science can explain confirm, and justify any and all Buddhist beliefs, but even more than that, he recommends abandoning any Buddhist tenets that are directly contradicted by scientific explanation and found to be definitely false from a scientific point of view.

Wayfarer said:

I previously brought that very fact up in a discussion with you, with the quote from his book, and you vigorously disagreed with it at the time, saying something like it was only due to some particular doctrinal position associated with Geluk-pa that he would make such a statement. I can go digging for it if it would be helpful.

Malcolm wrote:

Context is everything, I am quite sure I was disagreeing with the context in which this position of HHDL was invoked, rather than his position itself.

Wayfarer said:

The reason I say that naturalism is associated with utilitarianism is because naturalism eschews any notion of an inherent good.

Malcolm wrote:

No it doesn't. For example, there is no conflict between naturalism and intuitionism.

Wayfarer said:

Buddhism is not 'naturalistic' at all in that sense, that was the attitude of the Victorian 'protestant Buddhism' that wanted to show that Buddhism was compatible with so-called 'enlightenment values'.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, Buddhism is a species of naturalism, asserting that everything that occurs can be explained without resort to supernatural explanations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche & No Female Tibetan Rinpoches

Content:

Sonam_Phuntsok said:

I asked Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche why there were no female Tibetan Rinpoches? My Dharma sisters have been discussing this issue for a while. They feel like they have no future in Tibetan Buddhism, and that as women, they will never be given the respect to teach like their male counterparts. I personally view my dharma sisters as equals to my dharma brothers.

Malcolm wrote:

They may have no future in Tibetan Buddhism, but this does not mean that they have no future in Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

But then I'm uncomfortable with his suggestion that government is some kind of experiment. For most of history the most stable form of government was not democracy. Monarchy was not tried 'from time to time', on a whim. It was as natural as the sun in the sky.

Malcolm wrote:

The first king, Mahasamatta, was elected by consensus.

You should also study history — the most enduring govt. in the Americas prior to the arrival of Europeans was Haudenosaunee Confederacy, a democratic union that began in the 12th century and continues till today.

And as I already noted, Aryadeva cogently points out the defect of kingship in his 400 verses. There is no divine right of Kings advocated in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

MiphamFan said:

If you have really studied Graeco-Roman political philosophy you should know about anacyclosis.

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite understandable that the antidemocratic and antiseccular sentiments being voiced here are coming from a place of Buddhist utop/dystopianism. But since it is "Buddhist" it is not Dharma, and also not utopian. There is and never will be an external utopia. Utopia lies in liberating oneself. Dystopia lies in trying to liberate others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

The Buddha's silence on certain matters is surely a lack of explanation. It is not the entities themselves which are mysterious, but the manner of their existence.

Malcolm wrote:

The manner of their existence is not the slightest bit mysterious. Buddha's silence regarded only metaphysical speculation. What is the point of positing a beginning to the world, when it is clearly taught by the Buddha that all conditioned phenomena are both causes and results? Why speculate on whether a tathāgata exists after death, when he clearly taught that when someone attains cessation there is no longer any existence about which a nonexistence can be discussed? Each of the so called points of silence have a very clear and simple explanation, and are not a lack of explanation, rather, they are an encouragement to understand the Dharma. It is only those who do not know Dharma who believe Buddha's silences represent ambiguity on his part or some imponderable knowable only to an elect.

maybay said:

And it is not always the case that what can be explained will be explained. The difference is perhaps that the scientist will not admit mystery, and will typically endeavour to explain whatever happens.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha did not admit mystery either:

The Blessed One said, "What is the All? Simply the eye & forms, ear & sounds, nose & aromas, tongue & flavors, body & tactile sensations, intellect & ideas. This, monks, is called the All. [1] Anyone who would say, 'Repudiating this All, I will describe another,' if questioned on what exactly might be the grounds for his statement, would be unable to explain, and furthermore, would be put to grief. Why? Because it lies beyond range."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 27th, 2015 at 12:03 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is amazing to me that in this day and age that intelligent people, especially followers of Dharma, do not see the wisdom in the liberal, secular and open society that is the goal towards which the framers of the constitution were striving.

maybay said:

It's amazing to me that someone so sure of his model of political order should give so little attention to its weaknesses. You say my dialectic reminds you of Plato. Well do you recall what his criticisms were of democracy?

Malcolm wrote:

Plato was basically a fascist, and the Republic a blueprint for fascism, so why should I care what his criticisms were? That being said, of course I am aware of his criticisms, but they mean very little to me since they are not valid criticisms. As Churchill remarked: Many forms of Gov-ern-ment have been tried, and will be tried in this world of sin and woe. No one pre-tends that democ-racy is per-fect or all-wise. Indeed it has been said that democ-racy is the worst form of Gov-ern-ment except for all those other forms that have been tried from time to time....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Ya, and science has not found one yet. .

Malcolm wrote:

Mt. Meru?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Wayfarer said:

As I pointed out, the fact that conditioned entities are derived from causes, is not a conception that is unique to Buddhism...

Malcolm wrote:

And as Nāgārjuna points out, "arising from causes" is incoherent.

Wayfarer said:

Does Nāgārjuna say that dependent origination is incoherent?

Malcolm wrote:

He says in the opening statement of the MMK that the meaning of dependent origination is that things do not perish nor do they arise; are not annihilated nor are they permanent; do not go nor do they come; are not different nor are they the same. Dependent origination pacifies proliferation about whether things, arise, perish, are annihilated, permanent, going, coming, different or the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

HHDL has certainly seen "the wisdom in the liberal, secular and open society" - see Beyond Religion: Ethics for a Whole World <http://www.dalailama.com/biography/books>.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know — I was referring not to him, but to others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 10:04 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The only meanings are those we invent. In that sense, Western naturalism pretends to be 'value-free' but it's actually 'value-negative' insofar as it denies that there can be a real basis for values beyond the utilitarian - the greatest good for the greatest number. The idea that there is something 'inherently good' is not conceivable in its terms.

Malcolm wrote:

Meanings are invented, consensual and conventional.

As for your second sentence, it is very questionable that metaphysical naturalism is necessarily grounded in utilitarianism — I think you are making too broad a claim. For example, take this definition in which there is no species of utilitarianism mentioned: Naturalism, in recent usage, is a species of philosophical monism according to which whatever exists or happens is natural in the sense of being susceptible to explanation through methods which, although paradigmatically exemplified in the natural sciences, are continuous from domain to domain of objects and events. Hence, naturalism is polemically defined as repudiating the view that there exists or could exist any entities which lie, in principle, beyond the scope of scientific explanation.

Buddhadharma [and Jaindharma] in this respect is also a species of metaphysical naturalism — in Buddhadharma there is no mystery precisely because "whatever exists or happens is natural" and there does not exist nor could exist "any entities which lie, in principle, beyond the scope of Dharma explanation."

In other religions however [sans philosophical Taoism and Confucism], there is a profound mystery, God, through whose agency all things are created.

Indeed, this is one of the reasons why Buddhadharma is so appealing to westerners with liberal educations. The naturalism of Buddhadharma and philosophical Taoism fit well into our already metaphysically naturalist predilections.

HH Dalai Lama exemplifies this view with his confidence that indeed science can explain confirm, and justify any and all Buddhist beliefs, but even more than that, he recommends abandoning any Buddhist tenets that are directly contradicted by scientific explanation and found to be definitely false from a scientific point of view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 11:35 AM

Title: Re: DW and Political Bias

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Left-vs-Right-politics.png

dzoki said:

Is UKIP conservative? I had the impression that they are libertarian.

Malcolm wrote:

Libertarians are generally conservative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 11:15 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

tingdzin said:

Excellent comments in a generally enlightening discussion. So it seems that the situation in the secular Western world is that it has for all practical purposes abandoned any notion of the sacred in favor of a consensus model which, as Queequeg pointed out earlier, is fungible as the whims of a mob.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem is, as is proven again and again, ideas of the "sacred" are just consensus notions as well, and just as fungible.

tingdzin said:

For me, it follows from that that each of us has to have some sense of what is "sacred" (don't let the word itself throw you, it's just a word) in Buddhism and why. If we have no experience of that, or lose sight of it, then all we are doing is blindly applying one more set of rules instead of applying the perspective of inner cultivation which is crucial to the Buddhist path.

Malcolm wrote:

\

"Rights" are not rules — laws are passed in order to preserve and defend rights. It is amazing to me that in this day and age that intelligent people, especially followers of Dharma, do not see the wisdom in the liberal, secular and open society that is the goal towards which the framers of the constitution were striving. Rights are the very thing that allow all of us the leisure and freedom to pursue the very inner cultivation which you extol here.

tingdzin said:

Sure, Chinese, Indians, and Africans can learn to speak in that way [i.e. about human equality], but those notions are unintelligible in their native cultures. They may just be mimicking what they have been taught.

Malcolm wrote:

This is quite patronizing. All people have an intuitive sense of their own rights and the rights of others, they do not need to be "taught", nor do they "mimick" once they have been taught.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 6:25 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Queequeg said:

One of the problems in the West with the rise of Secularism is that the entire Rights framework is ungrounded when religion, and specifically, God, is removed from the equation. The idea of Rights comes from a variety of sources including in no small part, Natural Law which has been understood as God's Law.

Malcolm wrote:

You should read Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic. It may cause you to revise your opinion.

Although America's revolutionary deists lavished many sincere expressions of adoration upon their deity, deism is in fact functionally indistinguishable from what we would now call "pantheism"; and pantheism is really just a pretty word for atheism. While deism could often be associated with moderation in politics, it served principally to advance a system of thought that was revolutionary in its essence and effects. This essentially atheistic and revolutionary aspect of deism, I further contend, is central to any credible explanation of the revolutionary dimension of the American Revolution.

Queequeg said:

No, not really. The Founders were also profoundly influenced by the Roman Republic. Hamilton's ideal ruler was Julius Caesar. If you're familiar with ancient Roman civilization, especially as presented in Suetonius, Plutarch, Tacitus, etc., and then look at the early Americans, a very strong argument can be made that this is what they were modeling themselves on. For visual proof, look at Federal architecture and design; look at Washington DC. Their Deism/Pantheism looks and sounds like religion in the Roman Republic and early Roman Empire. Admittedly, it doesn't have the fervor and fanaticism of the Judeo-Christian sense, but there is still an underlying view of the world as conforming to a Natural Law; we may be looking at pantheism, but under that is a single divine order - not atheism. This guy is going too far. Admittedly I have not read any more of this article, but I don't think I need to if he thinks atheism "is central to any credible explanation of the revolutionary dimension of the American Revolution."

Malcolm wrote:

It is in fact an entire book, a large part of which concerns exploring the history of ideas behind Ethan Allen's Reason, the Only Oracle of Man: Or, A Compenduous System of Natural Religion. You should read the book in its entirety.

Queequeg said:

The Founders were influenced by Locke, not Bentham. If they were actually atheists, then Bentham would have gotten more play. Then again, they would not be able to say independence is compelled by Nature's Law and they would lose their basis in the inviolable fabric of reality for their revolution.

Malcolm wrote:

I never mentioned Bentham.

Again:

In a vital letter to John Adams, Jefferson makes clear that these Epicurean doctrines are essentially his own. "I feel therefore I exist. I feel bodies which are not myself: there are other existencies then. I call them matter," he writes. 69 Here he quietly paraphrases Lucretius, who says, "The common sensation of all men proves the existence of matter." Jefferson continues: "I feel them changing place. This gives me motion. Where there is an absence of matter, I call it void, or nothing, or immaterial space." Here he is all but quoting Lucretius: "There is, then, intangible space, void, and vacuity. Otherwise, movement would be absolutely impossible." Jefferson's conclusion is definitive, even militant: "To talk of immaterial existences is to talk of nothings. To say that the human soul, angels, god, are immaterial is to say that they are nothings." And here is Epicurus himself: "Those who say that the soul is incorporeal are talking nonsense." On the sources that inspired his views, Jefferson adds, "I believe I am supported in my creed of materialism by Locke, Tracy, and Stewart." But the manner in which he lapses into the language of Lucretius to articulate his ideas suggests that these later philosophers, whether consciously or not, served mainly as conduits for an ancient doctrine. Stewart, Matthew (2014-07-01). Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic (p. 99). W. W. Norton & Company. Kindle Edition.

Queequeg said:

Maybe its also appropriate to point out on the day before Thanksgiving - another critically important document in early American identity is Winthrop's sermon, "City upon a Hill."

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a revolutionary period document. There are miles of difference between Puritans like Winthrop and "deists" like Franklin, Jefferson, etc.

Queequeg said:

Maybe the reason I have no problem with seeing America as Christian

Malcolm wrote:

America was never a Christian country, as it made very clear by Adams in the treaty with the Barbary pirates.

Queequeg said:

Anyways, whatever. When we all agree to hold something inviolable - ie. sacred - then we all have a common ground to build on. Without it, we're all but doomed to the fate of Babel.

Malcolm wrote:

Rights are inviolable and inalienable [i.e. inherent], and do not depend on being granted by some deity — a deity, who in any case, a large majority of the leaders of the American revolution did not believe in at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Wayfarer said:

As I pointed out, the fact that conditioned entities are derived from causes, is not a conception that is unique to Buddhism...

Malcolm wrote:

And as Nāgārjuna points out, "arising from causes" is incoherent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

conebeckham said:

Neither Buddha nor Nagarjuna, nor any Madhyamaka teacher, argues for complete and utter nonexistence.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, as Buddhapalita states, "We do not claim nonexistence, we merely remove claims that existents exist."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 26th, 2015 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

MiphamFan said:

What do you mean?

Malcolm wrote:

Their view is shorter, their results more shallow, they feel more satisfied with less...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that to practice Buddhadharma at all, you need a teacher. Otherwise, you are just left with this sort of vague intellectual idea of what it means to practice. You need a teacher so that you can check your understanding. A book cannot do this for you.

Fortyeightvows said:

that sounds correct to me and it seems like this gets brought up here often.

however we do know that in many mahayana sutras, which are the words of shakymuni buddha, that explain the benefits of reading them and listening to them. the traditions of tibet venerate many of these same sutras.

so while reading these sutras may not check your level of practice, they are still of incredible benefit.

you don't see these same types of promises in some other books or texts.

so should we read the book or text which suggests it only be read under some conditions, even if we do not have those conditions?

or should we read the text which promises mountains of merit to the reader?

if one truly believes in these things.....

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāyāna sūtras themselves extol the benefit of relying on a teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:55 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth, Karma & Emptiness

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

The Buddha said that he couldn't find anything permanent in the 5 aggregates. If you say that it is the mindstream that is reborn, then you are saying that the mindstream is independent of the 5 aggregates. You are saying that the 5 aggregates can disintegrate but the mindstream continues.

Malcolm wrote:

The mind stream is made up of impermanent serial moments of consciousness, thus there is no contradiction.

Bodhidharma said:

The fact that those "impermanent" serial moments of consciousness always associate with each other through lifetimes suggest that there is independence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, these moments perish as soon as they arise, causing the next in the series to arise. Thus, there is no independence, all such moments are dependent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:54 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth, Karma & Emptiness

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

I am sorry to say that I find the illustration poor. This suggests that the "water" survives the disintegration of the 5 aggregates and is therefore, independent.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing transfers, but nevertheless, there is serial continuity. This is because in general causes and effects are neither the same nor different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:52 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth, Karma & Emptiness

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

Causes give rise to effects....but why must effects necessarily be associated with the one who acted. This is what rebirth suggests. We are reborn with the causes of previous lives where in the new life, we expect the effects to ripen. To connect the effects to us means that there is something that is not dependent arising

Malcolm wrote:

No. The actions of a previous life do not depend on the presence of that past agent to ripen on a present recipient of action. All that is necessary is that there is a serial link between the past agent and the present experiencer of ripening. That is accounted for by the serial, momentary mind stream.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:49 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth, Karma & Emptiness

Content:

Bodhidharma said:

The Buddha said that he couldn't find anything permanent in the 5 aggregates. If you say that it is the mindstream that is reborn, then you are saying that the mindstream is independent of the 5 aggregates. You are saying that the 5 aggregates can disintegrate but the mindstream continues.

Malcolm wrote:

The mind stream is made up of impermanent serial moments of consciousness, thus there is no contradiction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:25 PM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, people who practice only for this life get "faster" results.

smcj said:

I take it you've given up on regularly meditating on the '4 thought that turn the mind from samsara'.

Malcolm wrote:

"faster" is in scare quotes for a reason...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:04 PM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

smcj said:

I think it can be in this lifetime.

By all accounts it definitely can. However frustratingly it seems to be the case where if you practice "for this life" you do not get the results, but if you practice with the perspective of multiple lives it can happen in this life. It seems to have something to do with attachments to this life.

Now ain't that a kick in the butt?

tingdzin said:

Well, I wouldn't say "ONLY lack of self-confidence". I know a lot of people with all the self-confidence in the world, but who are nevertheless (and in some cases precisely BECAUSE of this self-confidence) probably going to be stuck where they are for a long time.

smcj said:

Yep.

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, people who practice only for this life get "faster" results.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 10:54 AM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

Nosta said:

But my point is this: since I cannot have teachers (I dont have anyone near me, I live in a non-buddhist country in a area without buddhists at all), can I, at least, practice such teachings? I the feeling that I cant even try some of the teachings without transmission or I will not receive even 0,01% of the benefits.

I hope you can understand my position: I dont want to be superior to others have practice without a teacher. I would love to have a [real] Guru near me, able to teach me. I would love to learn some of the teachings. But the only thing I can do is read some books and learn and practice from them.

Terma said:

First of all, I don't think anyone is trying to discourage you from practicing. Tibetan Buddhism has a very wide scope and there are many Mahayana practices that you could do, as well as shamata (calm abiding meditation), and other practices such as cultivating Bodhicitta .

But any such practice which falls under Vajrayana requires a transmission and at least a little instruction. As Malcolm pointed out, without a teacher this simply is not possible.

Malcolm wrote:

My point is that to practice Buddhadharma at all, you need a teacher. Otherwise, you are just left with this sort of vague intellectual idea of what it means to practice. You need a teacher so that you can check your understanding. A book cannot do this for you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Wayfarer said:

If you were playing Russian roulette - not that anyone should! - then you have a revolver with one bullet in six chambers. So in five chambers, no bullet exists; in one chamber, it does exist. Pull the trigger on that chamber, you die; pull it on the others, you don't. So is the bullet in the sixth chamber 'not truly existent'?

Malcolm wrote:

No, the bullet in the chamber conventionally exists.

Wayfarer said:

I think the 'realisation of emptiness' is actually a state of being, in which you're aware of the interdependent nature of everything. That is the 'antidote to clinging' in my opinion. And what 'clinging' is, is the belief that the phenomenal realm, the domain of sense, is the only reality, which is worldliness.

Malcolm wrote:

You have given into realism, in so far as that you think the phenomena realm is real, in any sense at all.

I looked up some google references on this topic. In Jay Garfield's essay, Why Madhyamika is not Nihilism, there is a quote from Tsongkhapa:

The key there is 'from the perspective of those people to whom we are speaking'. (I am among them!) So from the conventional viewpoint - their viewpoint - objects exist, and to deny they exist is nihilism. But from the ultimate viewpoint, objects are unreal, because they are essenceless. However that audience doesn't yet understand what 'essenceless' means.

As Buddhapalita says, "It is not that we claim nonexistence; we merely remove claims for existing existents."

Wayfarer said:

So there's no way to understand this if there are not degrees of reality.

Malcolm wrote:

There are no degrees of reality -- things are either real or they are not, whether or not they appear to be real. It is more accurate to say there are levels of appearances. Those levels of appearance depend on the presence or absence of delusion. A buddha could not be harmed by the bullet in the chamber.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 3:41 AM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

Nosta said:

So such books are not useful at all for someone without a teacher??

But I read some interesting things about the resting meditation of a kusulu. Why cant I just do that?

Malcolm wrote:

You can do whatever you like, but no one can guarantee the results.

All the buddhas of the three times had a guru, you are no different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

I am but an amateur here, but to my knowledge Prasangika does not get rid of the distinction between 'external objects' and 'appearances' the way you suggest it does. At least not according to Longchenpa.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, "Prasangikas" in general are happy with whatever conventional truth view you want to bring to the table. They may not agree with specifics of this or that view, but as they are all conventional, and therefore, rooted in delusion, conventional truths are not to be taken that seriously. But some people just don't get this and waste a lot of time arguing over the number of horns a rabbit has.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Gur

Content:

Nosta said:

Can you practice Tibetan Buddhism without ever had a Guru (or master, rinpoche, whatever you call it)?

In every book I find* they always say -somewhere in the book- that you need to receive instructions in order to practice. Its like such books were made only for someone who already had a transmission (or empowerment...I dont know if there is any difference between such words).

Malcolm wrote:

You need a teacher. It is really that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: Steven Seagal

Content:

smcj said:

Getting back on topic, maybe Rinpoche can cast Seagal in his next movie:

I'm a film crew member. I'd work on one of DKR's projects. It would be interesting, but I'd have to relate to him as "the director", not "the "lama".

Malcolm wrote:

On set, is there a difference?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: What did Nagarjuna mean?

Content:

Dan74 said:

Maybe Nagarjuna is more about unlearning than learning? Unlearning all the self-making, all the affirmation-making, all the negation-making, all the dualisms? Not unlearning completely but just letting go so that reality shines through the conceptual blinkers that we are so used to? And also seeing that the concept-making and the blinkers are the reality itself, are not-two from Nirvana, except that we get fooled by them. Even this getting fooled isn't anything real or external but an ancient habit, misunderstanding built on a misunderstanding, completely empty.

Trying to apprehend Nagarjuna might be a little like trying to grasp a sword that's swishing furiously in front of you. Put forward all that needs to be shredded to pieces, all the delusion, but try to grasp it and you'll get hurt.

/

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Nāgārjuna is not really all that difficult to understand — it is the acceptance of that understanding that is difficult.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Combatting extremism

Content:

MiphamFan said:

The status of women in Islam today is worse than 18th century Europe. How to fix it within our lifetimes?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, by encouraging Muslims to adopt liberal values, for one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 25th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Matt J said:

So while on break, I've picked up a copy of the Ninth's Karmapa's Feast for the Fortunate. In the introduction, there is discussion about how Tsongkapa positing the inherent existence of a vase as the object of refutation, and that this is somehow different than the vase.

Malcolm wrote:

This objection has its origins in Gorampa's writings, in fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2015 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Combatting extremism

Content:

mirrormind said:

...the status of women in society.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as I wrote elsewhere, the core conflict between fundamentalists of all stripes [including Buddhist fundamentalists] and liberal values is the status of women.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2015 at 10:47 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The problem is that if you leave it at the point of saying that 'nothing really exists', you fall into nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not proclaim that nothing exists. One discovers that no existents can be found. This is why Buddhapalita states, "We do not claim nonexistence, we merely remove the claim that existents exist."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2015 at 6:02 AM

Title: Re: French Immigration Policies

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

It's not that the policy was too permissive. As I mentioned, immigration is absolutely key to the French economy. The problem with the policy is that it did little to integrate the immigrant populations in the face of deeply entrenched discrimination. It was only half a policy. The solution is not to stop immigration, the solution is to remove the barriers for immigrants taking full part in opportunity.

Malcolm wrote:

Prior to 74, French Immigration policy was full assimilation, i.e., become French. They relaxed that, and replaced it with "integration."

Karma Dorje said:

The unfortunate thing is that we are seeing fascism rear its head throughout the West. Trump's recent rallies remind me of the scene from the Wall with 'In The Flesh' playing. That guy is like a malevolent carnival barker.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is very unfortunate. The only thing we can hope is that Trump has pissed off enough women, blacks, and latinos to ensure he will never be elected and that the election will not even be in doubt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2015 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: French Immigration Policies

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

In many ways, the North African immigrant experience in France parallels the Mexican immigrant experience in the US.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, which is why they are returning to Mexico, etc. in the hundreds of thousands. They just dont need to take this shit from fascist demagogues like Trump anymore.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2015 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: French Immigration Policies

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they do face these issues, there is no doubt. Nevertheless, it is not the case that immigration policies caused these problems, unless by this you mean that France gave up the policy of assimilating immigrants — expecting them to adopt French culture and values — and instead encouraged immigrants to retain their original culture and traditions.

Karma Dorje said:

The problem was not bringing in immigrants. Many European countries have low birth rates and depend on immigration to maintain their economies. The problem was that France brought them in as de facto second-class citizens. While they expected them to adopt French culture and values, they were still discriminated against even if they did. While progressives in France are amongst the best educated in the world, there is a strong current of bigotry that often extends to the highest office in the land.

In many ways, the North African immigrant experience in France parallels the Mexican immigrant experience in the US.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so the problem is not immigration policies, per se. The issue is the colonial biases which still govern how many French people regard those from former French colonies.

Nevertheless, there were people who were North African descent among the people killed in France on Nov 13th, 1 Moroccan, 2 Algerians, 2 Tunisians and 1 Turk: 6 Muslims out of 130 people killed. And of course many more seriously injured.

Still, it makes no sense to try and pin the blame on some mistaken or permissive policy the French had for these attacks. It just contributes to the rise of fascist sentiments to give into scapegoating of Muslims in general, as I know you will agree.

Look at the hysteria in the US over Syrian refugees just because one guy had a fake Syrian passport. Now the Republicons are all worked up in a rabid slather.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 24th, 2015 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: French Immigration Policies

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Those neighborhoods did not form because of immigration policy, they formed because they were places where immigrants could afford to live.

Karma Dorje said:

That's not entirely true. Many of the banlieue in question were low-income housing projects built to house Algerian and other African workers that came to France to rebuild infrastructure. France did a horrible job of integrating these workers into society. They face racism at every turn and high unemployment caused by discrimination.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they do face these issues, there is no doubt. Nevertheless, it is not the case that immigration policies caused these problems, unless by this you mean that France gave up the policy of assimilating immigrants — expecting them to adopt French culture and values — and instead encouraged immigrants to retain their original culture and traditions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 23rd, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Samsara is ordinary appearances and conceptions (ordinary experience) and according to Tantra it's this that has to be abandoned in order to attain enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, not even in sūtra, as the Āryabodhisattva-pitika states:

Developing sorrow for samsara is the provisional meaning;

The non-duality of samsara and nirvana is the definitive meaning.

The Hevajra Tantra states:

Having abandoned samsara for another,
nirvana will not be realized.

Samsara is form, sound and so on, these phenomena are nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 23rd, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

Dharma should be completely free from politics. Samsara cannot be fixed, it must be abandoned and to do this, spiritual paths must be free of worldly motivations.

Emptiness, and especially Tantra, is real anarchism.

Malcolm wrote:

The Hevajra Tantra explains nirvana can't be realized by abandoning samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Origin of mankind and animals according Buddhism.

Content:

paël said:

Were the first animals of this world born from egg, womb, moisture or miracle (4 forms of birth)?

Malcolm wrote:

The first three, no animals are born by miraculous birth.

But, there is no account I am aware that goes into detail on this issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Something Else the French Got Right viz Terrorism

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Terrorist attack in Mali

<http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-34877069>

Northern Mali is still a jihadist front

<http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2013/10/the-new-terrorist-training-ground/309446/>

Malcolm wrote:

That article is two years old.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Hyperbole around Syrian refugees in US

Content:

Dan74 said:

Anyone who thinks that the hundreds of thousands of refugees streaming into Europe are some sort of a covert Muslim army, needs to up the dose of their antipsychotics. Of course accepting them is the compassionate thing to do, but we should also see if we are ready to do much more - to do what it takes to successfully integrate them. This is the crux of the matter and it is no simple thing to integrate people coming from a very different culture and traumatised by the war. This is not a trivial matter and as much as progressives would like to sweep it under the carpet and the right-wing alarmists continue to whip up hysteria, there are very pragmatic considerations that need to be made, IMO. It entails a great deal of work.

Malcolm wrote:

Progressives are not sweeping the issue under the rug, they are embracing it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Hyperbole around Syrian refugees in US

Content:

DGA said:

Those of us who passed US history in high school may remember learning about Operation Wetback (for non-US readers--"wetback" is a racist slur against Latinos, particularly persons of Mexican descent)...

Malcolm wrote:

It is important to remember however that Operation Wetback was started because the Mexican Govt. wanted us to repatriate Mexicans illegally living in the US. We do not initiate it.

DGA said:

It's not necessary to initiate something in order to administer it. And that's what the Eisenhower administration did. There's another parallel--the Mexican economy fares very well with remittances sent home from expatriated family members working in El Norte, and the current Mexican gov't isn't going to disrupt that at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes we did administer from our side of the border, but the point I am making is that everyone paints Operation Wetback something the US started. We would not have started it. It started because the Bracero program failed, and significantly, because Mexico fields 5000 troops to the US border. That being said, I am not defending it.

DGA said:

more to the point, though: trying to initiate another round of this is just absurd and unworkable.

Malcolm wrote:

We agree, and now the less rational part of the GOP is doubling down on "yellow stars" for Muslims living in the US.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Refuge and practice from other religions

Content:

Lobsang said:

Yeah, also, I have one more question, there are mantras, for example, the Samjnaya mantra from the Golden Light sutra, that invoke 'Hindu' deities (Brahma, Indra), wouldn't that be also countering the Refuge?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are Lokapālas, mundane protectors of Dharma. Also "Brahma" and "Indra" are really more postions of devas than individual devas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Origin of mankind and animals according Buddhism.

Content:

Seishin said:

Does he say "mankind" or does he say "beings"?

Malcolm wrote:

Humans. But to answer the question, the asura, human, animal, preta and hells realm were all gradually filled sentient beings who took rebirth there from the third and fourth form realm.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

dhammafriend said:

From the Charter for Human Rights:

Article 1. All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Now tell me, how on earth the above statement makes objective sense outside of Semitic theological assumptions.

Malcolm wrote:

Because they are not Semitic theological assumptions, which general presume that people are not born free and equal, nor with dignity and rights.

dhammafriend said:

In fact, one could say the notion of 'rights' even generate conflicts.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, read the article supplied above.

dhammafriend said:

Need I remind you, we have tremendous cultural resources globally that can inform the discourse of rights for all people. South Asian and Asian cultures are rich with philosophies that deal with just that. Why are unscientific concepts like human rights, will, conscience etc boldly proclaimed as universal and objectively true? These ideas should ideally be sitting alongside other notions of the person and not be paraded around as facts.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, what is of value that you think contributes the philosophical conversation about theories of rights?

dhammafriend said:

Are we so intellectually bankrupt that we cannot conceive of better solutions for the decline in 'values'? Have we looked at social media? The internet and the flow of (mis)information, our shrinking communal spaces, lack of resources etc.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think our values have declined at all. In fact, apart from obvious barbarisms in the Middle East and Asia, I would say globally our values have all rather improved because humans are generally more well educated then they were 100 years ago.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

dhammafriend said:

My offering: the concept of (human) rights has it's origins in generic Christian theology.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily:

Intellectual historians have tangled over the origins of rights. These debates are sometimes framed in terms of when “the concept of a right” emerged. Yet insofar as it is really the emergence of the concept of a right that is at issue, the answer lies beyond the competence of the intellectual historian and within the domain of the anthropologist. Even the most primitive social order must include rules specifying that certain individuals or groups have special permission to perform certain actions. Moreover, even the most rudimentary human communities must have rules specifying that some are entitled to tell others what they must do. Such rules ascribe rights. The genesis of the concept of a right was simultaneous with reflective awareness of such social norms.

The more productive characterization of the debate within intellectual history concerns when a word or phrase appeared that has a meaning close to the meaning of our modern word. This debate turns on when in history the pre-modern “objective” sense of “right” came also to bear our modern, “subjective” sense of “a right.”

“Right” in its older, objective sense means “what is just” or “what is fair” (Finnis 1980, 206). Aristotle uses dikaion, for example, to indicate that a society is “rightly ordered”: that it displays the correct structure of human relationships “Right” in this objective sense can also be attributed to individuals. The Roman jurist Ulpian, for instance, held that justice means rendering each his right (ius). In this sense, a person's “right” is what is due to him given his role or status. This objective sense of “right” is not the same as our modern idea of “a right.” For instance, Ulpian noted that the ius of a parricide was to be sewn into a sack of snakes and tossed into the Tiber (Tierney 1997, 16).

The scholarly inquiry into when our modern, subjective sense of “a right” became established as a meaning of some word or phrase has proved long and divisive. The ancient authors often used words imprecisely, and smeared their meanings across and beyond the Hohfeldian categories. The intellectual historians themselves have occasionally congested the discussion by taking different features of rights as definitive of the modern concept. Moreover, the scholarly debate has sometimes accepted over-optimistic assumptions about the sharpness of conceptual boundaries.

Nevertheless, two broad trends in the scholarly discussions are clear. The first is to push the origins of a term indicating a modern, subjective sense of “a right” back further into history: from Locke to Hobbes to Grotius in the seventeenth century, then to Gerson in the fifteenth century, Ockham in the fourteenth, perhaps even to Gratian in the twelfth (Brett 1997, Tierney 1997). Donohue (2010) now argues that ius is used in a subjective sense throughout the works of the classical Roman jurists in the first century BCE to the third century CE.

The second and related trend has been to establish that terms referring to active rights (what we would call privilege-rights and power-rights) predate terms referring to passive rights (what we would call claim-rights and immunity-rights). It appears that the earliest medieval debates using recognizably modern rights-language, for instance, concerned topics such as whether the pope has a (power-) right to rule an earthly empire, and whether the poor have a (privilege-) right to take what they need from the surplus of the rich.

<http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/rights/#3>

The rest of the article is worth reading because it clarifies many things.

Why does it have to be founded on (christian) notions that various societies cannot agree on?

They are not.

dhammafriend said:

Because in reality, thats really what we do. We agitate, we lobby, we protest, we disrupt, we destroy. All with the goal of finding 'space' for ourselves and our communities. The notion that all human beings are equal (equal to what?) makes no sense if you're not from a Semitic culture. Sure Chinese, Indians and Africans can learn to speak in that way, but those notions are unintelligible in their native cultures.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahah, it makes perfect sense if you are a Mahāyāna Buddhist, we all have buddhanature.

dhammafriend said:

They may just be mimicking what they've been taught. The other mistaken assumption is that they (Indians etc who communicate in english) are referring to the same object (the sacred) in their experiential world that english speakers are.

Malcolm wrote:

Read the provided article. The modern issue really begins with Locke, who was in no way a Christian theologian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Refuge and practice from other religions

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

You can't impute Buddha on a worldly deity....

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahaha, well, I have news for you TKF, that is exactly what Pabhongkha in fact says.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tenso said:

Too much tolerance can lead to utter disaster as we have already seen now.

Malcolm wrote:

This is victim blaming. "Oh, the French were too tolerant. They should become less tolerant to prevent such attacks." This is really no different than saying of a women, "She dressed like a slut, no wonder she was raped."

maybay said:

As politically incorrect as that might be there is truth in it.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no truth in it.

maybay said:

The passions of men should be guarded against as any force of nature. This is just good advice.

Malcolm wrote:

Lets put them all in burqas then, shall we? This is just giving into the forces of unreason. Fundamentalists of all stripes all wish to control women and what they do with their bodies. This should be resisted and defied in every way.

maybay said:

So here, the blame falls on the state not the citizens. The first purpose of a sovereign state (the clothes if you like) is to secure the lives of its people (the slut), and if it fails to do that then it is reasonable for it to bare criticism. The victims here are the citizens not the state.

Malcolm wrote:

So now, you have just infantilized women as a class of people who not only cannot make good choices, but should not be allowed to make choices, or least, should have their choices dictated to them.

maybay said:

When people are attacked the state is actually strengthened. Wanting to go about naked and uncontrolled is a product of vanity and shamelessness (which is really just a variety of mindlessness), which when met with rebuke from the world leads to pride and indignation. It's hopelessly samsaric.

Malcolm wrote:

Wanting to have the right to make choices about one's body is quite understandable.

maybay said:

Actually, it is not the tolerance of the French that was the problem, it is the intolerance and hatred of a few extremists that is the problem.

Personally, I think the best response to this is doubling down on liberal, secular values, like Slut Walk:

In the Jataka righteousness is framed as a virtue, but it is over-abundant in the west. Your call to respond with more of the same is shallow. It is profligacy like this that infuriates fundamentalists. They don't strike at liberalism per se (statue of liberty). They attack its abuses (capitalist skyscrapers).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, we wouldn't want women to get all uppity now, would we? You are just basically taking up an oppressive refrain first applied to African Americans, and then anyone else who has called attention to their disadvantaged status through street protests.

I think there was once a fellow called Nigel Chamberlain. He pretty much argued the same way you do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 12:16 PM

Title: Re: Sources on Balance of Emptiness and Compassion

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I am interested in knowing what kinds of answers Buddhist texts, sutric and sastric, ancient and modern, give for reconciling the 'apparent' problem of perfect care for all beings, while abandoning conceptualisation. Discussions of meditations on compassion or wisdom in the sutras typically consider them separate, but does anyone know of sources which combine the two? Do you know of good arguments that the perfect state combining both compassion and wisdom are genuine psychological states, or are these rhetorical descriptions of the messianic mission of the Bodhisattva?

Why, upon attaining the Prajnaparamita, does the Bodhisattva also have the aspiration to help other beings, rather than just abide?

If you have answers that you formulated yourself, of course those are welcome, but I am specifically looking for textual sources. The earlier the better.

Malcolm wrote:
Dzogchen, baby.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:15 AM

Title: Re: French Immigration Policies

Content:

MiphamFan said:

French immigration policies allowed former colonial residents to migrate and form ghettos where dissent against the government could be fomented. I don't see how you can claim it's not due to their immigration policies.

Malcolm wrote:

Those neighborhoods did not form because of immigration policy, they formed because they were places where immigrants could afford to live.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:05 AM

Title: Re: DW and Political Bias

Content:

DGA said:

Generally, reasoned and fact-based discourse...

Malcolm wrote:

...tends to have a liberal bias.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 10:03 AM

Title: Re: Refuge and practice from other religions

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

If you take refuge in the Three Jewels, why would you want to practise something that isn't Buddhism? Taking refuge in Shiva is breaking the refuge commitment.

Malcolm wrote:

According to the logic given by Pabhongkha himself, if you regard Shiva [or insert worldly deity here] as a Buddha, then it there is no problem with taking refuge in him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is victim blaming. "Oh, the French were too tolerant. They should become less tolerant to prevent such attacks." This is really no different than saying of a women, "She dressed like a slut, no wonder she was raped."

Tenso said:

It has a lot to do with the immigration policies of France. They bring in a huge number of people in and allow Islamic ghettos to pop up all over the place which have been proven to be nothing but a breeding ground for these terrorists. You don't think that's a problem that France created for themselves?

Personally, I think the best response to this is doubling down on liberal, secular values, like Slut Walk:

That would do nothing but give more reasons for intolerant Muslims to hate the west.

Malcolm wrote:

I reply here:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=47&t=21289&p=311879#wrap>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: French Immigration Policies

Content:

Tenso said:

It has a lot to do with the immigration policies of France. They bring in a huge number of people in and allow Islamic ghettos to pop up all over the place which have been proven to be nothing but a breeding ground for these terrorists. You don't think that's a problem that France created for themselves?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I don't think this is correct. French immigration policies did not create this problem.

In this century, the first attack by an Islamist happened in March 2012. Then another in May, 2013. 3 in December 2014. Seven between January 2015 and now.

There are 4,155,000 Muslims and people of Muslim descent in France. I think it is a grotesque lie to claim that these attacks were caused by French Immigration policies. Most Muslims, or those of Muslim descent, in France are of either Algerian or Moroccan descent, immigrants from countries that were part of the French Empire.

It is estimated there are 1600 fighters in Isis from France. This is one out of every 2596 people of Muslim or Muslim descent in France. 18 for every one million people in France.

So, really, saying that this is a problem caused by French Immigration policies is just plain wrong.

Tenso said:

Personally, I think the best response to this is doubling down on liberal, secular values, like Slut Walk:

That would do nothing but give more reasons for intolerant Muslims to hate the west.

Malcolm wrote:

No, no more than claiming that woman who wear "provocative" clothes are giving rapists a justification for raping them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 3:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tenso said:

Too much tolerance can lead to utter disaster as we have already seen now.

Malcolm wrote:

This is victim blaming. "Oh, the French were too tolerant. They should become less tolerant to prevent such attacks." This is really no different than saying of a women, "She dressed like a slut, no wonder she was raped."

Actually, it is not the tolerance of the French that was the problem, it is the intolerance and hatred of a few extremists that is the problem.

Personally, I think the best response to this is doubling down on liberal, secular values, like Slut Walk:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

maybay said:

Tenso, why would you say we should abandon these values?

Malcolm wrote:
Did he?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: important buddhist text may have been authored by a woma

Content:

Tenso said:

Agreed. Talking from experience, we westerners are quite a narcissistic and egotistical bunch compared to our fellow practitioners in Asia.

DGA said:

Case in point...

<http://www.tricycle.com/interview/after-buddhism>

Malcolm wrote:

Saw him speak at Smith College recently. It was a snore.

However, again, I must disagree with Tenso. Ego and narcissism are social constructs, the difference between westerners and asians is mainly the source from where their ego and narcissism springs, asians are no less egotistical and narcissistic than westerners. They are just egotistical and narcissistic in a different way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 20th, 2015 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tenso said:

I agree with these values but they can also be considered a weakness. Look at France for example. An extremely liberal country and consistent victim of terrorist attacks.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I don't think we should abandon such values merely because there are some people who are insane enough not to see their value and benefit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Hyperbole around Syrian refugees in US

Content:

DGA said:

Those of us who passed US history in high school may remember learning about Operation Wetback (for non-US readers--"wetback" is a racist slur against Latinos, particularly persons of Mexican descent)...

Malcolm wrote:

It is important to remember however that Operation Wetback was started because the Mexican Govt. wanted us to repatriate Mexicans illegally living in the US. We do not initiate it.

DGA said:

Right now, the loudest voices in US political discourse are behaving, quite frankly, like cowards...

Malcolm wrote:

Bellicose cowards...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Alaya-vijnana it is shared or subjective storage?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What is the meaning of 'not established in any way?'

And isn't Bodhicitta distinguished by, or associated with, 'compassion for all sentient beings'?

Malcolm wrote:

Here, bodhicitta, awakened mind, refers to the basis, not compassion in the Mahāyāna sense. Not established means any predicates such as it exists, it does not exist and so on do not apply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 2:41 AM

Title: Re: chogyam trungpa ...?

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

boda said:

You don't believe Bodhisattvas are infallible?

smcj said:

Since a bodhisattva still has some traces of obstruction, to the same degree he "casts a shadow" and is fallible.

boda said:

Punya was saying that a Bodhisattvas wisdom is flawless. You don't believe this? You believe they can make mistakes?

Malcolm wrote:

When a Bodhisattva is in meditative equipoise, his wisdom is infallible. But Bodhisattvas do not spend their entire life sitting in meditation, so therefore, when they are not in equipoise, it is possible for them to have errors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

boda said:

Look at the video below from a documentary about him. He created an army and had his followers marching around for hours at a time. Seemingly somewhat antithetical to Buddhist practice, but we have to say that we are too ignorant to see the wisdom of it.

Malcolm wrote:

Speak for yourself.

boda said:

You don't believe Bodhisattvas are infallible?

Malcolm wrote:

That is not what I meant, but nevertheless, I will explain. Not all of use are too ignorant to see the wisdom of Trungpa's methods, which is why I posted Gesar's picture, since Gesar is an example of a Buddha who led an army and defeated many enemies.

Now then, in response to your reply, my friend, I suggest you STUDY some Dharma, preferably with a qualified teacher.

Bodhisattvas are not infallible. Why? Because they have obscurations of knowledge, even right up to the tenth bhumi. And up to the seventh bhumi, they have obscurations of affliction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

boda said:

Look at the video below from a documentary about him. He created an army and had his followers marching around for hours at a time. Seemingly somewhat antithetical to Buddhist practice, but we have to say that we are too ignorant to see the wisdom of it.

Malcolm wrote:

Speak for yourself.

Gesar of Ling

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Alaya-vijnana it is shared or subjective storage?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I think I understand where OP is coming from with this question. If the alayavijnana is completely personal, then where are collective karmic traces stored? Do you just have ever your own personal copy of the collective karma?

Malcolm wrote:

There are not traces of collective karma. There are traces which sufficiently resemble each other in each of our minds to create a common vision of the container universe.

smcj said:

If I'm not mistaken this is the general consensus of the Cittamatra view, right? If so, and given your post from another thread, Not really, Dzogchen is not cittamatra.

With your second post I am led to believe that the "traces which sufficiently resemble each other in each of our minds to create a common vision of the container universe" is not a Dzogchen view, right? If I'm right about that, and that being the case, what is the Dzogchen perspective on the "commonality of the container universe"?

Malcolm wrote:

The distinction is basically this: in cittamatra, phenomena are mental events. The way Lonchenpa explains it is like this. Bodhicitta, awakened mind, is like space, it is the basis, but it is not established in anyway. Its potential or energy [rtsal] arises like the face of a mirror. The display of that potentiality is like the eight examples of illusion. Since the basis, its potential and display are not themselves established because they are all empty, they are nondual. These three are conventionally distinguished because of appearances. Thus, bodhicitta, potentiality and the display are neither single nor plural in terms of their essence, nevertheless, just like the reflections in the mirror cannot be said to be either the same nor different than the mirror's power to reflect, it is understood that the imputations which are the display of the potential of bodhicitta also do not exist either inside or outside of, and hence these appearances are called "nonexistent, clear appearances." Indeed, nothing at all is established in anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Loving Kindness Meditation

Content:

gloriasteinem said:

I think it is an emotion. Love comes from the heart, kindness too. I think the mind itself could be very cold or at least too conceptual to show these. They come from the heart chakra. I know it not because I'm emotional but because usually I'm not, I'm a more thoughtful person and there is a constant need for me to feel/learn this from outside, other people. Mind even when peaceful cannot give loving kindness but can give place for the heart to release such.

Seishin said:

I think metta is better translated as "benevolence" rather than loving kindness. Also note: metta is not love and kindness, it is kindness that is loving.

Malcolm wrote:

Maitri is the wish that someone have happiness and the cause of happiness. Translating metta/Matri as "love" is just fine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 19th, 2015 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Matt J said:

Mipham's Chittamattra approach to dharman resolves all those pesky questions about rebirth, siddhis, body of light, the brain.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, Dzogchen is not cittamattra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 18th, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

I'm disappointed by your response regarding the 'worldliness' of spiritual paths.

Spiritual paths can be in the world but not of the world - you have to have a Dharma that is matched to a person's capacity and ability to practice and it has to be practical but in order to function it has to be free from politics and worldly concerns. I'm surprised you don't understand this. A spiritual path cannot be leading you deeper into samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

A true spiritual path must engage the world, not seek to rise above it. We live in the world. Our path is only of value insofar as in transforming ourselves, others around us are transformed and in the end, the world is transformed. That transformation requires a stable country, economic prosperity and freedom for everyone. Those last three goals are best secured in an open, liberal, democratic state based on robust secular ethics. The Dalai Lama understands this, I am surprised you don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 18th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Alaya-vijnana it is shared or subjective storage?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I think I understand where OP is coming from with this question. If the alayavijnana is completely personal, then where are collective karmic traces stored? Do you just have ever your own personal copy of the collective karma?

Malcolm wrote:

There are not traces of collective karma. There are traces which sufficiently resemble each other in each of our minds to create a common vision of the container universe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 18th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

Ayu said:

Is there anybody still willing to discuss the topic?

Malcolm wrote:

Not in the face of suspension of freedom of speech. I can't believe you erased those links to Dabiq.

How do you expect people to be informed about the issues if you censor necessary information?

This server is located in the US, not in Europe. There is no law against reading the crazy, apocalyptic insanity promulgated by ISIS here in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 18th, 2015 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:
boda said:
...you should have explained me better sooner.

Malcolm wrote:
I did. A long time ago.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 18th, 2015 at 1:28 AM
Title: Re: No means No
Content:
amanitamusc said:
How are are you trying to help Malcolm boda?

Are you testing his patients ?

boda said:
For now I'd like to help him stop repeating himself.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, stop blaming others for your own lack of clarity, then I will stop.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 18th, 2015 at 1:08 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism
Content:
TKF said:
Pure spiritual traditions have to be free from politics because a spiritual life cannot be motivated by worldly concerns. Many spiritual traditions espouse meditation on death to overcome worldly concerns, and politics is worldly, so there is no place where Dharma and politics meet.

Malcolm wrote:
Again, you are being naive.

smcj said:
He may be naive, but he is technically correct. In this respect I am naive as well, but to a slightly lesser degree. (The Gelug emphasis on Lam Rim that I have in common with TKF are showing here.) The way I see it "pure spiritual traditions" is almost an oxymoron. Once money, power and prestige come into play with the creation of institutions, the 8 worldly dharmas begin to intrude. One of the reasons that I'm a fan of 12 step programs is that they have made a serious attempt at defusing 6 out of the 8 worldly dharmas. By that i mean that, according to their own bylaws, nobody is supposed to be able to make money, become famous, or pull power trips (+ or -) on anybody else. Unfortunately that leaves sex in the mix, and even Bill W. "13th stepped" a lot of women.

What is not an oxymoron is a "pure spiritual practice". That is an individual thing, and it can be done in any environment. It is possible to be on retreat and have your mind filled with motivations of money, sex, power and prestige. Or you can be like HHDL who was born into power and prestige and yet is unaffected by it. So no, on the level of the individual I don't think it is overly naive, but certainly not a given either. If you don't believe me just try it. And TKF is right; that is what the meditation on death is for. Most of us usually just toss it because it reminds us of Christianity.

Malcolm wrote:

He is being naive because there is no samsara without nirvana, and no nirvana without samsara. There is no such a thing as a pure spiritual tradition that exists outside the world. The idea that spiritual traditions should eschew worldly concerns is morally bankrupt, in my opinion, it is a form of impractical utopianism. It is from his utopian stance that he took up the banner of criticizing HHDL for advocating secular ethics to begin with. He does not, and you do not here, seem to understand that it is precisely the world that we have that creates the fertile swamp in which the lotus flower of the Dharma can blossom. Secular ethics in a liberal society give those lotuses the room they need to grow, because you can be sure they will not blossom at all in a fundamentalist Hindu, Jewish, Muslim or Christian society.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

gloriasteinem said:

It is that you prefer to be compassionate and loving towards muslim refugees and not fellow Buddhists who suffer from them. Of course it is a matter of choice. Obama himself is mostly muslim, quoting of Quran and refusing Christian celebrations, he also refused refugee status prior to christian refugees of Syria but prefers such of muslim origin.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no. You have been misinformed. Obama is Christian, attends a Christian church, the Evergreen Chapel, at Camp David. He attends the Protestant service.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

The separation of Dharma and politics is a value that comes from Dharma...

Malcolm wrote:

You are quite mistaken and naive here.

Tsongkhapa said:

...because a Dharma that is motivated by politics is not Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

This statement contradicts the above statement. Why?, because the imperative to separate Dharma from politics is primarily a political imperative, not a spiritual one. History, including that of Tibet, is filled with examples of Kings who imposed religions on the populace.

Tsongkhapa said:

Pure spiritual traditions have to be free from politics because a spiritual life cannot be motivated by worldly concerns. Many spiritual traditions espouse meditation on death to overcome worldly concerns, and politics is worldly, so there is no place where Dharma and politics meet.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, you are being naive.

Tsongkhapa said:

Freedoms have to be enshrined in law because we are deluded beings and the likelihood of being able to practice moral discipline is small but that's no substitute for genuine spirituality.

Malcolm wrote:

Freedoms have to be enshrined in laws because this is how people's rights are guaranteed. And not everyone wants a "spirituality", genuine or otherwise.

Tsongkhapa said:

Laws are political, a completely different thing to Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Laws are social, not merely political. Dharma also has politics. It is not good to bury your head in the sand.

Tsongkhapa said:

Secular ethics can be promoted by judges, the police and politicians, it doesn't need to be promoted by Spiritual Teachers who have a more important job to do in spreading genuine spirituality.

Malcolm wrote:

Religious teachers need to promote secular ethics as well. For example, one of the reasons there is a clash between the Muslim world and the West is that there are so many variations in religious Islamic law. The obvious solution to me is that Muslim religious leaders should support the open secular society in their countries as the best way to safeguard their own freedom to worship Allah as they see fit. It is for this reason that it is vitally important that spiritual teachers and secularists come together in agreement over common secular ethics so that EVERYONE can live in harmony and at the same time practice whatever spiritual tradition they want.

Your solution is a kind of religious isolationism — fine if you're Amish, but then, the Amish are disappearing, since they are not integrated into the larger US society.

Tsongkhapa said:

If everyone practises a genuine spiritual path there is no need to enshrine ethical values in law because people will practise moral discipline.

Malcolm wrote:

But the only genuine path you recognize is Buddhism. So, your view is as impractical as it is utopian.

There will never be a time on this planet when all people follow the Dharma just as there has never been a time on this planet when all people followed the Dharma.

Therefore, the realistic and practical alternative to your pie in the sky utopianism is the further development of the liberal secular state based on the principle of a democratic, open society. Actually, you and the people who think like you are making a huge mistake by deriding secular ethics. Why?, because the Dharma will have its best chance to touch the lives of many people in precisely the kind of open, liberal society I am advocating.

Tsongkhapa said:

You can argue that only those who possess the eight freedoms and ten endowments have the opportunity to practise Dharma but there may be many such people who have the potential to practise but cannot at the moment because they don't have access to a centre or to a Teacher, so we should try to provide that opportunity in my view and encourage people to find real solutions to their problems.

Malcolm wrote:

All sentient beings have the potential to practice Dharma, merely because they are sentient beings. But part of the 18 qualifications of a human birth is access to Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: The Buddha's Jihad! :D

Content:

DGA said:

"left wing liberal" is a strawman. It's also a contradiction in terms, at least in the context of US politics. "left wing" means ending capitalism. "liberal" means reducing state intervention--this is why the Clintons make such good bedfellows with Wall Street. One wants to privatize the economy; the other seeks to end private control over social and economic life. These are completely different objectives.

Paul said:

"Liberal" has changed meaning over time, especially in the US. It's usually taken to mean a combination of left wing economics with social liberalism. Isn't this completely common knowledge?

Malcolm wrote:

The reason why I say that there is no "liberal elite" is that quite frankly, there isn't one. It is a Fox News trigger word, meant to shut down the frontal lobe of its viewers, place them in a hypnotic state, in order to prepare them for being conditioned by talking points they want to shovel into the minds of their viewers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: No External Objects

Content:

Matt J said:

Maybe to go further, I will summarize my understanding of Mipham.

First, all we know of the external world are appearances in the mind.

Second, we infer common objects because we compare appearances with other minds. However, Mipham points out a few problems with this. First, we are using subjective impressions, which differ, to establish something that does not differ, i.e. external objects. There is a logical contradiction in using subjective impressions to prove objective objects. In addition, external objects are not appearances (they cause appearances), so they can be never known. If they can never be known, why posit it in the first place?

So instead of saying that there is a common external world, we say there are common karmic seeds.

I agree with Mipham but it doesn't seem to establish no external objects, it just makes me agnostic. Who knows what is beyond appearances? Maybe something, maybe nothing. Although, maybe this is his point--- even though he uses Chittamatra arguments, in the end he is a Madhyamika.

Malcolm wrote:

Your conclusion is known Tibetan tenet systems as "the half-eggest" Yogacara approach.

The general consensus is that the most profound Yogacara system, that of Ratnakarashanti, is the false aspectarian system, in which indeed, all external appearances are merely the activation of common and specific traces in our mindstreams.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: The Buddha's Jihad! :D

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

This is odd, but the intertwining of Buddhism with left wing liberal politics in the US seems to have something to do with the fact that it first came with Asian immigrants to our Pacific Coast. It spread into the mainstream from there alongside everything else we associate with the culture and politics of that region. This has "poisoned the well" for many when it comes to Dharma, and there are many who seek it out but ultimately give it up because of the interpretations of it they find available.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma first gained its currency among those who had experience in the Civil Rights and Anti-War movements in the 1950's and 1960's. This is one reason why Dharma attracts many people of progressive values, whether or not Asian Buddhists actually share or possessed those values.

Rita_Repulsa said:

For our liberal elites, Dharma seems to be this cool toy that can be wielded against hinterland dwellers for extra gravitas in an argument.

Malcolm wrote:

What liberal elites? There is no such thing.

Rita_Repulsa said:

Our elites, on the other hand, won't defend Dharma...

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, this is just empty rhetoric. You have no idea what you are talking about, and you also have no experience "defending" the Dharma against anyone or anything.

Rita_Repulsa said:

Dharma is a treasure. It's worth defending...

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha pointed out in one sūtra that the Dharma can never be destroyed from outside, but only from inside. All of this sturm and drung about defending the Dharma from some imaginary outside foe is simply deluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Obama hasn't given in to the fear-mongers:

<http://www.upworthy.com/3-things-president-obama-said-about-refugees-that-we-all-need-to-hear>

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, the governors of those US states claiming they won't accept refugees are just blathering on in ignorance. In reality, states within the US cannot close their borders to any persons residing in or visiting the US. When the Federal Govt. processes those Syrian refugees, they will settle them wherever they like.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

boda said:

Is there a forum rule about not mixing thought with questions?

Malcolm wrote:

No, but there is a general consensus that if you do not write clearly, you can't very well expect the blame lies with others if they do not understand you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 10:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm... have you looked at the state of the world today?

Tsongkhapa said:

Yes, I see a world that needs Dharma, not feel good platitudes. I rest my case.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you see that most humans lack the 18 qualifications that constitute a precious human birth?

Case closed.

By the way, secular ethics are not "feel good" platitudes. Secular ethics are necessary in order to negotiate fairness and justice between different peoples of different faiths and political orientations.

Let me give you an example. A number of years ago I was attending a conference at Smith College on Mongolia. As you know, Mongolia is a country where there are a large number of people who follow the practice of Dorje Shugden. A friend of my introduced me to the Secretary General of the Mongolian Consulate to the United States, because he was quite concerned about the Dorje Shugden practice, and felt that it was a large problem in his country. After discussing various problems with the practice and its history, he asked me point blank if Mongolia shouldn't just outlaw the practice. I asked him whether or not Mongolia has a law on the books about freedom of religion, and indeed it does. I pointed out to him that in this case, a country which believes in separation of Church and State cannot be involved in banning this or that religion. You will be shocked to learn that I said to him that this kind of policy could not happen in Mongolia, that the Mongolian Gvt. would be wrong to ban Shugden practice because they value religious freedom and so forth. He was not terribly happy with my answer, but he understood it.

You see, the point is that is an instance of secular ethics, the separation of church and state are vital to everyone's freedom. A liberal open society requires a firm grounding in secular ethics for the benefit of everyone. Secular ethics are the foundation of the liberal state, they are the foundation of any open society. Thus, even though I personally think the practice of Dorje Shugden is harmful and deeply misguided, by the same token, in a liberal state, an open society, I have no choice but to accept that there are those who wish to perform this practice because of their religious beliefs.

You yourself invoked a separation of Dharma and politics. This is not a value that comes from the Dharma, this is a secular value, which finds its roots in the establishment clause of the first amendment of the US Constitution. Your and my best hope for religious freedom, economic wellbeing and justice is based precisely on the very secular ethics you are deriding. In other words, when you live in a pluralistic, diverse society like the US and Europe, one has no choice but to develop a strong and robust framework of secular ethics. It is absolutely necessary for everyone's wellbeing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

boda said:

DGA appears to understand my interest. Maybe he's the forum telepath.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, after I pointed out that you did not ask a clear question that you wanted answered.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

tomschwarz said:

tsongkhapafan wants all to have access to the Dharma. that is a truly beautiful wish. I think we all need to go to your meditation class))))))))

Malcolm wrote:

We all want everyone to have access to Dharma. Some of us understand that this is not going to happen, and mostly because most humans do not have a precious human birth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

DGA said:

boda, I'll try to address your interest in the matter of seeming self-indulgence that isn't really in the context of the precepts.

What seems to happen seems to happen because of the afflictions of people. I see things the way I do--things seem to me the way they seem--because of my own conditioning, karma, problems, hangups, whatever. So I see someone take an action that may seem outrageous to me and I make certain assumptions about it, and have a certain kind of response. Where do those assumptions come from?

For example, there's a precept against harsh speech. OK, fine. One day I saw a teacher I respect very much shouting instructions VERY VERY LOUDLY AND DIRECTLY AND NOT POLITELY VERY HARSHLY HOLY MOLY at a student. It wasn't just a scolding. The teacher really ripped him a new one. Now, someone who witnessed this burst into tears. Why? Because she had grown up with an abusive father, and couldn't understand why anyone would resort to the methods of an abusive father like that. Someone else thought it was funny and had to stifle a laugh. And the person on the receiving end? Just apologized meekly and went on with his life in clear repose. That teacher clearly broke the precepts in a way that looked careless and, well, self-indulgent. It would have been harder to simply pull the student aside and have the "Hey now, we need to talk" conversation. Instead he just popped off and made an example out of the poor sap.

We later found out that the whole thing was a pre-arranged stunt to teach someone else a completely different lesson. It was Dharma theater, and it worked like a charm to break that third party of a pernicious habit. Now, was the response of the person who started crying true or false? Did the teacher really break the precept?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, today we should have provided a trigger warning, and made sure there was a "safe space."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

boda said:

I wrote "Besides those thoughts, I was wondering..." Besides means 'in addition to'. And had you read further my interests may have been clearer, or you may have just ignored what I wrote, or you didn't care to give it your full attention. Who knows.

Malcolm wrote:

A thought is not a question. What I observed was that everyone addressed your question, a few people tried to address your thoughts, but you castigated them for not addressing your question. If you don't write more clearly, people will not be able to answer you very well. It is your responsibility to communicate clearly, it is not our responsibility to guess at what you want in reply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 17th, 2015 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

BrianG said:

I will answer your question for the Nth time, hopefully this will clarify.

If the situation requires it, and it will benefit sentient beings, a Bodhisattva must break the precepts.

Which part of this is confusing to you?

boda said:

I suppose the confusing part is that no one is responding to what I'm actually asking about. And I've been explicitly clear about what I'm asking about.

Malcolm wrote:

The only question in your OP is:

I was wondering what else is okay for the advance practitioner besides intoxicants. Is lying, stealing, killing and sexual abuse also okay for the advanced practitioner? Is there a line and how do you determine it?

So, if no one is answering the question you intended to ask, it is because you did not ask a question apart from the one above. Many people have answered the question you actually asked. Mind reading is hard enough without having to try and do it over the internet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

TKF thinks we ought to be standing on street corners evangelizing the Dharma.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Malcolm is setting up a strawman because he doesn't agree with his idea about my views, which he misrepresents.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh, I don't agree with my own ideas? Ok.

Tsongkhapafan said:

I have never said that we should evangelise Dharma, what I have said is that Dharma should be readily available for those who are able to practise it and anyone with compassion would want to make it available, in an appropriate situation, for example by holding and advertising Buddhist meditation classes.

Malcolm wrote:

It is.

Tsongkhapafan said:

It seems to me that Teachers like the Dalai Lama have such a great opportunity, so selling secular ethics instead of genuine Dharma is selling people short as these will not lead to liberation and enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not "selling" secular ethics. The HHDL regularly gives advertised Dharma teachings in the West. He also understands, however, that a liberal society, based on secular democratic ideals, is the best way humans being have to get along with each other. Not everyone is interested in Buddhist ideas of enlightenment.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Any one can teach that we should be nice to people, it's a no brainer. What people need are methods to develop their love, compassion and wisdom, not just to be told that we should be more compassionate.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm... have you looked at the state of the world today?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: OT posts from "Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris"

Content:

philji said:

Can the heading of this thread be changed as it is misleading.. I cannot find one post about the Paris attacks????

Malcolm wrote:

OT means off topic...

Anyway, we are apparently not permitted to voice any comments about Islam itself, since all such critical comments will apparently be regarded as hate speech. But perhaps the mods will let this Muslim woman speak to the issues:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Or this one:

Ayaan Hirsi Ali (@Ayaan) | Twitter

<https://twitter.com/Ayaan>

1 day ago As long as Muslims say IS has nothing to with Islam or talk of Islamophobia they are not ready to reform their faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

tingdzin said:

A society with no state control was as much out of the question in 1930s Europe as it is today.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the idea of the absence of a state is frankly ridiculous. It is not like we are going to return to hunter-gather bands. One interesting trend to emerge from the anarchists in general however is Bookchin's Libertarian Municipalism — the platform of the Kurdish P.K.K., amazingly enough.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anti-state = incoherent and poorly thought out.

tingdzin said:

Buddhists have no business getting romantic notions about any political ideology.

Malcolm wrote:

I agree, to a point — but where I disagree is that I feel Dharma practitioners should support the modern liberal state along lines I have elsewhere outlined, and should be deeply engaged in the Environmental movement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

You won't find those purported 60% of Thai men quoting Buddhist scripture to support what they are doing. This has to do with Thai culture, not Buddhist culture.

Tenso said:

You sure about that?

A conqueror, a water channel, a creeping plant,
Women and the blind, these five,
How they are led by the crafty!
And this leading places them in the power of others.

182. A woman's appetite is twice (that of a man),
Her deceitfulness four times (as much),
Her shame six times,
And her passions eight times--so it is said.

194. When milk is got from a horn,
When the reed-flower drops honey,
Then, when a woman is true,
The lotus will grow in dry ground.

246. An evil man, gold, a drum,
A wild horse, women and cloth
Are controlled by beating.
These are not vessels for elegant doings.]

<http://www.sacred-texts.com/bud/srdb/srdb.htm>

Malcolm wrote:

Surely not one of Nagarjuna's high points. Buddhism too has some work to do in terms of ridding itself of adharmic sexism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 10:42 AM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

dreambow said:

Malcolm, 'Quite frankly, these are all side issues. The real issue, the core of the whole thing, is women's rights. And in general, most Muslims don't believe in this' This mechanical declaration is based on group think and its quite untrue. The terrorist attacks are so much more complex and multi layered then this flat, politically correct statement.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is based on having looked at what groups like ISIS actually say about the West, why they hate us, and the sheer amount of energy they spend oppressing women.

And, also frankly, most Muslim women are in subjugation. They do not enjoy the freedom that women in liberalized societies like ours do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 6:43 AM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Why only women's rights?

Malcolm wrote:

Because that is what they hate most about the West. They hate the fact that women in the west are not slaves of men. They basically hate women.

BrianG said:

Besides Saudis I haven't really noticed that. Indonesia is the most populous Muslim country, I've never noticed anything overly misogynistic about the people.

The criticism about "Muslims oppressing women" could easily be applied to Buddhist cultures. 60% of Thai men think it's ok to beat women. I have heard similar things about Tibetan men.

Regardless, I don't think women's rights are responsible for the Paris attack. ISIS is doing exactly what it has said it would - draw the west into the Middle East.

Malcolm wrote:

I said before this:

Women's rights, from over the control of their bodies to their ability to live free of control of men and so on are the main thing that fundamentalists hate, whether Christian, Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, etc.

You have to look at WHY they want to draw the West into a total war. It has everything to do with the slow, inexorable, dismantling of patriarchal power.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Isn't it more the case that secular philosophy often defines itself in such a way to distinguish itself from what it understands as religious thinking. So that often manifests as the criticism of what it sees as being religious elements that have appeared in Buddhism. In that view, of Bachelard and others, the original form was more like today's secular humanism, before it became associated with ideas from the surrounding culture, of which belief in rebirth was a key one.

dharmagoat said:

Overlooking, it seems, that the Buddha did actually teach rebirth himself. The question remains whether the Buddha taught rebirth as an expedient. It is a question that has no satisfactory answer.

Malcolm wrote:

It has a satisfactory answer — the answer is no. Buddha taught the existence of four kinds of realized persons defined by how many lifetimes it would take them to attain nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

This is why secular ethics is selling people short and we should make every effort to get Dharma to those who can practise it.

dharmagoat said:

You seem to be giving the impression that secular ethics and Buddhist ethics are mutually exclusive.

Aren't secular ethics a subset of Buddhist ethics?

Malcolm wrote:

TKF thinks we ought to be standing on street corners evangelizing the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Flight of the Garuda

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Tony Duff has one too.

Malcolm wrote:

I also have one. It will be published in due course.

swooping said:

Do you have any books that are currently available?

Is there a website or mailing list to here about new releases?

Malcolm wrote:

Wisdom is publishing one of my books next year.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Hmmm, I don't know, but I think hating women is a symptom, not a root cause.

They hate that other systems of values can exist without Allah mainly.

Western women converts often say they feel more respect under Islam for femininity.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because these women have been brainwashed. Women's rights are at the forefront of liberal values in the modern western world, when you attack those, you are attacking the very foundation of upon which the rights movement is presently built on. Women's rights, from over the control of their bodies to their ability to live free of control of men and so on are the main thing that fundamentalists hate, whether Christian, Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, etc. Women's rights are basic to all rights human beings enjoy. You may not see it this way now, but if you think about long enough, you will see that this whole thing between the Muslim world, and our fundamentalists at home is a result of the West's clumsily and blindly lurching beyond patriarchy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 16th, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Why only women's rights?

Malcolm wrote:

Because that is what they hate most about the West. They hate the fact that women in the west are not slaves of men. They basically hate women.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

[

That's true, of course, but how far back should we look?

I looked back about a century, and I think that's far enough for most purposes because it has the strongest impact on our present. It covers the lived history of everyone alive today, and most of the histories they heard from parents and grandparents.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

Quite frankly, these are all side issues. The real issue, the core of the whole thing, is women's rights. And in general, most Muslims don't believe in this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

If whenever someone says something you have no answer to you say it is not what you are talking about, then you must have no shortage of irrelevancies. No doubt this was also irrelevant.

Malcolm wrote:

I could have answered, but it is a waste of time, because your whole statement was irrelevant.

maybay said:

I am sure it applies to the object of critique, if we are open to debating it.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not apply, because I was not recommending any of the things Dudjom Rinpoche was criticizing.

maybay said:

She wasn't deluded on that count, they were trying to discredit him.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that there is no substance in your criticisms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: No means No

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Funny -- I was just reading a <https://bhikkhucintita.wordpress.com/home/blog/> by Bhikkhu Cintita, a Theravadin monk, on the topic of ethics. He writes:

The weaknesses of precepts as guides to ethical conduct are that they...don't permit appropriate exceptions, that is, precepts are porous and rigid. There is the case in which the Gestapo shows up at our front door and asks us, gleefully aware that a Buddhist will not lie, if we are hiding Jews in the attic, or that in which one of us just happens to be returning from a softball game with a bat in his hand and walk in right behind a man who has just "gone postal" and is about to embark on taking out fellow employees. There are, moreover, many harmful, generally mildly harmful, behaviors that simply are not covered in precepts, like taking up two parking spaces.

Nonetheless, it is significant that the Buddha rarely sanctioned exceptions to precepts to correct their rigidity. I suspect this is because he wanted us to be fully aware of, and live with, the contradictory nature of the human condition rather than regulating it away. How do you think a good Buddhist should behave in the kinds of situations he mentions?

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty obvious — you lie to the Gestapo and strike down the man who is killing others with the bat. This is proper Buddhist response. Any other response is irresponsible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

smcj said:

For example, in order to destroy the world, kill millions of Jews and so on, Hitler had to have had great merit to rise to such power; the same can be said of Stalin and Mao.

I don't think that is right.

Malcolm wrote:

You would be wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

Zooming into the details you hope to distract from the bigger picture of falling morality and a Dharma in decline...

Malcolm wrote:

Now you pretend to know my inner motivations? Shame on you for being so presumptuous.

maybay said:

One cannot take the lives of disembodied beings. Sorry, it is just not possible. It doesn't matter. The point is not to take what you think is life, just as actions in a dream bare karmic fruit.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it matters, if you are being accurate and truthful. Something you supposedly hold as a value.

maybay said:

It is not possible to take responsibility for anyone's behavior but one's own. One cannot control what others do, nor should one try, unless those persons are acting out of bounds of law or parental authority.

By living with people, by choosing a certain profession, a certain employment, a city, by associating on an Internet forum, with a Gar about to go bureaucratic, you are effectively endorsing them. It is unavoidable that you as an ignorant sentient being, should be affected by their actions and they by yours, because unless you have seen through the illusion of your individuality you will be subject to that shared experience.

Malcolm wrote:

This is irrelevant. You like to bring in irrelevancies, I have noticed.

maybay said:

I have not asked anyone to abandon anything.

Noted, but the word I used was provoke.

Malcolm wrote:

I have not provoked anyone either.

maybay said:

This does not apply to what I am saying.

This is unfortunate. There is no better way to establish authority than through the writings of a master.

Malcolm wrote:

When using an authority, you should make sure it applies to the object of your critique. Otherwise, you will waste a lot of time writing things that miss the side of the barn, much less hit a small target.

maybay said:

For example, while some people, because they are either foolish or blind, may require a fence to protect them from falling over the edge of a cliff; other people do not require such safety measures.

Perhaps, but for you to say so. Your example conjures up images of a jaded outcast walking a knife-edge existence. Is this your medicine for people?

Malcolm wrote:

I can't help what fantasies you conjure in your own mind.

maybay said:

One has to understand the essence of the teachings, not adhere to outer forms.

This does not speak of a balanced view. It comes across as reactionary, myopic.

Malcolm wrote:

I can't help your perceptions — even the Buddha was accused by a desperate women of making her pregnant. All I can do is point out that under your dress is a trough, not a child.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

pael said:

Does dedication mean dedicating without wishing reward?

Malcolm wrote:

It means dedicating by understanding that the merit, the recipient of merit and the dedication are all ultimate empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

smcj said:

Vows can also be crutches for the weak minded, who are actually able to walk without their support.

One has to understand the essence of the teachings, not adhere to outer forms.

That's a somewhat Nyingma type perspective. Most Nyingma lamas are not monks. The more monastic sects of Vajrayana do not necessarily agree. HHK 16 was a monk that kept his vows. He was not "weak-minded".

Malcolm wrote:

SMCJ, he was an ārya on the stages, or so many people believe. Such people are simply incapable of breaking their vows at all, so how can they "keep" them? What they do is represent the principle of holding vows, but in reality their conduct is beyond holding vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 15th, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

If vows are so elementary then why do you provoke practitioners to abandon them?

Malcolm wrote:

I have not asked anyone to abandon anything.

maybay said:

Dudjom Rinpoche:

Malcolm wrote:

This does not apply to what I am saying.

maybay said:

And from Counsels from my heart:

The teachings say therefore that we should avoid one-sided attitudes regarding the view and action. Like eagles soaring in space, we should be clearly convinced of the view, but at the same time we should heed the karmic principle of cause and effect, as finely as if we were sifting flour.

As Buddhists, we rely on the teachings of the Buddha, and must therefore have heartfelt confidence in the supreme Dharma. Whoever we are, we need to have a good heart, sincere and without deceit. At all times and on all occasions, we must maintain an irreversible trust in the sacred Dharma, and our minds must be steady and constant. These three things are our firm foundation: steady faith, sincere devotion, and constancy. Furthermore, whatever the Dharma contains, it is all Buddha's teaching. We must therefore have pure perception and an appreciation of all Dharma traditions, those of others as much as our own. We must respect them all.

Malcolm wrote:

This also does not apply to what I am saying.

maybay said:

Not committing evil acts is one thing, but making a commitment to that way of life is another. We are not mindful all the time and mistakes happen. This is why Buddha explains right effort

Malcolm wrote:

One does not need a vow to have such a commitment.

For example, while some people, because they are either foolish or blind, may require a fence to protect them from falling over the edge of a cliff; other people do not require such safety measures.

maybay said:

A vow is actually a pretty simple way to remind us of that possibility, that humanness and vulnerability even, and it promotes a sense of communal identity and allows one to develop confidence and understanding for holding more strenuous vows.

Malcolm wrote:

Some people understand that śīla has nothing to do with vows and pledges. Other people don't.

maybay said:

Vows are a corrective for weak minds, and they are almost an expectation of those coming from other religions who still expect the same signs of legitimacy.

Malcolm wrote:

Vows can also be crutches for the weak minded, who are actually able to walk without their support.

One has to understand the essence of the teachings, not adhere to outer forms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Quite right! Actually I picked up a copy of a really interesting but dense book by Jay Garfield, <http://amzn.com/0195146727>, which has a lot of these ideas. It's starting to come together for me. I don't see any major contradiction between some of those 'idealist' elements in Western philosophy and the mind-only approach, except the latter is firmly grounded in meditation and not just conceptual analysis. But it does help to join the dots, so to speak. Which in one of the reasons I am very grateful to Dharmawheel Forum and its learned contributors.

Malcolm wrote:

Jay is in the same philosophy department as my father [Smith College].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, four of the five lay precepts are just based on all three physical non-virtues and one of the nonvirtues of speech. If you need a vow not to kill things, engage in inappropriate sexual conduct, steal and lie that does not say very much for your moral character, does it?

BrianG said:

But morality, if you define it as training in, engaging in wholesome actions, and abstaining from unwholesome ones, does require precepts. At least according to my interpretation of Sakya Pandita's Distinguishing The Three Vows.

Malcolm wrote:

If you subscribe to an excessively legalistic frame of mind, i.e., the one characterized by late Indian and 13th--15th century Tibetan thinking about the three vows, perhaps. According to their argument taking a vow of not killing makes both your practice of not killing and the act of killing stronger. There is some truth to this, but only in the sense that a vow indicates a strong resolve.

So, if you already have a strong resolve not to take life, for what reason do you need a vow not to do so? Please recall, there was no Vinaya in the beginning, the first five monks had no vows per se. The Vinaya gradually grew slowly as Buddha tried to deal with misbehaving monks causing problems.

The fact is that all three vows are scholastic constructions.

The three vows can also be summarized into three principles: cause no harm; help sentient beings; cultivate pure vision. If one is following these three principles, then you are training śīla.

Otherwise, a monk with all 251 vows can be a very harmful person, refuse to help sentient beings, and have completely impure vision, and nevertheless keep their 251 vows perfectly — is this really training in śīla? Of course not.

On the other hand a lay person who has gone for refuge but feels they cannot follow the five precepts, such a person can actually practice ahimsa, help sentient beings and cultivate pure vision. Such a person I would say is actually training in śīla.

maybay said:

There are many examples of spirit beings we don't ordinarily pay attention to.

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot take the lives of disembodied beings. Sorry, it is just not possible.

maybay said:

Or your response to someone else killing sentient beings is an automatic distancing from them, instead of sharing the responsibility for their conduct and feeling remorse.

Malcolm wrote:

Why should one share responsibility for someone else's actions? For example, when someone sells crack on the corner, I don't feel it is my responsibility at all, nor should I, nor should you.

maybay said:

Then what is the threshold at which you recognize your own greedy consumption as depriving others of property? Stealing is not always so clear cut.

Malcolm wrote:

Stealing is pretty well defined as taking that of which some other human person claims ownership. Unfortunately, Buddhist ethics does not count the feelings of animals and other small creatures when it comes to "property." If it did, farming would be impossible.

maybay said:

You say you don't lie. But lying is about deception and misrepresentation. Hiding the truth is effectively lying.

Malcolm wrote:

Lying is the intention to deceive someone.

maybay said:

Acting contrary to convention, like entering a house through a window, could be seen as deceitful, even if you know the owner well.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you intend to deceive someone.

maybay said:

They say the Buddha would never speak to you at an angle. He would always turn to face you like an elephant. Even with our eyes and our handshake we can lie.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you intend to deceive someone.

maybay said:

Sexual misconduct is more deception, against others, and against your inhibitions.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not at all. First of all, these "inhibitions" are largely cultural, which is why they vary so much from one culture to another. Secondly, sexual misconduct is clearly defined as sexual activity which is exploitative, such sex with minors and the ill; sexual acts which damage social contracts, such as marriage; and sexual acts which are seen as inappropriate or indolent, such as sex in shrines or during the day; and sexual acts which are seen as physically unhealthy, such as oral and anal sex. It is a physical act that is being censured.

maybay said:

Which brings us to intoxication, with substances, with ideas, worldly activities, plans. Shameless intoxication that precludes mindfulness.

Malcolm wrote:

Intoxication is confined to becoming intoxicating substances.

maybay said:

There is infinite depth to the precepts. For the sake of ritualizing them they are iconified.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the five precepts are just Hinayāna vows. They are very simple, something relative, and something which do not apply at all times and in all circumstances.

maybay said:

Second point, morality is a group effort.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is an individual practice.

maybay said:

There is wholesome behaviour, assurances of loyalty to wholesome behavior that calms the fears and the passions others, and censure and punitive action against immorality.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is all very subjective. You are just making a case for colonialism: for example, the Victorian redesign of the sari, because the Victorian English were both titillated and offended by women's breasts.

maybay said:

It's impossible not to take responsibility for other's behavior to at least some degree.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not possible to take responsibility for anyone's behavior but one's own. One cannot control what others do, nor should one try, unless those persons are acting out of bounds of law or parental authority.

maybay said:

We are not moral citadels in the world.

Malcolm wrote:

We need only to take responsibility for ourselves. That's it.

maybay said:

Of course, liberality is emphasised at times. Anyone who has something to sell another person will begin by highlighting their sovereignty of choice in the matter. It's your choice to do anything from buy our Pepsi to practice our Dharma. What is really being said is that you should forget your prior commitment, loyalties, savings etc. So when they ask Dalai Lama what is the best religion, he tells them. Yours.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you need to get out more.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, four of the five lay precepts are just based on all three physical non-virtues and one of the nonvirtues of speech. If you need a vow not to kill things, engage in inappropriate sexual conduct, steal and lie that does not say very much for your moral character, does it?

smcj said:

Really? By that way of thinking you would come to the conclusion that HHK 16, Deshung R. and HHDL to all have been of inferior moral character.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you really think these three men needed vows to avoid such things?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 10:24 PM

Title: Re: Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris - Hostage situation

Content:

BrianG said:

The president of France called it an act of war, and the Islamic State claimed responsibility, so this is the WW3 pre-game.

Malcolm wrote:

Worldly "logic" dictates a massive military response and reoccupation of Iraq, and now Syria.

In any case, our hearts should go out to all who are suffering from the terror of war and violence. It seems likely that more is on the way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 7:40 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Because it highlights the difference between what a lot of people would take for granted about the reality of things, from the proposition that 'Whatever thing or being we perceive are concepts, mental fabrications.' I know, I also post on Philosophy Forum, and if you posted that line of argument, it would either be ignored or ridiculed, whereas I'm starting to understand how it could be true.

Malcolm wrote:

I see. Well, given that I was raised by a philosopher, you might want to drop the name "Berkeley" to those guys.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This knowledge is meant to cut attachment to appearances as being real.

Wayfarer said:

Right - whereas for 'modern thought', only appearances are real.

Malcolm wrote:

What does that have to do with the question?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

The teacher is more important than your practice.

Malcolm wrote:

My guru wouldn't say so. Without practicing, a teacher is useless; like a doctor when the patient won't take the medicine.

maybay said:
I'd like to hear more about what your guru says.

Malcolm wrote:
You can listen to Chogyal Namkhai Norbu any time.

But my real point is that it is practitioners first and foremost who are the gatekeepers, or rather, more aptly (since gatekeepers sound like those who keep people out) stewards of the teachings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 3:20 AM
Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?
Content:

maybay said:
The teacher is more important than your practice.

Malcolm wrote:
My guru wouldn't say so. Without practicing, a teacher is useless; like a doctor when the patient won't take the medicine.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 3:00 AM
Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?
Content:

maybay said:
Oh I'm sure of it. So where does that leave us now? How can we get on better with the gatekeepers of the Dharma, keep a pure perception of the Guru, and be mindful of our own faults rather than seeking error in others?

Malcolm wrote:
Maybay, everyone who is a practitioner is a "gatekeeper of the Dharma," not just Tibetans.

maybay said:
Not everyone who practices teaches.

Malcolm wrote:
Even so, they are gatekeepers of the Dharma. Practice is more important than teaching.

maybay said:

We need to respect realized persons, not people of this or that ethnic extraction. We need to respect all people, of whatever ethnic extraction. It wouldn't hurt to try understand them either. They would probably accept it as a great kindness on your part.

Malcolm wrote:

Given the amount of I have spent with Tibetans both in the West, and in Tibet and Nepal, learning their language, customs, sciences and religion, I am fairly sure I have a pretty good handle on who they are.

I respect whoever is worthy of respect. One does not have to earn my respect. Once my disrespect it earned however, it is difficult to restore my respect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

Oh I'm sure of it. So where does that leave us now? How can we get on better with the gatekeepers of the Dharma, keep a pure perception of the Guru, and be mindful of our own faults rather than seeking error in others?

Malcolm wrote:

Maybay, everyone who is a practitioner is a "gatekeeper of the Dharma," not just Tibetans. We need to respect realized persons, not people of this or that ethnic extraction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

boda said:

We might judge from the example that no intoxicants is part of the path for good reason, simply.

Malcolm wrote:

Or we might judge from the example that we should not drive while drinking. Quite frankly, attitudes toward drinking differ considerably amongst Buddhists. What is appropriate and necessary for one person is not automatically appropriate and necessary for another.

For you, mindful drinking is not part of your path. For me, mindful drinking is included. For you, it is not possible drink and be mindful. That is your limitation. I don't have that limitation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

boda said:

It's a sad day when we find the simple truth demonizing.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, the demonizing is not in the truth of things, but rather the judgements people make as a result, and their ensuing hysteria.

The simple truth is that Trungpa was in an accident cause by drinking too much. He was in great pain as a result. He drank to kill the pain. He eventually died from complications related to diabetes, high blood pressure and liver damage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Flight of the Garuda

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Tony Duff has one too.

Malcolm wrote:

I also have one. It will be published in due course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

tomschwarz said:

So the follow on question, is there liberation without Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

If one's error can be exhausted without the Dharma, then yes. If not, then no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

ironic, isn't it?

boda said:

I was thinking more like not clear headed, and less generously, criminally irresponsible.

Malcolm wrote:

People like demonizing Trungpa. It has become something of an internet sport in Buddhist forums. Mostly it is jealousy.

If there is something to find offensive in Trungpa's behavior, it is the episode when he tried to shoot a bird. Of course he missed, having never handled a firearm, but...

oh hell, there is no end of potentially offensive things to find in Trungpa's bio...but at the end of the day, he was the most influential Buddhist teacher of the 1970's and 80's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

MiphamFan said:

So the function of conditioned and unconditioned merit is also different?

I.e. Conditioned merit can take one higher and higher in samsara, but does nothing directly for liberation. Unconditioned merit takes one along the paths and stages (in causal vehicle) but does not necessarily mean you will have a high position in samsara, in fact, you might be materially poor?

Malcolm wrote:

It is possible — I would rather be a poor person in the Dharma than a rich person who never heard of the Dharma. It all depends on what you define as "riches". In terms of Dharma riches, I am one of the wealthiest men in the West. Definitely part of the .001%. We all are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

boda said:

Unfortunate for people like Chögyam Trungpa that this transmutation didn't turn the toxin into something that wasn't addictive, and didn't destroy the liver.

Malcolm wrote:

As far as Trungpa and drinking goes, people usually fail to observe the obvious —

Trungpa was in intense pain all of the time from his accident. Alcohol was the only pain killer that left him clear minded. He accomplished what he needed to, then he died.

boda said:

Speaking of failing to observe the obvious, it's reported that the accident was caused by...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it was reported that was is the case, ironic, isn't it? People often burn their houses down while cooking, but no one suggests we should all cease cooking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

Hurrah for Mahayana ethics. I reiterate, what good are Hinayana precepts if you feel no shame in breaking them?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, four of the five lay precepts are just based on all three physical non-virtues and one of the nonvirtues of speech. If you need a vow not to kill things, engage in inappropriate sexual conduct, steal and lie that does not say very much for your moral character, does it?

maybay said:

What are you trying to say Malcolm. My point was clearly about the question of shame and the possibility of increasing understanding and sympathy with Tibetan teachers, in a very Mahayana manner I might add. But you seem to want an argument about stock standard precepts. Should I take a break from the forum do you think?

Malcolm wrote:

Here is your statement:

Just on the perception of Westerners by Tibetans and why they harp on about morality: If we appear shameless to Tibetans, then they assume we must lack morals. American Indians appeared shameless to Europeans. Should they have assumed, as they did, that American Indians lacked morals?

Tantric Buddhism appeared immoral to Victorian sensibilities. Should they have assumed, as they did, that Tantric Buddhism was immoral?

Maybe the problem lies with those are doing to the perceiving and not with the object they are perceiving.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:22 AM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

MiphamFan said:

So if one dedicates merit inexhaustibly it is not destroyed by an instant of anger?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Only conditioned merit is destroyed by anger.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 14th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

pael said:

Where I can study/read about those three things which do not exist?

Malcolm wrote:

The Diamond Sūtra for one. The point is that mundane merit, exhaustible merit, is created by those who have no knowledge emptiness. This causes rebirth in higher realms, but that is all. Inexhaustible merit causes progress along the paths and stages, according to the view of the causal vehicle, and is a direct cause for realizing dharmakāya, again, according to the view of the causal vehicle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

pael said:

How to dedicate before that happens?

Malcolm wrote:

You understand when you dedicate that these three things do not exist. It does not mean you have to be on the path of seeing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

Just on the perception of Westerners by Tibetans and why they harp on about morality: If we appear shameless to Tibetans, then they assume we must lack morals. What good are precepts if you feel no shame in breaking them and you're too obdurate to feel remorse? How could someone tell if you were moral? Isn't that important?

Malcolm wrote:

Morality does not lie in keeping precepts — this is the point, actually, of Mahāyāna ethics.

maybay said:

Hurrah for Mahayana ethics. I reiterate, what good are Hinayana precepts if you feel no shame in breaking them?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, four of the five lay precepts are just based on all three physical non-virtues and one of the nonvirtues of speech. If you need a vow not to kill things, engage in inappropriate sexual conduct, steal and lie that does not say very much for your moral character, does it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:42 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Mind-only refers only to the container universe, including bodies; it does not mean that other's minds are only your mind. Relatively speaking, i.e. false relative truth, there are still outer appearances, etc. True relative truth is that all these external appearances are just activated traces in the mind. Ultimate truth is that even mind is not established as truly existent and real.

Lazy_eye said:

Okay -- sorry to be thick-headed here -- how does this apply to daily interactions with others? Acquaintances, friends, relatives, significant others, etc? These are statements indicating how things are, but what do we do with this knowledge when we interact?

Malcolm wrote:

This knowledge is meant to cut attachment to appearances as being real. If we understand that all our appearances and so on are merely the activation of karmic traces in the mind and have no reality at all apart from being our common and personal mental projections, then it is assumed our clinging to these appearances will be lessened.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

pael said:

How do you create non-samsaric? Is it enough to say after good act 'I dedicate this merit for supreme enlightenment'? If not, how then?

Malcolm wrote:

Inexhaustible merit is created through understanding that three things do not exist: merit itself, object of dedication and the act of dedicating.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:20 PM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

boda said:

Unfortunate for people like Chögyam Trungpa that this transmutation didn't turn the toxin into something that wasn't addictive, and didn't destroy the liver.

Malcolm wrote:

As far as Trungpa and drinking goes, people usually fail to observe the obvious — Trungpa was in intense pain all of the time from his accident. Alcohol was the only pain killer that left him clear minded. He accomplished what he needed to, then he died.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Merit -- how would you explain this?

Content:

prsvrnc said:

If someone has merit, would that entail that they have a certain amount of "leverage" in the world...? They would be able to orchestrate situations more harmoniously and get goals met because of their merit? Would you say that is true?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

prsvrnc said:

And maybe we could say this is true because they are more in touch with actual reality? They are in the path of the good, so to speak, in tune with how things really happen?

Malcolm wrote:

No. For example, in order to destroy the world, kill millions of Jews and so on, Hitler had to have had great merit to rise to such power; the same can be said of Stalin and Mao. But of course, since they were on a completely wrong path, they exhausted any such merit by turning that to evil purposes. So having great merit from past lives is not guarantee of being in touch with reality.

In order to be Indra, or to be reborn in the deva realm in general, you have to have even more merit than a million Hitlers, Stalins and Maos. But this merit too will be exhausted unless you meet the Dharma and practice it properly. An emperor in this life will be a beggar in the next. Merit is not necessarily nirvanic. There is also samsaric merit. Keep this in mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

I'm wondering how this works on an interpersonal level. I mean, yes, ultimately it's all concepts and fabrications, but practically speaking there are other people and it seems important to interact on a human level. How do we cultivate the "mind-only" perspective while not losing sight of other people's needs, concerns, presence and humanity?

Malcolm wrote:

Mind-only refers only to the container universe, including bodies; it does not mean that other's minds are only your mind. Relatively speaking, i.e. false relative truth, there are still outer appearances, etc. True relative truth is that all these external appearances are just activated traces in the mind. Ultimate truth is that even mind is not established as truly existent and real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Pointing Out through Appearances

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I can see how it applies to many of the things that people assume are real, or to things that we attribute importance to. I get that, but I can't see how it applies to the raw truth of experience as such.

Malcolm wrote:

The raw experience i.e. the appearances of your senses, including the appearance of your body and its pleasures and pains, is just the activation of traces.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

Ayu said:

I don't have any certain members in my mind, but generally speaking:
Often I wonder, if speech would have been used less aggressively, if the members would refrain from touching their keyboard after their second drink.

Malcolm wrote:

I suspect that it is more like their second cup of coffee...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma is not about following rules blindly.

Tenso said:

It's also not about making up your own rules either. I've personally benefited greatly from following the precept against intoxicants.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't follow any path based on rules. That said, if you find that following the precept against drinking is good for you, then by all means continue.

boda said:

It's about following a path. A path that doesn't include intoxicants, for good reason.

Malcolm wrote:

Your path may exclude drinking wine with dinner. Or having a drink with friends. Mine doesn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:01 PM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

Just on the perception of Westerners by Tibetans and why they harp on about morality: If we appear shameless to Tibetans, then they assume we must lack morals. What good are precepts if you feel no shame in breaking them and you're too obdurate to feel remorse? How could someone tell if you were moral? Isn't that important?

Malcolm wrote:

Morality does not lie in keeping precepts — this is the point, actually, of Mahāyāna ethics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:56 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No one here cannot knock you down, silence you, intimidate you or gang up on you.

dharmagoat said:

Maybe not in reality, but it can feel that way.

Seven years ago when I joined ESangha I was very sensitive to this. I would actually feel sick with fear when checking replies if I felt that I might be criticised by someone more competent than myself. If Namdrol had confronted me then (he never did), I would have ducked and run.

Malcolm wrote:

Namdrol never participated much in the beginners forums. Malcolm doesn't either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:52 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not for some people.

Tenso said:

Buddha strictly forbade it. You should know this.

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma is not about following rules blindly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 11:05 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

Dan74 said:

Purpose is the key word that was mentioned above. What is the purpose of most exchanges here?

boda said:

The question asked above was basically: what is the purpose of bullying?

I think Malcolm answered that pretty well above:

Malcolm wrote:

... if you can't take the heat, well, go try and find a Dharma kindergarten somewhere.

boda said:

Talk about elitism, condescension, and harshness... the purpose is to drive away the dissonate voices.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no bullying here. That is in your imagination. No one here cannot knock you down, silence you, intimidate you or gang up on you. All they can do merely share their point of view. You can either agree or disagree. If you can't take disagreement, that says something about you, not the person who is disagreeing with you.

[sarcasm on] Maybe we should have trigger warnings on posts, just so people can avoid posts that might hurt their feelings. [/sarcasm off]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 10:57 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

Tenso said:

Best to take the Buddha's advice and avoid it all costs.

Herbie said:

or take the middle way

Tenso said:

There's no middle way with alcohol unfortunately.

Malcolm wrote:

Not for some people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 7:10 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, it is very simple. There are people here who are knowledgable, and there are people here who are not. If you [not you specifically] wish to improve your own knowledge and understanding, then it is useful to put aside your projections about other people's personalities [whom you do not in fact know] and listen to what they have to say. If you are unable to do this because of your own ego problems, well, then it is likely you will continue to have unsatisfactory interactions with people here and in other web forums.

boda said:

Great advice, but this takes us back to where we started. Be respectful and learn from the 'masters', but if you bring any of your own ideas...

Malcolm wrote:

If someone wishes to prosecute their own ideas about Dharma in a place like this, it is no different than any other Dharma forum in history — your ideas will be challenged if they are unusual, and if you can't take the heat, well, go try and find a Dharma kindergarten somewhere. At least here you won't be executed for losing a debate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 6:58 AM

Title: Re: having a drink

Content:

tomschwarz said:

his holiness the dalai lama often talks about happiness, that all beings have a right to be happy and how to attain happiness.

he often addresses the subject of drinking alcohol. he says that it may give you some happiness, for example alleviate some aspect of anger. but then the next morning you still feel bad or worse.

has anyone had contradictory experience? have you experienced stable and long lasting improvements to your feeling of happiness drinking alcoholic beverages?

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about getting drunk, not having a glass or two of wine with dinner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

boda said:

So the bullyboys have been to Potala? If that's the case then perhaps Potala is somewhat overrated.

Malcolm wrote:

It really depends if you are interested in going to the Potala, or just having a unrestricted free for all of ideas. If the latter is your aim, it is understandable that you might interpret so called "bullyboys" [and girls] in a negative light.

boda said:

Let me put it this way, if people who live in Potala appears to be wise I would want to go there. If people who live in Potala are asshats then I see no point in going there. There are more than enough asshats where I live.

Malcolm wrote:

Basically, it is very simple. There are people here who are knowledgeable, and there are people here who are not. If you [not you specifically] wish to improve your own knowledge and understanding, then it is useful to put aside your projections about other people's personalities [whom you do not in fact know] and listen to what they have to say. If you are unable to do this because of your own ego problems, well, then it is likely you will continue to have unsatisfactory interactions with people here and in other web forums.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 6:38 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

boda said:

So the bullyboys have been to Potala? If that's the case then perhaps Potala is somewhat overrated.

Malcolm wrote:

It really depends if you are interested in going to the Potala, or just having a unrestricted free for all of ideas. If the latter is your aim, it is understandable that you might interpret so called "bullyboys" [and girls] in a negative light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 6:13 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, before making innovations in a given discipline, it is expected that one has learned the discipline. This seems to be true everywhere but in politics and religion.

boda said:

"In the beginner's mind there are many possibilities, but in the expert's there are few"
— Shunryu Suzuki

You probably saw that coming. But anyway, politics and religion are the most resistant to innovation. I imagine that has something to do with maintaining the status quo.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, there are those who talk about going to Potala, what it might be like, how big it is, and so on, but they really have no idea what the Potala is like. Then there are those who go there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

At least in a liberal democracy, leaders are explicitly accountable to the people, installed by the people and rule only at the whim of the people, for better or worse.

maybay said:

You are like a doctor looking to administer the best medicine for the present suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I am after all, a doctor.

maybay said:

Buddha as physician. Its all well and good. But I want to discuss the issues. Buddha as teacher. You want to reduce the options, I want to explore them. You put things in their place, I kick things around.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha did not discuss issues, he recommended cures. So, I don't think that Buddha was the kind of teacher you seem to modeling yourself on. Plato maybe, but not Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

DGA said:

Generally, when someone comes to the board and says "Hi I'm new, I'm here to learn, here's what's going on..." and engages in conversation in a courteous way and in good faith, then that person has a good experience.

boda said:

But if you bring any of your own ideas...

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, before making innovations in a given discipline, it is expected that one has learned the discipline. This seems to be true everywhere but in politics and religion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

It depends on the context. Hereditary systems are very conservative and everyone involved is honour bound and primed intensively for their role. I'm not against them.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read Āryadeva. He points out completely the fallacy of relying upon hereditary monarchs. Hereditary systems are extremely corruptible.

maybay said:

What do you mean by relying on? Anything constructed is corruptible. It just depends on the context.

Malcolm wrote:

You prove your moral strength by meeting obligations and discharging your responsibilities without being reckless with your increasing freedoms and benefits. It takes moral strength to avoid the temptations of power. Then by this standard, virtually all kings fail.

maybay said:

What do you mean by fail? Kings are crazy. They live on a knife edge, and all the layers of people around them create a body of vested interests that relies on, among other things, the honour of the king and his court. If he is not able to preside with dignity over his kingdom, there will be rivals. There are rivals anyway, at home and abroad.

Malcolm wrote:

You have it exactly backwards my friend, kings are completely dependent upon the subjects for their power. If they are successful they manage to spin the illusion that power resides in them, but the reality is otherwise. This is why Āryadeva states that there are no fools greater than kings.

At least in a liberal democracy, leaders are explicitly accountable to the people, installed by the people and rule only at the whim of the people, for better or worse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Paul said:

And whose morals?

maybay said:

I guess it depends on the system. The incumbent authority, the electorate.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, with this guy it is all top down, it does not matter who is in power, just that they are in power.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

People shouldn't rise to positions of authority without proving their moral strength.

Malcolm wrote:

So I take it you are against hereditary systems then, kingships and the like?

And just how do you "prove" your "moral strength?"

maybay said:

It depends on the context. Hereditary systems are very conservative and everyone involved is honour bound and primed intensively for their role. I'm not against them.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read Āryadeva. He points out completely the fallacy of relying upon hereditary monarchs. Hereditary systems are extremely corruptible.

maybay said:

You prove your moral strength by meeting obligations and discharging your responsibilities without being reckless with your increasing freedoms and benefits. It takes moral strength to avoid the temptations of power.

Malcolm wrote:

Then by this standard, virtually all kings fail.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I just deal with the words on the page in front of me. I don't make judgments about the person writing them — by and large I don't know any of you.

dzogchungpa said:

Oh please.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I am happy to make judgements about you if you like, but it isn't necessary for me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

People shouldn't rise to positions of authority without proving their moral strength.

Malcolm wrote:

So I take it you are against hereditary systems then, kingships and the like?

And just how do you "prove" your "moral strength?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He meant that the Dharma should have made Tibet a better place and Tibetans better people — but it didn't.

dharmagoat said:

In your estimation has the Dharma done better in China and Japan?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am merely addressing the idea that Mahāyāna was best preserved in Tibet — other people just may not see it that way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He meant that the Dharma should have made Tibet a better place and Tibetans better people — but it didn't.

dharmagoat said:

Yet it would appear that Mahāyāna has been preserved in Tibet better than anywhere else.

Malcolm wrote:

I think Chinese Buddhists and Japanese Buddhists would not endorse this assessment at all.

Anyway, by whom was Mahāyāna preserved in Tibet? By an elite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Disappointed with this site

Content:

DGA said:

Generally, when someone comes to the board and says "Hi I'm new, I'm here to learn, here's what's going on..." and engages in conversation in a courteous way and in good faith, then that person has a good experience. At least, that person is unlikely to have his or her issues reflected back.

There have been instances of bullying and piling on at DW, and I don't want to dismiss those or minimize them. I do want to point out that not everyone reacts well when their pretensions are pointed out to them. Dunning-Kruger effect.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dunning%E2%80%93Kruger_effect

dharmagoat said:

It seems we decide whether certain posters are inherently pretentious, deluded, naive or innocent and treat them accordingly, with more kindness shown to the latter.

I agree that pretensions ought to be pointed out, but it is too easy to do this unkindly. In our culture the sentiment behind the expression "teach someone a lesson" is essentially unkind.

Malcolm wrote:

I just deal with the words on the page in front of me. I don't make judgments about the person writing them — by and large I don't know any of you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dezhung Tulku opined that the Dharma failed in Tibet.

tomamundsen said:

Well, obviously it wasn't a complete failure. So, what exactly does he mean by the Dharma "failing"?

maybay said:

He means its our turn.

Malcolm wrote:

He meant that the Dharma should have made Tibet a better place and Tibetans better people — but it didn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

maybay said:

Its not about needs, or even the individual who takes the vow.

Malcolm wrote:

The point I am responding to is the chauvinistic narrative that permeates a lot of conversations among Western Buddhists [like you] about how Westerners are somehow ethically and morally stunted. It simply isn't true.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 1:16 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Wayfarer said:

You do sometimes see 'dharma' translated as 'law' and is also sometimes equated with 'duty'. Karma likewise has sometimes been referred to as a law. Are these mis-translations?

Malcolm wrote:

There are ten definitions of the term "dharma."

The basic term, dhṛ, means "to bear."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 13th, 2015 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Harimoo said:

It is interesting to read books about pre-invasion Tibet, like wayfarers describing their journey.

A part of Alexandra David-Neil's book where she depicted the life of the "slaves" in Tibet was censured in the second edition. I'm reading a book written by a kashmiri merchant who was astonished by the prescribed tortures for the robbers (lost head nails in the fingers).

The difference between then and now (in the East and the West), it's "religious" practise, which became "religiosity".

Malcolm wrote:

It is important to understand that in old Tibet there were no real laws per se that governed the behavior of people outside of Lhasa. There were very few courts, and aristocrats had a very free hand to dispense punishments pretty much as they saw fit. Those punishments were often cruel by modern standards, but certainly not by seventeenth and eighteenth century standards. Tibet was largely governed by custom and local councils.

Banditry was a family business in much of Eastern Tibet, right up through the 1950's. Paltrul Rinpoche's brother in fact was one of the most famous bandits in Tibetan history.

Tibet was not a Shangri-lha, but it was also not the medieval hell some leftist writers have tried to make out. It was like anywhere else humans have lived. People like to think that because the Tibetans preserved the Dharma it is a "nicer" place — but I think they would be in for a rude surprise. We mainly know Tibet from the point of view of an educated elite. We have very little knowledge of the subaltern Tibet, the Tibet of illiterate farmers, wives, merchants, hunters, soldiers, prostitutes, criminals and bandits. The fact that our main window into old Tibet is through the window of the elite skews our view quite a bit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

are the Sravakayana and Mahayana vehicles are actually headed to the same destination?

Astus said:

Yes. I think it is best illustrated by the five aggregates. They are already impermanent, dependently originated and without self. The difference between delusion and enlightenment regarding that is what results in either attachment and dissatisfaction or freedom and peace. So there are the "five aggregates with attachment" for the deluded, and the "five aggregates" (as they are) for the enlightened. This is true in every Buddhist system I'm aware of.

Nirvana according to...

This is where things can become difficult, as texts and people can use all sorts of poetic language to talk about nirvana for various reasons. To keep it simple, it's just as in the four noble truths: the end of the cause of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation is the exhaustion of error.

—— Maitreyanatha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely the annihilationist nirvana of which Mahāyana is so critical.

Lazy_eye said:

But Sujato and Thanissaro would say they are accurately presenting what is found in the nikayas. So what are the options? I can think of three:

-- Go with Mahayana sources

-- Try to show their view is wrong/debatable even from a "nikayan" or "sravakayana" perspective

-- Attempt to use historicity to settle the argument

Malcolm wrote:

We can assume they are not stream entrants, not speaking from personal experience.

So why would we actually credit what they say? I think Peter Harvey would disagree with them. See his Selfless Mind: Personality, Consciousness and Nirvāṇa in Early Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Nibbana according to Thanissaro and Sujato:

Thanissaro said:

Nibbana itself is not the same thing as the awakened mind. The fact that you have a mind that's still functioning in the world after awakening that is part of the fuel remaining when you have nibbana with fuel remaining and nibbana with no fuel remaining. When you hit the point with nibbana with no fuel remaining there is no activity at all.

<http://dhammawheel.com/viewtopic.php?f=13&t=20626&p=357794&hilit=nibbana+thanissaro#p357776>

Sujato said:

...the Buddha's real teaching is not to temporarily escape materiality, but to reach an ending of suffering. And since all forms of viññāṇa (yaṃ kiñci viññāṇaṃ...) are said countless times to be suffering, even the infinite consciousness has to go.

<https://sujato.wordpress.com/2011/05/13/vinna%E1%B9%87a-is-not-nibbana-really-it-just-isn%E2%80%99t/>

Lazy_eye said:

Not to mention the <http://www.audiodharma.org/series/5/talk/1847/...>

Malcolm wrote:

This is precisely the annihilationist nirvana of which Mahāyana is so critical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 12:32 PM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Adamantine said:

Dezhung Tulku opined that the Dharma failed in Tibet.

And one Sakya tulku's opinion is supposed to be gospel?

Malcolm wrote:

I tend to trust the opinions of those who have personal experience over the opinions of people of those who don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 11:25 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It was more streamlined, i.e., men pretty much raped whoever they wanted. Rape has been a huge cultural problem in Tibet for millenia. This is nothing new. Nuns in particular were targets for rape. Deal with it.

.

Adamantine said:

It's a huge cultural problem here, now.

Malcolm wrote:

Have you seen the rape stats for Tibetan women? It is not better.

Adamantine said:

It is clear that the five poisons have been present throughout the history of humankind, sure, this is samsara. However it appears that at times when the dharma has taken deep root in a culture it has had a pacifying effect to a degree.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, what fantasy planet are you living on?

Adamantine said:

I certainly don't think of old Tibet as a shangri-la, that's your own projection but not at all my view. However for a few centuries it was likely a much more supportive environment to study and practice the dharma in.

Malcolm wrote:

Dezhung Tulku opined that the Dharma failed in Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 11:09 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahaha...you think casual adultery was not rampant among pre-modern Tibetans? .

Adamantine said:

I don't think it was this streamlined: <https://www.ashleymadison.com>

Malcolm wrote:

It was more streamlined, i.e., men pretty much raped whoever they wanted. Rape has been a huge cultural problem in Tibet for millenia. This is nothing new. Nuns in particular were targets for rape. Deal with it.

Tibetan aristocrats did whatever they wanted to poor people with no remedy. This is a fact. I have had long conversations about this with Tibetan Lamas raised in Tibet. Tibet was just a human land and the things aristocrats would do to poor people were nothing short of unbelievably barbaric as well as widespread and systematic.

You do understand that Tibetans hunted a lot? Right? Where do you think they got all those furs they loved to wear?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 11:07 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahaha...you think casual adultery was not rampant among pre-modern Tibetans? How about lying, gossip, harsh speech and calumny? You think our modern cultural conditioning makes these nonvirtues worse? This is utterly foolish thinking.

Have you ever seen how Tibetans treat their dogs? I have and it is nothing praiseworthy.

Adamantine said:

I'd agree those things were probably happening fairly often but I think the value of lives of even small creatures was more ingrained in their conditioning than in ours.

Malcolm wrote:

My friend, you are living in a fantasy.

Adamantine said:

And the potentials for idle chatter, gossip, harsh speech etc. are infinitely multiplied now with the glorious tech assistance of smart phones and social media sites. There are entire new trends of cyber-bullying, flame wars, twitter wars etc. Nowadays, at least in urban centers people are scarcely finding a few minutes without some kind of chattering. I don't think this was the case in old Tibet, or old India, or old anywhere. But it's our cultural context that developed these smart devices, programs and apps.

Malcolm wrote:

You really need to study Tibetan history. You are succumbing to a sort of nostalgic "it was so much better in the good old days."

Humans beings have never lacked for opportunity to be mean spirited and nonvirtuous. The idea that we Humans are worse now than we were before is really just a total fantasy. The truth is that we are the same, we have not gotten worse, and we have not gotten better. It is absolutely absurd to suppose that Tibet was this Shangri-la where everyone was more virtuous. It really isn't true. If it is were true, then how can we explain all the hyper-critical remarks we find great Dharma practitioners making about Tibetans from the earliest period of the presence of Dharma in Tibet — was it all sour grapes?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 10:59 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

maybay said:

About your argument, rights culture is really about the resurgence of the political classes over the religious, jurists over priests, the laws of men over the law of God.

Malcolm wrote:

There are no laws of God. Never have been.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 10:45 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Apparently Buddha thought we were all pretty pathetic.

Nevermind. I know Buddha didn't invent Vinaya as a Buddhist Moral Code.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps you have to remind Khampa lay people not to kill each other; but in America, most people who come to Dharma are already inclined not to kill each other.

Adamantine said:

Hmmmnn.. most Westerners, including a fair share of those who might identify with Buddhism, don't even think twice when they smash an annoying bug or lay poison out for pests. . . the vow of not killing and intentionally preserving lives is not only intended for human lives, as you know.

No need to mention idle chatter, gossip and lying. . .

sexual orifice extravaganzas, casual adultery. . I don't think our modern cultural conditioning is remotely in line with the 10 basic ethical conducts so it is somewhat against our habitual tendencies to follow them, and many people will try to change Buddhism, or outright reject it before they change their habits, sadly.. and this has already happened plenty enough times.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahaha...you think casual adultery was not rampant among pre-modern Tibetans? How about lying, gossip, harsh speech and calumny? How about rape and stealing?

You think our modern cultural conditioning makes these nonvirtues worse? This is utterly foolish thinking.

Have you ever seen how Tibetans treat their dogs? I have and it is nothing praiseworthy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

Paul said:

Can I come along? I can bring chocolate biscuits and a Krishna Das CD...

dzogchungpa said:

You're in.

Malcolm wrote:

How about Suns of Arqa and little Bonobo?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Apparently Buddha thought we were all pretty pathetic.
Nevermind. I know Buddha didn't invent Vinaya as a Buddhist Moral Code.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps you have to remind Khampa lay people not to kill each other; but in America, most people who come to Dharma are already inclined not to kill each other.

conebeckham said:

The main point regarding ethics this Lama stressed was, as Dzoki refers to, "discipline." The discipline to keep vows, yes, but also a more general sort of discipline--not to be confused with the inability to relax.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzoki's post was typical of western Buddhists beating up their brothers and sisters. It is sad really. Convert syndrome. Most so-called "Buddhists" are not "serious," whether they are Tibetan, American, European, Japanese, Chinese, etc. It's total bullshit to single out Westerners for some special criticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

conebeckham said:

Great post, Dzoki, by the way....and if it matters, I will say that I had a very intimate conversation with a Lama who echoed the feeling regarding ethics lacking in Western Vajrayana culture, and feeling that the only complete and successful transplantation of Vajrayana to the West will occur when Ethical training becomes the foundation. Not necessarily "Monasticism," mind you.....

Malcolm wrote:

Listen, this is too heavy handed. The only ethics we need are to understand is that we should avoid ten things and do their opposite. All this sturm and drung around "the lack of ethics" among western Buddhists is a bunch of culturally biased nonsense. Tibetans and other Asians should examine themselves first, especially teachers, especially, lamas, especially Asian monks.

Honestly, whoever needs a vow to avoid these ten things is really pathetic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: Trouble at Tricycle Magazine

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

However, you can see in the instructions he gave to kings that he consistently advised against the kind of policies we today characterize as neo-liberal (expansionism, conquest, imperial ambitions) and advised liberal policies frequently. Moreover, we can see that Nāgārjuna gave similar advice (provide health care, maintain and upgrade infrastructure, eliminate capital punishment, etc.).

Queequeg said:

Indeed. However, Liberalism in the US anyway, has become closely aligned, if not synonymous with the heavy, ham handed force of bureaucratic government. Hence, I can't imagine Buddha agreeing with its MO, except as an expedient.

That said, I'm feeling the Bern.

Malcolm wrote:

When businesses are allowed to become huge, a large government is necessary to control them. This is the lesson of the late 19th century monopolies, and the beginning of the monolithic federal period in US history, which was actually initiated by Republicans like Theodore Roosevelt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Queequeg said:

One of the problems in the West with the rise of Secularism is that the entire Rights framework is ungrounded when religion, and specifically, God, is removed from the equation. The idea of Rights comes from a variety of sources including in no small part, Natural Law which has been understood as God's Law.

Malcolm wrote:

You should read Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic. It may cause you to revise your opinion.

...the most popular narrative concerning the very idea of America— one that unites Christian nationalists with a large number of sober historians— has it that the American Republic owes its independence and its individual freedoms to its Protestant Christian legacy. 86 This narrative often comes with a distinguished lineage that traces the ideas of individual rights and freedom of conscience to seminal Protestant thinkers such as John Milton (1608– 1674), and it characteristically represents Jefferson, Madison, and precursors like Locke as latitudinarian Protestants or (to use a label that at the time would have sounded like a gross oxymoron) “Christian Deists.” 87 But this gets the history of ideas almost exactly wrong. It is to confuse mere precedence in time with causality. It is to suppose, falsely, that the ideas that best explain the actions of a collective are those that a majority of people within it pretend to carry around in their heads. Reformed religion brought carnage to Britain and Germany in the seventeenth century and madness to America in the eighteenth because it was a symptom of modernity, not a cause— a pathology, not a theory.

Stewart, Matthew (2014-07-01). Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic (pp. 72-73). W. W. Norton & Company. Kindle Edition.

And:

For the further clarification of the meaning of this “Religion of Nature’s God,” he referred his readers to “[Alexander] Pope’s little Essay on Man, confessedly deduced from the inspiration of Lord Bolingbroke, and perhaps every sentence adopted by me.” In some alternate universe— such as perhaps the one constructed from the nationalist myths that have long gripped American historiography— Young’s peculiar “Religion of Nature’s God” might have amounted to little more than a historical oddity. It was just the cloudy reflection of a disturbing individual who was always fishing in troubled waters. To judge from the hate that filled the newspapers of the time, it was a quite unpopular form of belief, deeply at odds with all the accepted varieties of the Christian religion. Yet the curious fact is that Young, like Allen, manifestly saw his unusual religion as an intimate component of the revolutionary political struggle in which he was engaged. The rights he claimed on behalf of his countrymen against the British Parliament and even against the Crown itself were not the rights guaranteed to Englishmen by their constitution, nor the rights due to Christians, but the rights deriving from the laws of nature and of “Nature’s God.” And Young and Allen were far from alone in their revolutionary theology. Indeed, “Nature’s God” was the presiding deity of the American Revolution. Franklin invoked it in his newspaper articles as early as 1747.

Stewart, Matthew (2014-07-01). Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic (p. 138). W. W. Norton & Company. Kindle Edition.

And:

In most versions of America’s revolutionary history, the term “deism,” if it appears at all, is taken to refer to a superficial theological doctrine about a “watchmaker God” who fashions a world of mechanical wonders and then walks away to the sound of ticking noises. Deism, according to this line of interpretation, was just a watery expression of the Christian religion, adulterated somewhat with the platitudes of the Enlightenment. It was the opposite of atheism, as the dictionary tells us, and it should count as thumpingly religious by modern standards. It arose in Britain around the turn of the eighteenth century and arrived in America in a moderate and conciliatory mood, quite different from the atheistic Enlightenment that took hold in France and elsewhere. The informed consensus today further supposes that deism was a detachable doctrine, present to some degree among the educated elites in revolutionary America, but only incidentally connected with the political ideology of its revolutionaries. All of this, I now think, is not quite right. “Deism” in its own day referred not to a superficial theological doctrine but to a comprehensive intellectual tradition that ranged freely across the terrain we now associate with ethics, political theory, metaphysics, the philosophy of mind, and epistemology. It was an astonishingly coherent and systematic body of thought, closer to a way of being than any particular dogma, and it retained its essential elements over a span of centuries, not decades. In origin and substance, deism was neither British nor Christian, as the conventional view supposes, but largely ancient, pagan, and continental, and it spread in America far beyond the educated elite. Although America’s revolutionary deists lavished many sincere expressions of adoration upon their deity, deism is in fact functionally indistinguishable from what we would now call “pantheism”; and pantheism is really just a pretty word for atheism. While deism could often be associated with moderation in politics, it served principally to advance a system of thought that was revolutionary in its essence and effects. This essentially atheistic and revolutionary aspect of deism, I further contend, is central to any credible explanation of the revolutionary dimension of the American Revolution.

Stewart, Matthew (2014-07-01). Nature's God: The Heretical Origins of the American Republic (pp. 5-6). W. W. Norton & Company. Kindle Edition.

Declaration of Independence:

When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

dzoki said:

So in the end the situation is such that there are people who have entered vajrayana and then left, there are people who have stayed on but have even become worse than they were before they received their first empowerment, there are people who stagnate and there are a very very few fortunate ones who have gotten it right from the beginning and who seriously practice the path.

Malcolm wrote:

You forgot the fifth kind of Westerner — the people who enter Buddhist teachings and instead of becoming more flexible, smooth and kind, use the Dharma to become more and more rigid, rough and intolerant of others, more insufferable and self-aggrandizing because they believe they are "doing it right" [complete with hair, clothes, and ritual gear] — building nice cages for themselves and very uncomfortable prisons for others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Can Westerners REALLY be Dharma practitioners?

Content:

amanitamusc said:

He definitely had extreme opinions of western practitioners and Bhudha Dharma in general.

His underwear was a bit tight?

He should have gotten out a bit more?

Karma Dorje said:
At least he could spell "Buddha". And "underwear".

Malcolm wrote:
He had editors — but really a spelling flame? That is so 1990's.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, November 12th, 2015 at 12:10 AM
Title: Re: Dealing with Christian Fundamentalists, Part 2
Content:
DGA said:
[This includes fundamentalist Christians, of course, but also Jews, Muslims, vegetarians, Subaru enthusiasts, Trekkies--anything, really.

Malcolm wrote:
And Republicans...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 11:41 PM
Title: Re: the idea of historicity and spiritual practice
Content:
Johnny Dangerous said:
Again, I'm just wondering what is the intersection between these ideas of historicity, and how they actually inform one's view as a Dharma practitioner.

Malcolm wrote:
It is useful to use these concepts:

Myth: a traditional story, especially one concerning the early history of a people or explaining some natural or social phenomenon, and typically involving supernatural beings or events.

Legend: a traditional story sometimes popularly regarded as historical but unauthenticated

Fable: a short story, typically with animals as characters, conveying a moral.

Chronicle: a factual written account of important or historical events in the order of their occurrence.

History: the study of past events, particularly in human affairs:

For example, sūtras mostly fit the bill as legend. However, there are a number of texts in Hināyāna and Mahāyana that can only be described as myths. The tantras, for the most part are myths, but some, especially lower tantras, more in line with legends. Dzogchen tantras are entirely within the realm of myth.

The Jatakas are clearly fables in the modern sense of the term.

The premodern "histories" we encounter are more properly considered chronicles.

Prior to the 20th century, really, there was no Buddhist history. Buddhist history is an entirely modern thing. True, these other terms I am using are also modern categories, but I think they are useful ways of approaching the different kinds of texts in the Buddhist tradition. For example, as practitioners, we are mostly inspired by the myths, legends and chronicles which form context for our practice. We are not so much concerned [to greater and lesser extents] with history in the modern sense of the term.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

maybay said:

The question is whether ignorant sentient beings are better off when Dharma fails to be institutionalized.

dharmagoat said:

Well put.

Despite my dislike of institutions in general, I think all living beings are better off for having Buddhism so accessible.

YesheDronmar said:

I agree as well; without libraries and gompas and places to hold the precious teachings, I never would have met the dharma nor have had access to so much grace and blessings. There is a balance in all of this. And, some of us actually prefer to join into organizations instead of practicing alone. Some of us learn more quickly in groups. There are many different methods for the many types of sentient beings. Creating and maintaining institutions is one method, though not the only one.

Malcolm wrote:

Libraries are great. The problem is that in general access to them was and is restricted. Monasteries are great, but they are mostly engaged in worldly activity, not Dharma activity. There is no problem with a group of practitioners meeting, but it is good to be clear on the distinction between practice and socializing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Trouble at Tricycle Magazine

Content:

Queequeg said:

As for the Neoliberal MO being at odds with Buddhism, so is the Liberal MO. I don't think Buddha would have been a Democrat. Not a Republican, either.

Buddha would have given this whole thing the face-palm mudra.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he would have been neither.

However, you can see in the instructions he gave to kings that he consistently advised against the kind of policies we today characterize as neo-liberal (expansionism, conquest, imperial ambitions) and advised liberal policies frequently. Moreover, we can see that Nāgārjuna gave similar advice (provide health care, maintain and upgrade infrastructure, eliminate capital punishment, etc.).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

DGA said:

A free association is the forming of a group, political alliance, or other organization without any constraint or external restriction. There isn't a bureaucracy in the DC. Each gar has a rotating board, a person responsible for maintaining the grounds and buildings, and a secretary for handling official business. The DC has a center, but no hierarchy. ChNN is basically the first member of the DC.

That's well and good--but what you are describing are the protocols of a specific kind of bureaucracy that are active within a particular kind of social institution.

Malcolm wrote:

bureaucracy |byoṽ rākṛeṣē|

noun (pl. bureaucracies)

a system of government in which most of the important decisions are made by state officials rather than by elected representatives.

- a state or organization governed or managed as a bureaucracy.
- the officials in a bureaucracy, considered as a group or hierarchy.

- excessively complicated administrative procedure, seen as characteristic of bureaucracy: the unnecessary bureaucracy in local government.

This definition does not apply to the DC. The DC is an association, it is not a bureaucracy.

DGA said:

This isn't a criticism of the DC by any means. It's just an observation on the role of institutions as means for people to relate to each other. Institutions are simply the forms in which human relationships are structured and mediated.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps we need to recognize there is a spectrum between formal and informal institutions. My focus is primarily on the former.

DGA said:

Parenthetically: Weber's description of how a free association oriented around a charismatic leader inevitably coalesces into an institution with steadily increasing bureaucratic tendencies (unless it disintegrates) is among its most durable ideas.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is when I leave the DC.

DGA said:

This is a little off the issue — my point in general was that Dharma exists in people, not institutions. Institutions are not persons. Dharma only exists person. The extent to which Dharma exists in its members, only to that extent can we say that Dharma lives in this or that institution.

I don't dispute your point that Dharma exists in people. I am merely pointing out that institutions are means by which people relate to each other.

Malcolm wrote:

The point I am making is that people put too much importance on the container, and not enough importance on the contents. A gold vase can contain shit. A clay vase can contain gold. Which vase will you pick?

DGA said:

Transmission of Dharma is about relationships, and relationships take specific forms. These forms may or may not be helpful at a given time, which is why your point about the mutability of these institutions is an important one.

Malcolm wrote:

The transmission of Dharma is a family thing. You have a teacher, and fellow students. The minute it becomes more than this, the minute the organization becomes the main point, at that moment, Dharma ceases being transmitted.

DGA said:

I just don't buy the anarcho-libertarian argument that institutions are inherently problematic, and the solution is simply to free individuals to do free individual stuff. Institutions just are. Their value or pathology depends on how they are used.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

For Dharma, formal institutions have inherent problems because they are so easily corrupted.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 11th, 2015 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Trouble at Tricycle Magazine

Content:

DGA said:

And they may be fighting over nothing in the end. I know that libraries buy Tricycle; does anyone else? Is their online presence profitable?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think many people take Tricycle very seriously. Especially not after Tworkov went after Trungpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Trouble at Tricycle Magazine

Content:

DGA said:

I don't know anything about Mr Shaheen. Was he on the Tricycle board when this went down?

<http://www.abuddhistlibrary.com/Buddhism/A%20-%20Tibetan%20Buddhism/Authors/Samuel%20Bercholz/Open%20Letter%20to%20Tricycle/Open%20Letter%20to%20Tricycle.htm>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he was.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

DGA said:

for the record, even a free association is an example of a social institution.

it's merely a social institution with a specific kind of bureaucracy. (anyone want to argue that a free association generally or the DC specifically lack bureaucracy?)

Malcolm wrote:

A free association is the forming of a group, political alliance, or other organization without any constraint or external restriction. There isn't a bureaucracy in the DC. Each gar has a rotating board, a person responsible for maintaining the grounds and buildings, and a secretary for handling official business. The DC has a center, but no hierarchy. ChNN is basically the first member of the DC.

This is a little off the issue — my point in general was that Dharma exists in people, not institutions. Institutions are not persons. Dharma only exists person. The extent to which Dharma exists in its members, only to that extent can we say that Dharma lives in this or that institution.

The Buddha did not leave behind any institutions. He established no authority to take up his mantle upon his passing. He did create a discipline, but all the Buddhist institutions we have today arose after the Buddha and none were established by him. We should keep this in mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

Kunzang said:

Don't be silly. Of course it is. Even has a tulku ready to take the helm when the master passes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the DC is a free association, with no hierarchy.

Karma_Yeshe said:

Of course it has a hierarchy. It has a president (currently Chögyal Namkhai Norbu), who has many special rights.

See page nr. 8 of the Statute of the International Dzogchen Community:

http://dzogchencommunity.org/assets/International-Dzogchen-Community-Statute_new-version_15102013_edarev-Registrato-notaio.pdf

Malcolm wrote:

This is just for show, in order to correspond with European laws of association.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Those of us living in the West, i.e. the US, Australia, Canada Latin America, etc., should be aware that we are only here because of centuries of systematic ethnic cleansing and genocide of First Nations. We need to deal with this as a civilization and stop sweeping it under the rug. Until we openly confront the colonialist underpinnings of "Western Civilization" we will continue descend into barbarisms like the Iraq war and so on.

All talk of "the sacred" should be conducted with this in mind.

boda said:

Religion can help to mobilize a nation to take resources from "heathens" (nothing about them being sacred).

Malcolm wrote:

Precisely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Reality is sacred. The translation of the Tibetan term for emptiness (lack of inherent existence) 'dön dam denpa' literally means 'holy object truth'. 'dam' is the word that equates to holy or sacred.

The Three Jewels are holy. Anything that permanently liberates ourselves from suffering is holy and it is a vital and important term that also signifies the importance of Buddhist faith.

Malcolm wrote:

No, don dam bden pa is a translation of paramārtha-satya. It means, literally, "truth of the ultimate goal."

Dam pa itself simple means superior or sublime, it's synonym is 'phags pa, and also yang dag pa, i.e. true, and mchog tu 'gyur ba, i.e. supreme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 12:45 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

maybay said:

A concept of an afterlife and a concept of liberation are not necessary for the construction of a coherent, robust and comprehensive system of morals and ethics. If you are attached to this life, you are not a person of Dharma. Jetsun Drakpa Gyaltzen: First, for non-attachment to this life, you must put aside the non-Dharma person's manner of practicing moral conduct, hearing, contemplation, and meditation which are performed for the sake of this life.

Malcolm wrote:

Great advice for someone who want to follow Dharma but it is irrelevant to the statement to which you are objecting.

maybay said:

Today they simply act out norms without examination.

Malcolm wrote:

This a baseless judgement, an expression of opinion, not a fact.

maybay said:

One of the developments of political culture has been the separation of people from their office. The role is one thing, the person another.

Malcolm wrote:

People have always been separate from their office — there is never, ever been a divine king. Not one.

maybay said:

So before a king would exercise moral judgement as himself, now a president must act as a president acts, for the duration of his presidency.

Malcolm wrote:

Kings and presidents are no different. Each has a term, each has an office, neither is a power unto himself.

maybay said:

Of course people will always have moral agency, but the roles people must take in the institutions of secular society don't facilitate that agency or its development.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, yes, as if Europe under Rome was a highpoint of moral fiber, etc. Religious domination of a culture does not ensure the facilitation of the moral agency of either its rulers nor its subjects. History demonstrates this again and again. In fact, arguably, Religions again and again corrupt people's moral agency by imbuing some people with imputed value based on a social hierarchy that is merely a product of economic arrangements.

maybay said:

In a corporatized, risk averse society, the whole question of morality is a liability. The liberal society's problem of competing religions is the problem of competing morals, which is why secular society is amoral.

Malcolm wrote:

In a religious society, moral agency is a liability since people who exercise their moral agency generally find themselves challenging religious authorities merely by their actions. Religious societies indeed generally strip people of their moral agency by insisting they behave according to catechism rather than conscience.

The so-called liberal society is the only means of finding a common ground in a pluralistic world and ensuring everyone is treated with fairness.

Asian cultures have more fear from corporatization, as their social history has programmed Asians into sublimating their egos into the group.

One of the great legacies of the First Nations in North America to European settlers who eventually exterminated them by and large, is our American sense of individualism and personal freedom— because that certainly did not come from the European experience.

Modern corporatization is just an extension of European Colonialism. There will always be dissenters from it here in the US. But not in Asia, it fits in with the Asian mentality too well.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 12:13 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

The Tibetan lamas I know do not have an issue with the word "sacred". In no small part that is because for them Christianity is a non-issue.

For us Christianity is a major issue, and anything that reminds us of it--even peripherally--is completely unacceptable. That prejudice is just as toxic to the transition of the Dharma to the West as inappropriate importation of western ideas imho.

Malcolm wrote:

The Chinese understood quite well the need to exclude Taoist terminology from Buddhist texts. We should follow suit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 10:52 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

smcj said:

With or without an equivalent word in their language, the idea that Tibetans do not consider Dharma to be "sacred" is preposterous from what I've seen and heard.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not preposterous when you understand that the word "sacred" does not really map well to Tibetan or even Buddhist ideas about things.

We constantly impute/inflict our own linguistic assumptions on cultures outside our own. As much as I am pretty conversant in Tibetan language and sciences such as medicine, astrological calculation and so on, culturally speaking I am an outsider looking into Tibetan culture [as distinct from Dharma] through the window of their language and texts. As an outsider, it is important that I am aware of my own penchant to impute/inflict concepts and so on onto Tibetans they just don't share with Anglo-American culture.

This is one of the reasons I am so opposed to using language in translations that is saturated with native meaning for English speakers that does not reflect implications of a given term in the source language — in this case Tibetan. I gave an example, i.e. translating the Tibetan term gzhi, basis, as "ground of being", a theological term largely coined by the Catholic Theologian, Paul Tillich that has no meaning nor corollary in Buddhist discourse.

All the terms we might wish to gloss as "sacred" generally mean high, supreme, sublime, glorious, and so on, much more than they match our concept of "sacred" or "holy".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The passage where the Buddha declares that he has 'seen the house-builder' and will be 're-born no more' has no secular equivalent, as there is no way in secular thinking to accommodate that.

boda said:

I was wondering, how does anyone accommodate that? How do you accommodate it?

Wayfarer said:

When I say 'accommodate', what I mean is that a secular-scientific worldview doesn't have any categories in terms of which such a statement can be understood or explained. From the scientific-secular point of view, it is off the map, it is radically different to anything that can be accounted for in terms of the physical sciences or evolutionary biology.

In liberalism, there is an inbuilt 'respect for freedom of conscience' - that is basic to liberalism, and it's a good thing. However one of the consequences is that such ideas are accommodated as 'individual or social beliefs'. So Nirvāṇa is no longer a or the fundamental reality of existence - it's 'a belief'. People or groups are allowed to have such beliefs, but they're essentially either private, or socially-mediated, because they can't be accounted for in scientific terms. Hence that tends towards relativism, the idea that ultimately it is just a matter of belief, or to all intents, an opinion, and doesn't concern anything real.

Now maybe where that is changing is in the various attempts at cross-cultural dialogue, and there's some good things happening there. So it's not all doom and gloom. But for us living in the west, we need to be very aware of the background, lurking normativity of the 'scientific secular' worldview, as the 'arbiter of what is real'.

Malcolm wrote:

Those of us living in the West, i.e. the US, Australia, Canada Latin America, etc., should be aware that we are only here because of centuries of systematic ethnic cleansing and genocide of First Nations. We need to deal with this as a civilization and stop sweeping it under the rug. Until we openly confront the colonialist underpinnings of "Western Civilization" we will continue descend into barbarisms like the Iraq war and so on.

All talk of "the sacred" should be conducted with this in mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

maybay said:

Many people live, in the words of philosophers, an unexamined life.

Malcolm wrote:

Following a religion is no guarantee of living an examined life, indeed, it can utterly prevent it by providing a rote catechism.

maybay said:

Many people live, in the words of the Buddha, as if dead.

Malcolm wrote:

Religious belief does not mean you are exempt from Buddha's critique.

maybay said:

So lacking in mindfulness, so full of conceit, they consider themselves sovereign individuals first, and later, by choice, part of a tribe.

Malcolm wrote:

This is your imputation of a "moral" principle. Having the feeling that you belong to a tribe is just an extension of one's egotism. It does not make your egotism better.

maybay said:

A Hobbesian fallacy. You should know community is natural to humans. But a religious person sees not his tribe first, but a higher group which he chooses to recognize, e.g. "kingdom of God" or "all sentient beings".

Malcolm wrote:

Oh what rubbish. Many religious people do not recognize people of other religion as human. Honestly, you are deluding yourself with eloquent fantasies. The notion that religious people necessarily see the kingdom of god or all sentient beings above and beyond their affiliation is deluded.

maybay said:

Those people you know, they think they aren't religious, but they still embody so many sentiments and cultural artefacts of centuries of religious thought.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not religious people at all. They have none of the beliefs you claim are a necessary precondition for moral action.

maybay said:

There are parts of the world where people don't put the welfare and benefit of strangers above their own. They think it's the wrong thing to do.

Malcolm wrote:

And many of those people are religious, indeed, most of them are.

maybay said:

You say people matter not institutions. But today more than ever we find ourselves in roles without moral agency, mediated by secular institutions. In removing human error, technology, algorithms, are replacing the very possibility of being a fallible human.

Malcolm wrote:

No one is ever without moral agency. And technology will never remove the fallibility of being human, indeed much technological development is precisely a result of human folly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

maybay said:

Yes, I accuse those religions of lacking coherent, robust moral systems.

Malcolm wrote:

Staggeringly wrong-headed.

maybay said:

Any system of thought that ignores realities outside this life reduces the possibilities for action in this life to nothing more than rational self interest. That is not what I consider morality.

Malcolm wrote:

This is false reasoning. Many people with no religious belief in an afterlife or liberation nevertheless put the welfare and benefit of others above their own continually simply because they feel it is the right thing to do and they have the ability to be a benefit to others. I know many such people.

maybay said:

The notion that religious thinking a priori results in moral and ethical action is ludicrous. It results in moral possibility. That's all I'm saying.

Malcolm wrote:

What you are saying is obviously wrong. Religion is not at all necessary for moral and ethical action. It is not at all necessary for "moral possibility."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

maybay said:

All religions illustrate two essential possibilities for the future, typically either heaven vs hell, or entrapment vs liberation, or a combination. The moral decisions one makes plays a causative role in determining that future. But secular culture either makes no claims to the future, or settles for oblivion. Therefore, for the non-religious, moral actions in this life can play no part in determining that future. The future you experience (or don't) is unrelated to the moral decisions you make. Morality becomes indeterminate. Amoral.

Malcolm wrote:

One, not all religions make this claim; for example, Judaism has no concept of an afterlife or liberation. Neither do Confucism or Taoism. Would you accuse these faiths of lacking a coherent, robust ethical systems? I think not. In fact, the Purva Mimamsa too do not believe in rebirth or liberation.

Therefore, your premise is stillborn.

A concept of an afterlife and a concept of liberation are not necessary for the construction of a coherent, robust and comprehensive system of morals and ethics.

For the nonreligious, the pursuit of an ethical life becomes an end in itself. Quite frankly, given the colonization and globalization that has destroyed the environment of the world and has led to impoverishment of billions for the benefit of a few million, the ethics of the religious have not proven to be a boon to humanity. There is very little correlation between a person's supposed religiosity and their ethical behavior. In fact, religion is used time and again for perpetrating highly immoral and unethical actions. The notion that religious thinking a priori results in moral and ethical action is ludicrous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

Kunzang said:

Don't be silly. Of course it is. Even has a tulku ready to take the helm when the master passes.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the DC is a free association, with no hierarchy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

DGA said:

How is the Dharma transmitted in the absence of social institutions committed to the systematic practice and transmission of Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

The amazing thing is that Dharma continues to be transmitted despite institutions. There is no Dharma in institutions, there is only Dharma in people, and frankly — most people in Buddhist institutions are not very interested in Dharma.

Kunzang said:

Dzogchen Community is an institution. Do you feel this way about your vajra sibs too?

Malcolm wrote:

No, it really isn't, not in the way most people think about Dharma institutions [no monks, no monasteries, etc.]. There are some buildings, it is true. Who knows what will happen to those.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 3:33 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Punya said:

So what does "lha" as in "lha chos" mean Malcolm? And is this a collective term in Tibetan that would refer to the "specialness" (for want of a better word) of stupas of stupas relics, temples etc or is there another word?

(Interesting topic Tingzin)

Malcolm wrote:

The original meaning of Lha in Tibetan is "royal." Originally Dharma was the "chos" of the Tibetan Kings [chos is derived from a root which means to "rectify, repair." Lha also means "high." It also means a god. It has associations with high status.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

With regard to your last comment, "sacred outlook" does not work for dag snang. You do not need to consecrate anything to have dag snang. Dag snang is self-arising. You cannot fabricate dag snang.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, maybe, but as you like to point out, language is diachronic. I don't see why you can't repurpose 'sacred' in order to refer to a kind of natural or self-arising sacredness/purity or whatever.

Malcolm wrote:

You can, I won't. I like to keep terms with other religious as well as philosophical connotations out of Dharma discourse as much as possible. Its one of the reasons I object to the term "ground of being" so vehemently as a translation of gzhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 10th, 2015 at 1:54 AM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

DGA said:

I'm not so sure about the concept of the sacred simply because, at least as I've been taught, everything without exception and everyone has sacred qualities--and if everything is sacred, then nothing isn't sacred, and the concept has no real meaning anymore.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, maybe. I think there is definitely a sense in Buddhism that things like stupas, relics, temples, certain people and places, images of Buddhas etc. are "special" in some positive way.

FWIW, CTR used the word 'sacred' quite a lot, and in particular translated "dag snang" as "sacred outlook", see e.g. "The Tantric Path of Indestructible Wakefulness".

Malcolm wrote:

With regard to your last comment, "sacred outlook" does not work for dag snang. You do not need to consecrate anything to have dag snang. Dag snang is self-arising. You cannot fabricate dag snang.

Stupas, relics, temples, are sacred precisely because they are "set apart," nevertheless, there still is no Buddhist word of which I am aware that maps to "sacred".

OED:

sacred |'sākrid|

adjective

connected with God (or the gods) or dedicated to a religious purpose and so deserving veneration: sacred rites | the site at Eleusis is sacred to Demeter.

- religious rather than secular: sacred music.
- (of writing or text) embodying the laws or doctrines of a religion: a sacred Hindu text.
- regarded with great respect and reverence by a particular religion, group, or individual: an animal sacred to Mexican culture.
- sacrosanct: to a police officer nothing is sacred.

The nearest Tibetan word that overlaps might be " lha " in some of its uses, like " lha chos ", for example.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 9th, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: The Sacred in Buddhism [from Dharma Decline]

Content:

tingdzin said:

Split from "Dharma Decline" thread

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=47&t=21203>

Kim O'Hara said:

I wouldn't mind at all (well, hardly at all) except that in losing religion we are losing ethics and morality (admittedly imperfect ethics and morality) faster than we can replace them with a more rationally based version of them.

tingdzin said:

This is a very interesting point, I think. Some posters have recently, on other threads, expressed the opinion that ethics and morality can exist without religion, and it seems a case made be made for this proposition. I would say that Kim is right, however, to point out that an ethical code based on an incomplete understanding of reality is still better than no ethical code at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Most secular people are of the opinion that a) reality is not completely understood, and b) religions [including Buddhism] are based on a far less complete understanding of reality than the present level of scientific knowledge.

Despite the fact that United States was founded on the ethnic cleansing of entire nations from their lands, which all Americans need to learn about, an important concept enshrined in the US Constitution is the Establishment Clause, which mandates what is popularly termed "the separation of church and state."

Because this is such an important principle in modern civilization, we have no choice but to continue to forge and strengthen a liberal ethical consensus apart from our individual religious convictions.

tingdzin said:

To shift the focus, though, I myself am of the opinion that when religion is lost, humanity also loses a sense of the sacred.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree with this at all. Religions tend to make "the sacred" beyond the reach of common people, creating celestial hierarchies that do little more than mirror the social divisions of the peoples they pretend to serve.

tingdzin said:

What does "sacred" mean to you?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not really a Buddhist word — I can't think of a single Buddhist term in either Sanskrit or Tibetan that truly maps to this term in the way it is used in English.

We can go back its root, consecrate, which really means to set something apart. We also have the word "holy" which ultimately derives from the word *kailo — whole, uninjured, of good omen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 9th, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

DGA said:

How is the Dharma transmitted in the absence of social institutions committed to the systematic practice and transmission of Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

The amazing thing is that Dharma continues to be transmitted despite institutions. There is no Dharma in institutions, there is only Dharma in people, and frankly — most people in Buddhist institutions are not very interested in Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 9th, 2015 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

Tsongkhapafan, I think it's interesting that some here claim things like, "Buddhism isn't and evangelical religion" despite the fact that Buddhism is well know for being the first evangelical religion in recorded history. The Buddha said:

Go forth for the good of the many, for the happiness of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the welfare, the good and the happiness of gods and men. Let no two of you go in the same direction. Teach the Dharma which is beautiful in the beginning, beautiful in the middle and beautiful at the end. Proclaim both the letter and the spirit of the holy life completely fulfilled and perfectly pure.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course the Buddha wanted the Dharma to spread, but he did not want people to be zealots, which is what "evangelical" means outside of its specifically Christian meaning.

This is why there were strict rules laid down in the beginning about who could teach, who could be taught, when and where there could be teaching, and so on.

Evangelists don't care about context and decorum in their zeal to spread "the good news" and create converts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 9th, 2015 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Decline

Content:

Arjan Dirkse said:

The dharma is the dharma. It is not the corrupt institution of Buddhism.

dharmagoat said:

We see the dharma through the lens of institutional Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

You may, I don't.

dharmagoat said:

Buddhism defines 'the dharma'.

Malcolm wrote:

Not for me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 9th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Mani Kabum

Content:

Tigersnest said:

Are there any here who are experts regarding the Mani Kabum? As it has been translated to English and is freely available I wonder if the practices therein are open for Buddhist practitioner to use? As I have heard usually Chenrezig practice is openly available to practice...

Malcolm wrote:

The Mani Kabum is a collection of instructions on the three inner tantras. The empowerment for it is called "The King's tradition Avalokiteśvara."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 8th, 2015 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Rita_Repulsa said:

Buddhism

Malcolm wrote:

You can keep Buddhism. I have no use for it at all. I prefer Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: altar blessing

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

How important is it, and why? What should be done with statues which cannot be filled? Can someone bless their own altar when no other option exists?

I've read/heard so many things, curious on opinions out there.

Malcolm wrote:

You put a piece of paper in the statue with Om aḥ and huṃ written on it. You summon the wisdom beings into the statue, you recite the mantra of dependent origination. That is enough.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 11:00 PM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Tenso said:

Which text?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not precisely sure, this is according to ChNN.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 7:42 AM

Title: Re: How can karma know, and how do for instance hell wardens

Content:

boda said:

The question isn't about distinctness or contents, it's about values (good and bad) and interactions (cause and effect).

Malcolm wrote:

I was responding to your objection, not his question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 5:49 AM

Title: Re: How can karma know, and how do for instance hell wardens

Content:

Seishin said:

We know good and bad because of the discriminating mind and we are the creators of our own karma. It is not outside ourselves, not governed by a supernatural being.

boda said:

How could it be only inside ourselves? Or do you believe that everything, including other minds, are only a projection of your mind? If I'm not mistaken that's called solipsism.

Malcolm wrote:

Yogacara argues there is no container universe in reality, but that nevertheless, mind streams are distinct and unique.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Assembly Photos

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Beautiful photos with promises of more to come from the Washington Post.

https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/in-sight/wp/2015/11/05/stunning-photos-from-tibetan-buddhists-bliss-dharma-assembly/?hpid=hp_no-name_photo-story-d%3Ahomepage%2Fstory

Malcolm wrote:

This place was founded by one of my most important gurus, the late Khenpo Jigme Phuntsok:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: How can karma know, and how do for instance hell wardens

Content:

Ervin said:

Also, where they come from and who created them? How did they form? Because it seems that they know!!! Are these beings who are tottering wrongdoers also creating a bad karma, if not? How come?

Paul said:

He'll guardians are not sentient beings - they are projections from the mind of the hell being in question. It is not possible, therefore, to be reborn as a hell guardian. That also explains how they 'know' about the being they are torturing.

I think it was Asanga who explained this, but I'm not certain and can't look it up right now.

Ervin said:

Thanks Paul,

Is there any chance that you could provide a name and an excerpt of the sutra that explains what you are writing about?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Read Vasubandhu's Viṃśatikākārikā.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 2:32 AM
Title: Re: Gradual Teaching
Content:
Queequeg said:
I see. Point out the primordial state?

Malcolm wrote:
As Alpha states, no one can point it out to you; however, one's self-recognition can be encountered only with the help of a master. This is accomplished because we have experiences, and a master knows how to work with a student so that based on their own experiences they can recognize their own state.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, November 7th, 2015 at 2:07 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism
Content:
Tsongkhapafan said:
Everybody needs Buddhism...

Malcolm wrote:
No, everyone does not need Buddhism. Some people need food more, others need safety from threat of violent death, etc.

The practice of Buddhadharma is only within the grasp of those who have leisure and endowment.

Fundamentalists are those who insist that only their own path is good and everyone else's is wrong. This is not Buddhadharma. Buddhadharma sees the good in all worldly paths, and encourages that. It never suggests to people who are following other paths that they need to change, etc. If someone is interested in Buddhadharma, great. But there is no need to evangelize the Dharma — it won't work anyway.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 10:35 PM
Title: Re: The Buddha's Jihad! :D
Content:

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 10:28 PM
Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

Your argument is very much like saying there is no point in giving people medicine if they won't take up Dharma as their personal religion. It is quite extreme. A physician does not require his patients to change their religion in order to give them medicine. Buddha didn't either. He also taught the so called vehicle of gods and humans which concerns mundane ethics in order to create worldly benefit.

Tsongkhapa said:

No, it's not. The vehicle of gods and humans has as its foundation a belief in karma.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually it does not. Again, refer to the Kalama Sutta.

Tsongkhapa said:

You have to give people methods for practising ethics, you can't just tell them to 'be good' because without a method for being a good person, you will try, fail and feel guilty. This is many religious practitioners' experience if they don't have a path. Secular ethics is not a path because, being devoid of religion, it's just telling people to be good. It doesn't work. Ethics devoid of meditation doesn't work.

Malcolm wrote:

Secular ethics is not a path in the Buddhist sense, certainly.

Apparently you have never heard of Confucianism, a perfectly lovely example of secular ethics where ethical conduct is engaged in purely because it results in social harmony. It is however a means of ensuring social good and harmony, and those are themselves worthy ends in their own right.

Tsongkhapa said:

Sure, of course not all people have the propensity to practise Dharma, but many do, many more than at present have access to it and therefore it would seem to be a good idea to create the conditions for them to be able to do so.

Malcolm wrote:

I thought you understood the principles of karma. In any case, your original claim that His Holiness does not stress Buddhism is really complete and total nonsense. But by the same token, he is a political liberal, and understands the need for forging consensus and tolerance across religious lines — that cannot happen if he is constantly encouraging people to abandon their traditions for a new one. He is not an evangelist, unlike the Popes. That is not his job, and that has never been the job of Buddhist leaders.

Tsongkhapa said:

Humanism talks about it which is great but doesn't give people the methods to develop anything - without a path, without methods, there's no chance of success.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not need a method to develop love and compassion other than recognizing suffering and having the desire to do something to alleviate it as much as possible.

Quite honestly, I know a lot of religious people who don't do shit to help others, Buddhists included, who spend all their time arguing about religion and praying rather than getting off their asses and helping others. I know a lot of completely non-religious people who devote their lives to helping others, and frankly, I know more of the latter who are actively engaged in helping others than the former.

[quote]

Those people who already have highly developed love and compassion have so because they met a spiritual path in the past and were able to practise moral discipline and meditations to improve their love and compassion. If there is no method there is no practice and no success. Just telling people to be good doesn't work.[/quote]

From the point of view of the narrative we follow, this makes sense. But it does not make sense to people who have not drunk the Buddhist koolaid and there is no good reason on earth that we should try and force people to accept our views. Instead we should encourage people, without reference to religion, to be good, ethical people as ends in themselves because this leads to a harmonious society.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The preliminaries are for those who have not yet understood what the primordial state is. Tregchö and thögal are inseparable: sometimes however, tregchö is parsed as "sudden" and thögal as "gradual", but this too is in reality misleading.

Astus said:

So, there is a gradual path for those who have not yet attained understanding. And once there is understanding, one should still follow through tregcho and thögal practices, so again, it seems gradual.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not a "path" in the sense that one goes from here to there, as alpha pointed out to you. There is no path like "first train in śamatha, then train in vipaśyāna; first train on path of accumulation, then application, then seeing, etc., first do creation, then do completion," etc.

Tregchö and thögal are not "practices" in the sense that one is making effort to generate a result from some cause. Tregchö and thögal are how one continues in the confidence of liberation, or as CHNN parses it, how one continues in the state.

The long and short of it is that Dzogchen teachings did not fit in the mold of gradual and sudden dichotomy [which is a conversation is only tangentially relevant to Dzogchen due to the conflict in Tibet over Indian and Chinese approaches to Mahāyāna sūtra]. They also do not fit into the mold of ultimate and relative truths. They do not fit into the mold of paths and stages.

Sudden means direct access to the ultimate. If there are stages involved in the path, it is necessarily gradual. So, if Dzogchen were just recognising the primordial state, then it would be a sudden method. If preliminaries and follow up practices are also included, it is gradual.

"Ultimate and relative" have no meaning in Dzogchen. Dzogchen is not "a method of directly accessing the ultimate," if it were, it would be Chan. Because this is so, Dzogchen is not a "sudden" system. One does not need to have realized emptiness in order to have knowledge [rig pa] of their primordial state [thog ma'i gzhi, a.k.a. original basis]. There is no need to gather accumulations and so on.

To the extent that there are stages in Dzogchen, there is only one stage and everyone is already on it. The Rig pa rang shar tantra likens it to being on a lake. No matter where you go on a lake, you never leave the lake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

It's a commitment of the Refuge Vows to encourage people to go for refuge out of compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You don't. Dharma [Lha chos] is about personal transformation, not social transformation.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Why are Buddhists interested in social transformation? All meaningful change comes from personal transformation so anyone who wants meaningful change should be promoting inner change, not politics.

Dharma is not an evangelical religion.

Bodhisattvas and Buddhas out of their great compassion want everyone to practise Dharma as this is the only real solution to human problems. Of course they will try to create conditions to give people opportunities to do this.

Malcolm wrote:

Your argument is very much like saying there is no point in giving people medicine if they won't take up Dharma as their personal religion. It is quite extreme. A physician does not require his patients to change their religion in order to give them medicine. Buddha didn't either. He also taught the so called vehicle of gods and humans which concerns mundane ethics in order to create worldly benefit.

Tsongkhapa said:

You ought to study the freedoms and endowments again. Not everyone has the karma to be a practitioner of Dharma. You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink.

That's a bit defeatist. At the very least one would work to give everyone the opportunity to practise Dharma if they have the propensity for it.

Malcolm wrote:

News flash! Not everyone has the propensity to practice Dharma. In fact, a very tiny minority of sentient beings have the propensity to practice Dharma. This is what it means to have a precious human birth with the eight freedoms and ten endowments.

In the meantime, secular ethics are necessary to keep the world from blowing itself up. Why? Because it is not possible to convert everyone to Buddhadharma. We do not live in the Kingdom of Shambhala.

Tsongkhapa said:

In the meantime, secular ethics are what the world needs. They will lead eventually to Dharma.

Humanism isn't going to lead to Dharma, and neither is politics or social change movements. The world needs a genuine spiritual path not secular ethics that implicitly deny the value of religion.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it will. Humanism encourages people to develop compassion and love for others, and encourages them to avoid non-virtues of body, voice and mind. This will cause them to accumulate merit and continue to take rebirth in higher realms. This is precisely the vehicle of gods and men that the Buddha taught, for example, in the famed Kalamas Sutta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The three series are a literary division.

"Preliminaries, trekcho, togal and its visions" are not stages or levels.

Astus said:

So those literary divisions do not mean difference in the teachings, one superior to the other, etc?

If those are not stages/levels, then what? Gradual instructions maybe?

Malcolm wrote:

The three series do not mean that for example, man ngag sde is "superior" to the other two, though in fact it has been interpreted that way. The reality of it is that they focus on different aspects of Dzogchen teachings.

The preliminaries are for those who have not yet understood what the primordial state is. Tregchö and thögal are inseparable: sometimes however, tregchö is parsed as "sudden" and thögal as "gradual", but this too is in reality misleading.

The long and short of it is that Dzogchen teachings did not fit in the mold of gradual and sudden dichotomy [which is a conversation is only tangentially relevant to Dzogchen due to the conflict in Tibet over Indian and Chinese approaches to Mahāyāna sūtra]. They also do not fit into the mold of ultimate and relative truths. They do not fit into the mold of paths and stages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The aggregates are a product of mind, correct?

Ye shes is a product of rig pa, correct?

M

alpha said:

At this point i will respectfully withdraw from this discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

You've got to know when to hold 'em, know when to fold 'em,

Know when to walk away, know when to run.

You never count your money when you're sittin' at the table,

There'll be time enough for countin' when the dealin's done.

—— The Gambler

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Śakyamuni is one of the twelve teachers of Dzogchen teachings, beginning with Buddha Nanga Dampa and ending with Garab Dorje.

tomamundsen said:

Do we know what Dzogchen teachings Shakyamuni taught? Are there any tantras specifically revealed by Shakyamuni?

Malcolm wrote:

He did not explicitly teach Dzogchen, however, he predicted the arrival of Garab Dorje.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Which levels, stages and practices?

Astus said:

Semde, longde, menngagde. Preliminaries, trekcho, togal and its visions. And probably there are others associated with or included in Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

The three series are a literary division.

"Preliminaries, trekcho, togal and its visions" are not stages or levels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Shabkar Natsog Rangdrol wrote:

Rongzom Pandita wrote:

Astus said:

If there are no stages and practices, what are all those levels, stages, and practices in Dzogchen?

Malcolm wrote:
Which levels, stages and practices?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 1:08 AM
Title: Re: Gradual Teaching
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Dzogchen is "No fkin way!?"

Queequeg said:
In this sense

or this sense?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 12:44 AM
Title: Re: Gradual Teaching
Content:
DGA said:
that's the path of renunciation and negation.

the affirmative path (with a slightly different mantra) was posited some twenty to thirty years prior:

<https://books.google.com/books?isbn=0940183218>

Malcolm wrote:
Dzogchen is "No fkin way!?"

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, November 6th, 2015 at 12:39 AM
Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
[It is the Dharma] in which one abides in sameness, like the supreme lotus of the world, not avoiding anything.

dzogchungpa said:
What does "like the supreme lotus of the world" mean?

Malcolm wrote:

According to Mipham:

Further, in the Dharma in which all desires of the world are mastered and is also the supreme of abundance, not covered by any faults like a lotus, one's conduct does not avoid anything. The reason for that is that there is no true difference between all faults and qualities, they are similar and not distinct, abiding in sameness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Who said the meaning of Prajñāpāramitā and Dzogchen were different? I merely said that in Dzogchen there were no caveats.

Astus said:

As you wrote, "Tibetan Buddhists in general interpret all sūtra paths as gradual paths". So, while there are five paths and ten bhumis, a bodhisattva does not get stuck by such conceptual fabrications.

"No caveats" here would mean that Dzogchen plays with open cards. How does it translate to the topic of gradual teachings?

Malcolm wrote:

Shabkar Natsog Rangdrol wrote:

The manner of obtaining each stage through the stages of the cause and result of the common vehicles, likewise the stage obtained through the effort and practice of creation and completion according to outer and inner secret mantra, here [in the Great Perfection] do not exist as [stages] upon which to train or make progress.

In reality, all vehicles are included and the paths and stages are complete within the single stage of one's pure vidyā.

Rongzom Pandita wrote:

To determine the greatness of the total non-existence of buddhahood, if buddhahood and non-buddhahood are non-dual, why is one seeking? Ascertain there is nothing to seek. The yogins in whom such a meaning is present effortlessly abide on the undifferentiated stage of Samantabhadra. The undifferentiated stage of Samantabhadra is the universal stage of all Buddhas. Whatever the meaning of the Great Perfection might be, that is it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Innermost Great Potentiality states:

The Soaring Garuda states:

The Cuckoo of Vidyā states:

Astus said:

"no suffering, origination, cessation or path; no gnosis, no acquisition and no non-acquisition. ... Due to non-acquisition, the bodhisattva, having relied on Perfect Wisdom, dwells without mental obstruction. From the non-existence of mental obstruction, he is fearless, he overcomes inverted erroneous views, and ultimately reaches Nirvāṇa."

(https://drive.google.com/file/d/0B4-

3ivsK5Q6MMWI3OGFjODctZTQ1Ni00NzU5LWJiOTgtMjdiNWM1YWE4N2Nk/view)

"if the bodhisattva refrains from taking up the practice of any particular dharma, because he does not apprehend any dharma whatsoever, he may thereby succeed in realizing prajñāpāramitā. How can this be the case? All practices are essentially false and unreal."

(Nagarjuna: Realization of Prajñāpāramitā through no Seizing on Practices, in http://kalavinka.org/Jewels/book_excerpts/N6P_excerpts/N6P_X-Bk4_X-15.pdf)

Malcolm wrote:

Who said the meaning of Prajñāpāramitā and Dzogchen were different? I merely said that in Dzogchen there were no caveats.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 10:14 PM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Queequeg said:

Regarding lineage...

ChNN seems to say that the DC lineage originates in Tibet... Is that correct? That's why I ask above about what place Shakyamuni has in the DC 'pantheon'.

Malcolm wrote:

He does not say this. He says [consistent with the teachings of the lineage] that Dzogchen originated in Oddiyāna, which was located somewhere in Pakistan.

Śakyamuni is one of the twelve teachers of Dzogchen teachings, beginning with Buddha Nanga Dampa and ending with Garab Dorje.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No. "Sudden" does not apply to Dzogchen, neither does "gradual." That's like asking the question, "Is a bar of gold suddenly gold, or gradually gold."

Astus said:

That's like saying Dzogchen lacks the path to liberation, while that is not actually true. In other words, one can get to that bar of gold either through the process of digging, clearing and melting (or something http://www.miningandmetallurgy.com/gold/assets/images/Gold_Technology_and_Gold_Production_Plant.PNG); or by discovering it in its pure form. The former is the gradual, the latter is the sudden way. It is of no help to say that the gold is already gold regardless of its location or information of its whereabouts.

Malcolm wrote:

The Innermost Great Potentiality states:

In the dhātu of all outer and inner phenomena,
the pure experiential field,
buddhas and sentient beings are nondual,
how can there be fabrication with a path?

The inner potentiality which does not need to be accomplished is free from aspiration, it has already been naturally completed without activity.

The Soaring Garuda states:

The illness of those entering the path that is not a path is great;
those who wish to arrive are like wild animals chasing a mirage.

Since there is no object to attain, there is nothing other than the three realms.

Even relying on the tenth bhumi is an obstruction to awakening.

The Cuckoo of Vidyā states:

The primal nature of diversity is also nondual,
in reality, free from the proliferation of partiality.

“Just as it is” is also not conceptualized,

Vairocana, Samantabhadra.

Since it is perfect, the illness of effort is abandoned, because of remaining naturally, equipoise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

alpha said:

We are not disputing the fact that the condition for them to be seen as wisdom is that one has to first discover the primordial state. And that is because this discussion is not about questioning our personal abilities to recognise them as such but is about what they are in truth.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, not exactly.

The aggregates are a product of mind, correct? Mind is deluded correct? What a deluded mind perceives is a delusion, correct?

Ye shes is a product of rig pa, correct? Rig pa is undeluded, correct? What undeluded rig pa perceives is not a delusion, correct?

As the Pellucid Transcendent State[/i> [dgongs pa zang thal] tells us, there is one basis, two paths, and two results. At the end of one of those paths lies the five aggregates and samsara; and at the end of the other path is the five wisdoms and nirvana.

However, there is a way in which phenomena of samsara and the phenomena of nirvana are the same, as Mañjuśrimitra declares:

Therefore, because awakening and nonawakening are the same in terms of absence of characteristics, there is nothing to accept or reject.

So therefore:

[It is the Dharma] in which one abides in sameness, like the supreme lotus of the world, not avoiding anything.

And:

Abide in sameness without imputing duality, free from speech, nothing to do or to not do, nothing to accumulate or reduce.

And of course, it goes without saying we need to be careful about being arrogant about what we think we understand. As Mañjuśrimitra states:

The pride of promoting one's understanding and lording it over all, giving rise to attachment and aversion, is ignorance which does not see the meaning, producing conflict.

Mipham further clarifies this:

If one engages in grasping such as, "Freedom from all views is seeing the ultimate meaning," promoting the idea, "My understanding is the realization of the truth" and lording it over all, the pride caused by that view, causing attachment to one's own views and aversion towards views of others, is ignorance which produces conflicts. Since there is no so-called "truth" or "falsity", holding onto one's view as true and holding onto the views of others as false are thoughts that does not correspond to the way both exist. Therefore, the authentic meaning of not perceiving either true nor false is not seen.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No caveats in Dzogchen...just saying...

Astus said:

Do you mean it is explicitly gradual or sudden?

(Sam van Schaik has a <https://books.google.hu/books?id=0Tg6AwAAQBAJ> on that subject.)

Malcolm wrote:

No. "Sudden" does not apply to Dzogchen, neither does "gradual." That's like asking the question, "Is a bar of gold suddenly gold, or gradually gold."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 10:05 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ka dag is ye shes.

alpha said:

But yeshe is also the five aggregates, good and bad karma, our ego, our perceptions, emotions, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

Let me modify my question - among active, living traditions?

Astus said:

Practically they all teach a gradual path. It's just that the <https://books.google.hu/books?id=LyfysMjKooEC> is naturally more popular.

If the unwise Bodhisattva counts the kotis of aeons,
And has the notion that it is long until the full attainment of enlightenment, he is bound to suffer,
And for a long time he will be suffering while moving unto Dharma.
Therefore he is inferior in the perfection of vigour, and essentially indolent.

(Ratnagunasamcayagatha, ch 30, tr Conze)

Queequeg said:

... all Sudden, with caveats... all Gradual, with caveats. Caveats, caveats, filling 84,000 volumes.

Brings me to the conclusion, "fk it. Just do it."

Malcolm wrote:

No caveats in Dzogchen...just saying...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

Let me modify my question - among active, living traditions?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan Buddhists in general interpret all sūtra paths as gradual paths, generally considering other interpretations incorrect and baseless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

<http://www.shabkar.org/scripture/sutras/index.htm>

Malcolm wrote:

None of these sūtras make the claim you are making, i.e. that eating meat is inherently harmful. They are mainly objecting to killing and then eating meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Gradual Teaching

Content:

Queequeg said:

It occurred to me that, other than straw men in polemical screeds, I can't think of any Gradual Teaching Mahayana Buddhism. Is there such a thing? There are practices that appear Gradual in various traditions, but once you start scratching the surface, some Sudden teaching appears at a "deeper" level.

What do you think?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read more Indian Mahāyāna sūtras and śāstras. Why do you think there is such a huge debate between Indian Buddhism and Chan?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

Sila is something a Buddhist undertakes as part of a practice aimed at personal transformation; it has no necessary bearing on the wider sociopolitical sphere. The latter should be based on "a political conception the principles and values of which all citizens can endorse."

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Lazy_eye said:

That distinction seems to neatly untangle certain problems, such as how a Buddhist should approach contentious issues such as abortion. The answer would seem to be that a Buddhist should personally practice sila, which includes non-killing. But since there is no "overlapping consensus" about the morality of abortion, it would be inappropriate for a Buddhist to join up with pro-lifers, for instance; this would constitute an extension of religious doctrine into the civic sphere.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, this at least is my point of view, which is why I am personally opposed to abortion, but support a women's right to choose.

Lazy_eye said:

Now someone will raise the objection, "yes, but what about bodhicitta?" But the answer would be that bodhicitta does not apply here because the term actually refers to the process of personal transformation, that is, the aspiration for enlightenment. It doesn't mean the aspiration to become a moral crusader.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 1:48 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Matt J said:

Is there a difference between gsal ba and ka dag? Is gsal ba also a potential?

Malcolm wrote:

gSal ba is a potential of ka dag. Ka dag is ye shes. This is the point that people do not seem to understand. Ka dag is the description of the original state of the basis, purity. The basis is ye shes, pristine consciousness, primordial wisdom, timeless awareness, [insert favorite calque here], etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 1:15 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Unnecessary.

What the world needs is a clearly articulated platform of secular ethics divorced from religions altogether.

Lazy_eye said:

Do you have any existing examples in mind, or anything that might serve as a useful model?

What would be the general outline of such a system?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a long discussion about this in the analytical philosophy tradition. Rawls in part answers your question:

The religious doctrines that in previous centuries were the professed basis of society have gradually given way to principles of constitutional government that all citizens, whatever their religious view, can endorse. Comprehensive philosophical and moral doctrines likewise cannot be endorsed by citizens generally, and they also no longer can, if they ever could, serve as the professed basis of society. Thus, political liberalism looks for a political conception of justice that we hope can gain the support of an overlapping consensus of reasonable religious, philosophical, and moral doctrines in a society regulated by it. Gaining this support of reasonable doctrines lays the basis for answering our second fundamental question as to how citizens, who remain deeply divided on religious, philosophical, and moral doctrines, can still maintain a just and stable democratic society. To this end, it is normally desirable that the comprehensive philosophical and moral views we are wont to use in debating fundamental political issues should give way in public life. Public reason—citizens' reasoning in the public forum about constitutional essentials and basic questions of justice—is now best guided by a political conception the principles and values of which all citizens can endorse (VI). That political conception is to be, so to speak, political and not metaphysical.

Political liberalism, then, aims for a political conception of justice as a freestanding view. It offers no specific metaphysical or epistemological doctrine beyond what is implied by the political conception itself. As an account of political values, a free-standing political conception does not deny there being other values that apply, say, to the personal, the familial, and the associational; nor does it say that political values are separate from, or discontinuous with, other values. One aim, as I have said, is to specify the political domain and its conception of justice in such a way that its institutions can gain the support of an overlapping consensus. In this case, citizens themselves, within the exercise of their liberty of thought and conscience, and looking to their comprehensive doctrines, view the political conception as derived from, or congruent with, or at least not in conflict with, their other values.

Rawls, John (2011-02-10). Political Liberalism: Expanded Edition (Columbia Classics in Philosophy) (p. 10). Columbia University Press. Kindle Edition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, November 5th, 2015 at 12:52 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In the meantime, secular ethics are what the world needs. They will lead eventually to Dharma.

Lazy_eye said:

Should it be Dharma-based secular ethics, or secular ethics within a Dharmic framework? Or is that not necessary?

Malcolm wrote:

Unnecessary.

What the world needs is a clearly articulated platform of secular ethics divorced from religions altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Do you not have shops that sell only vegetables in the US?

Malcolm wrote:

Not where I live, and not in most of the USA.

dharmagoat said:

Here we can choose not to shop at supermarkets. We even have the option of buying from local growers. Does this mean that the points you are applying to everyone do not apply to everyone?

Malcolm wrote:

All of the CSA's where I live raise animals for slaughter.

dharmagoat said:

Some. Perhaps less than you currently do?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't really eat that much meat. Way less than the average American. The average American eats a quarter pound of meat every day. I eat maybe a quarter pound of meat a week on average.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 10:57 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism without buddism

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Sometimes you can water things down too much and create the lowest common denominator. My problem with the Dalai Lama's teaching is that he makes it sound as if you don't need Buddhism to make the world a better place...

Malcolm wrote:

You don't. Dharma [Lha chos] is about personal transformation, not social transformation.

Tsongkhapafan said:

you just need secular ethics.

Malcolm wrote:

Secular ethics [Mi chos] are about outer transformation and governance, not inner transformation. We need both Lha chos and Mi chos.

Tsongkhapafan said:

He almost never encourages people to take refuge in the Three Jewels which is most odd for a Buddhist monk.

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma is not an evangelical religion.

Tsongkhapa said:

Secular ethics is too general and is never going to provide a real solution to people's suffering - the only solution is liberation and enlightenment which are only part of Buddhism, therefore to my mind, the selling of secular ethics is selling people short and undermining Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

You ought to study the freedoms and endowments again. Not everyone has the karma to be a practitioner of Dharma. You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink.

In the meantime, secular ethics are what the world needs. They will lead eventually to Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And I have also demonstrated that meat is consistently supplied to the market in excess of demand. Our commodity markets are driven on futures, expectations of demand, not real demand.

dharmagoat said:

This does not mean that demand ceases to influence production.

Malcolm wrote:

The number of slaughtered animals in the chain far exceeds the actual demand for meat. Additionally, as I also pointed out, money we pay to markets which sell meat is not divided up from moneys from vegetables. The only way to avoid supporting that market's purchasing of meat in general is to stop shopping at omnivore markets.

dharmagoat said:

A cattle rancher is not paid for the crops his neighbour grows.

Malcolm wrote:

They are separate businesses.

A market is one business. When you buy groceries in a market, you are supporting all that market's economic activities, not merely the ones of which you approve. Its like taxes — when you pay taxes, you are supporting all of the Gvt.'s activities, including wars of which you may disapprove. You may not approve of the wars which are fought, freeing you from the karmic burden of them; you may not approve of a market selling meat, freeing you from that that burden of karma. I also do not approve of killing and slaughter, but I also know that my eating meat bought at whole foods, for example, has nothing to do with the act of ordering an animal killed, etc. It would be different of course if I ordered a side of beef from a local rancher. But I don't.

If our culture changes so that no one buys meat, I won't buy it or eat it since it won't be available any longer. But all the evidence suggests that animals will be slaughtered for meat long after we are gone, and in the mean time, since there is no fault with eating meat that is pure in three ways, I will continue to do so when I need to, since I have found that I actually need to eat some amount of meat, to maintain my health. It is a survival issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No one is saying that we should not practice ahimsa. What we are saying is that your idea of "ahimsa" is problematical when you claim that by definition eating meat is harmful.

dharmagoat said:

We can agree that once an animal has been killed for its meat the harm has been done. As you have said, meat itself does not suffer. What you consistently overlook is how the acceptance of this meat, especially if it is paid for, completes the cycle of supply and demand. By rewarding the killing for meat, the consumer is encouraging subsequent killing.

Malcolm wrote:

And I have also demonstrated that meat is consistently supplied to the market in excess of demand. Our commodity markets are driven on futures, expectations of demand, not real demand.

This is not like Tibet, where, for example, Shabkar could reasonably scold monasteries for ordering sheep to be slaughtered based on demand for meat in monasteries.

The number of slaughtered animals in the chain far exceeds the actual demand for meat. Additionally, as I also pointed out, money we pay to markets which sell meat is not divvied up from moneys from vegetables. The only way to avoid supporting that market's purchasing of meat in general is to stop shopping at omnivore markets.

I am certain that in the near future, there will be a trend toward vegan and vegetarian markets — but that does not exist now, at least nowhere near where I live.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

As to complicity, as I've said a million times, we are all already indirectly complicit in lots of horrible things

seeker242 said:

The point I'm trying to make is that this is largely irrelevant. It doesn't matter if our activity causes a lot of inevitable harm or not. The point is that not all harm is inevitable...The point is that not all harm causing is created equal. If one can choose a less harmful choice, one should choose a less harmful choice. The idea that "it won't matter anyway" is just a cop out. The same logic can be used to refute recycling or even voting in a democratic election. It can be used to refute any action where the effect is cumulative. AKA "my individual vote won't matter, so I'm not going to vote". Just imagine if everyone believed that...

Malcolm wrote:

No one is saying that we should not practice ahimsa. What we are saying is that your idea of "ahimsa" is problematical when you claim that by definition eating meat is harmful.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If it makes you happy to insist on adding lhun grub, ok, but it isn't necessary. The Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra states:

The basis is called "great original purity" which is present as the essence, nature and compassion.

tomamundsen said:

Isn't lhundrup the "nature", though?

Malcolm wrote:

lhun drub and thugs rje are potentials of ka dag.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Malcolm,

Would you say more about rupakaya? You can assume i know nothing except maybe the word.

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Rūpa means form — it refers to the sambhogakāya and nirmanakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

The nine position scheme consists of varying interpretations (of the basis) that key adepts have chosen to champion. They are:

1. gza' gtad dang bral ba [championed by Oḍḍiyāna Mahārāja and Vimalamitra]
2. lhun grub [Garab Dorje]
3. bdag nyid chen po [Vairocana]
4. rang byung ye shes [Ānandā (nun)]
5. bya btsal dang dral ba [Buddhagupta]
6. bde ba chen po [Śrī Siṃha]
7. gnyis su med pa [Kukurāja and Mañjuśrimitra]
8. thig le chen po [Rājahastin]
9. chos thams cad gzhi ji bzhin pa [Garab Dorje, Dhahenatalo (king) and gNubs-chen Sangs-rgyas ye-shes]

Malcolm wrote:

You should clarify this is from sems sde, not man ngag sde.

Thanks, I actually wasn't aware of this, although makes sense. Are Nubchen's expositions generally classified as sems sde?[/quot
yup

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 6:40 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Mkoll said:

I don't see anything in that study that says grass-fed beef is less carbon intensive than organic agriculture. I also didn't see anything saying that ruminants are capable of zero carbon emissions.

You also said "studies." Plural means more than one. Can you deliver?

Malcolm wrote:

Also you can look.

Prior to oil age, the earth was basically in a steady state carbon wise for millennia. Meat and all.

What has causing global warming is oil, and nothing else.

Cattle raising that uses little or no oil is naturally going to be more efficient, carbon wise, that any plowing of fields done the old fashioned way.

However with proper strategies that include grazing animals...

<http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0167198705000401>

Then, the damage that conventional plowing does to the land...

<http://agriculturejournals.cz/publicFiles/50927.pdf>:

The moldboard plow causes the largest amount of carbon losses...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

alpha said:

In the schema i came across in my readings the 7 positions listed do not include bdag nyid chen po

The list is as follows:

Kadag

lhun grub

ma ges pa

nges pa'i don

cir yang sgyur du btub pa cir yang khas blang du btub pa sna tshogs su char'ba

asunthatneversets said:

The nine position scheme consists of varying interpretations (of the basis) that key adepts have chosen to champion. They are:

1. gza' gtad dang bral ba [championed by Oḍḍiyāna Mahārāja and Vimalamitra]
2. lhun grub [Garab Dorje]
3. bdag nyid chen po [Vairocana]
4. rang byung ye shes [Ānandā (nun)]
5. bya btsal dang dral ba [Buddhagupta]
6. bde ba chen po [Śrī Siṃha]
7. gnyis su med pa [Kukurāja and Mañjuśrimitra]
8. thig le chen po [Rājahastin]
9. chos thams cad gzhi ji bzhin pa [Garab Dorje, Dhahenatalo (king) and gNubs-chen Sangs-rgyas ye-shes]

Malcolm wrote:

You should clarify this is from sems sde, not man ngag sde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Mkoll said:

Can you provide a link to the actual studies? That's where you got the information to make that claim, right? You're not just making it up, are you?

Malcolm wrote:

Grass fed beef does not require water the way feed lot beef does, does not require grain or antibiotics, the herds are moved from pasture to pasture, building soil and sequestering carbon.

All of the great savannahs were created by moving herds of animals, and in the case of the American Great Plains, were created by humans for animals by burning away forests. These savannahs sequestered immense amounts of carbon. Ripping them up in the 19th century released a lot of carbon.

Now, large scale industrial organic agriculture requires great petroleum inputs, as well as animal inputs from slaughterhouses, irrigation [often in unsustainable places like California and Texas], and so on.

So no, I am not making it up. If you look, you can find studies.

Mkoll said:

I worded that wrong. I meant to ask if you're making up the studies that claim that grass-fed beef is less carbon intensive than organic agriculture. Because I did look for them and didn't find any.

Again, have you actually seen these studies or are you just making them up? If you've seen them, it shouldn't be too hard to direct me to where they are...

Malcolm wrote:

<http://edis.ifas.ufl.edu/an302>

Here is an example. Properly managed, ruminants could be capable of 0 carbon emissions and have a positive impact on carbon sequestration.

There used to be millions of buffalo on the Great Plains — according to current ideology, this should have contributed greatly to global warming, but the opposite in fact is true. Native Americans herded buffalo for 10,000 years and built one of the largest carbon sinks ever in human history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 5:39 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe the problem here is that your understanding of original purity is too confined to the emptiness aspect. Original purity has essence, nature and compassion. It has the three kāyas. Why? Because it is dharmakāya. There is no dharmakāya without the other two.

alpha said:

I always maintained that original purity is indivisible with lhun grub and it didn't make sense for you to say that the true definitive view is only original purity out of the two. Isolating one aspect over another is akin to falling into partiality (the extreme of annihilation), that is how I see it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not me who is saying that, it is Vimalamitra who is saying that in several books, not just one. You can accept or reject whatever you like.

If it makes you happy to insist on adding lhun grub, ok, but it isn't necessary. The Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra states:

The basis is called “great original purity” which is present as the essence, nature and compassion. The pristine consciousness of the unchanging essence manifests without impediment and is called “the reality of the youthful vase body.” The nature is the unimpeded five lights. For example, the appearance of compassion is like the absence of clouds. That is called “the reality of original purity,” i.e. unlimited and not falling into any position

And:

One will be liberated on the ultimate stage of original purity.

And:

Next, the absence of anything higher than the pristine consciousness that naturally arises on the stage of original purity is the attainment of the sixteen stage, Highest Wisdom.

And the String of Pearls Tantra states:

Everything actualizes buddhahood in the state of original purity free from taints.

The Realms and Transformations of Sound Tantra states:

Further, when the mind is ripened,
the basis is present in the dharmakāya, the taints upon original purity are exhausted and the essence has never been deluded.

Vimalamitra states:

The basis, the state of initial original purity, is liberated because its essence is not established at all.

Its nature appears as everything and its compassion arises in every way.

It is pretty clear to me that the intention of the 17 Tantras is that the basis is ka dag, original purity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Mkoll said:

Can you provide a link to the actual studies? That's where you got the information to make that claim, right? You're not just making it up, are you?

Malcolm wrote:

Grass fed beef does not require water the way feed lot beef does, does not require grain or antibiotics, the herds are moved from pasture to pasture, building soil and sequestering carbon.

All of the great savannahs were created by moving herds of animals, and in the case of the American Great Plains, were created by humans for animals by burning away forests. These savannahs sequestered immense amounts of carbon. Ripping them up in the 19th century released a lot of carbon.

Now, large scale industrial organic agriculture requires great petroleum inputs, as well as animal inputs from slaughterhouses, irrigation [often in unsustainable places like California and Texas], and so on.

So no, I am not making it up. If you look, you can find studies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 4:35 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

100% Grass fed? Are you kidding? Much less of a carbon footprint than any organic field plowed with tractors, etc.

Mkoll said:

I'd like to see the peer-reviewed study that comes to that conclusion.

Malcolm wrote:

You can find them, if you want to look.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

alpha said:

Well, the way you approach it it makes the basis just like dead space.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, but you can see it however you like.

alpha said:

Is this the definitive view?

Pearl Necklace tantra states:

"The ultimate nature is primordially pure and indescribable.

Its character is spontaneous and whatever appears is perfect".

The implication of this statement is that the basis apart from not falling into the extreme of permanence is not like nothing or dead space .

Malcolm wrote:

The Six Dimensions of Samantabhadra states:

It is present as pure from the beginning,
having always appeared as immaculate.

Among all of these stages of intellect,
the essence is pure from the beginning.

Vimalamitra comments on this passage:

When the asserted positions about the seven bases that are the object of knowledge are divided into two, there are six defective positions concerning the basis and the faultless position of original purity which is confirmed in our own texts...A follower of philosophical tenets asserts that all objects of knowledge are confirmed from the seven positions because assertions about the basis are confirmed through proofs, refutations, contradictions and replies. Those other six defective philosophical tenets are clearly explained in the Six Dimensions and so on. However, those who follow philosophical tenets [15a] resemble someone who has not seen Vajrāsana telling stories about Vajrāsana. Simply put, they do not confirm the profound meaning that is to be understood.

So however you want to slice it up, of the seven positions about the basis, only the position that the basis is originally pure is non-defective.

alpha said:

One the other hand what good does it do to make kadag the focus of one's view and place lhun grub on a lesser position as potentially being the cause of error.

To me focusing on kadag alone as being the definitive view can lead to errors as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Addressing your concern, he continues:

Since the six assertions about the basis are recognized as the potential of original purity, the practice of the faultless philosophical tenet is like explaining Vajrāsana having been there. That is without error. In addition, it is so because the explanatory description is faultless. People who follow philosophical tenets can only partially explain how the six assertions about the basis are defective.

In other words, it is recognized that the other six positions about the basis, while faulty, do indeed address an aspect of the potentiality of original purity. Nevertheless, only describing the basis as original purity is considered absolutely faultless from the point of view of the system of Dzogchen laid out in the 17 Tantras.

Maybe the problem here is that your understanding of original purity is too confined to the emptiness aspect. Original purity has essence, nature and compassion. It has the three kāyas. Why? Because it is dharmakāya. There is no dharmakāya without the other two.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Earth Termas - real objects?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Everything that buddhas do is a lie, because everything we sentient beings perceive is deceptive, including buddhas.

dzogchungpa said:

Mind is blown.

Malcolm wrote:

I really think you should use it as your new sig, with attribution of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Queequeg said:

Per the bolded part, does that mean if an adept dissolves into the little rainbow body that is indicative of a process with an inevitable end and which can come before the completion of certain other practices carried out in the Bardo?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that the practitioner is engaged in the final stages of integrating with the basis, described above as "original"

Queequeg said:

Also, can you explain what it means to be liberated into the three kayas?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that having realized the dharmakāya, one now can act with the rūpakāya.

Queequeg said:

That being said, the difference between Dzogchen and sūtra Dharmas is that in sūtra Dharmas no methods are explained how to achieve the result they describe, apart from the lengthy and forbidding paths and stages.

Aye, that does seem to be the rub.

I understand that Tantra is also distinct from Dzogchen. Can you elaborate on that distinction?

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtra in general belongs to the path of renunciation — this is the main method of practice.

Tantra in general belongs to the path of transformation — using the creation stage and completion stage and so on, generating oneself as the deity, reciting mantras, transforming one's impure dimension into a pure one.

Dzogchen is path of liberation or self-liberation, where one does not need to apply any sort of antidote, either in terms of renunciation or transformation. Instead phenomena are allowed to self-liberate just as they are by recognizing one's primordial state and integrating with that. Apart from Norbu Rinpoche's teachings, the place where these three paths are most clearly explained is in the Zhang Zhung sNyan rgyud teachings belonging to the Bon school, especially the outer cycle:

Now then, the first, the path of renunciation, gives up the ten nonvirtues and accomplishes the ten virtues. The result is asserted to be buddhahood after many lives and eons. That is the path of causal characteristics.

Second, the so called "path of transformation" of result secret mantra is transforming the outer universe into a celestial mansion, transforming the inhabitants into gods and goddesses, transforming the five samsaya substances into the five ambrosias, transforming the five aggregates into the five deities and transforming the five afflictions into the five wisdoms. This is asserted as buddhahood, being the path of result secret mantra.

However, neither the path of renunciation nor the path of transformation will be explained here. What is to be explained here now is the inseparability of cause and result in the great vehicle.

In the explanation of the so called "path of great self liberation with nothing to accept or reject" samsara and nirvana, existence and nonexistence, the duality of permanence and annihilation, the duality of happiness and suffering, the duality of attachment and aversion, the five afflictions, the eight consciousnesses, all appearances of deluded concepts of subject and object are not abandoned and are not to be abandoned. Since everything arises from the mind, in the sole unique sphere, abandonment and accepting do not exist as a duality. Therefore, everything that arises self-arises, everything that is liberated is self-liberated, therefore it is termed "the path of liberation."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

alpha said:

What I have is different.

Isn't the basis the indivisibility of kadag and lhun grub?

Malcolm wrote:

The reality of the original basis that exists permeated with the intrinsic nature of the three pristine consciousnesses, essence, nature and compassion, is the inwardly illuminated original purity.

It has lhun grub, but lhun grub is the cause of making mistakes, whereas, ka dag can never be the cause of error. This is why 17 Tantras state that the basis is ka dag, and that this is the correct position. Sometimes, the union of ka dag and lhun grub is called " ka dag chen po " — still, ka dag is more important because it can never be a basis for delusion, unlike lhun grub.

alpha said:

To me those quotes you gave are only arguments to support the originally pure nature of the basis .Because this purity is not just purity it has a potentiality and a luminosity, aspects which are actually reffered in your quotes essence, nature and compassion

Malcolm wrote:

They are taken directly from the book, Buddhahood in This Life [to be published by Wisdom next year], where the author, Vimalamitra, runs through the seven positions of the basis, and identifies the position of the basis as ka dag as the only faultless one. This is a summary of an extensive section in the commentary of the Kun bzang klong drug tantra. Vimalamitra does not go into it further because, as he says, it is mostly an intellectual discussion, not for practitioners.

Ka dag does not mean only emptiness, though sometimes people misunderstand it that way Ka dag refers to the fact that reality has always been pure, never affected by ignorance and so on. This is why it is the basis, and not lhun grub.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

fckw said:

I had always assumed that "light body" and "rainbow body" are actually not the same thing. But we'd need the specific Tibetan or Sanskrit terms to know which one the question really targets.

Malcolm wrote:

They are terms used interchangeably.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Dan74 said:

I'm not sure if alternative meat industries have a smaller carbon footprint than the commercial ones, do they?

Malcolm wrote:

100% Grass fed? Are you kidding? Much less of a carbon footprint than any organic field plowed with tractors, etc. Of course, chicken requires grain, but pigs are quite happy on acorns, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Queequeg said:

The implication seems to be that my ignorance appears to you as form also. If I was realized, however, my form would appear to you to revert into light.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. But in fact my afflictions are my own, so even if you were fully realized in this lifetime fully, the state called Phowa Chenpo, great transference, you would still appear to me in an ordinary form.

Queequeg said:

If I am following, is it then fair to say that when an adept reverts to light, leaving behind the hair and nails, that outward event (light show) is for the benefit of us deluded beings? I.e. a show to nurture our faith?

Malcolm wrote:

Some people explain in that way, but is not correct. What you are describing is called little rainbow body. This happens when a person has not completed their practice in this lifetime. When they enter the bardo of dharmatā, they remain in that and finish as much as their practice as they can before they are liberated completely into the three kāyas.

Queequeg said:

It is well known that the traces in the mind streams of all sentient beings are all that hold this mundane appearance together. These traces are even strong enough to generate appearances for other sentient beings, such as the container universe and the beings in it. These traces come from ignorance. Ignorance comes from not recognizing our primordial state. Dzogchen practice is how that ignorance is reversed. With regard to the primordial state, is there a Garden of Eden so to speak, and then a fall from purity?

Malcolm wrote:

Only as a didactic device. "Primordial state" is an alternate term for the what is otherwise translated as "the original basis [thog ma'i gzhi]."

Queequeg said:

Believe it or not, I think that from the East Asian Lotus Buddhism perspective, if I understand correctly, none of that is controversial. Our language might be different, and may very well have different understandings of these statements. We make a distinction between the Primordial Buddha, which is the True Aspect of each being's Mind, and the Buddhas with 32 Major and 80 Minor characteristics who appear in response to the needs of deluded beings. The way we put it, we each embody all sentient as well as insentient beings such as plants, trees, rocks down to atoms and up to the entire dharmadhatu environment in a way that mind and body, self and environment, and person and reality are "two but not two". Our starting point is the Primordial Buddha's revelation of his body, which we do not presently understand completely, and then progression through investigation to full realization. Provisional Buddha (the Buddha that appears as Buddha) is the awakening function of our Mind.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason I quoted Mañjuśrimitra is that his text, Meditation of Bodhicitta, is written for sūtra practitioners who may have doubts about a path that discards cause and result, to show this is the true intention of Mahāyāna.

That being said, the difference between Dzogchen and sūtra Dharmas is that in sūtra Dharmas no methods are explained how to achieve the result they describe, apart from the lengthy and forbidding paths and stages.

The attainment of rainbow body, in any form, is dependent on receiving proper Dzogchen transmission and instructions, and then putting them into practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

alpha said:

If kadag is included in the above schema as one of the partial and incomplete positions by which some unilaterally define the basis, would it not be erroneous to hold the view that kadag is the only definitive view ?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Why? Defining the basis as kadag is the position of the 17 tantras. The other six are the partial positions.

As Vimalamitra/Nyibum states:

First, establishing original purity as faultless. Dharmatā, original purity, is free from all proliferation. Since it is unaffected by ignorance, it is free from all obscurations...

Now comes the intrinsic characteristics of the faultless position, the actual extensive explanation of the reality of original purity. The reality of the original basis that exists permeated with the intrinsic nature of the three pristine consciousnesses, essence, nature and compassion, is the inwardly illuminated original purity...

The basis is not possible if it is not originally pure.
The proof text he uses, among others, is the Self-Arisen Vidyā Tantra:
Also, the basis of great original purity is endowed with essence, nature and compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Earth Termas - real objects?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Everything that buddhas do is a lie, because everything we sentient beings perceive is deceptive, including buddhas.

Sonam Wangchug said:

Yes, Earth terma's do exist.. There are of course many stories surrounding their revelations. However the proof is in the pudding.

It's obvious in dealing with the genuine tertons, just how amazing and genuine they are, and also Not only on the level of Sa (earth) Terma objects Such as Phurba's, and statues, and all .. However the Various Sadhana's which were also revealed in scroll form .. The realized beings these terma's have produced.

I can see how one could have a doubt, something common place in this age of skepticism, but keeping an open mind, (as you sound like you are trying to do) is the way to proceed..

Tashi delek

Nosta said:

Since we are dealing with real buddhist masters - that fully follow the precept of not lie - I believe that they are not deceiving people (with illusionist tricks and so on) when retrieving termas. Unless they have some kind of secret practice -and this is just my imagination wandering - where they should do tricks to make people follow them or follow Buddhism. There is also the possibility that they may want win the respect, fear and adoration of people by doing tricks (recovering termas).

I prefer to believe in the idea that they have the power to transcend reality and make wonders like this, but as someone raised in a world filled with scientific knowledge, sometimes i question myself and have some doubts. A little bit like the Pure Land teachings: sometimes I think that they are too much wonderful to be real!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Queequeg said:

The implication seems to be that my ignorance appears to you as form also. If I was realized, however, my form would appear to you to revert into light.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. But in fact my afflictions are my own, so even if you were fully realized in this lifetime fully, the state called Phowa Chenpo, great transference, you would still appear to me in an ordinary form.

It is well known that the traces in the mind streams of all sentient beings are all that hold this mundane appearance together. These traces are even strong enough to generate appearances for other sentient beings, such as the container universe and the beings in it. These traces come from ignorance. Ignorance comes from not recognizing our primordial state. Dzogchen practice is how that ignorance is reversed.

As Mañjuśrimitra says:

Also, my body appears as the infinite worlds and bodies of living beings.

The mind and traces are not the same, not different and are very hard to investigate.

However, in reality as he says:

The mind that clings to entities and clings to cause and result itself appears as cause and condition, but because those are nondual, there is no arising and perishing.

Because there is no arising and perishing, there is no self and other. Because there is no death and transmigration, there is no permanence and annihilation.

Therefore, there is no delusion or samsara. In fact, there is also no nirvana.

From a Dzogchen point of view, even the pure appearance of a Buddha is not real. As he says:

Because the awakening of the sugata does not exist, his magical apparitions appear to the deluded, similar to an illusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, November 4th, 2015 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Some Questions about DC

Content:

Queequeg said:

Taking this premise for granted, that all things are vibrational frequencies, why limit this dispersal into light to the personal body? If one can so transform one's body into light, why not transform the entirety of the dharma dhatu into light? Free all beings in one instant? Is there some real distinction between the body and the environment in which the body is ensconced?

Malcolm wrote:

It is simple really. Consciousness in its pristine state arises as an appearance of color to itself. This appearance is reified as the elements and so on.

When one attains buddhahood in the system of Dzogchen, everything and all sentient beings are liberated into light.

Rainbow body is just a sign that you have reached this realization. One does not transform one's body into light, one's body reverts into light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Dan74 said:

Intention seems to be key, along with harm minimisation. There is more and more evidence that meat harms not only the animals but the environment as it is a carbon intensive industry. As for intention, most meat-eaters (including myself) crave meat and place their craving above any consideration for the welfare of the animals. This is not a good thing.

/

Malcolm wrote:

Industrial meat cultivation is certainly bad for the environment.

But we humans put our welfare above that of other creatures, including other humans, all the time. It is the norm, not the exception. Every time we dig in the ground, "relocate" some "pest" we do not like in "our" house and so on, every time we decide to disturb some environment so we can exploit it. For example, we decide we need to irrigate a field — we give absolutely no thought to the millions, possibly billions of creatures we are drowning. But vegetarians consider rice "less harmful."

The idea that being a vegetarian is less harmful than choosing to consume consciously raised, grass fed beef and pastured pork and chicken is ludicrous.

The fact is that everything we do harms some one or something. We have our vanity of course, but in the end, everyone chooses to ignore the harm they do to some creature either directly or indirectly. At least I don't pretend. I choose my diet based on what is good for the planet as a whole, understanding that all my choices involve harming some creature or another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Qing Tian said:

Is a person who offers a cent with good intention less meritorious than one who offers a dollar?

Malcolm wrote:

That depends on which patron is free of the three wheels.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dharmagoat said:

By all means spare a thought for the suffering of beings as small as a dust mite, but it seems to me completely impractical to avoid actions that may unintentionally harm them. Such actions of course include washing you own body and clothes. There is inevitably a kind of background noise of suffering we cause that we simply cannot avoid. Presented with this fact (and equating the suffering of microorganisms with that of more highly developed animals), some will rationalize that practicing harmlessness is futile, and disregard the tangible suffering inflicted on the animals that they choose to exploit. Worse still are the crude justifications made for overlooking this suffering. When these justifications are made in the name of the Buddhadharma, the truly compassionate must speak out.

Malcolm wrote:

When you know they are there, you are not "unintentionally" harming them, you are ignoring them.

For example, just as when one drives a car in the spring and summer, thousands of insects wind up smashed in the grill of our cars. We may regret all the thousands of insect lives we take, but we certainly do nothing about them. We keep driving anyway, since our human business is so much more important than theirs, and we are more "highly developed" sentient beings.

The thing is, there is no qualitative difference between one creature and another, there is only quantitative difference in terms of sense organ development. This is why we can be reborn as bugs, and they can be reborn as humans.

Ignoring the suffering we cause creatures who live in the ground when we plough fields and calling it "unintentional" when we know full well we are inflicting all kinds of harm on all kinds of creatures, that is a justification. At least I understand that all the food that I eat comes with a price of suffering. I don't pretend that some suffering is excusable and some suffering is not — I certainly do not make a distinction between the suffering of one creature and that of another. I understand that my movement in the world is inevitably harmful whether I intend it or not, and knowing that means that I cannot really claim that I am "unintentionally" harming beings. All I can say is that I did not see a being, and develop the motive to kill it and proceed with that motivation, and from the point of view of the Buddha, I am therefore free of the karma of killing. But that also applies to all the meat that I eat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Alleviation of suffering now

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Suffering is a result, it cannot be removed. However, it can be prevented.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

Matt J said:

Thanks for "clarifying."

I've noticed that ChNNR says that nature rang-bzhin is gsal ba, while Tsyonki Rinpoche (and some of the Bonpos) says it is clarity in the sense of "knowing." I noticed on the citations related to Natural Luminosity* that gsal ba is purity. But it sounds to me that while gsal rig is gsal ba, gsal ba isn't necessarily gsal rig. Is this correct?

Malcolm wrote:

They are synonymous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, November 3rd, 2015 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Unless "obscured by adventitious defilements", right?

Malcolm wrote:

It cannot be obscured by adventitious defilements any more than the sun is obscured by clouds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dharmagoat said:

How many insects do you think live on a sheep? Have you seen a healthy sheep's wool? Do you know what you are talking about?

Malcolm wrote:

Many, just like the many thousands of insects and mites that live on and in our bodies. The same goes with sheep and all other living creatures. Our bodies are a universe of living things.

dharmagoat said:

The chickens are not fed on insects. They find a few for themselves. If they were living in the wild they would eat more. Locking them in would compromise their diet and cause them general unhappiness.

Malcolm wrote:

Chickens eat lots of insects, not merely a few.

dharmagoat said:

Yes. Animal manure is vegetable waste, it is not made out of animal. I wanted to make it clear that I did not suggest fertilizing plants with animal remains, to keep my point simple.

Malcolm wrote:

The organic industry is absolutely dependent on animal products, feather meal, bone meal, blood meal and so on. Where do you think those come from? Chicken manure has a fairly high content of insect proteins in it.

dharmagoat said:

Of course I have not saved any being from suffering itself, but by not having them killed I have saved them from some suffering. Some is better than none.

Malcolm wrote:

That's funny, the suffering of death is the same whether you die of natural causes or not.

[/quote]

Despite the impression that some may give, chanting mantras is not a substitute for practicing harmlessness. By all means do both.[/quote]

You cannot harm a piece of meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 10:51 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Now we are counting animals in the wild?

dharmagoat said:

Of course. You are the one thinking only in terms of the farming industry.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahaha, so you are saving all the ants by not eating them?

And how do you personally spare farm animals unless you pay their owners not to the slaughter them?

By being the keeper of a number of sheep and chickens. You are the one thinking only in terms of urban living.

Keeping is nice, are you perhaps sheering the sheep, killing thousands of insects in their wool? You understand that by keeping chickens, you are condemning countless thousands of insects to death? The ones that make the eggs they lay for you healthy with omega threes, etc.?

Arguing that not spending money on meat = saving animals is ludicrous at best.

I thought it was basic economics. Maybe the meat industry has gone mad. Another reason to leave it well alone.

You keep chickens by your own account. So many insects make their eggs healthy, unlike poor industrial chickens.

Anyone can grow a garden of some sort and fertilize it with vegetable waste. On a small scale pests are seldom a problem.

Anyone who knows how to garden, understands compost mixed with manure is better than just compost alone. Anyone who gardens understands soil is complex living thing that needs many ingredients.

Nor did it help the Syrian refugees.

My vegetarianism helps a number of animals within my sphere of influence.

I doubt it — lots of omnivores keep pets and animals they choose not to eat for this or that reason.

More than if I was not vegetarian.

No. You have not saved a single being in samsara from suffering. Not at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 10:12 AM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But it's a metaphor or an analogy. Mind is not actually clear, nor actually luminous.

Clarity and light are metaphorical descriptions of the nature of mind, whereas 'knowing' is intrinsic to it.

Malcolm wrote:

Clarity here means "distinct." In this case, the mind is clear, distinct, unmistakable.

The mind itself is actually clear. The knowing, which is the function we ascribe to mind, is clear. It has no color, shape, etc. The space of the mind is clear, free from objects, taints and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 10:11 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Jesse said:

What parts of buddhism should never change?

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma part. The rest of Buddhism is irrelevant.

dharmagoat said:

Could you please explain the distinction for those at home?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhahood and its meaning, samsara [i.e. the process of rebirth of sentient beings] and its causes, dependent origination, karma, emptiness, great compassion, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 10:07 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Abstaining from eating meat does not help animals at all. Not in the least. Not even remotely.

dharmagoat said:

I have saved many animals from harm by choosing not to eat them.

Included in this list are animals in the wild that I have encountered, farm animals that I have personally spared, not to mention the hundreds of animals that have remained uncaught or unborn because I have not contributed money toward their consumption.

Malcolm wrote:

Now we are counting animals in the wild? And how do you personally spare farm animals unless you pay their owners not to slaughter them? A calf for example costs anywhere 250-500 dollars. How many of them have you personally saved?

Arguing that not spending money on meat = saving animals is ludicrous at best.

Actually if you look at the stats: 38 percent of grain products are discarded at point of sale; 50 percent of seafood is discarded at point of sale; 52 percent of fruits and vegetables are discarded at point of sale; 22 percent of meats are discarded at point of sale and 20 percent of dairy are discarded at point of sale. This comes from an estimate made of supermarkets in USA, Canada, Australia and NZ.

What the figures above show is that for every ten pounds of meat we find in the markets, 22 percent of it goes to waste. This means that meat is not being sold into markets based on some precise metric of demand. You may choose not to eat meat, but you are not saving any beings at all by doing so. The supply of meat clearly outpaces demand. The supply of grain, seafood and fruit and vegetables is clearly outpacing demand.

So, especially with regards to fish, your abstaining from eating animals is saving none of the them. Of half the fish in the sea that have vanished in the past 50 years, half of those went to waste, not counting all the other creatures pulled up by nets.

And your being a vegetarian did not help any of them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You may think you are helping sentient beings, but you are not helping them.

seeker242 said:

Yes, I am. And so is every other person out there advocating it.

dharmagoat said:

Absolutely.

Crikey, Malcolm. How can you make a claim like that? You yourself do more harm than you even realise.

Malcolm wrote:

Abstaining from eating meat does not help animals at all. Not in the least. Not even remotely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 8:54 AM

Title: Re: How much should Buddhism Change?

Content:

Jesse said:

What parts of buddhism should never change?

Malcolm wrote:

The Dharma part. The rest of Buddhism is irrelevant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

Wayfarer said:

What about 'awareness'? Mind is 'aware' by nature, isn't it? I mean, glass and water are both 'clear' by nature, but they are not mind-like, because they don't embody awareness or knowing. I think 'knowing is to mind as illumination is to light', i.e. Just as the very nature of light is to illuminate, the very nature of mind is to know.

Malcolm wrote:

Clarity is the aware part of the mind. It is short hand for " gsal rig ", "knowing clarity". Sometimes it is termed " shes rig, "knowing awareness": shes rig is gsal ba.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

Herbie said:

I am not Theravada either. But I can tell you that your nature of mind is nothing but soul theory in disguise.

Malcolm wrote:

How so? In what way does the "nature of the mind" entail an unchanging entity that continues from one life to another, etc.

Herbie said:

If it doesn't what's the purpose of positing a permanent "nature of the mind" at all?

Malcolm wrote:

Fire is always hot, water is always wet, a mind is always inseparable emptiness and clarity by nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, November 2nd, 2015 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

That is fine, and if you want to run a crusade, go for it. But I am pretty sure the world is not going to go along with it. After all, even in India, which is supposedly a vegetarian country, most people eat animals.

Malcolm wrote:

What you call crusade, I call "helping sentient beings". [/quote]

You may think you are helping sentient beings, but you are not helping them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 1st, 2015 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: Nature of mind vs. soul theory.

Content:

Herbie said:

My take is simply that "mind" is a word used in conventional language in different contexts like in "mind-ful" or "mind-less" but that there is no mind entity at all and therefore there cannot be any mind nature at all. so "mind" is like "santa claus".

.

Malcolm wrote:

And so what substantial entity do you take the "nature of mind" to be? Why do you think, when people discuss the "nature of the mind" they are referring to something that is not merely a convention? Why do you think "nature of the mind" refers to an entity? The mind is empty of being a mind, in other words, there is no ultimate entity called "mind."

Herbie said:

But "becoming conscious" of this or that can well be observed by everybody. therefore "consciousness" is a valid term

Malcolm wrote:

And why is this consciousness different than what is termed "clarity"?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 1st, 2015 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

Herbie said:

I am not Theravada either. But I can tell you that your nature of mind is nothing but soul theory in disguise.

Malcolm wrote:

How so? In what way does the "nature of the mind" entail an unchanging entity that continues from one life to another, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 1st, 2015 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No one disagrees that changing industrial agriculture is one of the major keys to climate change — but you are not going to convince "typical omnivores" that they should stop eating meat.

seeker242 said:

I have to say I disagree. As I've already convinced hundreds of people. I convinced my brother and sister without even trying. I myself was once a "typical omnivore" and someone else convinced me. There are plenty of future vegetarians out there!

Malcolm wrote:

That is fine, and if you want to run a crusade, go for it. But I am pretty sure the world is not going to go along with it. After all, even in India, which is supposedly a vegetarian country, most people eat animals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, November 1st, 2015 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Plants Respond to Leaf Vibrations Caused by Insects' Chewing, MU Study Finds

COLUMBIA, Mo. – Previous studies have suggested that plant growth can be influenced by sound and that plants respond to wind and touch. Now, researchers at the University of Missouri, in a collaboration that brings together audio and chemical analysis, have determined that plants respond to the sounds that caterpillars make when eating plants and that the plants respond with more defenses.

<http://munews.missouri.edu/news-releases/2014/0701-plants-respond-to-leaf-vibrations-caused-by-insects%E2%80%99-chewing-mu-study-finds/>

There is increasingly more evidence that plants are in fact sentient, as well as living beings. This is fundamentally one of the reasons why I think many of claims vegetarians make about plant-based diets reducing suffering is pretty much bunk. Plants suffer.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 31st, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think other things are more important, like eliminating fossil fuels, changing how we do agriculture, and so on.

seeker242 said:

I personally see those things as an intrinsic part of the issue being discussed. The elimination of fossil fuel isn't going to happen tomorrow so in the meantime it's reasonable for one to try to reduce their consumption of them. At least in the US, a vegan uses only 10% of the fossil fuel that a typical omnivore does, with regards to food. Consumption is going to first have to be reduced, in order for them to be eliminated. If one cares about global warming for example, one should be concerned about their own personal carbon footprint that their own lives and choices create IMO. One may not have power over politicians or corporations half a world away, but one does have power over one's own choices.

Malcolm wrote:

No one disagrees that changing industrial agriculture is one of the major keys to climate change — but you are not going to convince "typical omnivores" that they should stop eating meat. You can however convince them to switch to 100% pastured beef. Pigs and chicken will always require grain, which is why, once upon a time, pork and chicken was more expensive than beef, pound for pound.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 31st, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I guess, what I am trying to say is that becoming a vegetarian is not going to save the world. It won't even put a dent in global warming...

seeker242 said:

Perhaps, but for me, that still isn't a good enough reason not to try.

Kinda like the Bodhisattva vow almost. Is one really going to save a numberless about of living beings from samsara, just by doing meditation, etc. and getting enlightenment? One could argue no because there still going to be wars and killing, etc. even after that happens. But, still not a good enough reason not to try.

Malcolm wrote:

I think other things are more important, like eliminating fossil fuels, changing how we do agriculture, and so on.

And yes, by awakening, one is in a much better position to help others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

tingdzin said:

Very good thread.

Clearly, "mind" is a pretty useless word, almost as bad as "soul" or "consciousness", unless one states from the outset what one means by it. In Buddhism, people have translated, manas, citta ,vijñana, etc. all as "mind", when the terms have completely different meanings. It also obscures the fact that what the English word refers to is a process and not a thing.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, they don't really — Vasubandhu clearly states they are synonyms, distinguished only by time reference, i.e. manas has a past object, vijñāna has a present object, and citta has a future object.

tingdzin said:

It would be quite interesting and productive if someone with a thorough background in Sanskrit (Vedic as well as Buddhist) could trace these and other Sanskrit mental words back to their earliest appearances in Indic literature, and then try to discover, using related words in other ancient Indo-European languages, what they originally stemmed from, in the same that the English word "is" ultimately stems from an IE root meaning "breathe".

Malcolm wrote:

This a useful thing to do, but as we know, language is diachronic, it evolves according to need, and there is no reason why we cannot make English terms fit Dharma definitions.

As for etymology:

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=cognizance>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=concept>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=conscious>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=consciousness>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=intellect>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=intelligence>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=know>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=mind>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=thought>

<http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=think>

It really is not so hard to make equivalencies. The Tibetans managed.

Dharma texts, especially Dzogchen texts, need to be translated into a common vernacular, not an obscure academic jargon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 10:52 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I guess, what I am trying to say is that becoming a vegetarian is not going to save the world. It won't even put a dent in global warming...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Persuading people to become vegetarian, IS ITSELF, a benefit to sentient beings...However, If someone is going to attack and argue against vegetarianism, I'm going to defend it. That's all there is to it really. There is nothing unreasonable about that. You don't want me to talk about it? Well, then don't attack it with nonsensical arguments. Problem solved.

Malcolm wrote:

No one is attacking vegetarianism per se. What is being critiqued is that one's diet is a measure of one's compassion.

seeker242 said:

The ecosystem of the ocean is more important than your personal feelings. The health of the planet as a whole, is more important than your personal feelings.

Malcolm wrote:

I agree with you. Unfortunately, there is no authority out there that can regulate fishing worldwide. But fisheries management in the US has led to a rebound in fish stocks. The main problem is with developing countries:

In the U.S. this gloomy picture has started to improve, thanks to science-based fisheries management. Thirty-four fish stocks have been declared rebuilt since the year 2000 and more than 90 percent of U.S. fish stocks are not considered overfished. Worldwide, though, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations considers almost 30 percent of fish stocks to be overfished. "The main problem is really in the developing countries where we need more effective institutions for fisheries management," says Christensen. "We need to get effective management introduced in all countries, or it will have dire consequences."

<http://www.scientificamerican.com/article/predatory-fish-have-declined-by-two-thirds-in-the-20th-century/>

seeker242 said:

And it's quite appropriate to try and save them.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is. The world environment as a whole is worth preserving. We have no where else to live. Properly grazed herds are one of the most effective means of sequestering carbon, actually. And plowing fields releases an enormous amount of carbon every year.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 9:37 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

When you kill things, of course you have no compassion.

dharmagoat said:

And when you knowingly sponsor others to kill for you..?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't sponsor anyone to kill anything for me. In order for that to happen, there would have to be a living animal that I paid someone to kill for me.

Otherwise, if by buying the meat of an animal already dead in which I had no hand I am nevertheless responsible, so too are all people who buy vegetables and grains responsible for all the deaths of rodents, birds and insects that die in the hundreds of millions every year in order to put gas in your car and rice on your plate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 8:18 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Malcolm, is creating a demand for killing through purchasing meat products not asking that it to be done for you?

nilakantha said:

“And if, Mahamati, no one ever ate meat, then they wouldn’t kill for that purpose. For most innocent living beings are slaughtered for profit, few for other reasons. It is abominable, Mahamati, that in the over-eagerness of craving for flavor even human flesh is eaten by humans, not to mention the flesh of other living creatures such as animals and birds. Most of this is killed in nets and traps for that purpose, by deluded people afflicted with craving for the taste of meat, as fowlers, herders, fishermen, and so on slaughter innocent creatures of the air, earth, and water in many ways for the sake of profit. And these bitter, cruel-hearted, demoniacal, ruthless people have no concept of living beings as living beings; as they are killing and eating them, they feel no compassion." -- The Lankavatara Sutra

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is completely true. But we don't live in a world dominated by Buddhadharma and we never will. We live in a world where the vast majority of people eat meat and demand it. And indeed, as their standard of living increases, so does their demand for meat as is shown in India, China, Japan and so on.

When you kill things, of course you have no compassion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 8:15 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Malcolm, is creating a demand for killing through purchasing meat products not asking that it to be done for you?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

I am not creating a demand.

For every person in the US, no matter what kind of diet they have, 90 pounds of vegetables per year go to waste, 40 pounds of meat. In other words 6,360,000 tons of meat goes to waste in the US every year, and 14,310,000 tons of vegetables.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dharmagoat said:

If it is simpler than that, then past interpreters of the Buddhadharma have made it that way to suit their own specific conditions.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is just very simple. When meat is pure in three ways, this means you have no hand in the suffering of the animal. By the time it reaches you, there is no consciousness left connected with that to experience suffering.

It is only when one has a direct hand in slaughter by either seeing it done, doing it oneself or asking that it be done for you that there is a fault because one is directly party to the suffering of a given creature.

Vegan ethics are different than Dharma ethics. Some people think the former superior to the latter. Let them. I shall continue to follow the Dharma, not what vegans think.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

One can eat meat and still observe the vow of not taking life.

dharmagoat said:

By effectively hiring a hit man.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that would break the vow of not taking life.

As long as you do not see, it request it be done, or do it yourself, there is no fault, it really is that simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

I apologize to all if what I wrote seems holier than thou because I'm vegetarian as part of the precept of not killing. We each interpret the precepts according to our experiences and lives.

Malcolm wrote:

One can eat meat and still observe the vow of not taking life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Jodo Shinshu and the Adibuddha

Content:

steveb1 said:

Thanks smcj for your comments... I'm very curious to see how a kind of "Primordial Emanator" Who/Which is a Buddha but not a creator-deity "pans out" in the Vajrayana, e.g., as with the Creator question in the West, if everything is an emanation from the primordial Buddha, does not the question of theodicy arise in the sense that the ultimate cause and therefore the ultimate responsibility for the evils of samsara must be laid on the shoulders of the Emanator, whether a deity or a Buddha? And of course, there's the question of how Jodo Shinshu relates or does not relate Amida Buddha to the Adibuddha... fascinating stuff!

Malcolm wrote:

This is not an accurate article. So ignore it.

The adibuddha simply means the first buddha of this eon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Simon E. said:

No one is either promoting nor defending the eating of meat on health grounds. There are those who require meat in their diet to stay well

.

But the Vajrayana view of eating meat is often predicated on arguments that are tangential to health.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed. The point of eating meat in Vajrayāna is compassion. The view that eating meat harms compassion belongs to sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

People who have sense at all do not eat industrially produced meat. Not only is it environmentally unsound to do so, it is not healthy either.

Mkoll said:

From a few pages ago, with added emphasis.

"Bacon, sausages and ham rank alongside smoking as cancer causes, says WHO"

Bacon, ham and sausages rank alongside cigarettes as a major cause of cancer, the World Health Organisation has said, placing cured and processed meats in the same category as asbestos, alcohol, arsenic and tobacco.

The report from the WHO's cancer arm, the International Agency for Research on Cancer, says there is enough evidence to rank processed meats as group 1 carcinogens, because of a causal link with bowel cancer.

It places red meat in group 2A, as "probably carcinogenic to humans". Eating red meat is also linked to pancreatic and prostate cancer, the IARC says.

<https://www.theguardian.com/society/2015/oct/26/bacon-ham-sausages-processed-> meats-cancer-risk-smoking-says-who

Malcolm wrote:

Not much about the current state of industrial civilization is healthy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Again, the environmental harm in terms of pollution and killing in the meat industry is well documented. Is this really even being questioned?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and this is not being questioned. People who have sense at all do not eat industrially produced meat. Not only is it environmentally unsound to do so, it is not healthy either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 30th, 2015 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

According to the interwebs, it takes 6 pounds of corn to make 1 pound of beef. So the argument about relative quantity of deaths or deaths of insects doesn't hold water.

Malcolm wrote:

Cows did not evolve to eat corn. So I don't eat corn finished beef.

And yes, the argument about relative quantity of deaths or deaths of insects does hold water:

Although U.S. corn is a highly productive crop, with typical yields between 140 and 160 bushels per acre, the resulting delivery of food by the corn system is far lower. Today's corn crop is mainly used for biofuels (roughly 40 percent of U.S. corn is used for ethanol) and as animal feed (roughly 36 percent of U.S. corn, plus distillers grains left over from ethanol production, is fed to cattle, pigs and chickens). Much of the rest is exported. Only a tiny fraction of the national corn crop is directly used for food for Americans, much of that for high-fructose corn syrup.

<http://www.scientificamerican.com/article/time-to-rethink-corn/>

This means that the very act of driving vehicles in the US, where there is ethanol in virtually everything involves deaths for just as many creatures as feed for cows.

Monlam Tharchin said:

The environmental impacts of the meat industry in the US are well documented.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I have mentioned many times that industrial meat production is an environmental disaster.

But I don't buy that kind of meat. Properly grazed animals are a boon for the environment, build soils, sequester carbon and so on.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Simon E. said:

And you are being told by more than one Dzogchen student that it isn't. Now what ?

Malcolm wrote:

I think all he means is that there is similarity in so far as there is an investigation of where thoughts or mind come from, where they go, and where they stay.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Adamantine said:

I've looked at your link to your own quote. It is not clear what you are saying. Are you saying that the Bhavya that is being paraphrased is a Tibetan Bhavya from a period after the 8th century, as opposed to the famous Bhavaviveka also called Bhavya from the 6th century?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying there are two Indian Madhyamaka authors, one who wrote a commentary on the MMK, called Bhavaviveka; another whose works were translated by Atisha, Tarkajvala, Blaze of Dialectics, being one of them.

Adamantine said:

You say above "I already have shown elsewhere that this is a very inaccurate paraphrase of what Bhavaviveka says" and then in the link you say "It is not a text by Bhavaviveka. Bhavya is a much later master, post Shantarakshita." So is it a paraphrase of Bhavaviveka or isn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

It is a paraphrase of Bhavya, aka Bhavaviveka II

Adamantine said:

And if it is, and you are saying he is later than Śāntarakṣita, how is it that all biographies of Bhavaviveka date him 6th century, while Śāntarakṣita is clearly 8th century? And while it may be clear to yourself, you have not done a good job of communicating what you think Dudjom Rinpoche's, or Bhavya's, or the Derge canonical edn. of the text: dbu-ma, Vol. Tsha's error is. So, what is it, and who made the original error?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two people referred to by one name. The author of the Madhyamakavṛtti is the first, Bhavaviveka I; the author of the text, Tarkajvala, being paraphrased by Dudjom Rinpoche and other gzhan stong pas, is Bhavaviveka II.

While there is no mention of Prasanga or Svatantra in the Tarkajvala, it does mention a great Madhyamaka. However, that "great Madhyamaka" is defined by how it treats relative truth, i.e. mind only. Coarse outer Madhyamaka treats relative truth in the manner of the Sarvastivadins and so on.

In general, Dudjom Rinpoche repeats an error universally common in Tibetan Buddhism scholastics, and it is by no means confined to him. That is, he cites a version of citation that has been passed down to him in an altered or truncated form without checking the original text to see if it is accurate. This is a big problem with Tibetan treatises in general, not confined to any one school or any one author.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your point of view is not in touch with reality.

seeker242 said:

Interesting. However, it is actually your point of view that has nothing to do with reality. It has nothing to do with Buddhism at all. Wrong again.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that any diet is less harmful than another, unless you are begging for alms, is the underlying point. Apart from killing animals yourself which is definitely harmful, all diets are equally harmful because they involve someone harming some creature at some time in the production of food.

For example, in order to make sesame oil, millions of tiny insects are crushed in its production — which of course is why sesame pounders were among the lowest castes in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 10:41 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, I already have shown elsewhere that this is a very inaccurate paraphrase of what Bhavaviveka says...just saying, you can search in this easily...

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=102&t=13306&p=174083&hilit=outer+madhyamaka#p174083>

dzogchungpa said:

Oh, OK, I was just supplying the quotation. It does show how Dudjom Rinpoche thought about things though, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

It just shows that Dudjom Rinpoche was not a very thorough scholar and was repeating someone else's mistake.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 10:37 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So when you dig in the ground, you think you are not killing many creatures?

seeker242 said:

No, I grow indoors. No digging required. But even if I did, the point of digging is not to kill animals. The point of making meat is precisely to kill. Killing is the only way to get meat. Unless you are eating roadkill...The idea that there is no difference between the two is nonsensical.

Malcolm wrote:

But in point of fact, the reason why Buddha forbade monks from farming and wandering during the rain season was to prevent harm to living beings, so your point of view is just not consistent.

seeker242 said:

Oh, ok. So east asian Buddhism is not in touch with reality?

Malcolm wrote:

Your point of view is not in touch with reality. It has nothing to do with Buddhism at all.

seeker242 said:

No, the idea that I need to stop buying food altogether, is not even close to being reasonable.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that you can separate your dollars spent on vegetables in a market that sells meat from its activity in buying meat is not reasonable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 7:17 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Adamantine said:

I recall reading that Dudjom Rinpoche said that in scholastic study and debate--i.e. from the intellect's point of view it was important to hold the Rangtong view. From the experiential practice perspective, the shentong view was more apt. I'll look for the quote...

dzogchungpa said:

From the BRB: Secondly, concerning the subtle, inner Great Madhyamaka of definitive meaning, it is stated in the Jewel Lamp of the Madhyamaka by the master Bhavya (skal-ldan): The Madhyamaka of the Prasangika and the Svatantrika is the coarse, Outer Madhyamaka. It should indeed be expressed by those who profess well-informed intelligence during debates with [extremist] Outsiders, during the composition of great treatises, and while establishing texts which concern supreme reasoning. However, when the subtle, inner Madhyamaka is experientially cultivated, one should meditate on the nature of Yogacara-Madhyamaka.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, I already have shown elsewhere that this is a very inaccurate paraphrase of what Bhavaviveka says...just saying, you can search in this easily...

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=102&t=13306&p=174083&hilit=outer+madhyamaka#p174083>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: Scientific Materialism and Re-birth

Content:

maybay said:

The mechanism is karma, a word you have yet to invoke in this thread.

dharmagoat said:

For good reason. On a Buddhist forum the existence of karma is taken for granted without question.

But what actually is it, how is it possible, and how can it be demonstrated?

Malcolm wrote:

"Karma is volition [cetana], and what proceeds from volition."

You are confusing karma, which is very straightforward, with karma-vipaka, the ripening of karma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

As a footnote I'd like to point out that DKR is Dudjom R.'s grandson and presumably brought up in the tradition of his grandfather. Therefore I think it safe to assume he accepts the Great Madhyamaka/Shentong view of emptiness which is not universally accepted in Nyingma. Thus he may express opinions not all Nyingmapas would agree with.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he was educated Sakya, and while he has taught the gZhan stong pov for balance, it is fair bet to say that like his father, he is not a gzhan stong pa.

smcj said:

Thrangu R. got a geshe degree from the Gelugpas and that doesn't stop him from being a Shentongpa.

But it looks like we are both guessing. Until and unless he comes out with a clear statement on the subject neither of us really knows. And given the touchy nature of the subject it seems likely he will keep his cards close to his chest.

Malcolm wrote:

You should read his commentary on Uttaratantra, and in point of fact he has made his POV known.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

Not true, I grow and harvest my own organic lettuce and I don't spray it with pesticides.

Malcolm wrote:

So when you dig in the ground, you think you are not killing many creatures?

seeker242 said:

But, you can't do that because that's a precepts violation so you need to hire someone to do that for you. Talk about passing the buck...Jesus!

Malcolm wrote:

If the market is out of meat, I don't buy it. My purchase or non-purchase of meat has no impact at all. Do you have any idea at all of how much meat is wasted every year in landfills because no one bought it?

seeker242 said:

But even if I didn't grow my own lettuce, according to east Asian Buddhism, it would still be more virtuous than eating a slaughtered cow, no question about it.

Malcolm wrote:

But not according to reality.

seeker242 said:

It's a completely and totally unreasonable statement.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a completely reasonable statement. As long you buy your food, you are contributing in toto to a system of agriculture that is grounded in cruelty to living creatures.

In 2010, the average amount of food loss per American was 429 pounds, of which 139 pounds at the retail level and 290 pounds at the consumer level went uneaten (table 2).

At the consumer level, 59 pounds of vegetables, 52 pounds of dairy products, and 41 pounds of meat, poultry, and fish per capita from the food supply in 2010 went uneaten.

<http://www.endhunger.org/PDFs/2014/USDA-FoodLoss-2014.pdf>

Sorry, but the very little money I spend on meat every year just does not count.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

smcj said:

As a footnote I'd like to point out that DKR is Dudjom R.'s grandson and presumably brought up in the tradition of his grandfather. Therefore I think it safe to assume he accepts the Great Madhyamaka/Shentong view of emptiness which is not universally accepted in Nyingma. Thus he may express opinions not all Nyingmapas would agree with.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he was educated Sakya, and while he has taught the gZhan stong pov for balance, it is fair bet to say that like his father, he is not a gzhan stong pa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

haha said:

As I am not sure that the first Shankara has commented on the Yoga Sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he did in fact. It is in English translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

dharmagoat said:

Malcolm, you make a good case for eating organically grown food.

Becoming vegan would of course minimize the harm you describe.

Malcolm wrote:

Organic pesticides are still poisons that kill things, and in fact most "organic" fertilizer comes from animal husbandry [manure] or slaughter [bone meal, blood meal, feather meal and so on].

Most people really have no idea how their good is produced...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha never made vegetarianism mandatory, even though Devadattva insisted that he should. What the Buddha made mandatory was that we should not directly participate in taking the life of other beings, if possible, though in Mahāyāna ethics, even this is not absolute.

seeker242 said:

Do you think that intentionally giving money and financial support to a slaughterhouse kill floor is not participating somehow? Perhaps if you are a beggar monk on alms rounds, then there wouldn't be any participation. Is anyone here actually a beggar monk?

Malcolm wrote:

I do not think buying meat in a grocery store and say strawberries in a grocery are at all different in terms of harming living beings. Our entire global system of agriculture is based on harming living beings: whether they are "pests" or food animals.

seeker242 said:

The real point I am trying to make is that the Buddha nowhere taught that our liberation was dependent on our diet. For example, do you think bodhisattvas who live in rakṣasa dimensions convert them into vegans?

And the point I would like to make is that your liberation or not-liberation, and my liberation or not-liberation, is largely irrelevant. The relevant question to ask here is: What do the cows themselves think about all this? To ignore their concerns and think of only your own liberation or not liberation, is by definition, a selfish way to view it.

Malcolm wrote:

Now you are changing the terms of the discussion.

Cows, like a "pest" on your lettuce, wishes to preserve their own life at any cost. Your lettuce, produced with pesticides, chemical fertilizers and so on, is no more virtuous a food than a slaughtered cow.

seeker242 said:

Do people really think they can save all beings from suffering, while simultaneously giving support to people who are murdering them? When they could easily choose not to? I'm sorry, but that idea is just beyond my comprehension!

Malcolm wrote:

Then you better stop buying any food at all. It all comes at a great cost in sentient beings' lives, every last bit of greens, every nut and every grain.

Further, if you buy any food at all at any market that sells meat, you are supporting the slaughter of animals as well, it is not like dollars go into their register marked "vegetarian" and "omnivore."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 29th, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Matt J said:

He also interestingly does not rule out a correspondence with Kashmir Shaivism.

dzogchungpa said:

FWIW I recently heard Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche, whose Deer Park Institute regularly holds courses and seminars on Kashmir Shaivism, say that it is "very, very identical" with Vajrayana Buddhism

Malcolm wrote:

No, not really. There are of course some parallels, but to say "very, very identical" with Vajrayana Buddhism..." is just exuberant hyperbole and nothing more.

However, it is good that they hold courses on it. People who follow Buddhadharma should learn the tenets of other systems from their exponents in order to be clear about where there are similarities, and more importantly, where there are differences.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: How Do You Understand The Word " Mind ? "

Content:

DGA said:

It's a shorthand cipher for Sanskrit concepts like "citta" and "vijñāna."

I tend not to use the term "mind" to translate Buddhist concepts such as Buddha-nature or Dharmata; there are other shorthand terms for that.

I'm glad you've initiated this thread, because the term "mind" really is a muddle in English-language Buddhist discourse.

Malcolm wrote:

The term "mind" in English is a container metaphor. "What I have in mind...", "The thought arose in my mind..."

Consciousness on the other hand is not a container metaphor, it is a description of the awareness a mind has, dating no earlier than Locke.

In reality, "mind" comes from PIE, *men, leading to Latin mēns:

mind intellect

reasoning, judgement

The actual word "mind: comes from is Proto-Germanic/gamundiz, leading to old English:

gemynd:

memory; commemoration:

Heora gemynd is forgotten. The memory of them is forgotten.

thought, thinking

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

seeker242 said:

No, that hasn't happened as far as I can remember at least. However, talking down to East Asian Buddhism, trying to discount it as illegitimate, has happened over and over. The heir of superiority of Tibetan Buddhism, that some people put fourth in this forum, is plainly evident.

Johnny Dangerous said:

As is the air of superiority consistently put forth by militant vegetarians and vegans on this forum. Off the forum too, in fact. Just the other I had one admonish me for eating meat occasionally after arguing with me about medical evidence on the link between high protein and cholesterol (which he was wrong on), and then proceeding to tell me about what company he favored for pest control - can't make this stuff up.

seeker242 said:

Sure. But if someone is going to say "it's not appropriate to claim" or something like that. Then you should be behaving in the same way as you advise. Otherwise, you're just being hypocritical. If it's inappropriate to marginalize Tibetan views of eating meat, then it's equally inappropriate to marginalize East Asian views.

Malcolm wrote:

In fact there is a long and strong tradition of vegetarianism in Tibet. But it is not universally maintained, and not merely because "Tibetans can't grow vegetables."

The reality that seems to escape many people who advocate a literal interpretation of the Buddha's teachings on not eating meat, is that being a conventional living being who eats food involves harming other beings no matter what kind of diet one follows. The Buddha never made vegetarianism mandatory, even though Devadattva insisted that he should. What the Buddha made mandatory was that we should not directly participate in taking the life of other beings, if possible, though in Mahāyāna ethics, even this is not absolute. The real point I am trying to make is that the Buddha nowhere taught that our liberation was dependent on our diet. For example, do you think bodhisattvas who live in rakṣasa dimensions convert them into vegans?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 7:01 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

Just mentioned it to suggest that canonicity in Buddhism is very different than canonicity in Christianity. Just because a text was composed in China doesn't mean it's not Buddhavacana.

Malcolm wrote:

Likewise, just because a text is a tantra, does not mean it is not Buddhavacana, therefore:

"Whoever eats meat has compassion."

—— Hevajra Tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 6:54 AM

Title: Re: Nāda yoga ~ Sound as Path ~ Sutra, Tantra, Mantra, Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, what you cite is a footnote on pg. 383, note 102 which itself is taken from Erik Pema Kunsang's appendix to Circle of the Sun, which is actually a summary of texts written by Khenpo Ngachung and others.

Kongtrul's actual remark on page 92 merely states what I said above, that this is a preliminary practice. It has nothing to do with the unstruck sound you are interested in.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 6:28 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

Correct. Eating meat is not necessarily intentional killing. Sorry, but it just isn't. Not if you eat animals who die of natural causes and have been dead long enough for their consciousnesses to leave their bodies, waiting 72 hours to be safe. Even then, you're eating your parents and children from former lives.

Malcolm wrote:

If you eat meat pure in three ways there is no fault and no karma, as Bhavaviveka shows. It is not stipulated that it be from natural causes.

If you eat a tomato, it is certainty that some creature has died in the processing of that plant.

Buddha gave such teachings to attract Jains and so on to Mahāyāna. I do not consider them definitive teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

“You may use those substances that have come to you indirectly without having been touched by killing.”

Malcolm wrote:

This is a recipe for starvation, if taken literally.

nilakantha said:

We know that to be an act of killing in Buddhism it must be intentional.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. Eating meat is not necessarily intentional killing. Sorry, but it just isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Is collective consciousness Buddhist?

Content:

Lazy_eye said:

[

In the Buddhist view, saṃskāra comes directly before Vijñāna in the twelvefold chain. So collective karma would automatically imply collective consciousness to some extent, no?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Nāda yoga ~ Sound as Path ~ Sutra,Tantra,Mantra,Dzogchen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, that is not what is described in the sgra thal 'gyur.

Panaesthesia said:

Can I ask you for a clarification Malcolm? Are you a translator of Tibetan? Did you read the original text itself, or are you reporting what you heard in a teaching? I am curious as to how someone of the stature of Jamgon Kongtrul could be so wrong about what the text said.

Thank you, Malcolm

Malcolm wrote:

I read the text myself. It is unlikely that Kongtrul has access to the commentary of the sgra thal 'gyur. It was lost.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

“You may use those substances that have come to you indirectly without having been touched by killing.”

Malcolm wrote:

This is a recipe for starvation, if taken literally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Matt J said:

Yes, and this is one of the ways that people distinguish between Samkhya and Yoga.

tepp01 said:

Actually, some Samkhya traditions (like Patanjali's Yoga school) also include Ishwara, but it's not the same Ishwara of Vedanta.

Samkhya's Ishwara is a unique, ever free, Purusha that does not have any cosmic functions (creation, destruction, etc.).

Also, all Vedanta schools teach that Jivas are beginningless (Anaadi), even though Advaita asserts that they are unreal (as different from Brahman).

Malcolm wrote:

As Tepp01 says the Ishvara in the Yoga sūtras is merely a special kind of purusha who was never bound, is not a creator, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

The one that comes to mind is the Brahma Net Sutra:

Malcolm wrote:

This sūtra is not known in India and not found in the Tibetan canon. Therefore, it is irrelevant outside of Chinese Buddhism.

nilakantha said:

How about the Lankavatara Sutra: "Because it is produced from semen and blood, too, Mahamati, meat should not be eaten by a bodhisattva, out of a desire for purity. And because it causes anxiety in beings, Mahamati, a practicing bodhisattva wishing friendliness of beings should not eat any meat at all."

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course there are Mahāyāna sūtras where the Buddha recommends vegetarianism. It is also equally true that Bhavaviveka addresses these issues in his famed Tarkajvala:

If one eats meat after creating suffering for the bodies of creatures, this will possess a fault, but if there is no mind in the creature when the meat is eaten, where can there be a misdeed if no suffering arises? Just as when one uses mother pearl, or the excrescences of fish and elephants, or peacock feathers, yak tails, teeth, bones, skin and so on, there is little or no suffering for the creature, just as when one uses fruit, water and so on there is no harm at all, in the same way, since there is no harm when meat is eaten, there is no fault. If there is a fault, then cremating the dead will be a misdeed.

Even in Mahāyāna, the Buddha never forbids using wool, using feathers, using leather, bone, shell, and many other kinds of animal products. It is inconsistent to claim that the passages where Buddha enjoins us not to eat meat must be taken as definitive teachings.

Bhavaviveka, whose Mahāyāna credentials are impeccable, certainly opines that it is not necessary to take these passages literally. He points out that if the suffering of creatures is the problem we want to solve then we must avoid eating rice, sesame oil, and all kinds of other products which involve suffering for creatures.

Instead, we need to understand that this advice is aimed at people who kill animals or have them killed in order to eat them and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

The one that comes to mind is the Brahma Net Sutra:

Malcolm wrote:

This sūtra is not known in India and not found in the Tibetan canon. Therefore, it is irrelevant outside of Chinese Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: impermanence

Content:

DGA said:

You may be surprised to read that Dolpopa's position is not the consensus one in those threads. Far from it, actually.

Nor is there any consensus among Tibetan Buddhists that Dolpopa was on the right track. Far from it.

Nor is there any consensus among Mahayana Buddhists of East Asia that Dolpopa's view is the definitive one. That goes without saying, right?

Really, take a quick tour through the links I gave above and you'll see what is about to happen in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Son of the Buddha....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 1:05 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

Purusa gives rise to prakrti.

Malcolm wrote:

Not exactly, not in Sāṃkhya proper, anyway.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

Simon E. said:

So you wouldn't consider that HH the Dalai Lama (who eats meat every other say) had a fortunate birth nilakantha ? Or won't next time ?

nilakantha said:

Karma works without regard to who or what you are. Whether you're a monk or a layman, eating meat cuts off the root of Great Compassion.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not. Buddha taught in the Hevajra tantra, "Those who eat meat have compassion."

Further. Bhavaviveka proves that there is no fault if one consumes meat pure in three ways. There is no karma if one eats meat that is pure in three ways. Karma involves volition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

The choice of a vegetarian diet is a necessary, though not sufficient, cause for being reborn either in a Pure Land or for a fortunate rebirth in this one.

Malcolm wrote:

Not it isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 28th, 2015 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

Matt J said:

I think you're getting your Samkhya mixed up with your Advaita.

asunthatneversets said:

The model of Advaita Vedanta has puruṣa and prakṛti. Puruṣa is a singular ontological source that gives rise to prakṛti, however prakṛti (and the transformation of the three gunas) is held to be unreal, as it is illusion [māyā], only puruṣa is real. Puruṣa is Brahman, and is an unconditioned knower [jñā].

Malcolm wrote:

No, Sāṃkhya is like the Abhidharma of Hinduism. The conclusion of Sāṃkhya [infinite independent purushas] is rejected by Advaita, but the general treatment of elements, organs and so on is not disputed.

In the Yogasutra commentary by Shankara, he explicitly equates purusha with Brahmin, and says there is only one purusha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

hence Buddha in the world is just an appearance in the mind of the perceiver.

Malcolm wrote:

The appearance of the world is just an appearance in the mind of a perceiver, whether that appearance is pure or impure. If your view is pure, there is no difference between meat and rice. If your view is impure, there is still no difference between meat and rice. If your view is pure, there is no difference between a buddha and a sentient being; if your view is impure, there is still no difference between a sentient being.

Liberation is not attained through choice of diet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

The Buddha's body is eternal and unchanging. Our bodies are in a constant state of flux; ergo we eat to sustain ourselves, the Buddha doesn't eat because their's no changing body to support.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahaha, so now you have lapsed into a dual view: your view of the Buddha's body is eternalist, and your view of sentient beings bodies is that they are subject to perishing.

In reality, there is no difference between the body of a buddha and the body of a sentient being: they are equally unreal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 8:29 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

While we all possess the Buddhadhātu as our true Self, not all of us manifest as form body Buddhas. If you are a form body Buddha, you will not eat. The logic of this is obvious in the Angulimaliya Sutra:

Mañjuśrī, if any man or woman should think to themselves that they can do evil deeds because they will still be liberated by the existence within themselves of the Tathāgata-garbha, and then do some evil deed, how could their ātma-dhātu [Self- Factor] become liberated? As I previously explained, they will not be liberated, even though they do have the dhātu, just as in the case of the youth who engaged in asceticism. Why is that? Because they are very careless. Because they are careless, they will naturally not be liberated.

Malcolm wrote:

You completely missed the point — all bodies are projections...the Tathāgata's form is not less real than our own...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

As Mahāyāna Buddhists, we know that the Lord Śākyamuni was a nirmānakāya Buddha and never actually ate anything...

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously?

nilakantha said:

Shakyamuni was basically a holographic projection, existing only in the consciousnesses of sentient beings. How could a hologram need food? We're told in the Sarvabuddhaviṣayāvatārajñānālokālaṃkāra Sūtra:

“Mañjuśrī, the Tathāgata is in the realm of non-arising. On the other hand, he appears in the world as a reflected image. According to the beliefs of sentient beings he displays diverse appearances and diverse lifespans. He appears among sentient beings who have become fitting receptacles for awakening thanks to their maturation and belief. These sentient beings then hear the Dharma according to their dispositions and beliefs. According to their dispositions they understand the three vehicles, and according to their dispositions they obtain belief.”

And

“Mañjuśrī, there is no Tathāgata. However, the designation ‘Tathāgata’ comes about in the world because of the voice of Dharma. It is exclusively due to the maturation of sentient beings’ previous wholesome karma that they perceive the voice of the Tathāgata. That voice emerges in order to produce happiness for all sentient beings and to prompt those who are careless. Mañjuśrī, as those sentient beings hear that sound, they form the concept of a tathāgata, thinking, ‘This is the Tathāgata’s body.’”

Malcolm wrote:

If the Tathāgata never ate food, neither did we. Therefore, your obsession with diet is a complete waste of time.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 4:27 AM
Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta
Content:

swooping said:
Does this seem like a viable line of thought, or do you think I am twisting the essence of (at least) one of these traditions?

Malcolm wrote:
I think you are twisting the essence of (at least) one of these traditions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 4:16 AM
Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta
Content:

Matt J said:
I don't think that renders the terms "base," "path," and "fruit" indistinguishable, or mean they cannot be useful concepts in a public discussion (so far as concepts are useful) about different approaches.

Malcolm wrote:
They are distinguishable in this respect only: the basis is termed the basis when one has not realized the result; the path is the means of recognizing the basis; the result is when one has recognized the basis for what it is. But in reality, the basis, path and result are the same thing.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 1:06 AM
Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta
Content:

Matt J said:
I actually think the more important point isn't the fruit, it's the base and the path. Advaita and Dzogchen DO take completely different approaches. Let's assume for arguments sake that the end result IS the same. So what? You still have to go down one or the other. Mixing them up isn't going to work.

Malcolm wrote:
The basis, path and result are the same thing in Dzogchen. So of course the result is the most important point, given that it is the basis and the path.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, October 27th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Is collective consciousness Buddhist?

Content:

PorkChop said:

Is the idea of a collective consciousness a part of Buddhist doctrine?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2015 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: the great vegetarian debate

Content:

nilakantha said:

As Mahāyāna Buddhists, we know that the Lord Śākyamuni was a nirmānakāya Buddha and never actually ate anything...

Malcolm wrote:

Seriously?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 26th, 2015 at 7:47 PM

Title: Re: Non-Duality in Dzogchen vs Advaita Vedanta

Content:

swooping said:

With what little I have read about Kashmir Shaivism it, or at least parts of it, seem to be very very similar to dzogchen to me.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not similar at all. In Trika, everything is considered real because everything is part of Shiva, and Shiva is real.

In Dzogchen, everything, there is nothing established in which or of which to be a part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2015 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: Bhutas, Dons, negative spirits etc.

Content:

nilakantha said:

I have firm faith in the power of Our Lady of the White Umbrella to protect me from all supernatural evils. Her dharani can be practiced by all and needs no "transmission".

Malcolm wrote:

It is but one among many such practices...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 23rd, 2015 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: Bhutas, Dons, negative spirits etc.

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

What are all the different kinds of negative spirits etc., and what are the different ways that they can effect us? And why?

What can help in dealing with them?

Thank you.

nilakantha said:

Reciting the Sitatapatra (Shurangama) Dharani is the most powerful apotropaic practice we have.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmmm, no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2015 at 7:04 PM

Title: Re: Bhutas, Dons, negative spirits etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Jundo:

It is the case that provocations and so are a product of dualistic karmic vision, but so is your dog, your wife, your kids, your house and your car.

If one is still under the power of dualistic vision, thinking one's problems will be solved by passively sitting is hardly a cogent solution.

Of course, in the past, Soto masters were credited with great powers of exorcism, so clearly, they understood through their insight what to do in such cases.

M

jundo cohen said:

Hi Malcolm,

I am glad you are well and thriving. All good greetings to you.

I can only offer an opinion from one view-non-view.

Some phenomena, such as my dog, my wife, my kids, house and car, do seem to exist apart from my small mind. Merely by my thoughts, I do not seem able to make my wife go away (not that I would ever want to!). When I leave "my house" on a trip, there "my wife" is (and "my house") when I return.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is all, including sleep, karmic vision — quite powerful, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 22nd, 2015 at 12:04 AM

Title: Re: Bhutas, Dons, negative spirits etc.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hi Jundo:

It is the case that provocations and so are a product of dualistic karmic vision, but so is your dog, your wife, your kids, your house and your car.

If one is still under the power of dualistic vision, thinking one's problems will be solved by passively sitting is hardly a cogent solution.

Of course, in the past, Soto masters were credited with great powers of exorcism, so clearly, they understood through their insight what to do in such cases.

M

jundo cohen said:

Hello,

The following is just one practitioner's opinion from a small corner-non-corner of Buddhism.

It may be that the negative spirits are just the heart-mind. When the heart and mind are at peace, the negative spirits disappear with the breeze. They never were real from the start except for the mind's own making them real.

So, just sit, dropping all thought of spirits and their negativity and ... poof ... a certain Positive Peace may be found instead.

Better, however, to ask your own Teacher in your own Tradition.

Gassho, Jundo

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 21st, 2015 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Bhutas, Dons, negative spirits etc.

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

What are all the different kinds of negative spirits etc., and what are the different ways that they can effect us? And why?

What can help in dealing with them?

Malcolm wrote:

This is complicated topic.

In short, practicing Guru Trapo, Drollo, etc. are best for removing provocations.

pael said:

How do you practice them? Can anyone?

Malcolm wrote:

You need transmission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2015 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Bhutas, Dons, negative spirits etc.

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

What are all the different kinds of negative spirits etc., and what are the different ways that they can effect us? And why?

What can help in dealing with them?

Malcolm wrote:

This is complicated topic.

In short, practicing Guru Trapo, Drollo, etc. are best for removing provocations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2015 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Meditation in Tib monasteries before the Chinese

Content:

MiphamFan said:

How much do you know about Tibetan Buddhism in general?

zenman said:

Khenpo level.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean you have the same level of knowledge of Tibetan Buddhism as a Khenpo?
Really?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2015 at 2:04 AM

Title: Re: Nāda yoga ~ Sound as Path ~ Sutra,Tantra,Mantra,Dzogchen

Content:

Panaesthesia said:

Ah, well. So many people confused about so many things... I've been hoping that the "Dra Talgyur" would contain more information about the practice it refers to in the title, given the assertions of Jamgön Kongtrul in "The Treasury Of Knowledge, Esoteric Instructions" (Book 8, Part 4): "(sGra) thal 'gyur (rasa bali rgyud): A main tantra in the esoteric instruction class of atiyoga. It explains how to attain the level of nirmanānakāya and how to accomplish the welfare of others through practices related to sound" (Rangdrol, "The Circle of the Sun," 82)

Malcolm wrote:

The practices related to sound come from the first chapter, and the entire first chapter is a series of preliminary instructions.

Panaesthesia said:

All this time I've considered Jigme Lingpa's description of the practice as the yoga of four (external) elements just an error on his part caused by his admitted unfamiliarity with the practice, but I guess the confusion goes deeper.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not an error at all. This is one kind of practice included in general in the practice of the elements

Panaesthesia said:

I assume that you mean the same thing Malcolm. If not, what "this practice" are you referring to?

And are you referring to the Vimalamitra commentaries? I've been talking with Jean-Luc Achard about his translations of those commentaries, but he's still working on them.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. It is a long complicated section impossible to summarize here apart from saying that it teaches a progression of practices that are titled: the sound of 1) the Brahmaloṇa, 2) Viṣṇu Loka, 3) Kalavinka Loka, 4) the four elements and 5) the voice of the teacher.

Panaesthesia said:

These descriptions, from Mahamudra, are for the practice I am writing about:

These quotes are from p. 91 and p. 93 respectively of "Masters of Mahamudra: Songs and Histories of the Eighty-four Buddhist Siddhas" by Keith Dowman, Publisher: State University of New York Press (ISBN 978-0-88706-160-8): The Mahasiddha Vinapa (The Musician) achieved mahamudra through contemplation of the unborn, unstruck sound:
With perseverance and devotion
I mastered the vina's errant chords;
but then practicing the unborn, unstruck sound
I, Vinapa, lost my self.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, that is not what is described in the sgra thal 'gyur.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 20th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He is not running against Bill Clinton or the Clinton Family. He is running against Hillary Clinton. Don't worry though, there are five more debates I think, and Sanders will get his points across. He has plenty of time to show that Hillary herself is owned by Wall Street, and that her positions in the Senate demonstrate this again and again.

It is not his nature to pin his opponents to the wall or put the screws in. He has never run a campaign that way, and he won't start now. I support that.

DGA said:

I'm all for collegiality, so I agree with the thrust of your post in spirit, but I disagree on two points.

1. Sanders really is running against the Clinton family, because this is the network or machine behind the Clinton campaign. .

Malcolm wrote:

Sanders is not going to run against the Clinton family because it is misplaced. He is running against a corrupt political system awash in the cash of the wealthy more than anything else. If people are smart enough to see that, and have enough courage to vote on their convictions, and will actually help Sanders win the presidency, and continue to apply pressure to both parties through voting out irresponsible and lazy legislators, then our Democracy, founded on the ethnic cleansing of Indigenous people, might have a chance. Otherwise, it will be business as usual in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

DGA said:

Going back to the democratic debate for a moment, I want to underscore again how disappointed I am in Sanders' performance. He had the opportunity to pin Clinton to the wall and take a definitive lead, and he took a pass. If he's not willing to put the screws to this Republican, how can he be expected to take on the GOP nominee? Not a good showing.

In Tuesday's debate he pointedly ignored the Clinton family's role in deregulating Wall Street, and in doing so he allowed Hillary Clinton to cast gun regulation as the key issue that divides her from him. Forgotten was Bill Clinton's selection of Goldman Sachs honcho Robert Rubin to be his treasury secretary, an appointee who with President Clinton's complicity presided over the dismantling of New Deal limits on financial greed.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not running against Bill Clinton or the Clinton Family. He is running against Hillary Clinton. Don't worry though, there are five more debates I think, and Sanders will get his points across. He has plenty of time to show that Hillary herself is owned by Wall Street, and that her positions in the Senate demonstrate this again and again.

It is not his nature to pin his opponents to the wall or put the screws in. He has never run a campaign that way, and he won't start now. I support that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Nāda yoga ~ Sound as Path ~ Sutra,Tantra,Mantra,Dzogchen

Content:

Panaesthesia said:

Dzogchen has three central practices, only two of which are taught and performed today. The "Yeshe Lama" instruction manual starts by explaining this. The one no longer used is the one I am writing about.

Malcolm wrote:

It is taught today.

Panaesthesia said:

The root tantra of the seventeen dzogchen tantras received by Padmasambhava from Shri Singha is called "The Reverberation of Sound tantra" (Dra Talgyur Root Tantra "sgra thal 'gyur gym rgyud") and the practice is described therein. It has not been translated yet, although there is an effort underway in Austria at the direction of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Malcolm wrote:

When the commentary is published, I think you will be a little surprised at what this practice actually is. The root tantra itself does not devote more than a few stanzas to describing it. The commentary sets out in detail how one actually enters into the sounds of the four elements. But most importantly, it is a preliminary practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 9:37 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Martial Arts

Content:

Caodemarte said:

These are Chinese martial arts and the Chinese adherents claim this as their tradition. Lama Pai, Tibetan White Crane (not to be confused with Fujian Style White Crane), Lama or Tibetan Kungfu, and Hop Gar, according to tradition, originated in far Western China in the border regions with Tibet and then moved to north China and then down south. An American student of Tibetan White Crane published his research which indicates a Northern China origin, contrary to received tradition.

BTW, internal and external martial arts adherents also claim the "Indian" (probably Central Asian in origin although as far south as Sri Lanka have been claimed) Bodhidharma as their founder. Is any of this historically true? Possibly, but it would seem more likely that various schools of physical practice borrowed from each other, eventually merged, and then people invented a unified historical origin. It does seem likely that some yoga exercises made their way to China and influenced physical practice there. It is a fascinating topic in intellectual history and diffusion.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan martial arts are archery, wrestling, javelin throwing and sword fighting. That's it. Well, maybe we can include horsemanship as well...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Martial Arts

Content:

Caodemarte said:

This may be of passing interest. The Chinese martial arts Lama Pai, Tibetan White Crane, Lama or Tibetan Kungfu, and Hop Gar (all derived from the same form) from the western border region between Tibet and China and are traditionally claimed to be Tibetan in origin, originally taught by a Lama in that region.

Malcolm wrote:

Traditionally claimed by who? Certainly not Tibetans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

monktastic said:

And this is supposedly different from what took place in the Flower Sermon, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Some will see it that way, others will not, it depends on how well you understand Dzogchen teachings. Nubchen Sangye Yeshe certainly thought it was different, as does ChNN, and this is why the former took great pains to distinguish Dzogchen teachings from Chan, and why the latter follows Nubchen. You can either accept Nubs arguments or not, it is up to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Martial Arts

Content:

swooping said:

Is there any history of martial arts in Tibetan Buddhism in general, or Dzogchen specifically, as a spiritual path?

Malcolm wrote:

No, not until Trungpa adapted some Japanese Martial arts like Kyudo to the Shambhala teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 19th, 2015 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Some believe that Direct Introduction to the Nature of Your Mind or Pointing Out Instructions involves a quasi-magical transfer of energy from Guru to Disciple..

.

alpha said:

I do not think there is a transfer of energy from guru to disciple because during a real direct introduction there isnt any guru that gives or transfers something to the disciple .But some of us take part in a direct introduction with the expectation that we might get something which we dont already have.

Malcolm wrote:

The term direct introduction is a bit misleading. The term is translated from the tibetan, which is rang ngo thog tu phrad, "directly encounter your own state." This direct introduction or encounter is facilitated by a Guru, but as you correctly note, nothing is transferred per se, because the guru is merely showing you your own face [rang ngo] or your own state [rang ngo] in a direct encounter [thog tu phrad]. This is done on the basis of experiences, as the example of Nyoshul Lungtok's encounter with Patrul Rinpoche:

Nyoshul Lungtok, who later became one of the greatest Dzogchen masters of recent times, followed his teacher Patrul Rinpoche for about eighteen years. During all that time, they were almost inseparable. Nyoshul Lungtok studied and practiced extremely diligently, and accumulated a wealth of purification, merit, and practice; he was ready to recognize the Rigpa, but had not yet had the final introduction. Then, one famous evening, Patrul Rinpoche gave him the introduction. It happened when they were staying together in one of the hermitages high up in the mountains above Dzogchen Monastery. It was a very beautiful night. The dark blue sky was clear and the stars shone brilliantly. The sound of their solitude was heightened by the distant barking of a dog from the monastery below. Patrul Rinpoche was lying stretched out on the ground, doing a special Dzogchen practice. He called Nyoshul Lungtok over to him, saying: "Did you say you do not know the essence of the mind?" Nyoshul Lungtok guessed from his tone that this was a special moment and nodded expectantly.

"There's nothing to it really," Patrul Rinpoche said casually, and added, "My son, come and lie down over here: be like your old father." Nyoshul Lungtok stretched out by his side.

Then Patrul Rinpoche asked him, "Do you see the stars up there in the sky?"

"Yes."

"Do you hear the dogs barking in Dzogchen Monastery?"

"Yes."

"Do you hear what I'm saying to you?"

"Yes."

"Well, the nature of Dzogchen is this: simply this."

Nyoshul Lungtok tells us what happened then: "At that instant, I arrived at a certainty of realization from within. I had been liberated from the fetters of 'it is' and 'it is not.' I had realized the primordial wisdom, the naked union of emptiness and intrinsic awareness. I was introduced to this realization by his blessing, as the great Indian master Saraha said: He in whose heart the words of the master have entered, Sees the truth like a treasure in his own palm."

The sad part is that someone will take this literally, think that they should go somewhere, lie on the ground, listen to dogs bark and think this is direct introduction.

As you know, direct introduction is not introducing you to something you don't have. It is introducing you to something you have always had, and misplaced. This is one reason why the Buddhature metaphor useful in Dzogchen, but here it means something a bit different than in lower yanas [cue, Son of the Buddha].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

MiphamFan said:

OK sure, I never disagreed with you Malcolm.

dzogchungpa said:

Oh good, because that would have been terrible.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, agreeing with me makes for very silent threads...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

swooping said:

I got distracted by the lively (!) conversation on rigpa-through-books (thanks for posting such great info there btw), but I wanted to make sure to say thanks for that. It probably should have been obvious to me, but that has cleared up a lot of confusion for me.

Malcolm wrote:

The Seven Mind trainings are a unique system which originally comes from the Vima sNying thig. These days it is most popularly summarized by the Chetsun sNying thig, and there is a long commentary on them by Jigme Lingpa as well. Longchenpa also wrote three commentaries on the Seventh Lojong, which can be found in the Lama Yangthig.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 8:50 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Anyway I don't really know personally any lineage that doesn't have DI or empowerment, I was just taking his word for it that at least one of his traditional teachers did not do it formally at a given session but did it over the course of a long relationship.

Malcolm wrote:

Everytime someone receives the Chetsun Nyingthig, the Thigle Gyacan, any of the Yabzhi empowerments, Gongspa Zangthal, the medium Shitro empowerment of Karma gLingpa, etc., direct introduction is provided within the context of those empowerments.

In reality, everyone in Tibet who takes these teachings seriously, not only has received DI in a formal way, but also in the informal way Ivo is describing — the two are not mutually exclusive at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 11:55 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

Ivo said:

There is no requirement for the the extremely unelaborated empowerments of Nyingthik to be given. It is the choice of the teacher as to which empowerment variation to use. There are a lot of masters who do not use the extremely unelaborated empowerments in a formal way at all. As I said, they are very often treated differently.

Malcolm wrote:

There is a requirement that direct introduction is given. There is no difference in meaning between the extremely unelaborate empowerment and direct introduction. They are the same thing. And in point of fact, everyone who practices actual Dzogchen receives these transmissions as a matter of course. There is no use in pretending otherwise. On the other hand, I can't speak for the fools out there who delude their students with pretty words...

Ivo said:

Only if you received them from a teacher. Otherwise, in some sense, you are a thief of the teachings.

A thief of the teachings about one's own true nature? Well, that's certainly a new one... A very interesting kind of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not new at all, I have heard many teachers, ChNN among them, refer to people who think they can just read this or that book without transmission as "thieves of the teachings."

Ivo said:

Not really. But there are a lot of Lamas out there who sell their teachings as "Dzogchen" who do not actually teach Dzogchen.

And there are lamas out there who do not even utter the word Dzogchen, and definitely not "Direct Introduction", but are among the greatest living Dzogchen masters on Earth. And their students happen to be amazing too.

Malcolm wrote:

The first word of the three words of Garab Dorje is "འདྲིམ་ཐོག་དུ་ཕྱད" parse it however you want. It is indispensable in Dzogchen.

Ivo said:

The whole intent of the Dzogchen tantras and upadeshas is that the guru is inside, not outside.

Malcolm wrote:

Uh huh, so now we are dispensing with the lineage, and gurus too, after all the "guru is inside" — that has gotten sentient beings very far up till now, hasn't it?

Ivo said:

This is what Samantabhadra means.

Malcolm wrote:

Samantabhadra means lots of things, but a guru is never optional in Dzogchen. And this means that one cannot just buy some translation in a bookstore, read it, and then claim that one has discovered one's primordial state.

Ivo said:

Belittling people who have had by chance a taste of the blessings of the lineage with forceful arrogance instead of gentle guidance is not Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Telling people they have tasted the blessings of the lineage when they have never met a real lineage is an outright lie. Telling people the truth is never arrogance, it is just honesty.

Ivo said:

The need for a teacher should be explained, not enforced.

Malcolm wrote:

The need for a guru is fundamental to Dzogchen teachings, it is not optional.

Ivo said:

And one should always remember that Dharma means freedom, not bondage.

Malcolm wrote:

All buddhas of the three times depended on a guru.

Ivo said:

As the incomparable Kyabje Trulshik Rinpoche used to say, not just the teaching should be Dzogchen, the person should be Dzogchen too.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you should think about that.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 9:48 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen Martial Arts
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
People in glass houses....

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 9:43 AM
Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age
Content:
Ivo said:
The modes of transmission in Dzogchen differ among lineages, a lot.

Malcolm wrote:
Not really. But there are a lot of Lamas out there who sell their teachings as "Dzogchen" who do not actually teach Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 9:41 AM
Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age
Content:
MiphamFan said:
Maybe it is a regional thing too? Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche says it was very common for people to ask lamas for pointing out instructions in his Nangchen region of Kham and for masters to give it. ChNN himself often tells how Changchub Dorje gave him DI in a short, one-to-one talk after the empowerment for his Shitro terma.

Malcolm wrote:
It is not a regional thing whatsoever.

For one thing, "pointing out", ngo phrod is generally a Mahāmudra term. Direct introduction, "rang ngo thog du phrad," literally, "directly encountering one's own state" is a Dzogchen term. Granted, even in Dzogchen texts, there are this and that "ngo phrod," there is even an entire tantra devoted to the subject. But direct introduction from a qualified master is the only thing absolutely essential in Dzogchen teachings. Anyone who thinks otherwise has no understanding of Dzogchen at all.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 9:35 AM
Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

Ivo, as you very well know, the extremely unelaborate empowerment of the four Nyinthig empowerments is precisely a direct introduction. So what are you talking about?

Ivo said:

As you know, there is no requirement for this type of empowerment to be given at all.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean you do not need direct introduction to enter Dzogchen teachings? Every single teacher in your lineage has received all transmissions of Dzogchen in the proper way. That means they received instructions from their respective gurus. Their teachers did not just hand them books and send them out to meditate.

Ivo said:

In the lineages I have had the good fortune to be part of, this is often not taken as a formal ritual at all, and the actual transmission on this level happens in a different way, in the context of very close teacher-student relationship, one to one, over the course of time. And it is never formal. Although it is a direct introduction it bears no resemblance at all to the DI as given within the Dzogchen Community. It is in fact so different in look, and feel, as if it is a completely different thing. This is why many older Tibetan lamas have such a problem with what Norbu Rinpoche is doing. I myself do not.

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever said direct introduction needs to be a formal ritual? That depends on context. Certainly, the direct introduction that ChNN received from Rigdzin Chanchub Dorje was not a ritual.

Ivo said:

Reading authentic dzogchen texts from the deep and profound terma tradition is a form of interaction with the teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you received them from a teacher. Otherwise, in some sense, you are a thief of the teachings.

Ivo said:

For those thus fortunate, the outer appearance of a human teacher will come in due course as well. We need not stand in the way.

Malcolm wrote:

Then one should encourage people to find a qualified teacher and not encourage people to believe they have understood what they have not understood because that understanding depends on the intimate instructions of the guru, and not books.

Ivo said:

People who only read English translations of these texts without access to a Tibetan teacher who can clarify for them what this and that actually means are like blind people in a cave who have been given flashlight with dead batteries to find their way out.

At least with some of the translations out there, the batteries are quite fine, and the flashlight is reasonably bright.

Malcolm wrote:

Without a proper teacher however, the students are still quite blind no matter how bright the flashlight is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

[

So, the Direct Introductions were received through means of a book. There is one question I had about Guru Padmasambhava's "Self-Liberation." I had quoted the Guru where he said four times that the text was a "direct introduction to your intrinsic awareness," but the quotations were rejected as false.

Malcolm wrote:

Steve, what was rejected was your conclusion about what the quotes mean. The text you cited was an oral text written down by someone. They are Guru Padmasambhava's speech, not a book written out by an author. When a guru presents that text, he does so because he has received the lung for that text and knows how to present it. For you, that Guru is the same as Guru Padmasambhava.

steve_bakr said:

The question I wanted to ask was, "Are we to believe Guru Padmasambhava or not?" "Did he tell the truth or not?" If Guru Padmasambhava reiterates that same point four times, is it even permissible to say that he is wrong all four times? Isn't he a venerated source?

Malcolm wrote:

Steve, no one is saying that what Guru Rinpoche said is wrong. Your understanding is wrong.

When he was teaching, he was giving direct introduction through words to a group of students. Which students? Principally a translator named Chogro Lui Gyaltsen, who is renowned as one of the translators of the 17 Tantras. Also Yeshe Tsogyal, she was the direct heir to these teachings. Karma Lingpa was the reincarnation of Chogro and the one appointed to promulgate them. So what you are reading is a record of one of Guru Padmasambhava's teaching sessions. Guru Rinpoche in fact wrote very little, but he taught a lot and those recorded teachings are what we now have as the treasure tradition. But they are all just so many books without proper empowerment, reading transmission and instruction

After Karma Lingpa revealed the text, he gave the empowerments, the lung and the teachings to his son, Nyida Chojey, who then spread it widely. Ever since then it is a teaching that has been passed down in connection with the empowerment of the peaceful and wrathful deities in his tradition. I have this transmission as do many people you are talking to. You can easily get this transmission, it is given rather frequently, and I am sure if you ask someone to teach you the text, respectfully and with a beginners attitude, you will have no problem.

The main reason Reynolds translated it again was to correct Evans Wentz's and Jung's misunderstandings of the text.

steve_bakr said:

I submit that it's not possible for the Guru to say something four or more times and be wrong about it.

Malcolm wrote:

But it is quite possible for you to vastly misunderstand the context [you have] and promulgate this error [which you are doing].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

Adamantine said:

I agree with this, as I said before: pointing out instructions are not necessarily given with a label, or warning. Fourth empowerments and rikpa tsel wangs still have a bit of that expectation. There is another approach, which is quite spontaneous, and the disciple will only know it was a pointing out if they "get it". I believe true Dzogchen masters are giving a type of pointing out all of the time, in infinite ways, and if one has the opportunity to spend significant time with one, they should jump at it.

Ivo said:

Very true. One of my closest teachers once told me that his own teacher (a pivotal figure in the recent history of the Nyingma) never gave them this type of direct introduction at all, and only gave them lungs for the various direct introduction traditional texts in order for them to find the experience by themselves. He also never gave commentaries on any Dzogchen texts to his heart disciples, even on the seven treasures and YL, only lungs. And he was the master of masters.

Malcolm wrote:

Ivo, as you very well know, the extremely unelaborate empowerment of the four Nyingthig empowerments is precisely a direct introduction. So what are you talking about?

Of course you have to discover Dzogchen knowledge through your own experience, and of course, having been ripened with the rig pa'i rtsal dbang through whichever of the three ways it can be given — pandita style, secret mantra style or pointing out for old ladies — then of course one takes whatever practice texts one needs and goes and does Dzogchen practices such as rushen, etc. and eliminates one's doubts. But the effectiveness of Dzogchen practice comes about through one's interaction with a teacher and practices they give one, not from reading books and developing nice fantasies about what Dzogchen might be based on reading Western translations without a proper teacher.

People who only read English translations of these texts without access to a Tibetan teacher who can clarify for them what this and that actually means are like blind people in a cave who have been given flashlight with dead batteries to find their way out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

Fa Dao said:

This whole discussion could have been avoided if you had not so stubbornly insisted that Dzogchen can be learned from a book, or that rigpa can be introduced by a book in absence of proper transmission.

Yeah..Malcolm..about that..with all due respect...what did you expect? If you attack somebody..what..you think they wont automatically go on the defensive? Besides that, it DOES say that in the book..there is no disclaimer saying that it is a teaching manual to be accompanied by being given Direct Introduction by a qualified master. So maybe this whole discussion could have been shortened and more productive if that had been patiently explained?

Malcolm wrote:

I have been patiently explaining for many days now, ever since steve showed up. Not only myself, but many other people.

Anyone who has been a student of Norbu Rinpoche for any length of time knows that you really should receive the transmission for any Dzogchen text you wish to study. Dzogchen texts are not meant to be read in absence of proper instruction. Yes, of course, when you know the meaning, then one Dzogchen text is just as good as another, they all have the same meaning more or less, depending on whether we are talking about sems sde, klong sde, or man ngag sde. Still, if you want to really work with a text, then the proper way to do it is to find someone who will teach you the text in a proper way. This was how it was done in Tibet, we are no different today. If you can't find someone to teach you that text, then you find someone who will teach you any text of Dzogchen. The text does not matter, what matters is whether the master has genuine realization of the teachings of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, October 18th, 2015 at 5:23 AM
Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age
Content:

steve_bakr said:

Malcolm, I understand that you have a very specific understanding of what constitutes the proper media and manner of transmission regarding the nature of one's mind and I respect that. I also understand that you are highly educated and I respect that as well. I hope to avail myself of your expertise.

Malcolm wrote:
Hi Steve:

It is not my understanding, it is the understanding of my teachers and my lineage, including Guru Padmasambhava, going back to the two founders of Dzogchen teachings on this globe in this epoch: Garab Dorje and Tonpa Shenrab.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 11:01 PM
Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age
Content:

steve_bakr said:

Not that tradition is to be disrespected or anything like that. Not that Dzogchen can be learned from a book independently of a living master. I claim nothing more than the taste of sugar. I hope to be verified by a living master.

Malcolm wrote:

Look steve, if you want to practice Dzogchen, it is very simple — find a proper master, receive direct introduction; then engage in Dzogchen practices so you do not remain in doubt. Finally, when you are no longer in doubt, continue in a state of confidence in liberation.

This whole discussion could have been avoided if you had not so stubbornly insisted that Dzogchen can be learned from a book, or that rigpa can be introduced by a book in absence of proper transmission.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 9:49 PM
Title: Re: Yoga teachers.
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

Dongyuling Center in Buenos Aires is an excellent centre that offers free teachings on Buddhist theory and practice, primarily in the Drukpa Kagyu tradition. The president, Gerardo Abboud, is not only a wonderful and wise man who spent 14 years studying and practicing in India and Nepal, but he is also the Dalai Lama's translator for Latin America. You can get more information at their website: <http://www.dongyuling.com.ar>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 8:45 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

smcj said:

With this post I am actually quoting a recognized authority, so the disclaimer in my signature does not apply.

Starting around the 15 minute mark in the following link

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FGzN4FAFgTs>

Alan Wallace talks about the various approaches to Dzogchen. At one end of the spectrum is getting the "pointing out instructions" (D.I. by a different name) in a weekend retreat without any other preparations approach. He affirms that this is a valid approach, what we would call "top down". At the other end of the spectrum is spending 20 years studying the texts and then going off and doing long retreats. He said his teacher didn't teach him either of those two ways but was a third way, just practice based. Plus obviously there is the "bottom up" approach with progressing through the lower 8 yantras.

Around the 17 minute mark he talks about what the pointing out instructions are like. At first he calls them "mind to mind transmission" but then he says it isn't literal. He does say it is "...a resonance, an affinity, a transmission..." where metaphorically the clouds can part for a moment or a minute. It's at the 20 minute mark he says in 24 years his teacher Gyaltrul R. never gave him pointing out instructions.

There is more than one way approach the subject. Our tendency to dismiss or exclude the entire spectrum of approaches here at DW tends to make the discussions somewhat myopic.

Garudavista said:

I believe Alan Wallace may not have needed pointing out instructions because he was practicing Mahamudra and not Dzogchen. Although the base for both is the same, the methods are quite different. I think that is what you've stated in your post. However, to avoid any potential confusion, I just wanted to clarify that he didn't need pointing out instructions because he was practicing Mahamudra and not Dzogchen. If I am wrong about this, please feel free to correct me.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāmudra and Dzogchen both depend on introductions, the former is more gradual than the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 8:39 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I have the highest regard for Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you don't. You have no respect for it all.

steve_bakr said:

although later someone posted actual quotes which verified what I said.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they posted citations from the introduction to the book that they poorly understood.

steve_bakr said:

Now, I have responded to many posts directed to me. If it was necessary to repeat what I said before, it is because my credibility was questioned, which gave me the right of response.

Malcolm wrote:

You have no credibility here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 8:37 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Misrepresenting what I've said is the opposite of helping. I know bullies very well. Why don't you address the substance of the good points that have been made here?

Malcolm wrote:

I never misrepresented a single thing you said.

I have addressed each and every point that raised, substantively.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I am more partial to Longchenpa's view of Rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't understand Longchenpa's views about rigpa, let alone Dzogchen. If you did, you would never claim that Dzogchen can be understood from reading books in absence of a master.

steve_bakr said:

I am well aware that you can hand out insults, and your are misrepresenting my position. Is that what Dzogchen is all about in your own mind? Where I am from, we call that a schoolyard bully.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not insulting you. When someone insists over and over again, that $2+2 = 5$, it is not an insult to inform them that they do not know how to add. It actually helps them.

When you insist over and over again that you can introduce yourself to rig pa through reading a book in absence of a master, it is not an insult to tell you that you are deeply mistaken and wrong. I am actually helping you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 6:11 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

How recently have you read, "Natural Perfection?"

Malcolm wrote:

I don't read Dowman's translations -- I have no need to.

What particular aspect of the gNas Lugs mDzod did you have in mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I am more partial to Longchenpa's view of Rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't understand Longchenpa's views about rigpa, let alone Dzogchen. If you did, you would never claim that Dzogchen can be understood from reading books in absence of a master.

Do you really need me to trot out the citations by Longcheпа where he insists that one must have a guru to enter Dzogchen teachings, really?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Longchenpa presents a considerably more expansive view of Rigpa in his work, "Natural Perfection." For Longchenpa, Rigpa is perhaps the most essential and pivotal aspect of Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you really have any idea how naive and uninformed you sound? I am sorry, but of course the whole point of Dzogchen is rigpa. The point is that you clearly do not understand what that means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is pity that these days fools think they can read a book about Dzogchen and think they have got it. Oh well, c'set la vie. There were such fools in Tibet as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 2:53 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, if I'm not mistaken, books can provide meaning and example, so I'm guessing the provision of "experiences" is what is uniquely the role of the master. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. This is what distinguishes Dzogchen and Vajrayāna in general from sūtra. In sūtra of course, an experienced teacher is indispensable, but there are no methods of introduction in sūtra.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, good, but I've never really gotten a clear explanation of how that works in the absence of something like "mind-to-mind contact".

.

Malcolm wrote:

Read ChNN's commentary on Song of the Vajra, it is all quite clearly explained there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

What is direct introduction but "a glimpse of rikpa?"

A direct introduction is a context for the "glimpse of rikpa". And a manifestation of a true method for attaining liberation.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Ivo. Rig pa is a result of direct introduction, or otherwise working with methods to discover the meaning of that introduction.

Ivo said:

Malcolm, what the terma tradition is for me is clearly something very different from what the terma tradition is for you.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see any point in fetishizing books, no matter how miraculous they are, even if they fall out of the sky onto one's roof. My bonafides as a disciple of three authentic tertons are quite in order, thank you very much.

Ivo said:

On top of that you are twisting my words, now you are twisting even a direct quote of ChNN where he clearly states that "This introduction, this meeting face-to-face, is precisely the function of the present text "

Malcolm wrote:

I am not twisting anything.

The function of that text in the hands of a qualified master is to give introduction, not all by itself, picked up off a bookshelf in Barnes and Nobles or ordered from Amazon.

Ivo said:

I see no point of rephrasing again and again things which I already wrote down as clearly as I could. I am saying that yes, you can recognize by yourself with the support of symbols, and no, you can not work effectively with this without a teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

And I am saying that no, you cannot even recognize your primordial state without direct introduction, let alone work with it without a teacher.

Ivo said:

Disparaging the living force of the Dzogchen transmission, the blessings and the activity of the dakinis and the dharmapalas and terming it "superstition" is not good.

Malcolm wrote:

The living force of Dzogchen transmission is in Dzogchen masters and practitioners, not in Dzogchen books. Books are always secondary and relative. That is why Dzogchen is called "the intimate instruction [man ngag] that does not depend on scriptures [lung]."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, if I'm not mistaken, books can provide meaning and example, so I'm guessing the provision of "experiences" is what is uniquely the role of the master. Is that correct?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course. This is what distinguishes Dzogchen and Vajrayāna in general from sūtra. In sūtra of course, an experienced teacher is indispensable, but there are no methods of introduction in sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The master is the person who activates the text with his or her knowledge and realization.

dzogchungpa said:

What exactly does "activate" mean here?

Malcolm wrote:

Gives life to the teaching, through meaning, example and experiences.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Matt J said:

While I generally agree with Malcolm that ChNNR's view seems pretty well laid out, this is from his 1989 Forward to Self-Liberation through Seeing with Naked Awareness: ...This is our Primordial State. But in order to recognize it, we first need transmission from a realized master in the form of an introduction (ngo-sprod) to the state of presence and awareness (rig-pa). This introduction, this meeting face-to-face, is precisely the function of the present text, which reports the very words of Guru Padmasambhava introducing his disciples to such presence or awareness."

Malcolm wrote:

Which is precisely what I am saying, "we first need transmission from a realized master in the form of an introduction..."

And yes, the function of this text, in the hands of a master, is to give introduction.

Matt J said:

Certainly many readers possessing fortunate karma

Malcolm wrote:

Fortunate karma means they have met Dzogchen teachings in the form of direct introduction. Not that they have the good fortune to stumble over the book in Barnes and Nobles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 2:08 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He repeatedly criticizes the idea that it is enough to just read a book about Dzogchen, any book, and claim you have real knowledge of Dzogchen.

Ivo said:

I never, ever said, nor intended to say that you can claim a real knowledge of Dzogchen by reading a book about Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but you did say, "I never stated that one can receive DI "from a book". Just a glimpse of rikpa."

What is direct introduction but "a glimpse of rikpa?"

Ivo said:

However, it is perfectly possible for someone to encounter the base, and to recognize it for what it is, if the correct circumstances engage.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, if they happen to attain the tenth bhumi.

Ivo said:

In the absence of a teacher and a working path it gets veiled almost instantaneously, but according to some of my teachers it happens a lot to ordinary beings.

Malcolm wrote:

This was already covered, no one denies that it is possible for ordinary people to have an experience of the nature of their minds without depending on a teacher. What they are unable to do is introduce themselves to the basis, and as a result, have rig pa. Rig pa is not the basis.

Ivo said:

To deny that a text especially meant to induce this, and on top of that especially during the present time of wide dissemination of Dzogchen, is ineffective is to argue directly with the source of these teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, the text is just a bunch of squiggles on a page in absence of a teacher to use it as a manual for introduction. Without a teacher to present it, indeed the text is ineffective. That's why you need a master. The master is the person who activates the text with his or her knowledge and realization. Without that, the text is just words on paper.

You cannot have it both ways, Ivo. You cannot on the one hand claim that you never said that direction introduction can be gained from a book, and on the other hand claim that it can.

In the hands of a master, any number of texts, hundreds, if not thousands of them are effective means for giving direct introduction — but in reality, a master does not need a book to give direct introduction. But without being received from a master, no text of introduction is effective, no matter how many of them one reads.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Well, you know, even ChNN says that at one time in his life he thought he knew everything. So....people will think what they think, understand what they understand and there is not a lot anyone can do about it. Except what is happening here.

Enjoy your lives.

Malcolm wrote:

The one thing ChNN says is that direct introduction is indispensable and he explicitly rejects the idea that you can gain Dzogchen knowledge from books in absence of a master. Honestly, have we all been listening to the same master? He repeatedly criticizes the idea that it is enough to just read a book about Dzogchen, any book, and claim you have real knowledge of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

Malcolm, I know this distinction pretty well. I am not confusing these things.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you are simply in error when you claim that someone who has never received introduction can obtain introduction from a book, for if you claim that someone can have an "experience of rig pa" from reading a book, you are claiming that they can receive direct introduction from a book in absence of a master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 17th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

And... while I am still in my recreational break, which went far too long today, I may as well state, in full compliance with the DW tradition to put words into our teachers' mouths, that during all the years I have spent trying to find my way in Dzogchen with the help of a number of teachers, I have never met a teacher who would state that a person can not have an authentic rikpa experience by oneself, be it reading books or whatever. Even a total beginner, in fact, it is easier for them. So I can safely say for myself that I know of no Dzogchen teacher who would state that as a fact, including ChNN if asked one to one. This doesn't mean that my teachers would present this as a path or valid option for beginners, or talk about this on public talks, but denying that it might happen is absurd. In my opinion it shows a total lack of understanding of what Dharma is and what the samsaric condition actually is.

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa, Ivo, is knowledge, as opposed to ma rig pa, ignorance.

You seem to be claiming that ordinary people can have knowledge of their primordial state spontaneously. If this were true, there would never have been any need at all for teachers and teachings.

I have never met one single authentic teacher of Dzogchen who would claim that one could have this experiential knowledge [rig pa] without it having first been introduced to one by a master.

People can experience the nature of the mind [George] without introduction, just as they can see George on a train everyday without knowing [ma rig pa] who George is. When people are introduced to the knowledge of the nature of the their minds, then we can say they have "rig pa".

Rig pa and the nature of the mind aka primordial state aka basis, are not the same thing. The fact that people continually conflate these two is unfortunate. But if you pay attention to ChNN, he says repeatedly, "rig pa is not the nature of the mind, rig pa is knowledge or instant presence in the nature of the mind."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

Is that what Ivo was saying that you can get DI from this pecha?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in general he is saying that without a master one can get direct introduction from special, holy books filled with special holy blessings, different from all the other words of Buddha which are not as holy nor as filled with blessings.

T. Chokyi said:

maybe it does not go along with CHNN, I don't know...but CHNN also says to go beyond limitation, so saying we can get DI only by meeting with a human Guru and listening in the daytime (while awake) is that the only way to get DI you know of, there are no other examples of someone getting a "taste of sugar" besides from the masters oral transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

Not for those of us, who by circumstance, happen to be ordinary sentient beings. And even those extraordinary persons, realized people who have the capacity to meet Sambhogakāyas, even they started out as ordinary people who had to receive transmission from a human, aka nirmanakāya, guru.

Even tenth stage bodhisattvas have to receive empowerment in order to advance to the stage of Buddhahood. There is no path in Buddhadharma that bypasses the need for a master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is just a book, even for an advanced yogi. There is nothing special about a terma text that makes it superior to say a sūtra or a tantra in terms of blessings. This is just superstition. Of course there are some texts that can plant a positive connection in a person's mind so they can make a connection with the lineage at a future time. Even so, texts are always something relative and something quite limited.

Ivo said:

I disagree. If this is superstition, the Dharma becomes invalid in all its aspects, maybe apart from the path of an arhat.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, so you are actually claiming that the words of one Buddha have more blessings than the words of another Buddha?

BTW, your objection makes no sense at all and lacks any pervasion. Just because treasure texts are no more holy or sacred than the words of the Buddha in sūtra and tantra does not bear the consequence that the Dharma becomes invalid in all respects outside of the path of Arhats.

Ivo said:

Yes, actually it is just a book. Without a master to introduce it, it has no juice. wow... nope. It has plenty of juice as it is a direct wisdom manifestation and there can be no chance encounter with any such text. Not to mention that such an encounter would trigger a whole chain of events involving a number of samaya bound agents of all kinds.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing is explained in all the tantras; transcended in the signless dimension, there is nothing to explain.

Nothing is demonstrated in all the agamas, transcended in the unfabricated dimension, there is no effort or practice.

Nothing is illustrated in the upadeśas, transcended in the incorruptible dimension, there is nothing to accomplish.

E ma, Listen up, retinue of sublime appearances! The Vidyā of Reality is unceasingly clear to the retinue of the method of appearances.

Thus, in the location of vidyā nothing was said, is not being said now and will not be said later on.

— Yi ge med rgyud

Dzogchen is based on a direct perception. That cannot be brought about reading a book, no matter how holy and perceived to be filled with blessings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

but reading this text is fine imho as Ivo has said.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that it was not "fine", to read the book. People are free, they can do what they want. What is not "fine" however is to claim that without a master one can receive direct introduction from a book. ChNN would never go along with this claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

Well, someone disagrees with you, so you don't need to dig your heels in, it might be wise to listen to someone other than yourself, you wrote reems on NOT eatting meat, you conducted quite a thread, but then changed your mind once you learned differently.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't "learn differently," I changed my mind.

T. Chokyi said:

Ivo and I are agreeing here, we understand the point, and George is not that far away, but you actually said he was kind of indifferent yourself if you read back...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, your primordial state aka George, is pretty indifferent. He does not care if he is wet, dry, hot, cold, in heaven, in hell or for that matter recognized or unrecognized.

T. Chokyi said:

You don't need someone to explain everything, you can read this text in English, get the lung if you are fortunate, and the person who was asking about this text already has DI since they listened to CHNN for over a year, so tasting sugar comes from the DI, but how that DI happens is different for everyone, you seem to think it is the same for everybody...

Malcolm wrote:

Our friend steve is making a different suggestion. He is making the suggestion that you do not need a master whatsoever, and that reading a text like Self-Liberation without a master is sufficient for introduction. In other words, he is suggesting that merely by reading a book, one can understand the taste of sugar.

Not only do I disagree, but ChNN would think such a suggestion preposterous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

You will change your mind over time, it isn't "just a book".

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually it is just a book. Without a master to introduce it, it has no juice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

I think the George thing can be right under the surface for some individuals, for others, it may take longer, and I've had Nirmanakayas in the form of teachers come up and introduce themselves "I'm George" which implies they care very much, more than most of us here can know, for me the outer "George" was the same as the inner "George"... and it's still that way, so there isn't a line of separation, what's outside is what is inside and what's inside is what is outside, so if your outside looks a certain way, that's YOU and nobody else, you created it, including whether you see a Nirmanakaya inside or outside or both at the same time. Everybody is different, some can understand immediately, some take more time, and some take ages, but people shouldn't be lumped into "he or she is just a beginner" when it comes to Dzogchen as CHNN has said again and again while giving teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

You have not understood the point. The point is that George is not under the surface at all, he is sitting right next to you, in full view. But still sentient beings do not recognize George unless he is introduced. And they will never recognize George by reading a book, no matter how wonderful, in exactly the same way they will never be able to understand the taste of sugar by reading about it in a book, no matter how precise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

But not with this... We are discussing the terma tradition here. It is not just a book, not even for a complete beginner.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is just a book, even for an advanced yogi. There is nothing special about a terma text that makes it superior to say a sūtra or a tantra in terms of blessings. This is just superstition. Of course there are some texts that can plant a positive connection in a person's mind so they can make a connection with the lineage at a future time. Even so, texts are always something relative and something quite limited.

Termas are also part of the oral tradition. They are held to have been orally taught by Padmasambhava [or someone else, like Saraha] to a specific person at a specific time and place, and when they are unpacked by the predicted tertön, he again gives the oral transmission as he received it, thus continuing it without a break. Also tertöns, by definition, must be realized Dzogchen masters.

Mahāyāna Sūtras are actually termas. So are all Tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

Such a text is not only ink on paper.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, it pretty much is, if it is not presented to a proper student in a proper way, complete with the oral transmission of the text and accompanying introduction.

Dzogchen is an intimate instruction that does not depend on a scripture. This is the point that is lost on Steve.

What does Dzogchen depend on? Introduction by a master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

Steve_Bakr, it is indeed possible to get a glimpse of rikpa by reading a text.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Ivo, actually it isn't, and I have demonstrated this already.

Ivo said:

Well, I wouldn't argue with this point, as I know where you are coming from, but I beg to differ. My personal opinion is irrelevant, but many of my Dzogchen teachers, especially during thogyal teachings, have stated the opposite again and again, and I mentioned one of those teachers. But since the possibility of any of them coming here and confirming it is quite minuscule, it is a moot point.

Malcolm wrote:

Ivo — rig pa is the knowledge of a very specific thing, one's primordial state. This is very, very subtle and cannot be accessed through a coarse mind that is engaged in reading a book, not matter how nice those words are.

We are talking about a beginner, someone who has never met George. They might see George every day on the subway, but they will never know who George is. However, when they are at last introduced to George by someone who knows George, they will say, "Oh, I see you everyday on the Subway." After that point, they will always recognize George, even if he changes his suit, hat, shoes, etc. But without that introduction, they will never recognize George, and George, being rather disinterested in people, will never walk up and introduce himself, saying, "I am George."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Ivo said:

steve_bakr, it is indeed possible to get a glimpse of rikpa by reading a text.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Ivo, actually it isn't, and I have demonstrated this already.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Matt J said:

While I disagree with what he says, I think he has every right to say it.

In the U.S., there is the idea that free speech is better than censorship because the truth will win in the marketplace of opinions. This position seeks to drive alternate views into the shadows, where they will linger unopposed.

Malcolm wrote:

The refers to the press and public sphere only. You do not have the right, for example, to walk into a African American church and stand up and say that African Americans are inferior to whites, or walk into a synagogue and express your opinion that Hitler was correct to exterminate Jews. In other words, freedom of speech is not protected in private spaces, and never has been.

Matt J said:

The debate and refutation of wrong views has a strong history in Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Banishment of recalcitrant debaters also has a long history in Buddhism...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

you can say that there is enlightenment in a provisional sense, but in an absolute sense enlightenment is dualistic because it is paired in contrast to its opposite.

Malcolm wrote:

This argument is explicitly rejected in the Rig pa rang shar.

steve_bakr said:

Therefore, I can understand your saying that the absolute viewpoint contradicts Dzogchen Tantras. .

Malcolm wrote:

What I am saying is that your argument is explicitly rejected in the Tantras of Dzogchen. The Rig pa Rang shar gives the following account. Follow it closely and you can see that your point of view is explicitly negated. The context of the argument, btw, is to prove that Buddhahood is attained merely through an introduction.

[Opponent]

The opponents reply to that:

all phenomena are nondual.

Therefore, there cannot be duality.

Since there are no sentient beings, there are no buddhas.

Therefore, [nonduality] is freedom from the extremes of dualistic appearances.

[Reply]

Now then, is this stated in the ultimate sense, or stated for the objects of deluded appearances?

Our reply to that and the demonstration of the proofs:

that this is so in the ultimate sense, but there is a dualistic appearance in the objects of deluded appearances.

[Opponent]

The opponents rebuttal to that:
because there is no duality in the ultimate sense, it is not reasonable for there to be duality in objects of deluded appearances.
Why? Because there is no duality in the ultimate sense.
In that case it is reasonable that all sentient beings could be liberated without the need for effort.
Why? Because duality does not exist in the basis.

[Reply]

Now then, how is duality asserted?

The reply to that is:

when there are no buddhas and no sentient beings,
there is no second or third in the basis.
Because the potentiality of play arises from that [basis], buddhas and sentient beings arise as a duality.

[Opponent]

Now it is asserted that duality exists in the basis.
Because there is no good or bad in the basis, for what reason is it said to exist as a duality?
In that case, there cannot be transformation.
Why? It is reasonable that sentient beings do not attain buddhahood.
For example, even though coal is polished, it will never become white.
In the same way, deluded sentient beings will never become buddhas through practicing meditation.

[Reply]

Next, the reply is given like this:
because it exists to be demonstrated,
the result is attained through the demonstration.
If not demonstrated, how can there be liberation?

There are no signs in the dharmas of the basis,
no grasping to the dharmas of the path,
and no attainment of the dharmatā of the result.
The basis of sentient beings and the basis of buddhahood is definitely differentiated by a sole difference.
For what reason is there a sole difference?
Why is it called “the sole difference”?
The basis of buddhahood is pristine consciousness [ye shes];
the basis of sentient beinghood is not pristine consciousness.
When both the primordial state (ye) and recognition (shes pa) are combined, it is the sublime transcendent state of the buddhas.
I really think you need to reconsider your arrogance on this point. There are people here who understand Dzogchen far better than you. You should listen to them. On the Guru, for example, another of the 17 Tantras, the Precious Introduction Tantra, states:

Investigating into the intimate instructions of the Guru, one reaches the extent of effortless self-liberation.

The Rig pa Rang shar, the commentary tantra of Dzogchen, also chimes in the faults of not obtaining empowerments. Now mind you, this does not mean that one necessarily needs some kind of empowerment into an outer mandala and so on, as the Rig pa Rang Shar makes clear. That depends on the faculties of the student. But this tantra makes it absolutely clear that one must receive at least direct introduction from a proper master: The faults of not obtaining the empowerment are as follows: in the bardo one is alarmed, panicked, exhausted, impeded and one can also lose consciousness.

“While one has not left the body of traces, migrating beings will not see one as worthy of respect. One’s merit will be small, one’s life short, one’s enjoyments of living will be few, one will be powerless and many obstacles will occur. Nothing will be accomplished.

Those are the faults of not obtaining the empowerment for the conduct of Secret Mantra. A yogin of Secret Mantra conduct must first obtain empowerment. If empowerment is not obtained, not even the Buddha will be able to turn the wheel on the stage of a tathāgata. If the wheel cannot be turned, then the nirmanakāya will not be able to benefit migrating beings with compassion. Therefore, the empowerment of the conduct of Secret Mantra must be obtained.

The root tantra of all Dzogchen teachings, the Sgra thal gyur, states:

Serve the guru as equal to a buddha by pleasing him/her with activities of body and speech.

And:

The Dharma is in accord with the transmission of the Guru.

Finally, since you like the Kun byed rgyal po, then heed what it says:

Without an authentic master, like the scripture of a monkey, the basis and path will be erroneous, indeed one will be seized by conceptuality. Therefore, like applying ferrous sulfate to gold, the precious master should be paid with a gem of inestimable value.

This is also part of the lung called rtsal chen sprug pa, one of the five lungs brought to Tibet by Vairocana.

The Great Garuda, another one of the five lungs and also part of the Kun byed rgyal po states:

The virtuous mentor is like a precious jewel which produces everything.

Unsupported, not depending on places of transformation, he fulfills hope through his excellent inner nature.

When examined, nothing; but he has the great excellence of producing a variety for others.

Finally, you should heed Mañjuśrīmitra [Garab Dorje's main disciple], who states in yet another of the five lungs brought by Vairocana, the Meditation of Awakened Mind:

Subtle and difficult to understand, this path of the great seer is beyond nonconceptuality and conceptuality, difficult to analyze and difficult to explain, free from conventional expressions, inaccessible through words, while it is not shared with the domain of others and all of the immature, this meaning can here be seen through those definitive scriptures of the Teacher and the experiential intimate instructions of the gurus.

So, given these definitive statements in original texts of the Dzogchen tradition, you can see why no one agrees with your baseless and harmful assertions. However, you are free to following the three words of Jim Valby:

Introduce yourself to some delusion.

Spread it as widely as possible.

Continue in that state forever.

Because that is all you are doing, sad to say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I know this text like the back of my own hand, probably better than anyone here. If you say that I do not understand it, you might as well say that there is no sky.

Malcolm wrote:

Incidentally, you only know Reynolds' translation. That can hardly be called "knowing the text like the back of my own hand..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

You are not familiar with the text, then, because John Reynolds said that it is possible to be liberated by understanding the text itself.

Malcolm wrote:

Not without having received direction introduction in a proper way from a real master. I would say that you are not familiar with this cycle in general. Many of us here actually have the transmission for this cycle. In order to practice these teachings, you must have received the Karling Shitro Empowerment.

steve_bakr said:

...probably better than anyone here.

Malcolm wrote:

Probably not.

steve_bakr said:

If you say that I do not understand it, you might as well say that there is no sky.

Malcolm wrote:

You certainly think you understand it...but sadly you don't.

The main practice of the cycle, connected with the text you are so fond of, is the Supplication of the Guru Yoga of the Three Kāyas, Self-Liberation without Abandoning the Three Poisons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

There is no enlightenment. There is no nonenlightenment. It is like "chopping wood and carrying water," except there is no wood and no water.

Malcolm wrote:

This point of view is explicitly rejected in the Dzogchen tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Clearing Practice Space

Content:

Karma_Yeshe said:

Of course we should stick to tradition and don't become secular buddhist or something strange like that. But especially when using tantric methods, it is very important for them to be connected with the place you are practising. Otherwise they just don't really work that much! Himalayan plants are no more special or more connected with spirits than any other special plants from other areas of the world. So everybody that stated that "you should stick to tradition", please ask yourself, what the real essence of the tradition is.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, when using these things, you should be very aware of the environmental impact you are having. For example, in Tibetan Medicine, it is held that one should use medicines from one's region, as these will be the most potent for you. Also, the trees from which gugul, sandalwood oil, myrrh, frankincense, aloes [agar] and so on are extracted endangered.

In Mexico, there are over 5,000 plant species useful for medicine, and very little of it has been documented in one place, much less made accessible for non-Indians to understand and use.

As far as Himalayan plants go, however, they have a special potency because of the altitude at which they grow. Alpine instances of a plant are held to be stronger than an instance grown at a lower altitude. Why? Because the distance between flower and root is shorter, and therefore the plant as a whole is held to be more potent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 10:10 AM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

steve_bakr said:

As the text says, there are no antecedent or subsequent requirements.

Malcolm wrote:

Only someone ignorant about the cycle the text comes from would make this erroneous claim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 10:08 AM

Title: Re: Why Hillary won the debate

Content:

Serenity509 said:

If it were anyone else, people would look at her experience alone and see she's qualified to be president. I've already listed her achievements in this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

Hillary does not have any special qualifications that make her more suitable to be President than Sanders. The issue is that she is owned by the banks...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 4:45 AM

Title: Re: Why Hillary won the debate

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Deleted by CNN this morning...:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 15th, 2015 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Why Hillary won the debate

Content:

Serenity509 said:

The real reason Hillary won the debate is that no one was on her level:

http://www.salon.com/2015/10/14/the_real_reason_hillary_clinton_won_the_debate_no_one_else_was_at_her_level/

Bernie Sanders supporters who think he won the debate just because he said what they wanted to hear need to quiet themselves.

Malcolm wrote:
She didn't win the debate.

She was completely unable to distance herself from big money. She refused to say that the big banks should be busted up [they should].

She could not effectively respond to the charge that she changes her opinions based on political expediency.

Her reply to Sanders that US was not Denmark was not an reply, it was lame.

She also does not support free college tuition [boo].

The only place where she gained traction with Sanders was on gun control.

But I happen to agree with Bernie on this point. He voted against the Brady Bill because IT DID NOT SUPPORT INSTANT BACKGROUND CHECKS. It is also true that VT is a rural state with the lowest rates of gun violence in the US, etc. This is why Sanders has the position on guns that he does. People in VT hunt for food. It is a poor state. Gun policies that are good for cities are not necessarily appropriate for rural areas.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 11:59 PM
Title: Re: Is Zen Mindfulness?
Content:
boda said:

You see mindfulness 2.0 practitioners as lacking something merely because of it's secularness. A mindfulness practitioner could do all sorts of loving kindness practices, met meditation, feed the hungry, etc etc. They are not limited to any tradition. But nevertheless you see them as lacking something only because they have the quality of being secular.

Malcolm wrote:
They are lacking something because they no connection with an lineage of awakening.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 11:04 PM
Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu
Content:
swooping said:
Is lojong a general term that refers to multiple systems of meditation?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes.

swooping said:

Ah, thank you. That makes sense then.

Are the 59 slogans that are popularly practiced in the dzogchen community?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Recording of phat!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Um, no, phat is special.

zenman said:

Because?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to find out from a teacher.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Recording of phat!

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There are many different ways of using this syllable.

Used incorrectly, one can cause oneself a lot of problems.

zenman said:

And any syllable. Sure. Willpower is not always beneficent.

Malcolm wrote:

Um, no, phat is special.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Recording of phat!

Content:

conebeckham said:

The Herukasattva mantra has a Phet at the end, that may be what you're hearing.

zenman said:

Sakya Trizin: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FvdEtII9fl4>

Recited like this phe-mantra does not have the cutting or exploding quality to it.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many different ways of using this syllable.

Used incorrectly, one can cause oneself a lot of problems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 1:46 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

swooping said:

Is lojong a general term that refers to multiple systems of meditation?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Clearing Practice Space

Content:

Dharmaswede said:

Since we are on the topic "supportive herbs" (and with the risk of straying off topic): If one would want to have a period of more intense practice, and fortify it with "supportive herbs" what would a boosting regimen look like? I am primarily thinking of medicine (in the widest sense of the word) but also diet.

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

First, you do a mild cleanse. Then you adhere to a pure diet [no meat, alcohol, stimulants and processed/junk foods] and use chulen, preferably tailored to your constitution and age. If you need Tibetan medicine, then you also take that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Clearing Practice Space

Content:

Ivo said:

Even the Vimala which is traded today and which should still be according to the specifications ChNN popularized - one brand still works, another one does not work at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Our Vimala is excellent, crafted in a small Tibetan-owned pharmacy in Amdo used by many physicians there.

<http://www.bhaisajya.guru/web-store/vimala-dza-ti-nyi-zhu>

heart said:

I can verify that it works as it should.

/magnus

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 12:42 AM

Title: Re: Clearing Practice Space

Content:

Ivo said:

Even the Vimala which is traded today and which should still be according to the specifications ChNN popularized - one brand still works, another one does not work at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Our Vimala is excellent, crafted in a small Tibetan-owned pharmacy in Amdo used by many physicians there.

<http://www.bhaisajya.guru/web-store/vimala-dza-ti-nyi-zhu>

Ivo said:

Thanks for the link, that's great to hear. Will be ordering from them for sure. The only one which works so far according to our experience is batches from Amdo sold by "Himalayanremedies". It may even be the same...

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 14th, 2015 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Clearing Practice Space

Content:

Ivo said:

Even the Vimala which is traded today and which should still be according to the specifications ChNN popularized - one brand still works, another one does not work at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Our Vimala is excellent, crafted in a small Tibetan-owned pharmacy in Amdo used by many physicians there.

<http://www.bhaisajya.guru/web-store/vimala-dza-ti-nyi-zhu>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 13th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Clearing Practice Space

Content:

Adamantine said:

he'd said musk is ok for Riwo sang cho- but be sure to avoid it for naga pujas or naga sang.

Malcolm wrote:

For general Sang, using an incense that has musk in it is ok. For Naga Sang it must be avoided.

For example, when holding a banquet for many people, we don't make it vegetarian because one or two guests are vegetarian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 13th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism as type of agnosticism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I think there is some medium by which ideas, memories, actions and so on, are carried, which is not known to science.

Malcolm wrote:

It's called "a mindstream."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 13th, 2015 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: Sutra: Lung needed or not

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Here's a question, can a deaf person receive a lung?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see how.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 11th, 2015 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: Sutra: Lung needed or not

Content:

pemachophel said:

Loppon-la,

Can you tell us what the difference is between a mantra and a dharani? In at least one entry from the gZungs 'Dus, the title says it's a dharani, but then in the body of the sutra, it says to recite this "mantra" X number of times. Is there an actual traditional definition of a dharani?

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

A dhāraṇī, properly speaking, is a formula for recalling the Dharma and developing wisdom and removing nonvirtues which can cause problems.

Generally, we find a description of three mantras: guhyamantras, vidyāmantras and dhāraṇī-mantras. A text called the Abhisamayavibhaṅga by Atisha states:

Because of protecting against mundane thoughts with reality, there are so-called secret mantras. As such, because of giving rise to special knowledge when invoked again and again, there are vidyāmantras. In order generate unfailing recollection of bodhicitta, there are dhāraṇī-mantras.

Further, an interesting text called the sGra sbyor bam po gnyis pa gives the following definitions:

A so-called mantra is mantreguṇa bhāṣaṇe, i.e. because it is a description of the deities of mantra being summoned and secret, it is called "secret mantra." So-called "vidyā" is vidajñāna: it is name of abiding as the form of a deity in order counteract ignorance. So called "dhāraṇī" is artha grantha dhārayati dhāraṇī: a name for not forgetting the meaning and the words of Mantra Dharma and obtaining a specific stage, thus, "dhāraṇīmantra."

Further, we can make four more distinctions: dhāraṇīs that become the cause of a bodhisattva obtaining patience, Secret Mantra dhāraṇīs, dhāraṇī of Dharma and dhāraṇī of meaning. This distinction is found in the commentary on the Prajñāpāramitā by Daṇṣṭrasena.

The first kind is a result of attaining patience for emptiness because of meditating with wisdom and mindfulness.

The second is a dhāraṇī mantra that possesses the power of blessings is a dhāraṇī of Secret Mantra because of an aspiration that was made to remove negativities for sentient beings.

Third, the dhāraṇī of Dharma is when bodhisattvas on the stages listen to buddhas and bodhisattvas no matter how many words of Dharma there are held and recalled with wisdom as they were explained, and this ability to not forget them for a long time is called dhāraṇī of Dharma.

Finally, the dhāraṇī of meaning simply remembering the Dharma terms of the paths, perfections, and so on.

So, my understanding is that dhāraṇīs that come from sutra do not require transmission. Dhāraṇīs that come from tantra, may, depending on the level of tantra. It seems that many dhāraṇīs that seem to require transmission in the Tibetan tradition do not require transmission in East Asian traditions.

More research should be done because there are so many dhāraṇīs that do not have explicit rites of transmissions connected with them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

haha said:

Another presentation for five Kayas: jagrat, swapna, sushupta, turiya and turiyatit.

=

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is Vedanta, it does not apply.

haha said:

No, it is according to Buddhadharma. Source for this presentation is "AryaManjushrinamasangiti by Bikshu Ravishreejyana with amritakanika namasamgititippani"

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, I stand corrected, but the presentation here is an explanation of the five kāyas through the four joys. And as such, it is very specific presentation and the usage of these Vedantic terms only occur in one Tantra, the Ḍākārṇava-mahāyoginī-tantra, which has a commentary by Padmavajra.

The text of the Tippani is interesting, but again, it is a very unusual usage and is not widespread at all, which is why I never encountered this before.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Can the Buddha become angry?

Content:

jundo cohen said:

Hello,

The following is just one possibility, an interpretation, by one practitioner.

I feel that if you could travel back in time to meet the person who was the historical Buddha, before all the legends and hagiographical writings which (perhaps as a possibility) imposed a potentially idealized image on who he was, you would meet a man, a human being. He may have been a very special man, with great gifts, but just a man. If so, there is a good chance that he exhibited more ordinary human emotions than we give him credit for, and might have had some buttons that could be pushed at a certain point like most people.

On the other "one hand clapping" hand, if one is speaking of the "Big B" Buddha which represents emptiness, all reality and then some ... there is no separate you me or the other guy, nothing lacking ... thus no anger is possible.

The historical man who was buddha and ol' "Big B" are not two.

Just one opinion to toss into the stew, and not intended as the final word on Buddhism.

Gassho, Jundo

Malcolm wrote:

Sunakṣātra [Sunakkhatta] is the prime example of the Buddha's "doubting Thomas": "And he will never infer of me according to Dhamma: 'That Blessed One encompasses with his own mind the minds of other beings, other persons. He understands a mind affected by lust as affected by lust and a mind unaffected by lust as unaffected by lust; he understands a mind affected by hate as affected by hate and a mind unaffected by hate as unaffected by hate; he understands a mind affected by delusion as affected by delusion and a mind unaffected by delusion as unaffected by delusion; he understands a contracted mind as contracted and a distracted mind as distracted; he understands an exalted mind as exalted and an unexalted mind as unexalted; he understands a surpassed mind as surpassed and an unsurpassed mind as unsurpassed; he understands a concentrated mind as concentrated and an unconcentrated mind as unconcentrated; he understands a liberated mind as liberated and an unliberated mind as unliberated.'

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.012.ntbb.html>

So, the Buddha was not an ordinary human being, subject to suffering and affliction...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

haha said:

Another presentation for five Kayas: jagrat, swapna, sushupta, turiya and turiyatit.

=

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is Vedanta, it does not apply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

smcj said:

Five kayas? I know of the three or four kaya schema.

Malcolm wrote:

Five kāyas: dharmakāya, sambhogakāya, nirmanakāya, svabhavikakāya and the vajra or mahāsukha kāya.

smcj said:

Thanks. I'd not heard of the "vajra or mahasukha kaya".

Malcolm wrote:

Abhidhāna-uttaratantra

states:

The dharmakāya pervades everything,
the sambhogakāya enjoys Mahāyāna,
The nirmanakāya tames whoever is to be tamed,
The vajrakāya is totally indestructible, and the svabhāvikakāya is supreme...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

smcj said:

Five kayas? I know of the three or four kaya schema.

Malcolm wrote:

Five kāyas: dharmakāya, sambhogakāya, nirmanakāya, svabhavikakāya and the vajra or mahāsukha kāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Queequeg said:

Oh.

Malcolm wrote:

Any buddha, including Samantabhadra, automatically has all three or five kāyas. Samantabhadra is different from other buddhas however in that "he" woke up without having to follow a path, without any effort and without engaging in any virtue at all. Śākyamuni Buddha is a nirmanakāya of Samantabhadra. This means that Śākyamuni Buddha woke up without having to follow a path, without any effort and without engaging in any virtue at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Queequeg said:

He's talking about Bodhisattvas, but in Tientai thought, Buddha, Bodhisattva, etc. on down to hell dweller, are all functions of Buddha, so he's really talking about Buddha.

DGA said:

Hold on--actually we do agree here. "functions of Buddha" = nirmanakaya. Which means that if you're seeking Buddha, it makes sense to look at one's own function, so to speak, and that's meditation. That takes us back to here...

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=20915&start=20#p304865>

Queequeg's objection to Malcolm's claim that Buddhahood is to be found in one's own mind. I've been trying to argue, if somewhat clumsily, that Zhiyi for one wouldn't disagree with this claim Malcolm made.

Queequeg said:

Yes, I took issue with primordial Buddha being limited to Dharmakaya. Not the rest.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said it was limited...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Queequeg said:

I don't know how you are informed on Tientai thought, but you're mistaken.

Malcolm wrote:

DGA belongs to a Tendai organization, and it is a Tendai Ordinand.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is absolutely no precedence in the sūtras for the idea that you can learn Buddhadharma by reading books.

Astus said:

Several Mahayana sutras contain their own "advertisement", saying things like knowing just a single stanza gives immeasurable merit and bring about enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

Mañjuśrīmitra writes in his Meditation of Awakened Mind:

In the final five hundred years when people are oppressed by the age, the completely untrained practice the stainless discourses that are difficult to understand according to the words, not properly.

The various views they enter according to the power of their own intelligence and so on, carry them away in a river of ignorance, separating them from the yoga that is the amrita of the quintessence of the teachings.

We have a fundamentally different view of things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

smcj said:

Both Malcolm and Queequeg have posted things to the effect that there is an eternal or permanent Nirmanakaya, which to me means the physical appearance of a Buddha.

For that kind of statement to be true you've got to do a lot of fancy footwork redefining either "eternal" or "Nirmanakaya" imo.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I didn't. Queequeg did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 1:45 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:
DGA said:
yes, that's so about the inseparability of Dharmakaya from the form bodies.

Is there more than one Nirmanakaya?

Malcolm wrote:
There are several kinds of nirmanakāya: supreme, variegated, manufactured, and so on.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, October 10th, 2015 at 12:39 AM
Title: Re: Sutra: Lung needed or not
Content:
naljor said:
But ChNN said that function of mantra is in transmission of sound.....

Malcolm wrote:
A dharani is not a mantra.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 11:43 PM
Title: Re: Sutra: Lung needed or not
Content:
pemachophel said:
Loppon-la,

I appreciate your response. However, can you give a citation that backs up that nothing in sutra requires oral transmission? I would very much like to have such a citation if there is one.

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:
ChNN mentions this all the time.

There is no principle of transmission in sūtra apart from transmitting vows.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 10:21 PM
Title: Re: Sutra: Lung needed or not Content:
pemachophel said:
It is common today to hear/read that sutras need no lung/oral transmission. A) Is this true? B) Is there an authoritative citation supporting this?

How 'bout the dharani (taken from sutras) that appear in the gZungs 'Dus (Compendium of Dharanis)?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing in sūtra requires lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

heart said:

If you could get teachings on it, that would be best. Masters use teaching on texts like this to give the actual direct introduction.

/magnus

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I was going to add that today, texts like this, Flight of the Garuda and so on are really teachers manuals, and in general, would be given to the student after he or she had received the lung and khrid.

While I think at this point restricting texts is absurd, getting transmission for texts is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Tibetan text is extremely clear on this point. I don't much care what the Chinese translations or Suzuki's incredibly inaccurate paraphrase state.

Astus said:

The discourses in the sutra are supposedly spoken explanations. Since Mahamati and the Buddha are talking to each other, it is out of place to say that "apart from spoken explanations". Making an exception of verbal communication is problematic whether the sutra is meant as a spoken discourse or as a written text. If it is a spoken discourse, the whole sutra is an exception, like any other sutra. If it is a written text, it negates everything found there, including the stated exception. So, unlike other versions of the Lankavatara, the Tibetan seems to be in error.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, what they are discussing, as is very clear from the Tibetan, is the deficiency of text [letters, yi ge, akṣara] in conveying meaning. The term being translated as "word" in the text is śabda, sound. The text says the fault is that sounds/words can fall down into letters. It then contrasts letters with spoken explanations, and then points out that even spoken explanations are deluded, because they are made in accordance with the inclination of deluded sentient beings. So no, while the Tibetan translating is not inaccurate, the Chinese translations do not manage to convey the real nuances of the passage, sorry to say.

In the first passage you cited, the Buddha is saying that sounds [śabda] and meanings are not different, because sounds can lead to understanding. He never says that reading or text can. This is because Buddhadharma is and always will be a oral tradition based on verbal explanations that are heard by students.

Astus said:

Then of course there many, many statements like the following from the Ārya-niṣṭhāgantabhagavajjñānavaipūlya-sūtraratnānanta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra: Maudgalyayāna, the awakening of a bodhisattva is connected with the virtuous mentor

Malcolm wrote:

There are several statements on the importance of good friends already in the early discourses (e.g. "the whole of the holy life" in the <http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn45/sn45.002.than.html>). However, it does not address the difference between written and oral communication. That sutta itself explains that the importance of a good friend is visible in the fact that the Buddha himself taught the noble eightfold path, based on which beings can attain liberation. In another discourse (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an08/an08.054.than.html>) the Buddha teaches that lay people should learn virtue, generosity and discernment by associating with good lay friends. But that doesn't mean they could not learn the same qualities by listening to the Buddha and his monastic disciples, since there are quite a few cases where people gain faith and insight from a single teaching. Good friends are also said (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an09/an09.001.than.html>) to be a prerequisite for developing the wings to self-awakening, because through them one learns the Dharma. The reason for it being a prerequisite is because one has to learn of the teachings. It does not say that the source is limited to face to face communication using voice.[/quote]

Your objection has nothing to do with the passage at hand. There are so many other passages just like it, it would take days to collect and translate them all. There is absolutely no precedence in the sūtras for the idea that you can learn Buddhadharma by reading books.

Astus said:

By the way, what is that sutra you quote from? Any English translation? Any other title (Sanskrit/English/Chinese)?

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, I generally translate my citations myself directly out of the canon. As far as I know, there is no other translation of this passage. But the Tibetan of this one is extremely simple and straight forward.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra (Split)

Content:

Queequeg said:

This is one instance where Zhanran was discussing the pervasive quality of Buddha-nature, but nonetheless, he's discussing here the Tientai view that the Dharmakaya is indisitinguishable from the Sambhogakaya and Nirmanakaya - ie. the primordial Buddha has Dharmakaya, Sambhogakaya and Nirmanakaya, all three without beginning or end.

.

Malcolm wrote:

No one ever said the three kāyas were separable.

In Dzogchen it is held that from the point of view of the basis, the three kāyas are the dharmakāya; from the point of view of the path, the three kāyas are the sambhogakāya; from the point of view of result, the three kāyas are the nirmanakāya. The three kāyas are always inseparable.

The reason there is a "difference" between them has to do the fact that ordinary sentient beings and bodhisattvas on the lower stages can see only the nirmanakāya; higher bodhisattvas can see the sambhogakāya; only buddhas can see the dharmakāya.

In other words, Samantabhadra, the dharmakāya, always has a sambhogakāya and a nirmanakāya Why? For as long as there are deluded sentient beings, the buddhas appear to teach them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Caodemarte said:

This Zen discussion was inspired by the questions raised on this thread as to whether or not one had to hear actual spoken words in Buddhism or whether or not Buddhist teaching was absolutely dependent on sound waves reaching the ear. Zen Buddhism, at least, does not uniquely privilege the ear.

Malcolm wrote:

The Zen turn in this discussion is entirely ancillary. The main point was the meaning of hearing [śruta] and whether or not one could consider reading part of śruta. Even in the origin story of the Zen tradition, the legend of the Buddha holding a flower, the context is an in-person teaching with the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Matt J said:

I agree with Malcolm on the incompleteness of the texts. I've studied with teachers from every vehicle, and the "how to" is never clearly spelled out in the texts I've seen. The Pali suttas are pretty detailed with meditation, but even these aren't really like how meditation is taught by teachers. Especially with Zen, there's no way to know by yourself if you "get" a koan. The best you can do is piece together something like zazen in non-Sutric commentaries, and even then I would bet most people get it wrong. Heck, I got it wrong even under the supervision of a teacher, and I doubt I'm unusual in this aspect. And Dogen, the big promoter of non-koan zazen, says you need to have a teacher. In fact, out of the whole history of zen, you have maybe one or two Chinul like characters out of probably hundreds of thousands of dedicated students. This is like planning your retirement around winning the lottery. Sure, it could happen, but the chances are so low to be negligible.

Anyone who has meditated in a group knows there is a far different energy at play than when meditating alone. So to say there's nothing transmitted, out of fear for sounding New Age, I think is nonsense. There's an energy at work there, just like there's an energy at work when you play board games live instead of over the internet, or have a face to face conversation over texting.

Then there is a logical problem. Buddhism generally tells us we have a knowledge problem, we start off in ignorance. To think that an ignorant person can guide themselves out of ignorance seems specious at best.

Malcolm wrote:

But Astus is a new breed of internet do it yourself intellectual, despite the fact that he actually went to some kind of Buddhist school and learned everything he knows about Dharma from someone else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 1:52 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I am claiming is that oral communication and teaching is different than reading. For example, our conversation here is dry and logical [at least my side of the conversation is]. If we were talking, or I was listening to you teach Dharma, there is a qualitatively different sort of communication happening.

Astus said:

That is meta-communication, all those other things that go on during a face-to-face conversation. It is not a matter of words being pronounced or written. Then there are two options to maintain that orality is the only way of communicating the Dharma: either that words combined with other signifiers/expressions transmit the whole, or that words are irrelevant and only the other expressions convey the meaning. It also raises the question if anything can be communicated at all through the written form.

One of the advantages of texts is exactly their "dry and logical" nature (although I wouldn't dismiss the literary arts as capable of more than that). Unlike spontaneous verbal communication, writing generally requires some focus and organising of thoughts, except perhaps instant messaging.

The Buddha also addresses this issue later on in the text, beginning on folio 212/a of the Lhasa edition:

That being the case, therefore Mahāmati, apart from spoken explanations, the Buddha and the other bodhisattvas have taught "The Tathāgatas have never explained and will never explain even a single letter." Why? For this reason, because in all Dharmas there are no letters, in absence of the meaning [the Dharma] cannot be explained. There is an explanation through taking hold of concepts. Mahāmati, if Dharma is not explained, the doctrine will perish. If the doctrine perishes, there will be no buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śravakas.

"For this reason, Mahamati, it is declared in the canonical text by myself and other Buddhas and Bodhisattvas that not a letter is uttered or answered by the Tathagatas. For what reason? Because truths are not dependent on letters. It is not that they never declare what is in conformity with meaning; when they declare anything, it is according to the discrimination [of all beings]. If, Mahamati, the truth is not declared¹ [in words] the scriptures containing all truths will disappear, and when the scriptures disappear there will be no Buddhas, Sravakas, Pratyekabuddhas, and Bodhisattvas; and when there is no one [to teach], what is to be taught and to whom?"

(Lankavatara Sutra, 3.76)

There is no mention of an exception for "spoken explanations" in Suzuki's translation. In T670 it says "我等諸佛及諸菩薩，不說一字、不答一字。" (We, all buddhas, and all bodhisattvas, don't say a word, don't respond a word.), in T671 it says "是故我經中說，諸佛如來乃至不說一字不示一名" (It is because I say in the scriptures, all buddha-tathagatas don't go as far as saying a single word or giving a single name.), , and in T672 it says "我經中說，我與諸佛及諸菩薩，不說一字不答一字。" (I say in the scriptures, I, and all buddhas, and all bodhisattvas, don't say a word, don't respond a word). So, neither of the three Chinese Lankavatara translations speak of such an exception.

.

Malcolm wrote:

The Tibetan text is extremely clear on this point. I don't much care what the Chinese translations or Suzuki's incredibly inaccurate paraphrase state.

Then of course there many, many statements like the following from the Ārya-niṣṭhāgantabhagavajjñānavaipūlya-sūtraratnānanta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra: Maudgalyayāna, the awakening of a bodhisattva is connected with the virtuous mentor

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 9th, 2015 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Malcolm, so how do you explain how ChNN says we can read and study sutrayana without any special transmission? I'll note he says this TO HIS STUDENTS, not necessarily any random person.

Is it based on understanding Dzogchen, which is the essence of all Buddhadharma and thus being able to understand the meaning of sutra in that light?

Malcolm wrote:

You do not need a special transmission to study sūtras, but without a teacher to guide you in the meaning it is likely you won't understand any of it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtras and tantras are not written documents. The written documents that record them are merely a shadow of verbal discourse that took place at some time. The meaning of those documents is not contained within the documents.

Astus said:

Either you say that the texts are incomplete

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they are incomplete.

Astus said:

- in which case you'd need to be in possession of some original audio record - or you claim that words as voice are significantly different from words as letters -

Malcolm wrote:

What I am claiming is that oral communication and teaching is different than reading. For example, our conversation here is dry and logical [at least my side of the conversation is]. If we were talking, or I was listening to you teach Dharma, there is a qualitatively different sort of communication happening. For example, no one is going to faint when they read the Prajñāpāramitā sūtra, but when those monks heard to the PP sūtra so long ago, some of them were really shocked.

Astus said:

"If, Mahamati, meaning is different from words, it will not be made manifest by means of words; but meaning is entered into by words as things [are revealed] by a lamp. It is, Mahamati, like a man carrying a lamp to look after his property. [By means of this light] he can say: This is my property and so is kept in this place. Just so, Mahamati, by means of the lamp of words and speech originating from discrimination, the Bodhisattva-Mahasattvas can enter into the exalted state of self-realisation which is free from speech-discrimination."

(http://lirs.ru/do/lanka_eng/lanka-nondiacritical.htm, 3.65)

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha also addresses this issue later on in the text, beginning on folio 212/a of the Lhasa edition:

Mahāmāti, those foolish men say the following, "The meaning is exactly the words. The meaning is not other than the words. Why? For this reason: since there is no substance in the meaning, the meaning is not other than the words. The word itself is the meaning."

Mahāmāti, since the nature of words are not understood, those with uneducated mind cannot understand that how words arise and perish and the meaning does not arise and does not perish.

Mahāmāti, words fall into letters. The meaning does not fall into letters, not arising and lacking substance because of being free from entities and nonentities.

Mahāmāti, because letters are not perceived to either exist or not exist, the Tathāgātas do not teach a Dharma that falls into letters.

Mahāmāti, because there are no letters in the Dharma, whoever explains a Dharma that falls into letters, he is twisted up. That being the case, therefore Mahāmāti, apart from spoken explanations, the Buddha and the other bodhisattvas have taught "The Tathāgatas have never explained and will never explain even a single letter." Why? For this reason, because in all Dharmas there are no letters, in absence of the meaning [the Dharma] cannot be explained. There is an explanation through taking hold of concepts.

Mahāmāti, if Dharma is not explained, the doctrine will perish. If the doctrine perishes, there will be no buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śravakas. If they do not exist, for whom will there be an explanation?

That being the case, therefore Mahāmati, bodhisattva mahāsattvas must not be attached the words of the spoken explanations.

Mahāmati, since the spoken explanations exist in accordance with the inclinations of sentient beings, they are erroneous. I and all other tathāgata, arhat, samyaksambuddhas teach the Dharma to interested sentient beings in order to reverse their minds, intellects and consciousnesses. All phenomena are nonexistent appearances. Because they are understood as appearances of one's mind, the realization of one's own sublime wisdom can never be reversed by many kinds of false concepts.

Mahāmati, bodhisattvas mahāsattvas must rely on the meaning, they must not rely on letters.

Mahāmati, the sons and daughters of good families who rely on letters will be deprived of the meaning, and further, will not understand it. They will not being learned in the characteristics of all the Dharmas and the stages, and they will have as their associates evil intellectuals who do not understand the sentences and the certain words will fall into evil views.

Astus said:

We can certainly come to understand the meaning of the Dharma by studying with a teacher. We can never come to understand the meaning of the Dharma merely by reading books.

Does a teacher gives any Dharma not contained in the sutras? If yes, then his teaching fails to follow the Dharma of the buddhas. If no, then sutras are both valid and beneficial sources of the Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

My reply to this is to refer you to the above where the Buddha declares all sūtras are erroneous, because they are taught in accordance with the inclinations of sentient beings.

Astus said:

"all of the buddhas and all of their teachings of peerless perfect enlightenment spring forth from this sūtra"

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 8)

Malcolm wrote:

The above explanation by the Buddha establishes that a "sūtra" is not something which is in the letters of a text, nor in the words. It is in the meaning as spoken verbally.

Astus said:

For example, the name of a teaching like Kalacakra, does not mean that the real Kalacakra can be found in the book called Kalacakra. Just as the real Prajñāpāramitā cannot be found in all the books that bear that name. The meaning of Kalackara and Prajñāpāramitā can only be learned from a teacher, never from the books themselves. Prajnaparamita is not obtained from anyone or anything. How could a person today instruct in that better than the Buddha?

"Wherever this sutra is taught, read, recited, copied, or wherever it is to be found, one should build a seven-jeweled stupa of great height and width and richly ornamented. There is no need to put a relic inside. Why is this? Because the Tathāgata is already in it. ... the highest, complete enlightenment of all the bodhisattvas is within this sutra. This sutra opens the gate of skillful means and reveals the marks of the truth."
(Lotus Sutra, ch 10, p 161, 162, BDK Edition)

Malcolm wrote:

These days, the Buddha can't instruct anyone. But teachers can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness

Content:

Hansei said:

Hello,

I've been a student of ChNRR for over a year. Does anybody know if I need to receive a particular transmission to read this book?

https://www.amazon.com/Self-Liberation-Through-Seeing-Naked-Awareness/dp/1559393521/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1444297462&sr=8-1&keywords=Self-Liberation+Through+Seeing+With+Naked+Awareness

Best wishes.

Malcolm wrote:

It is good if you have the lung, but no, you do not absolutely need it to read it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Bon influence on buddhism and viceversa.

Content:

Adamantine said:

In principle offering "fragrant smoke" is the same, if in indian incense form or or in a larger capacity as with juniper branches on a fire..

With Riwo Sang Cho mother mixes you also have ingredients like the 3 sweets and three whites, which you also have in tormas, which are based on traditional Indian vegetarian desirable foods

so that's certainly not coming from Bon, but from India..,

Also seems to be a tangible relation between elaborate sang offerings like Riwo Sang Cho with many precious substances in the ingredients and the homa offerings of vedic tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

One characteristic of rituals of Bon origin is that at the beginning of the rite there is a narrative of its origin. Look at ChNN's description of Sang on page 109 of Drung, Deu and Bon.

No one is denying Buddhist appropriation of some native Tibetan rites like Sang, but there is not even one single rite of Sang that was translated from Sanskrit to Tibetan. The Sang offering attributed to Padmasambhava was written in Tibet. Also this Sang offering shows evidence of having been converted from a Bonpo rite because like other Bonpo rites and Sang, it contains a narrative of its origin.

Offering of incense as a object of scent and Sang, which is used for purification, have totally different functions. In ancient Tibetan culture, nomads would have newcomers to their camp pass through Sang smoke to prevent contagious diseases. They mainly used juniper, but also many other aromatic plants as well. The principle of Sang and the principle of smudging in Native American cultures is very similar.

Riwo Sangchod, incidentally, it not a terma, it is a dag snang, a pure vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Bon influence on buddhism and viceversa.

Content:

Tongnyid Dorje said:

i was told by my lama, that tormas, bhalim in sans, indeed originated in indian vajrayana. in indian tantra you have also hom, fire offering, i will be not surprised, if they had also smoke offering... to burn the incense is already a smoke offering, no?

Malcolm wrote:

Not the elaborate sculpture tormas you see in Nyingma.

Sang, which universally uses juniper, is a uniquely Tibetan custom which comes from Nomadic culture.

The function of Sang and the function of incense are different.

Tongnyid Dorje said:

sure, not the elaborate ones. but what is left unelaborate in Tibet, as it was in India? just look at abhisheka, how it is done nowadays and how it was done originally by wandering yogis. but this doesnt mean it is a bon influence.

as for sang, may be you are right, im not expert.

Malcolm wrote:

Tormas in India were just flatbreads.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: Bon influence on buddhism and viceversa.

Content:

Tongnyid Dorje said:

i was told by my lama, that tormas, bhalim in sans, indeed originated in indian vajrayana. in indian tantra you have also hom, fire offering, i will be not surprised, if they had also smoke offering... to burn the incense is already a smoke offering, no?

Malcolm wrote:

Not the elaborate sculpture tormas you see in Nyingma.

Sang, which universally uses juniper, is a uniquely Tibetan custom which comes from Nomadic culture.

The function of Sang and the function of incense are different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Look, obviously being blind or deaf makes study and practice more difficult, but I don't accept that it makes them impossible. For Vajrayana, maybe, but otherwise no. I do think you need to have personal interaction, preferably a lot of it, with a good teacher to really get somewhere but that is possible for both the blind and the deaf.

Garudavista said:

No one said that it does make it impossible.

dzogchungpa said:

See: <https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=20915&p=304846#p304844> et seq.

OK, ta ta for now.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, no one said it was completely impossible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

With respect to having complete sense organs intact, if one does not, for example, it makes one unsuitable to be a Vajrayāna practitioner.

jorden said:

Could you explain that further? Do you mean that being deaf would be a practical obstacle for Vajrayana or that it would be impossible to practice Vajrayana?

Malcolm wrote:

It means your body mandala is not complete. For example, Hh Sakya Trizin discouraged one man from studying Lamdre because he was blind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 8th, 2015 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

You guys are being a bit dzogmatic, admit it.

Malcolm wrote:

No we are being xmlmatic, i.e. XML code that does not work is not XML.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Bon influence on buddhism and viceversa.

Content:

dzoki said:

I am not sure there is any such material, because to really know the influence of Bon on Buddhism and vice versa, one would need to thoroughly know both traditions, their source texts, their histories etc. Some say that rites such as Namkha, Lungta, Sur and Sang are of Bon origin (and they probably are).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they are, as well as the custom of making tormas.

dzoki said:

But I have seen at least one argument for Sang being Buddhist independent of Bon version (some sutra is supposed to speak of smoke offering).

Malcolm wrote:

There is one Sakya Lama, Zuchen, who makes some arguments to this effect. I think he is wrong.

dzoki said:

I heard Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche say that all of Bonpo style vajrayana (or whatever it is called in Bon tradition) is completely made up and copied from elements of Buddhist vajrayana and that the only original teaching of Bon having parallel in Buddhism is their short dzogchen tantra called Shang Shung Nyen Gyu.

Malcolm wrote:

Bonpo "Vajrayāna" is called "Secret Mantra."

ChNN does not say made up, he says "borrowed", and also he maintains in Drung De'u and Bon that the tantric cycles connected with Nangzher Lodpo such as Zhang Zhung Me ri [a tantric cycle], Zhang Zhung sNyan rgyud and Sems sde [Dzogchen cycles, the latter being A khrid] are not dependent on Buddhist sources, the latter have however been influenced by Dzogchen from Garab Dorje.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Words do not communicate, people communicate. ... The transmission of the Dharma does not lie in words themselves, it lies in the interaction between two people.

Astus said:

And what is the means of interaction between two people? Words.

Malcolm wrote:

I would hate to be your girlfriend.

Astus said:

Words cannot adapt with circumstances.

That's a matter of hermeneutics.

Malcolm wrote:

No, words are not sentient things.

Astus said:

Words cannot estimate your level of understanding.

If there are levels of understanding - as defined in scriptures - then even teachers can only use that for reference. If there are no clear definitions, then it is arbitrary and unreliable.

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtras and tantras are not written documents. The written documents that record them are merely a shadow of verbal discourse that took place at some time. The meaning of those documents is not contained within the documents.

We can certainly come to understand the meaning of the Dharma by studying with a teacher. We can never come to understand the meaning of the Dharma merely by reading books.

For example, the name of a teaching like Kalacakra, does not mean that the real Kalacakra can be found in the book called Kalacakra. Just as the real Prajñāpāramitā cannot be found in all the books that bear that name. The meaning of Kalackara and Prajñāpāramitā can only be learned from a teacher, never from the books themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jonghwi was also a Seon master.

Astus said:

Apparently Jinul was not satisfied with the teachings provided by him or others, so he did not continue their tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure he did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Unknown said:

Words cannot answer your questions.

How does a non-verbal question look like

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Chinul had a Seon master, Jonghwi of Sagulsan.

Astus said:

Jonghwi was his ordination master. Jinul gained realisation and developed his teachings on his own, particularly he introduced the huatou/hwadu method - propagated by Dahui Zonggao - to Korea without ever having visited China.

Malcolm wrote:

Jonghwi was also a Seon master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Of course Chinul was a great scholar, thinker, and monk (not the reader of Internet forums like us). The point is that literally hearing the words was not necessary in his case. The other activities (years of meditation, study, etc.) were what helped prepare him.

Astus said:

You could add Wonhyo, Chengguan, Dushun, Jizang, Huisi and probably every Buddhist teacher who did not belong to a specific lineage, but rather studied the Dharma, listened to various people, contemplated the teachings, came to a realisation, then started to teach publicly and write some treatises.

Malcolm wrote:

The order is "listened to various teachers, studied the Dharma...."

In our modern world, this is reversed — read some books on Dharma, did not understand them at all, found a teacher to explain them....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:11 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean exactly is that meaning of the Dharma is always learned from a teacher, not a text. A text cannot convey even its own meaning. In order to learn the meaning of a text, one must have a teacher. And also the Dharma does not depend on texts. One does not need books and texts to communicate its essentials.

Books do not communicate, only people do. Books may support that communication, but they are entirely incapable of replacing human transmission of the Dharma from mouth to ear.

Astus said:

Words can be communicated both through voice and letters. What is the difference between you telling me the above words over the phone or over this board? The meaning is something I have to derive from the words in both cases, so it is not communicated in either way.

Malcolm wrote:

Words do not communicate, people communicate. Words cannot adapt with circumstances. Words cannot estimate your level of understanding. Words cannot answer your questions.

The transmission of the Dharma does not lie in words themselves, it lies in the interaction between two people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Importance of a Dharma Teacher/Oral Transmission

Content:

Caodemarte said:

You do your best to learn from whatever material or through whatever means you can obtain. Chinul, a really heavy hitter in Korea, learned the meaning of China's Rinzai (Lin-ji or Imje) through written texts after his initial experiences (also inspired by written texts). So possible, but highly unlikely and rather silly to try if one has a choice of more practicable methods.

DGA said:

Chinul was a great master. He was trained and educated--which is to say, he heard the teachings and reflected on them before embarking on meditation--at Sagulsan, and later at a temple in Pyongyang. Only after this did the texts open up to him. It's not as though he woke up one day at age 30, went to Barnes & Noble, swept through the Zen section, read until kensho hit him a few times, and became the founder of the Chogye Order.

He was part of a living culture. He was not a consumer.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Chinul had a Seon master, Jonghwi of Sagulsan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Q: "So, the deaf cannot really learn the Dharma?"

A: "When we discuss what constitutes a precious human birth, having all sense faculties intact is one of the requirements."

This is unclear and confusing. Surely it is not meant that the deaf cannot learn the Dharma because they cannot hear the Dharma. Would the Dharma be then dependent on sound waves vibrating air which in turn vibrates the inner ear? Is it a requirement that one not be blind or deaf to be considered human?

Malcolm wrote:

You should acquaint yourself with the eight freedoms and ten favorable conditions that constitute a precious human birth, not just any old human birth.

With respect to having complete sense organs intact, if one does not, for example, it makes one unsuitable to be a Vajrayāna practitioner.

With respect to studying common Dharma, in ancient times blind people were less at a disadvantage than the deaf. These days the people with sensory deficits are at less of a disadvantage because of modern technology, but I wager there are very few blind people who participate on the forum.

To answer Dzogchungpa's question, the main criteria is organs of sight and hearing.

To answer Garuda Vista's question, in Dzogchen there are techniques for blind people.

But in general we have to understand that precious human birth has very precise criteria which indicates the ease with which one may meet and study Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

When we discuss what constitutes a precious human birth, having all sense faculties intact is one of the requirements.

Malcolm wrote:

So, the anosmic cannot really learn the Dharma?[/quote]

It means they have a deficiency.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Books do not communicate, only people do. Books may support that communication, but they are entirely incapable of replacing human transmission of the Dharma from mouth to ear.

dzogchungpa said:

So, the deaf cannot really learn the Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

When we discuss what constitutes a precious human birth, having all sense faculties intact is one of the requirements.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But the Dharma has always been communicated through the medium of the voice, not the medium of the page, and even Huineng's awakening story bears this out.

Astus said:

Not sure what exactly you mean here. People have been studying the Dharma through texts for ages. Also, teachers have been teaching from texts for ages. Many have composed treatises and other written materials in order to preserve what they want to communicate. Textual communication has also been used for a long time now to disseminate the teachings, communicate it to those one has never met. And the process of translation has not even been addressed.

Malcolm wrote:

The oral transmission for all the Sūtras in the Tibetan Canon still exists and is given at regular intervals.

Astus said:

Do you mean the practice that someone reads out loud what is written?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, since the sūtras are all based on a oral transmission that begins with the Buddha. In the case of the Tibetan Canon, this transmission exists in an unbroken form. Translation does not present any problem either, apart from today, when people translate many texts for which they do not possess the lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra (Split)

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But the Dharma has always been communicated through the medium of the voice, not the medium of the page, and even Huineng's awakening story bears this out.

Astus said:

Not sure what exactly you mean here. People have been studying the Dharma through texts for ages. Also, teachers have been teaching from texts for ages. Many have composed treatises and other written materials in order to preserve what they want to communicate. Textual communication has also been used for a long time now to disseminate the teachings, communicate it to those one has never met. And the process of translation has not even been addressed.

Malcolm wrote:

What I mean exactly is that meaning of the Dharma is always learned from a teacher, not a text. A text cannot convey even its own meaning. In order to learn the meaning of a text, one must have a teacher. And also the Dharma does not depend on texts. One does not need books and texts to communicate its essentials.

Books do not communicate, only people do. Books may support that communication, but they are entirely incapable of replacing human transmission of the Dharma from mouth to ear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I recommend it highly to anyone who has not received Pointing Out Instructions

Adamantine said:

sigh

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, some people are intractable in their erroneous thinking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, October 7th, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus said:

What is missing is the oral transmission of those sutras, not to mention the rest of the canon.

Malcolm wrote:

This is completely false. The oral transmission for all the Sūtras in the Tibetan Canon still exists and is given at regular intervals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hearing, Astus, not reading...

Astus said:

Where is the difference?

"Since they maintain they have no need of written words, they should not speak either, because written words are merely the marks of spoken language. They also maintain that the direct way cannot be established by written words, and yet these two words, 'not established' are themselves written."

(<http://www.cttbusa.org/6patriarch/6patriarch20.asp>, ch 10, tr BTTS)

Malcolm wrote:

This objection does not apply:

1. I am not suggesting we throw away all books or that they are not useful.
2. I am not suggesting you cannot write out words that have been spoken.

But the Dharma has always been communicated through the medium of the voice, not the medium of the page, and even Huineng's awakening story bears this out.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are like a person who mistakes the leaves for the trunk, in this respect.

Buddhadharma has always been, and will always be, a tradition in which the meaning of the Dharma is communicated orally.

Astus said:

There are several cases where a tradition was revived/reformed/established based on scriptural materials. Recent cases include most of modern Theravada, the Soto Zen reform of Menzan Zuiho in Japan and the reforms of Taixu, Yinshun and others in China/Taiwan.

Malcolm wrote:

Hearing, Astus, not reading...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

DGA said:

Astus, I think we just disagree on this issue. If I had to guess, it's because your experience differs from mine. And that's fine.

Malcolm wrote:

Astus has failed to notice that the three wisdoms are hearing, reflection and meditation; not reading, reflection and meditation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

DGA said:

importance of learning the Dharma from a capable teacher.

Astus said:

Who counts as a capable teacher depends on whom one likes. Thus both the best and the worst can gather a large community where both call the other incompetent. How to tell which one is correct? That's when one has to start learning from the Buddha himself by reading his words. And if that's not enough, there are numerous traditionally approved masters, like Nagarjuna, Aryadeva, Asanga and Vasubandhu to consult with. And if even that's not enough, there are quite a few generally reliable works by modern teachers, like the Dalai Lama, Thrangu Rinpoche, Thich Nhat Hanh, Hsing Yun, Sheng Yen, etc.

DGA said:

Buddha Dharma is described as an oral tradition to the present, even with all these texts available.

Astus said:

By whom? There are teachers, true. But hardly any of them could recite even just a few major Mahayana sutras, not to mention the whole canon of the Buddha's words. Buddhism has been a scriptural tradition for over two millennia. It doesn't mean there are no explanations give orally, on the spot. But even the most important commentaries are textual.

DGA said:

What little understanding I have comes primarily from listening to teachers teach, and watching their example.

Astus said:

That can show how worthy teachers are important and beneficial. Or that you prefer to listen to people instead of reading. Or both. Or maybe neither.

Malcolm wrote:

You are like a person who mistakes the leaves for the trunk, in this respect.

Buddhadharma has always been, and will always be, a tradition in which the meaning of the Dharma is communicated orally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 10:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddha Shakyamuni Qualitatively Different?

Content:

DGA said:

I guess I'm trying to probe this question of whether one Buddha is ultimately different in quality or kind from any other. I've been taught, consistently, that the answer to this question is No at the level of Dharmakaya. Differences in manifestation (nirmanakaya) reflect the needs of samsaric beings, and hence are differences in samsaric situations, not in Buddhahood as such.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 9:59 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

DGA said:

I'm interested in this question of whether or how Buddha Shakyamuni's emergence in this world system is different in quality or kind from that of any other Buddha in any other world system. So I started a discussion on it here...

<http://dharma.wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=66&t=20904>

...in case anyone would like to chime in.

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't. There are a billion worlds in the Sahaloka, and there is a supreme nirmanakāya in every one of them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Queequeg said:

Are we really going to dispute which of Amida or Siddhartha Gautama has had a greater connection to the beings of this world now?

Malcolm wrote:

What does it matter? The dharmakāya of both is the same. There is only one teacher, i.e., the dharmakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, October 6th, 2015 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Queequeg said:

The identification of the Primordial Buddha with Shakyamuni is not, as Malcolm suggests, just delusion grounded in attachment to names and forms, but is a statement on the nature of reality, grounding it in present, historical reality.

Malcolm wrote:

Which "present, historical reality" is just a delusion grounded in attachment to names and concepts. This teleological obsession is rather saddening.

Queequeg said:

It is largely in response to other interpretations of the Buddha and the implied statements on the nature of reality. Malcolm made an assumption that Primordial Buddha in this context means Dharmakaya and then made a typically unproductive Malcolm statement.

Malcolm wrote:

There isn't any other kind of primordial buddha. There is also no buddhahood outside of the mind. Three kāyas are in everyone. There is no buddhahood outside of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Queequeg said:

It's all just attachment, of course unless it's the truth expounded by brother Malcolm.
But, oh, let's not talk about the emperor's clothes.

Malcolm wrote:

Is there anything to discuss?

Queequeg said:

Sure. But you'd have to leave your attachment to thinking you know what you are talking about in this context.

Malcolm wrote:

[Note: the image above is Kulayarāja, the All-creating King aka Samantabhadra, a pun on your quip]

There is nothing to discuss — the dharmakāya is beyond names, words and concepts [and images]. Ideas like "...according to Nichiren, the various Buddhas of the various schools are actually the Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra" are completely relative. The dharmakāya is no more "Śākyamuni" than it is "Vairocana" or "Samantabhadra", etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 11:32 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Queequeg said:

It's all just attachment, of course unless it's the truth expounded by brother Malcolm.
But, oh, let's not talk about the emperor's clothes.

Malcolm wrote:

Is there anything to discuss?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 11:12 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Adamantine said:

This may embarrass them and cause them to regret and stop their abusive behavior.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because this has worked so well...all of these teachers who have been embarrassed or called out, not one of them stopped teaching...

Garudavista said:

Although he is not a Buddhist teacher and is instead a neo-advaita teacher, Andrew Cohens' students' open criticisms about his abusive behavior did cause him to step down and stop him from teaching. It's been over two years now and he hasn't attempted to teach again yet. It's an interesting story. If you're not familiar with it, here are some links:

<http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2015/03/27/what-happens-when-your-guru-disappears.html>

<http://www.andrewcohen.org/>

Malcolm wrote:

I am quite familiar with the situation — think deposed dictator fleeing country with ill gotten gains...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Adamantine said:

Note he didn't say "stop them from teaching"

He said "stop their abusive behavior"

Malcolm wrote:

That has not happened either.

Adamantine said:

Seems like the letter in reply from Genpo Merzel at least indicated this was a possibility.

Malcolm wrote:

He is a two time loser on this score. He was ousted from his center in Maine, moved to Utah, and then got ousted again.

Adamantine said:

Another effect of exposure is so potential students (or existing students) can be aware of the problems and be cautious about getting involved or staying involved.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, because this worked so well with Sasaki Roshi, Leonard Cohen's recently deceased teacher. That guy was molesting female students for years and years, everyone knew it, no one said anything until a year or so before he died.

Adamantine said:

I'm aware of a number of students of controversial teachers who left once they realized that the teachers were deceitful based on public exposure of their actions.

Malcolm wrote:

They just get new students, etc., etc., etc., or, they manage to secure endorsements from high Lamas...

Its all bullshit, in the end, you just have to rely on your own good judgement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 5:20 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Astus said:

And what meaning is that here?

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmakāya....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Adamantine said:

This may embarrass them and cause them to regret and stop their abusive behavior.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because this has worked so well...all of these teachers who have been embarrassed or called out, not one of them stopped teaching...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It's all just a bunch of attachments to names and concepts...it is not very important.

Astus said:

What is?

Malcolm wrote:
The meaning.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 4:49 AM
Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age
Content:

anjali said:
Thank you for that clear explanation. I do have two follow-on questions.

If, for some reason, the student was not whole heartedly present, and wasn't able to experience something, is it possible to gain direct experience without receiving another pointing out instruction from the master again at a later date?

Specifically, I'm thinking of practice texts such as Pointing Out the Dharmakaya, Clarifying the Natural State, or The Ocean of Definitive Meaning. One reads those texts, not for conceptual understanding (although that may happen), but as tools for working with experience. In your opinion, is it possible to have a successful pointing out by working with those texts (with the blessing of the guru of course)?

Malcolm wrote:
The principle of these mahāmudra texts is completely different and much more gradual. If you read these books and work with them without a teacher, it is possible you can have a sutra-like experience of śamatha and vipaśyāna, you can even become a first stage bodhisattva, but that does not mean you will have discovered the rig pa that Dzogchen is talking about. Of course, if you work with a realized master it is possible you can have that experience.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 2:17 AM
Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History
Content:
Monlam Tharchin said:

The Three Ages and specifically living in the Age of the decline of the Dharma is a prominent teaching for the Jodo-shu and Shin schools, at least.

Malcolm wrote:
But it is quite a provisional teaching.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 2:08 AM
Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Serenity509 said:

The five periods doctrine is that each sutra was from a specific part of the Buddha's life, and that the Lotus Sutra and Nirvana sutra were his final teaching:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tiantai#Five_Periods

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand what you are saying, but that does not even make sense if you look at the Lotus Sutra itself which establishes there has never been any time nor will there be any time where the Buddha is not teaching the Lotus Sutra on Rajagriha. Kind of throws a kink in the five period theory no?

It never ceases to amaze me the schemes people come up with to limit the Buddha's teachings in time and space.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: The Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Not Amida for Nichiren.

Considered in this light, it is evident that Vairocana Buddha depicted in the Flower Garland Sutra as sitting on a lotus pedestal, the sixteen-foot Shakyamuni described in the Āgama sutras, and the provisional Buddhas of the Correct and Equal, Wisdom, Golden Light, Amida, and Mahāvairocana sutras are no more than reflections of the Buddha of the "Life Span" chapter. They are like fleeting images of the moon in the sky mirrored on the surface of the water held in vessels of varying sizes. The wise men and scholars of the various schools are first of all confused as to [the nature of the Buddhas of] their own school, and more fundamentally, they are ignorant of [the Buddha of] the "Life Span" chapter of the Lotus Sutra. As a result, they mistake the reflection of the moon on the water for the real moon shining in the sky.

<http://www.nichirenlibrary.org/en/wnd-1/Content/18>

Serenity509 said:

It appears that, according to Nichiren, the various Buddhas of the various schools are actually the Eternal Buddha of the Lotus Sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

It's all just a bunch of attachments to names and concepts...it is not very important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Wikipedia says Tendai, Tiantai, and Nichiren.

The Three Ages of Buddhism is also an important teaching in Pure Land, specifically living in the Dharma declining era.

From my understanding the Five Periods is a subdivision of this idea into five 500-year periods.

Malcolm wrote:

This is basically a Hinayāna idea. While it enjoys some Mahāyāna popularity, there are other sutras which push back against it, such as the Lotus Sutra and so on

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I'm not questioning ChNN's credentials or mastery, I'm just saying it's an interesting question of how anyone could know that someone else has experienced a moment of rigpa at a certain time, don't you agree? As far as proof is concerned, it's not a big deal for me personally, but Jikan brought it up so it got me thinking. Anyway, I have to run, ta ta for now.

Malcolm wrote:

If you understand the process, then it is quite easy for one to know.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no proof of such things. Dzogchen is beyond proof and negation.

But this is what my guru, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu has said many times.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, so you have faith in that, that's fine. Have you ever wondered how ChNN knows that?

Malcolm wrote:

I have no need to wonder. His uncle attained rainbow body, his root guru attained rainbow body. He was trained by masters who attained buddhahood. When you examine things, you will find that a large number of ChNN's immediate predecessors attained rainbow body.

As for the state of Dzogchen being the same generic thing for all people, by way of analogy, the state of Dzogchen is to sentient beings what heat is to fire and wetness is to water.

That's a nice thing to say, but hardly a proof of anything.

If you want proof, my friend, I suggest you discover this for yourself. But put in simple terms, all sentient beings have minds, and the essence of those minds is inseparable clarity and emptiness — there is no Dzogchen apart from that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Seeing into the Nature of the Mind has been accomplished by mystics throughout history. Rigpa has been experienced by mystics of other religions throughout history, most with teachers, and some on their own.

DGA said:

That's a big claim. Prove it.

dzogchungpa said:

Actually, saying that everyone who receives direct introduction experiences rigpa, if only for a moment, or even that there is such a thing as "rigpa", somehow known to be the same kind of thing for all dzogchenpas, is also quite a big claim IMO, and I would be very interested to see a proof of it as well. I understand that this is the Dzogchen forum, but it's an interesting question.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no proof of such things. Dzogchen is beyond proof and negation.

But this is what my guru, Chogyal Namkhai Norbu has said many times.

As for the state of Dzogchen being the same generic thing for all people, by way of analogy, the state of Dzogchen is to sentient beings what heat is to fire and wetness is to water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, October 5th, 2015 at 1:27 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I love Dzogchen deeply. It is the last religion, so to speak, that I have studied. By the time I encountered Dzogchen, I recognized its teachings from parallels in other mystical and religious traditions. What I have learned, Malcom, is that religion is universal.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is not religion, it is not a religion, it is not a tradition, it is not mysticism. The most we can say is that it is a kind of knowledge.

steve_bakr said:

Dzogchen is in a Great Transition. It is now becoming a global religion. There are Lamas who have authorized the publication of the most Profoundly Secret Texts. These texts contain in it Universal Truths which are not anyone's sole property.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen cannot be written down in words -- this is what you seem to fail to understand. Because Dzogchen can never be written down in words, it can never be discovered from reading a book.

steve_bakr said:

But your approach does not take into consideration the history of the mysticism in all religion, and the attainments of individual mystics. You cannot place conditions or limitations on another person's religious experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen is a living transmission, from one person to another, one by one. There is no other way it can be. This is not a limitation, this is heart of the teachings. Without transmission from another living breathing human being, there is no Dzogchen, in this case then "dzogchen" is a bunch of concepts written in words on paper.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 4th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

The question is whether Pointing Out Instructions can be effective if they are read from Terma, like "Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness," by Guru Padmasambhava. I would submit that, yes, they can.

Malcolm wrote:

And I would submit that you are wrong.

anjali said:

If one has received the pointing out instructions, but didn't "get it" at the time, is it possible in your opinion to later "get it" while reading a text?

Malcolm wrote:

If one has received direct introduction, it is possible that you may understand something more clearly with such a text, but since direct introduction works with experiences, there is no way one can substitute this conceptual understanding for working with the transmission by means of working with various experiences until one discovers the basis, aka primordial state, for oneself and has stabilizes that knowledge [rig pa].

The reason? Direct introduction works with experiences to show what the foundation that lies below experiences, thoughts and concepts, i.e. the mind essence. This is extremely subtle and cannot be discovered merely through reading books, no matter how holy or profound. The error, quite frankly, is mistaking the fact that we are aware with that awareness being the mind essence itself. The awareness that we experience moment to moment is quite coarse, and is dominated by our "energy," our rlung or vāyu. The mind essence is much more subtle than any awareness we can experience.

Direct introduction, received from a master who knows what it is he is introducing, is indispensable — it sets up the foundation for our later discovery of our own state even if at the time the experience was too subtle for us to register it clearly. Anytime anyone participates in a direct introduction with a realized master in a whole hearted openly collaborative way [rather than passively expecting something to happen], they will in fact experience that moment of knowledge [rig pa] the master intends to introduce. Even if they do not "grasp" it at the time, they will have that experience to carry with them. In the beginning, our concepts are very strong, and our ability to see the mind essence is very weak. Therefore, our moment of rig pa we experience in the direct introduction is something like a small branch caught up in a torrent of a river of concepts — it is very easily swept away. But if we are patient, and we are diligent, we can again have that experience of the mind essence, upon which all future practice depends. Why? Because it was introduced and we had it once. There is nothing at all mystical about the process, it is straightforward and nonmagical.

The process of reading is too conceptual, the mind involved is too coarse, and therefore, it is impossible that we can experience the mind essence from reading a text. However, if we have experienced the mind essence reading books such as the Chos dbying mdzod and so on can reinforce our confidence which we can bring to our practice.

In order to experience the mind essence we have to cut through coarse concepts with various methods to re-experience the mind essence that we were exposed to during the introduction. This is why we have practices such as rushen and semszin, and supremely, Song of the Vajra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, October 4th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

The question is whether Pointing Out Instructions can be effective if they are read from Terma, like "Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness," by Guru Padmasambhava. I would submit that, yes, they can.

Malcolm wrote:

And I would submit that you are wrong. The commentary tantra of the Great Perfection, the Rig pa Rang Shar states:

While one has not left the body of traces, migrating beings will not see one as worthy of respect. One's merit will be small, one's life short, one's enjoyments of living will be few, one will be powerless and many obstacles will occur. Nothing will be accomplished. Those are the faults of not obtaining the empowerment for the conduct of Secret Mantra. A yogin of Secret Mantra conduct must first obtain empowerment. If empowerment is not obtained, not even the Buddha will be able to turn the wheel on the stage of a tathāgata. If the wheel cannot be turned, then the nirmanakāya will not be able to benefit migrating beings with compassion. Therefore, the empowerment of the conduct of Secret Mantra must be obtained.

steve_bakr said:

You said that a Direct Introduction to the Nature of Mind is only legitimate if received from a living master, because the living master has the lineage and direct experience. That is indeed the best way.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the only way.

steve_bakr said:

The other way is reception through Terma, which is a written record of oral teachings made for a future time. If a Direct Introduction were only possible from a living master, the Terma would be without any purpose at all. The Terma are both oral teachings and contain the lineage as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Termas are revealed by people who have already studied and practiced and attained realization. They are not revealed by people with no training and no realization. Moreover, there is even training in how to reveal tertons. The teachers of Tertons are almost always tertons themselves. Tertons always undergo training in the normal way, receiving transmissions and so on in the normal way for years and years. There are no exceptions to this, none.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: The Lion-Faced Dakini

Content:

naljor said:

Really? Is it not Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Adamantine said:

He was talking about old Tibet. . . are you relaying what you've seen in your past lives?

Malcolm wrote:

I think that it was really easy for someone with a bit of education and charisma to set themselves up in the old country. This is why there was so much sectarianism, it all began with someone thinking someone else was a fraud...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

But if some of the charlatans we have over here had tried to pull off their cr*p back in the day, in old Tibet - I suspect they would have been run out of town ... or worse ...

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, they would be put right up on the thrones and showered with offerings.

Adamantine said:

I highly doubt it, from reading the historical accounts I've had access to. Even recognized tulkus were often treated skeptically before they proved themselves to their communities, as was the case for Chagdud Tulku, if you read his account in Lord of the Dance.

Anyway, are you suggesting that's how we should treat charlatans here?

Malcolm wrote:

I am just observing what I have seen with my own eyes...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

But if some of the charlatans we have over here had tried to pull off their cr*p back in the day, in old Tibet - I suspect they would have been run out of town ... or worse ...

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, they would be put right up on the thrones and showered with offerings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, October 3rd, 2015 at 12:36 AM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

You have my respect for translating original Dzogchen texts. My original post was directed to someone who is having great difficulty gaining access to a teacher. I have had the benefit of Pointing Out Instructions, but it was as if I knew it all along. In retrospect, I had experienced Rigpa before but I didn't know I was experiencing it. It just needed to be "pointed out."

Malcolm wrote:

Without receiving transmission, it is of no benefit to read books about Dzogchen. Without actual direct introduction, those instructions will always just remain a bunch of concepts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

For a Direct Introduction to the Nature of your Mind, please read, "Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness," by Guru Padmasambhava, translated by John Reynolds. It is available on your Kindle or in print.

This not a direct introduction. One cannot receive direct introduction from a book. I understand what you are saying. But I would not consider ancient texts formerly "Sealed, Sealed, Sealed," to be in the category of books. Many of these are in fact "Direct Oral Instructions" that in fact Dzogchen students of the past had no access to without a lung. And then, perhaps only one of these was read to them, one or a few times.

You have to understand the extraordinary times we live in. I have many secret texts along with explanations given by masters. Instead of hearing just a few of them a limited number of times, I can internalize these sacred texts dependent upon the extent of my devotion. Reading, studying, and internalizing these ancient original formerly secret texts are every bit as effective as hearing them. One can be liberated in this manner. As a lifetime student of religion, I fully appreciate the extraordinary development of having access to material that I would have had to travel to Tibet in hopes of finding when I first began to study religion.

I am not talking about reading books "about Dzogchen" with their conversational descriptions. I am talking about original pith instructions which can put one in the state of Intrinsic Awareness, one's Primordial State, simply by reading them, if one is receptive. You have to have lived long enough to fully understand the extraordinary nature of this development in the history of religion.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, I think we are talking about two entirely different things. Someone who reads Dzogchen texts without having had the benefit of a real transmission and explanation cannot receive transmission even from the most profound writing of ancient upadeshas written on a page. They might find them inspiring, but they won't discover anything and they will just remain in a state of concepts.

This is quite different than finding inspiration in those same instructions that have been communicated to you by a qualified teacher.

steve_bakr said:

I fully endorse having a personal teacher, most definitely. It is the nature of these texts, however, that listening to your teacher does not transmit the complete sentence by sentence density of the line by line liberating pith teachings contained in these secret texts. Much of what teachers present is the background understanding and preparation necessary to understand what is contained in these texts. A teacher will also judge your personal capabilities, and instruct you accordingly. There are three kinds of students: the superior, the intermediate, and the inferior.

Malcolm wrote:

What the teacher communicates is the essence of those instructions. That living relationship with a master enlivens those instructions because the instructions are then connected with transmission. Without transmission, the instructions have no life.

steve_bakr said:

But make no mistake, these secret texts are the real thing; one can be liberated upon reading them.

Malcolm wrote:

Steve, it may come as a surprise to you, but I spend my whole day, all day, reading original Dzogchen texts in Tibetan and translating them into English. It is what I do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Simon E. said:

Its very difficult to discuss this, or any other issue, particularly online stripped as it is of all that accompanies meat world communication..body language, intonation etc ...if any of the parties involved have problems with dissonance.

But it is dissonance and it's expression which often makes for truly adult conversation, and which can mark a fresh understanding, even a changing of minds.

Something rarely achieved by a meeting of pollyannas.
We are not (most of us) Asian. We have a proud history of speaking our minds plainly.
This is not a barrier to understanding individual teachers. On the contrary it is an essential part of the Buddhadharma's transition to the west.

That transition is still ongoing. In fact it is early days in that process.
We are having to make policy on the hoof. That will go on for a hundred years or more at least.

Students of Buddhadharma in the west may need to be as robust in the discussion of these issues (the authenticity or otherwise of specific teachers) as they are vis-a-vis climate change or capitalism, without that being seen as somehow adharmic.

Malcolm wrote:

Generally speaking, the discussion of the validity of teachers is best done without calling people out by name. It is best to describe the positions they hold and identify those as problematical.

On the other hand, when someone makes themselves a celebrity, they are inviting inspection and criticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Possibly of interest, from Berkeley's favorite tulku Pema Khandro Rinpoche:

<http://ngakpa.org/library/haters-and-who-they-really-are-2/>

Ivo said:

This is an excellent article in every respect. Thank you for sharing!

It also contains an great summary of the whole topic by Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche:

“Do not have opinions on other people’s actions.
When we see defects in others, people in general but particularly those who have entered the Dharma...
we should understand that it is the impurity of our perception which is at fault.

Malcolm wrote:

Personally, I don't have pure vision, so I cannot really cannot say that I have this quality.
But the older I get, I have noticed that I have developed the quality of being like a piece of wood if I have nothing good to say...people are free to draw their own conclusions from my silence about this or that...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Ivo said:

I am basically saying exactly what Malcolm wrote.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I pretty much agree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 6:35 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Adamantine said:

I didn't notice anyone here trying to force someone onto a path or to convert them.

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, me either.

Adamantine said:

As I'd mentioned already- in my own experience it was valuable to see thoughtful (albeit harsh) criticisms of a prospective teacher on Esangha- both comments grounded in dharma scripture as well as details I would otherwise have been unaware of (such as the detail that you provided regarding the practice text for a certain gyalpo that was translated by ACI prior to their first

3-year retreat.)

Malcolm wrote:

Translated, I don't know — published as part of the ACIP releases, definitely.

Adamantine said:

So based on my own experience.. I think it'd be actually quite the opposite of generosity to not offer one's insight into certain situations or teachers, even if it's just healthy skepticism alone.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in the case of the Michael Roach debacle, we could all see where that was headed...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Paul said:

Paul, yes, I genuinely think that this is a bad idea too. I know how controversial this sounds, but it is actually the same karmic situation I outlined and no criticism could be helpful. My capacity for explaining such complex topics is not that high, and seeing how easy my words are misinterpreted here I would not even try to elaborate further. But I think that there is only one thing which is truly helpful in dealing with cult leaders and harmful teachers - presenting a strong example of a genuine path. This is the only way out and the only true help we can give. Everything else will destroy us in the end, no matter how good the initial intentions are. I believe this is also, incidentally, in harmony with the precepts of the Buddadharma.

I have to disagree completely then. Warning someone away from a cult is never a bad thing, as the cult cannot lead to liberation. Certainly when it starts to involve tantra and samaya issues. A group like that, and as I mention there is a rather active and highly negative cult here in the UK, is worse than poison. Poison can only harm you in one life.

I'm honestly not sure that you're saying this, but allowing someone to go down a harmful path because 'it's their karma' in some way is not compassionate.

Malcolm wrote:

People are free, and it is not our job to condition anyone to follow any path at all, whether we think it is a good one or not.

That said, there is nothing wrong with providing facts — for example, Jax's comments on facebook are there for all to see.

Providing info is one thing, strongly conditioning others is another. If someone wants to worship the Gyalpo, this may be a pity, but it is not our job to try and force them or convert them from that path. All we can do is point out what masters such as HHDL, ChNN and so on say about it. If they want to listen, fine, if not, then fine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: The Lion-Faced Dakini

Content:

naljor said:

From which terma comes practice of Simhamukha in Dzogchen Community? I mean the practice from booklet The practice of Sinhamukha with five mantras for each family.....

Malcolm wrote:

Ayu Khandro

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

To a hammer, everything looks like a nail.

Funny you should use that metaphor. I've been known to hit my thumb on occasion. In any case, this really really looks like a nail to me:

Malcolm wrote:

And there are also no phenomena of either samsara or nirvana at all present in the basis. Well, keep hitting it then...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

There is an unfortunate tendency here at DW to completely dismiss any teaching that can be characterized as "lower". None of my teachers has ever demonstrated that kind of attitude, so I will be excused if I follow their example.

Malcolm wrote:

To a hammer, everything looks like a nail.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, October 2nd, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

From an outsider's perspective....

Malcolm wrote:

You just said it all...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Is there a master resource that has events for all lineas

Content:

UnTyingTheStrings said:

I'm at the stage where I feel like seeing many teachers styles before comnoting to one. So I want to attend different teachings and events. But it seems harder than it should be to find scheduled events and such. Is there a better resource than just hearing about a center(word of mouth or searching online) and finding their individual events page? Is there some kind of inter-lineage listing by city /region/or country so that I don't miss a visiting teacher or event out of ignorance?

Malcolm wrote:

You can try Dharmalist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

Be that as it may (and I concede that there is a gamut of opinions on this), you must admit that on the surface it is prone to that interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you understand neither Yogacara nor Dzogchen.

smcj said:

I don't think that it is arguable to say there is unanimity of opinion on this.

HHDL " Dzogchen: Heart Essence of the Great Perfection ": Question: Certain Nyingma masters have expounded shentong- emptiness of other-as the view of Dzogchen. Do you agree with them? Why is shentong such a controversial view among Tibetan Buddhist philosophers?

HHDL: If we read the writings of the great scholar Mipham, especially his commentary on the Sublime Continuum, we find that he explicitly mentions the importance of understanding the Dzogchen view, in which one is able to combine the teachings of emptiness, as expounded in the wisdom sūtras of the second turning of the wheel of Dharma, with the sūtras belonging to the third turning of the wheel of Dharma, particularly the Essence of Buddhahood Sutra. The understanding developed through a combination of the views expounded in both turnings of the wheel of Dharma will enable us to appreciate what in Dzogchen terminology are called: primordial purity, which is the main subject matter of the second turning, and spontaneous presence, which is the main subject matter of the third turning of the wheel of Dharma.

However, this does not mean that the emptiness spoken of in the second turning, that is in the wisdom sūtras, is exactly the same as what in Dzogchen terminology is called primordial purity. But one thing which is clear is that without an understanding of emptiness as expounded in the wisdom sutras, and without taking that understanding as a basis, there is no way that you can understand primordial purity in the context of Dzogchen.

As for the question of whether spontaneous presence in Dzogchen is synonymous with what is called the tathagatagarbha- the essence of buddhahood or innate mind of clear light-in the third turning of the wheel of Dharma, especially in the Essence of Buddhahood Sutra, there do seem to be divergent views on that, even among Nyingma meditators and scholars.

(formatting mine)

Malcolm wrote:

Because you don't understand Dzogchen, you really can't appreciate what HHDL is saying here.

1) There is the question of whether it is really proper to try and understand Dzogchen on the basis of sūtra. I personally question the entire context of HHDL's comments. Dzogchen is not part of the three turnings, not at all.

2) The main controversy HHDL mentions is whether it is proper to consider tathāgatagarbha as presented in sūtra to be the same as lhun grub or not.

This is just not the same thing as conflating Yogacara and Dzogchen. Tathāgatagarbha has a very subordinate role in Yogacara. It is almost entirely ignored.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

Be that as it may (and I concede that there is a gamut of opinions on this), you must admit that on the surface it is prone to that interpretation.

Malcolm wrote:

Only if you understand neither Yogacara nor Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 9:31 PM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:

smcj said:
I like this part: And there are also no phenomena of either samsara or nirvana at all present in the basis.
(formatting mine.)

At the very least I'd say this was a Yogacara view.

Malcolm wrote:
Not even remotely.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 8:39 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts
Content:
Ivo said:
, but I have never seen evidence of him questioning their status as teachers, or their realization..

Malcolm wrote:
I have.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, October 1st, 2015 at 3:52 AM
Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology
Content:
Vimalakirti432 said:
. Nowhere in the Lotus that I'm aware of is it suggested that shravakas or others should aspire to Buddhahood in order to be of help to others. The implication may be there but it is not the focus of the sutra.=.

PorkChop said:
Then you've missed the entire gist of the sutra...
Malcolm wrote:
The generation of bodhicitta is a central theme of the Lotus Sūtra.

PorkChop said:
Nice quotes... and you're totally spot on here (imho).

For further reading in this line of thought there's also the whole chapter on the prediction of Buddhahood for the Buddha's most prominent sravaka disciples (all of whom are arahants), the chapter on the conduct of Bodhisattva Mahasattvas, the point of the burning house chapter (that all 3 types of disciples will eventually attain the supreme cart of Buddhahood), the Avalokitesvara Chapter (as a model of Bodhisattva behavior) etc, etc, etc...

Malcolm wrote:

I don't he or she actually read the sutra with any attention, and he or she would rather hurl invectives rather than actually have a discussion so....good riddance....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Ivo said:

Guys, do not crucify Jax.

Malcolm wrote:

We do not have to crucify Jax, he is already doing a fine job of hanging himself with his own rope.

dzogchungpa said:

Isn't that mixing metaphors?

I guess what you're saying is that there's more than one way to skin a cat.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a little hard for someone to nail himself to a cross, but it is very easy for someone to hang himself with a rope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Ivo said:

Guys, do not crucify Jax.

Malcolm wrote:

We do not have to crucify Jax, he is already doing a fine job of hanging himself with his own rope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, there are really only two stages, when everything is said and done. The Hinayāna path only results in freedom. The Mahāyāna path results in freedom and omniscience.

The rest of it is just details.

Tenso said:

Is the bliss of Buddhahood greater than the liberation achieved from practicing hinayana?

Malcolm wrote:

That's an interesting question. Even if the bliss associated with full awakening is deeper than mere liberation, it is not a great degree of liberation, but rather, a quality associated with the result of the path.

There are basically five paths and ten stages. Paths measure realizations, stages measure qualities. There are also four kinds of realized persons, which are in fact measures of liberation from latent afflictions. The measure of full liberation is an arhat, pratyekabuddha, or an eighth stage bodhisattva, because only arhats, pratyekabuddhas and eighth stage bodhisattvas on up are free from birth in the three realms. However, the difference between the former two and the latter are the qualities cultivated on the path and the depth of realization. Arhats and pratyekabuddhas do not necessarily realize the emptiness of phenomena, and they do not necessarily comprehend the nonarising of phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

. Nowhere in the Lotus that I'm aware of is it suggested that shravakas or others should aspire to Buddhahood in order to be of help to others. The implication may be there but it is not the focus of the sutra.

Malcolm wrote:

In that respect, just as a rishi possesses the five clairvoyances and a pure eye, in the same way bodhisattvas generate bodhicitta, and after they attain patience for the nonarising of phenomena, it is observed that they attain the full perfect buddhahood of unsurpassed perfect complete awakening.

One who does not attain any phenomena, where is nirvana for one such as he? The Tathāgatas introduce them to awakening, and having generated bodhicitta, they do not abide in samsara and they also do not attain nirvana.

Son of a good family, a woman who possesses four qualities should take this Saddharmapundarika in hand. If it is asked what four, they are as follows: being blessed by the Buddha Bhagavans, having generated roots of virtue, abiding in the heap of certainties and having generated the thought of unsurpassed perfect full awakening in order to protect all sentient beings.

The generation of bodhicitta is a central theme of the Lotus Sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 9:13 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes the problem is that you are using provisional sūtras and commentaries from Yogacara, which is a realist system lower than Madhyamaka.

Son of Buddha said:

Yes the problem is that you are using provisional sūtras and commentaries from Madhyamaka which is a system that constantly requires interpretation due to it teetering very close to Nihilism/Annihilationism, such a system is lower than the definite Tathāgatagarbha teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka requires no interpretation, and the Tathāgatagarbha sūtras, understood from the Madhyakamala perspective of freedom from extremes, make sense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

. Nowhere in the Lotus that I'm aware of is it suggested that shravakas or others should aspire to Buddhahood in order to be of help to others. The implication may be there but it is not the focus of the sutra.=.

Malcolm wrote:

Really? I'll sort you out on this one tomorrow, but you are mistaken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

And your citation?

Malcolm wrote:

Abhisamayālaṃkāra, that being said, you invoked a specific passage of the Saddharmapundarika Sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Matt J said:

While both the Buddhist and the Vedantin may attain freedom, the way they go about it is completely different. In my mind, the Vedantin expands the sense of Self,

Malcolm wrote:

In which case afflictions are not wholly eradicated and rebirth is not ended.

Matt J said:

while the Buddhist eliminates it.

Malcolm wrote:

In which case afflictions are wholly eradicated and rebirth is ended.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 5:04 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

DGA said:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Son of Buddha said:

Then change the channel nobody forcing you to watch this programming.

All the OP wanted was a list of Buddhist teachers who taught True Self teaching's (not hard to provide there are many), but you guys wanted to go off topic to argue and harass the poor fellow because he has different view's than you.....so you guys got what you were looking for.

But please don't complain when you guys make statements and someone else is willing to reply to those statements in disagreement while providing Sutras and commentary to support their position.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes the problem is that you are using provisional sūtras and commentaries from Yogacara, which is a realist system lower than Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just as there is no snake apart from the rope that we see, there also no snake in the rope that we see. So too it is with a self — there is no self apart from the persons and phenomena that we see, there is also no self in the persons and phenomena we perceive.

Son of Buddha said:

Sure there is a self apart from persons and phenomena.

Here is Ju Mipham's gloss on 9:23, from the new Dharmachakra version of Sutramkara: In the absence of the twofold self of persons and phenomena, this is the actual nature of things, the supreme nature of the abiding reality, the intrinsic nature or essence itself. In achieving this, the buddhas have achieved a nature that is of complete purity. Thus, [to actualize] the suchness that is the unmistakable way things are is to be "the self of great beings." This self is not the same as the conceived object that is involved when apprehending the twofold self because such a self has no bearing on things as they are.

The Self of great beings(suchness) is apart from the self of persons and phenomena

Malcolm wrote:

This is just a manner of speaking.

Son of Buddha said:

If the snake and the rope are the same thing, we should also see a snake when we see a rope.

The snake is an illusion that's very existence is predicated upon the rope which is its source, which again the fact remains when you see the illusion of the snake what you are actually seeing is the ropeeither way the illusion of the snake and the rope are the SAME object.

Malcolm wrote:

No, if they were the same object, we would always see a snake when we see a rope.

Son of Buddha said:

Since we do not see a snake when we see a rope, and we do not see rope when we see a snake, we can understand that in fact the former perception is accompanied by knowledge and the latter perception is accompanied by ignorance.

Yep I agree, still doesn't change the fact that whether you see an snake or a rope you are looking at the same object(misperception doesn't change that)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, misperception does change that. Ignorance does not have an object of valid perception, that is why it is ignorance.

Son of Buddha said:

We can understand that rope and the snake are just not the same thing. If they were the same thing, when one was seen, the other must always be seen. For example, when we fire, it is always accompanied by heat.

What????..... If we look at the SAME OBJECT and you see a baseball and I see an softball it still doesn't change the fact we are looking at the SAME OBJECT.

Malcolm wrote:

In order to maintain this position, you would have to maintain that the water that you see and the pus and blood that a pretas sees are the same thing, something which objectively exists apart from your perception of it. In other words, you are maintaining that the round object we are seeing exists objectively. If you maintain such a thing, you are also maintaining that external phenomena have a self.

Son of Buddha said:

Likewise, If the self and the suchness are the same thing, we should also see a self when we see suchness.

The numerous Tathagatagarbha Sutras state that Suchness is the True Self,(different words used to describe the same thing)

Malcolm wrote:

As I said and will always maintain, they cannot be taken literally on this point.

Son of Buddha said:

You make a big deal about purity, permanence and so on. There is no self without the selfless; there is purity without the impure, and so on. Taking these teachings in the Nirvana Sūtra and so on literally just traps one in dualistic categories. This why they cannot be taken literally

Malcolm wrote:

You claim they cannot be taken literally, the Buddha in those Sutras say the opposite.[/quote][[/quote]

Buddha taught such sūtras for the timid, those who are afraid of the Lion's Roar of emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

DGA said:

and here we are...

William Blake said:

unable to do other than repeat the same dull round over again

DGA said:

<http://www.bartleby.com/235/339.html>

how many times have those chunks of that translation of chapter 6 of the Nirvana Sutra been posted to this board now?

Malcolm wrote:

Until we all do this to SOB....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 3:57 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Well I'm highly skeptical that the kind of absolute certainty you claim to be in command of can be real for any ordinary sentient being, which I assume you to be. I'm also highly skeptical that the mass of Buddhist writings can be as thoroughly consistent as you appear to claim. These writings, like all writing everywhere, are the products of ordinary sentient beings, so while they may evince a basic consistency they cannot be free of error and ambiguity, in my view. It takes the eyes of faith to believe otherwise. So I guess we need to leave it there.

Malcolm wrote:

Still waiting for your citation...as it is said, "if you can't put up..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[but I don't buy it — there are too many contradictions inherent in the term, which is why we cannot take these buddhist sutras that discuss and use the term "self" literally. They are provisional and require interpretation.

Son of Buddha said:

You were saying.

Nirvana Sutra

Chapter Six: On the Virtue of the Name

V199. “Then the Tathagata spoke again to Kasyapa: “O good man! You should now uphold all the words, chapters, clauses and all the virtues thereof of this sutra. Any good man or woman who hears the name of this sutra will never get born into the four realms [of hell, hungry ghost, animal, and asura]. Why not? I shall now expound to you all the virtues of this sutra and all that is practised by innumerable boundless Buddhas.”

V200. Bodhisattva Kasyapa said to the Buddha: “O World-Honoured One! What is this sutra to be called? How should Bodhisattva-mahasattvas uphold this sutra?” The Buddha said to Kasyapa: “The name of this sutra is to be “Mahaparinirvana”. The foremost word betokens “good”, the middle also “good”, and the final “good” too. The signification [of this sutra] is extremely deep, and what is written [in it] is good. The pureness of its arrangement is perfect, its action is pure, and its adamant treasure-house is all-satisfying. Listen well, listen well! I shall now speak. O good man! The word “maha” betokens “eternal”. This is like all the great rivers draining into the great ocean. The same with this sutra. It crushes out all the bonds of illusion and all the qualities of Mara, and then body and life drain into “Mahaparinirvana”. Hence we say “Mahaparinirvana.” O good man! This is like a doctor who has a secret treatment embracing all medical treatments for disease. O good man! It is the same with the Tathagata. V201. All the various wonderful doctrines taught and all the secret(esoteric) depths of meaning find their way into this Mahaparinirvana. That is why we say Mahaparinirvana. O good man! It is like a farmer who sows seed in spring. He entertains a rare wish. When he has finished the harvesting, all his longing is at an end. O good man! The same is the case with all beings. If we study other sutras, we always long for beautiful tastes. When one once hears this Mahaparinirvana, [however], one long ceases to covet the beautiful tastes mentioned in other sutras. This great Nirvana well enables all beings to cross the sea of all existences. O good man! Of all footprints, that of the elephant is the best. The same with this sutra. Of all the samadhis of the sutras, that of this sutra is the best. O good man! Of all the tillings of the field, that done in autumn is best.

V202. The same with this sutra. It is the best of all sutras. It is like sarpirmada, which is the best of all medicines. It thoroughly cures the feverish worries and madding minds of beings. This Great Nirvana is the foremost of all. O good man! It is like sweet butter which contains the eight tastes. The same also applies to this sutra. It contains the eight tastes. What are the eight? These are: 1) it is eternal, 2) it always is, 3) it is peaceful, 4) it is pure and cool, 5) it does not grow old, 6) it does not die, 7) it is taintless, and 8) it is pleasing and happy. These are the eight tastes. It possesses these eight tastes. This is why we say “Mahaparinirvana”. Now, all Bodhisattva-mahasattvas peacefully abide in this and manifest Nirvana in all places. That is why we say “Mahaparinirvana”. O Kasyapa! All good men and women who desire to enter Nirvana by this Mahaparinirvana must study well the fact that the Tathagata is eternal and that the Dharma and Sangha are eternal.”

V203. Bodhisattva Kasyapa said to the Buddha: “All is wonderful, O World-Honoured One! We cannot conceive of the Tathagata’s depths of virtue. The same is the case with the virtues of Dharma and Sangha. This Mahaparinirvana is also inconceivable. One who studies this sutra will gain the right eye of Dharma and become a good doctor. Anybody who has not studied this sutra, we should know, is [like] a blind person, not possessing the eye of Wisdom and overshadowed by ignorance.”

Malcolm wrote:
Oh yawn....

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 3:55 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

[

No, the illusion of a snake has never been the rope. If you really think that the illusion of snake is the rope you have just betrayed the basic flaw in your thinking.

Son of Buddha said:

Yes the rope and the illusion of the snake are the same. Cause whether a person see a rope or a misperception of a snake it doesn't change the fact he is looking at the same one object.

Malcolm wrote:

Just as there is no snake apart from the rope that we see, there also no snake in the rope that we see. So too it is with a self — there is no self apart from the persons and phenomena that we see, there is also no self in the persons and phenomena we perceive.

If the snake and the rope are the same thing, we should also see a snake when we see a rope.

Since we do not see a snake when we see a rope, and we do not see rope when we see a snake, we can understand that in fact the former perception is accompanied by knowledge and the latter perception is accompanied by ignorance.

We can understand that rope and the snake are just not the same thing. If they were the same thing, when one was seen, the other must always be seen. For example, when we see fire, it is always accompanied by heat.

Likewise, If the self and the suchness are the same thing, we should also see a self when we see suchness.

Since we do not see a self when we see suchness, and we do not see suchness when we see a self, we can understand that in fact the former perception is accompanied by knowledge and the latter perception is accompanied by ignorance.

You make a big deal about purity, permanence and so on. There is no self without the selfless; there is purity without the impure, and so on. Taking these teachings in the Nirvana Sūtra and so on literally just traps one in dualistic categories. This is why they cannot be taken literally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation is one thing, stage one; omniscience is stage two, buddhahood.

smcj said:

This vehicle has more than two gears. You skipped a couple styles and levels of liberation, like pratyekabuddha, bodhisattva (with 10 levels), and levels of buddhahood.

I'm not telling you anything you don't know, just making a point that there are multiple styles and level of "liberation". That is a term I understand to mean being freed from the compulsory need for rebirth (samsara).

Malcolm wrote:

No, there are really only two stages, when everything is said and done. The Hinayāna path only results in freedom. The Mahāyāna path results in freedom and omniscience.

The rest of it is just details.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Well it does appear to be put differently in some sources. For example, in the Lotus there is the repeated refrain that the disciples had achieved a kind of "extinction" but not true extinction. So perhaps some ambiguity here, no? Of course I understand that in the more popular sutras things may be put more loosely. Where do you find the interpretation you offer here?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no ambiguity. Śravakas eliminate the afflictive obscuration, thus they no longer take birth in the three realms; but they do not eliminate the knowledge obscuration, thus they do not attain buddhahood.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Okay but the text literally says that their extinction (of their afflictions) is not real; it doesn't say that what they really need is omniscience. Imho your refusal to admit of any ambiguity anywhere can be a hindrance. Or are you saying that the thousands and thousands of words of Buddhadharma are inerrant, like the bible?

Anyway I won't argue the point. For me it's a distinction without a difference, since no one is disputing what the actual differences between a shravaka and Buddha are.

Malcolm wrote:

Cite the text. I think you have a problem with your understanding of it.

When you understand the Dharma, where others see ambiguity, you don't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Well it does appear to be put differently in some sources. For example, in the Lotus there is the repeated refrain that the disciples had achieved a kind of "extinction" but not true extinction. So perhaps some ambiguity here, no? Of course I understand that in the more popular sutras things may be put more loosely. Where do you find the interpretation you offer here?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no ambiguity. Śravakas eliminate the afflictive obscuration, thus they no longer take birth in the three realms; but they do not eliminate the knowledge obscuration, thus they do not attain buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Even Madhyamaka texts use the term svabhāva in this sense, such as saying that all things are of the nature of emptiness. If the term svabhāva meant substance or intrinsic existence in such instances, then those texts would be totally incoherent because they would be saying that all things are formed of an underlying substance, and that substance is a negation of substance, which is a flat out self-contradiction.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is actually what Candrakirti says it means, i.e. emptiness is the natureless nature or the insubstantial substance.

Bakmoon said:

Aren't the texts being a little bit poetic and not 100% literal when they say that though? I would take it to mean that all things are without any real nature, and this lack of a nature is conventionally designated as a nature, rather than a purely literal meaning that all things have an underlying substance, and this underlying substance is a lack of underlying substance.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you can take it quite literally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

conebeckham said:

Yes, indeedy, Malcolm!

(Didn't see your post until after I had started mine....freedom from afflictions is the root of freedom from samsara, of course).

While we're at it, can we agree that Liberation is not the same as Buddhahood?

Vimalakirti432 said:

But is it not the case in the Mahayana that true liberation can only be achieved through Buddhahood?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Liberation is one thing, stage one; omniscience is stage two, buddhahood.

The Mahāyāna insight comes from the fact that liberation is not sufficient; in order to help sentient beings, one must be omniscient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Even Madhyamaka texts use the term svabhāva in this sense, such as saying that all things are of the nature of emptiness. If the term svabhāva meant substance or intrinsic existence in such instances, then those texts would be totally incoherent because they would be saying that all things are formed of an underlying substance, and that substance is a negation of substance, which is a flat out self-contradiction.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is actually what Candrakirti says it means, i.e. emptiness is the natureless nature or the insubstantial substance.

dzogchungpa said:

Or even the selfless self?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is also fine, that is the meaning. This selfless self is merely a convention, a term, a name. Our friends SOB would like us to believe there is some transcendent self that is not merely a conventional name, but I don't buy it — there are too many contradictions inherent in the term, which is why we cannot take these buddhist sutras that discuss and use the term "self" literally. They are provisional and require interpretation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

conebeckham said:

Liberation means to be free of suffering and the causes of suffering. Put more simply, Liberation means to be free of Samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

Which only comes about through being free of afflictions, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

This is kind of a personal response. I've been charged with conflating epistemology and ontology.

Malcolm wrote:

How can you hold your head up in public? Who issued this grave accusation?

Vimalakirti432 said:

The point is that this logical distinction, like all logical distinctions, are only of non-trivial interest when supported by valid assumptions and outcomes. My whole point in this case is that while Vedanta may habitually start with what can be called ontology and Buddhadharma with epistemology (though personally I feel phenomenology is more accurate), the liberation each points to are arguably indistinguishable in the end.

Malcolm wrote:

Then define liberation for us, and lets see how it stacks up.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Stacks up? So you're standing in judgement? But I'm sure you must not mean that.

But really Malcolm you know I've been an open book on this, indiscriminately disclosing in numerous places, verbosely, to the annoyance of not a few!

So I would toss this question back to others, who have not been forthcoming on what liberation means to them, though asked to on occasion.

For your part, I accept your recent dzogchen pointers, which as you know I had no particular objection to.

But look, when it comes to giving brief conventional pointers to what liberation means in one's particular case, the easiest shorthand is to find a reference point in the broad tradition, as you have done.

So to repeat briefly what I've already disclosed elsewhere my view can be summed up in that hoary old Ch'an adage, which goes something like: in the beginning mountains are mountains and rivers are rivers, then mountains are not mountains and rivers are not rivers, finally mountains are mountains and rivers are rivers. Of course this is merely the figurative version of the grammar of the Diamond Sutra: is, is not and therefore is.

So again as I've said elsewhere liberation for me can only be a liberation into the no-place of what's here, a letting go, a relinquishment into the only place possible. Now how that is realized or thought about, as sudden or gradual, innate or constructed, through rigorous training or shouting at the moon, through the dancing angels of logical disputation or the sudden plosh! of a duck landing on a pond, through visualizing herukas or other celestial beings or astral traveling - I'll leave for other worthies and dharma warriors to battle over.

But you others, you silent ones! What does liberation mean to you? Speak!

Malcolm wrote:

In Buddhadharma, liberation means only one thing and nothing more no matter whether we are talking about Hinayāna, Mahāyāna or Vajrayāna, including Dzogchen — liberation means freedom from afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

Even Madhyamaka texts use the term svabhāva in this sense, such as saying that all things are of the nature of emptiness. If the term svabhāva meant substance or intrinsic existence in such instances, then those texts would be totally incoherent because they would be saying that all things are formed of an underlying substance, and that substance is a negation of substance, which is a flat out self-contradiction.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is actually what Candrakirti says it means, i.e. emptiness is the natureless nature or the insubstantial substance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Ology, ology, ology

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

This is kind of a personal response. I've been charged with conflating epistemology and ontology.

Malcolm wrote:

How can you hold your head up in public? Who issued this grave accusation?

Vimalakirti432 said:

The point is that this logical distinction, like all logical distinctions, are only of non-trivial interest when supported by valid assumptions and outcomes. My whole point in this case is that while Vedanta may habitually start with what can be called ontology and Buddhadharma with epistemology (though personally I feel phenomenology is more accurate), the liberation each points to are arguably indistinguishable in the end.

Malcolm wrote:

Then define liberation for us, and lets see how it stacks up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 30th, 2015 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Can a stone meditate?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Yesbutt ... then the recognition isn't real either. My recognition is as real as a stone's non-recognition. Both are just norms. Since neither have possible reality, my recognition might as well be a stone's non-recognition.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference, conventionally, is that you can realize this unreality, a stone never can.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Can a stone meditate?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you recognize the emptiness of a rock, this is the same as recognizing the emptiness of the mind.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Ty. Yes but - even if we say the ultimate can "recognize" itself (its wisdom is "self-arising"), but a stone (ultimately) can't - then just in the ultimate there's something different between a man and a stone. One can know self-arising wisdom, the other can't. In the ultimate there seems to be a difference between sentience and non-sentience. But no difference with respect to their emptiness. Or - a person has an ultimate but a stone doesn't..

Malcolm wrote:

The ultimate cannot recognize itself. There is no ultimate entity to do so.

In the ultimate there is no difference between the sentient and the insentient, since neither are established in the ultimate; they are only established conventionally. Rock, sentient beings and buddhas are nothing more than conventions, they do not refer to anything real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: So I inherited this incense burner...

Content:

DGA said:

I was given this piece from a late friend's estate. It had never been used. I shined it up and while this isn't something I would pick out for myself, I find a lot to like in it and I have a specific use in mind for it.

As you can see, on the lid is our old friend Hotei (Bodai), and on the bottom portion, where the incense goes, there's a large Chinese character framed by a boy and a girl... doing something. Making an offering? Rejoicing? And behind that are more characters I can't read.

Can anyone inform me of what may be going on in the relief of this incense burner? Any context will be warmly welcomed, as I'm largely ignorant of Chinese Buddhism and I can't read classical Chinese at all, fool that I am.

Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Hotei is not the Buddha, he is more like Chinese Santa Claus, the boy and the girl are receiving gifts. He is like the Chinese Jambhala.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Can a stone meditate?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Again, if the emptiness is the same for everything, why is the wisdom different? In twofold egolessness, how can I "have" mind and the stone "not have" mind?

Malcolm wrote:

You are conflating the two truths here.

Conventionally, rocks do not have minds or rig pa, etc. They are insentient. Sentient beings have minds, this is why we call them sentient.

Rocks and minds arise from causes and conditions, they are all therefore empty. If you recognize the emptiness of a rock, this is the same as recognizing the emptiness of the mind. But maybe it is a little more useful for us to recognize the emptiness of the mind, rather than the emptiness of a rock.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 10:01 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

[

When the quote says the perfected nature does not exist, it clarifies that statement by saying that it does not exist IN THE SAME WAY of the worldly understanding which is the existence imputed upon the phenomena and persons (known as the 2 selves of the world), so all you quote is actually saying is that it doesn't exist in ONE manner, BUT it exists in ANOTHER manner hence: "It is also not a nonentity, because at that time suchness, the characteristic of the perfected exists", of course the very terms Existence and Non Existence are words used to describe a Samsaric understanding and Suchness is beyond samsaric understanding. hence the non duality teachings (freedom from existence and nonexistence)

Malcolm wrote:

It is saying two things, it does not exist as a nature [svabhāva], but it exists as a svalakṣaṇa, a characteristic. For example, space does not exist as a nature [since there is no entity of space], but it does exist as a characteristic [since the characteristic of space is absence of obstruction].

Son of Buddha said:

It does exist however as a characteristic, and what is that characteristic, emptiness a.k.a suchness,

Now you are just agreeing with me, I have been saying for years that the term True Self is just a word used to describe the Characteristics of Suchness which is you said "does exist"..... welcome to the club.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am not agreeing with you — you fail to distinguish between an entity and a characteristic.

Son of Buddha said:

The True Self is not an identity

Malcolm wrote:

Then the term cannot be taken literally, since after all, a self is nothing but an identity.

Son of Buddha said:

however to think that the Supreme Self has the Characteristics of Not Self is one of the 4 perversions.

Malcolm wrote:

The so called "supreme self" is just selflessness, i.e the absence of being an entity. Your supreme self is not an entity, it is therefore not real, it does not exist.

Son of Buddha said:

hence you acknowledged that the Self means something that is real.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I have shown that the intention of the term "self" is indirect and not to be taken literally.

Son of Buddha said:

Further earlier in this chapter Maitreya declares at 9.4 "all phenomena are buddhahood," but according to your oft stated point of view, this is impossible since [buddha = self] and [self = not the aggregates] and so on.

So really, I think you need to rethink your literalism on these points

Malcolm wrote:

Your not understanding the passages

Son of Buddha said:

All phenomena is Buddhahood, because the illusion of the snake is the Rope

Malcolm wrote:

No, the illusion of a snake has never been the rope. If you really think that the illusion of snake is the rope you have just betrayed the basic flaw in your thinking.

Phenomena are not established as real, and neither is Buddhahood. As Nāgārjuna quips:

Whatever is the nature of the Tathagata, that is the nature of the world;
as the Tathagata has no nature, the world has no nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The meaning of the Sutra is explicit...

Malcolm wrote:

No, it really isn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Vasubandhu also said:

Vasubandhu on the Sutralamkara 9:23, Thurman translation:

23. In pure voidness buddhas achieve the supreme self of selflessness, and realize the spiritual greatness of the self by discovering the pure self.

Yes, and here,

As you can see the Buddha and other Buddhist masters distinguished different types of Atman, rejecting most form's but accepting their own interpretation of the term Atman.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is intentional language and is not to be taken literally. For example, in the comment on this passage {which is by Maitreya and not Vasubandhu}, Sthiramati's Sūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya provides useful clarification here:

The term "self" in this context means "essence" [svabhāvatā], i.e., since the buddhas are said to obtain the supreme self because of being the selfless essence. Since that is pure, the buddhas attain the pure supreme selfless self.

He continues in this vein:

The Buddha is the dharmakāya. Since the dharmakāya is emptiness, because there are not only no imputable personal entities in emptiness, there are also no imputable phenomenal entities, there are therefore no entities at all.

Now, someone may wish to counter "Sure, the imputed nature does not exist, but the perfect nature does exist," but Sthiramati responds to this:

The nature of the perfected does not exist. Since it does not exist in the same way the horn the hare of the imputed phenomena and persons, at that it is not defined as existent. It is also not a nonentity, because at that time suchness, the characteristic of the perfected exists.

This means that the perfected is not a substantial entity. It does exist however as a characteristic, and what is that characteristics, emptiness a.k.a suchness, which is not a self in any sense in which the word is used as an identifier, unless of course one wishes to claim, "The supreme identity is no identity" or "The supreme self is no self."

This is precisely the meaning here. What this means is that this "self" is merely a designation and does not indicate anything real, any more than conventionally calling the stream of the aggregates a self does not indicate anything real.

Now, Sthiramati was a direct disciple of Vasubandhu, and I am quite sure he understands this text perfectly.

Son of Buddha said:

Consistent with this remark by Vasubandhu we see the Buddha using the term atman to refer to himself, and so on as a mere designation, etc. He never uses it to refer to a real entity, not even in the much vaunted Nirvana Sūtra.

In the very much vaunted Nirvana Sutra the Buddha does describe the Atman as real, he literally tells you the meaning of the term of Atman and says that it is real.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in the Nirvana Sutra, the Buddha is using intentional language that cannot be taken literally.

Further earlier in this chapter Maitreya declares at 9.4 "all phenomena are buddhahood," but according to your oft stated point of view, this is impossible since [buddha = self] and [self = not the aggregates] and so on.

So really, I think you need to rethink your literalism on these points.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

more precisely, his teaching that all dhamma are anatta,

Malcolm wrote:

...including nirvana...

Son of Buddha said:

What you are promoting is called the 4 perversions of the dharma, to think full enlightenment is not self is the 3rd perversion.

The Self' signifies the Buddha; 'the Eternal' signifies the Dharmakaya; 'Bliss' signifies Nirvana, and 'the Pure' signifies Dharma. Bhiksus, why is it said that one who has the idea of a Self is arrogant and haughty, traversing round Samsara? Bhiksus, although you might say, 'We also cultivate impermanence, suffering, and non-Self, these three kinds of cultivation have no real value/ meaning. I shall now explain the excellent three ways of cultivating Dharma. To think of suffering as Bliss and to think of Bliss as suffering, is perverse Dharma; to think of the impermanent as the Eternal and to think of the Eternal as impermanent is perverse Dharma; to think of the non-Self [anatman] as the Self [atman] and to think of the Self [atman] as non-Self [anatman] is perverse Dharma; to think of the impure as the Pure and to think of the Pure as impure is perverse Dharma. Whoever has these four kinds of perversion, that person does not know the correct cultivation of dhammas.

V119. These are called perversions/ inversions. Because of these perversions/ inversions, mundane people know the letters but not the meaning [referents]. What is the meaning/referent? Non-Self is Samsara, the Self is the Tathagata; impermanence is the sravakas and pratyekabuddhas, the Eternal is the Tathagata's Dharmakaya; suffering is all tirthikas, Bliss is Nirvana; the impure is all compounded [samskṛta] dhammas , the Pure is the true Dharma that the Buddha and Bodhisattvas have. This is called non-perversion/ non-inversion. By not being inverted [in one's views], one will know [both] the letter and the meaning. If one desires to be freed from the four perverse/ inverted [views – catur-viparita-drsti], one should know the Eternal, Blissful, the Self and the Pure in this manner.”

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, you do not understand the meaning of what you read. And obsessively repeating the same quotation over and over again does not mean anything. The meaning of this sūtra is not explicit, it is indirect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Matt J said:

Well, no matter how Thanissaro Bikkhu interprets the particular sutta, his stance is unequivocal:

Multiply the four varieties of self by their three modes, and you have twelve types of theories about the self. All of these theories the Buddha rejects. He doesn't agree with any of them, because they all involve clinging, which is something you have to comprehend and let go. This means that his not-self teaching is not just negating specific types of self — such as a cosmic self, a permanent self, or an ordinary individual self. It negates every imaginable way of defining the self.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/lib/authors/thanissaro/selvesnotself.html>

dzogchungpa said:

Well, as I said, I'm not an atmavadin, but I suggest you read that whole book and see how equivocal or unequivocal TB's stance is. Here's a nice quote towards the end:... the Buddha never said that there is no self, and he never said that there is a self. The question of whether a self does or doesn't exist is a question he put aside.

Malcolm wrote:

Thanissaro is here quite mistaken.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 29th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

more precisely, his teaching that all dhamma are anatta,

Malcolm wrote:

...including nirvana...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

tingdzin said:

And, as Meido remarked, a little ironic that some Zen stuff has been kept well hidden while nowadays one can read the innermost secrets of Vajrayana and Dzogchen all over the place.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, perhaps people who have a proclivity towards "secrets" should switch to Zen.

tingdzin said:

Well, certainly people who prefer actual practice to endless chatter might try looking into Zen.

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt Zen will make a dent in endless chatter, whether one practices it or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

And in response to the direct question, 'is there a self', the Buddha did not respond, or rather, met the question with a noble silence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Buddha taught quite clearly there is no self in the aggregates or separate from the aggregates. He did not maintain "noble silence" on the issue. There are 14 points about which he remained silent, but the true existence of a self that was either part of the aggregates or separate from them was not a question upon which he remained silent.

Wayfarer said:

As I understand it, 'to teach the self exists is eternalism, to teach that the self doesn't exist is nihilism'. So neither the view 'the self exists' nor the view 'the self doesn't exist' are the correct view.

Malcolm wrote:

As Vasubandhu states in the Kośabhaṣyam:

Further, if it is asked whether there is liberation apart from this [Dharma] or not, there is not. If it is asked why, because of clinging to the false view of self, [others] do not maintain the definition that the continuum of the aggregates alone is designated as a self, they designate the self on some other substance alone, and therefore the afflictions arise from grasping at a self.

If it is asked, "How are we to understand that the expression, 'self', is an expression used to engage the continuum of aggregates alone and nothing else?," it is because [a self] cannot be directly perceived nor can it be inferred. If those other phenomena that exist do not hinder it, it should be directly perceptible, in the case of the the six objects and the mind, or other wise inferable, as in the case of the sense organs.

Consistent with this remark by Vasubandhu we see the Buddha using the term atman to refer to himself, and so on as a mere designation, etc. He never uses it to refer to a real entity, not even in the much vaunted Nirvana Sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 10:47 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

tingdzin said:

And, as Meido remarked, a little ironic that some Zen stuff has been kept well hidden while nowadays one can read the innermost secrets of Vajrayana and Dzogchen all over the place.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, perhaps people who have a proclivity towards "secrets" should switch to Zen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Can prayer flags be hung indoors?

Content:

Ayu said:

Is it mentioned anywhere if the prayers are also distributed by light?

I have some small flags in my window. You can see them from afar. It looks very friendly and joyful. And slowly the letters are fainting from the intense sunlight.

Malcolm wrote:

No, if they were, they would have been called 'od rta, rather than rlung rta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

You can accept their word because of your direct experience in meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

Their meditation deviated into reifying clarity as something real. It is exact mistake all the tīrthika meditators make, which is why the tradition you presented does not go beyond the purusha of Samkhya and Advaita. The only difference between the latter two traditions is whether there are multiple purushas or one universal purusha. In reality, this purusha is called jñā, the knower, no different than the citta you describe.

The second account you gave, where everything is included in one eternal citta, is just the sat cit ānanda of Advaita.

This is completely beyond the pale of Buddhhdharma. It is a totally wrong view, every bit as much of a wrong view as Buddhadasa's rejection of rebirth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Can prayer flags be hung indoors?

Content:

qwerty13 said:

I am getting two kinds of information on this question. Some say prayer flags should not be used indoors (they say it is inauspicious) and others say that they can be used indoors too.

So whats the deal here? Should prayer flags be hung only outdoors?

Thanks for answers!

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but not much point. The point of hanging prayer flags is to use the wind [rlung] as a mount or "horse" [rta] for harmonizing your local environment with the mantras printed on the cloth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Compassion and the Basis

Content:

pothigai said:

I suppose I could modify my question somewhat. Afflicted dependent origination begins with ignorance of the basis, unafflicted dependent origination beings with knowledge of the basis. Can anyone describe the process of unafflicted dependent origination?

heart said:

There is nothing called "unafflicted dependent origination"

/magnus

pothigai said:

What I mean by this is the activities of a Buddha. I assume they do not arise as a product of affliction within a Buddha's mindstream.

Malcolm wrote:

The activities of a buddha arise because sentient beings are deluded. In other words, the activities of a buddha are not other than delusions of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Matt J said:

How does this differ from a self?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not established as something real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 28th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

And in response to the direct question, 'is there a self', the Buddha did not respond, or rather, met the question with a noble silence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Buddha taught quite clearly there is no self in the aggregates or separate from the aggregates. He did not maintain "noble silence" on the issue. There are 14 points about which he remained silent, but the true existence of a self that was either part of the aggregates or separate from them was not a question upon which he remained silent.

dzogchungpa said:

I believe Wayfarer is referring to <http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn44/sn44.010.than.html>.

Malcolm wrote:

But the Buddha did not remain silent on the issue...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Can a stone meditate?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

If this is so, is the highest vipashyana bhumi the same as the consciousness of a stone?

If the emptiness is the same for everything, why is the wisdom different?

Adder said:

Does the stone have consciousness.... can a stone know its own face? No, I don't think a stone even has a 'face' rang-ngo shes-pa

It's not, but the stone already is 'pure awareness' rig pa by not having the stains of mental activity... you cannot kill a stone. At least that is how I view it (at the moment [subject to change w/o notice])

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but rocks do not have rig pa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The distinction between citta and vijñāna is a false one. Citta, vijñāna and manas are all synonyms for one thing. This point of view described above has very little difference with the point of view expounded in the Yoga Sutras — the only difference in fact is that these monks are using the scheme of the skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas, whereas the Yoga Sutras use the Samkhya scheme of purusha/prakriti. What they are describing is exactly purusha.

frankc said:

The distinction isn't a false one.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course the distinction is a false one. The word citta is not at all hard to translate into English.

frankc said:

Here is a teaching from Ajahn Dune Atulo

All Buddhas and all creatures are nothing but one citta. Besides this citta. nothing exist. The citta which has no beginning does not appear and can not be destroyed. It is not something green or yellow. It has no shape nor appearances. It is not included in the existence or the none existence. It cannot be considered new or old, long or short, big or small because it is beyond all limitation measurement, nomination trace and comparison.

Malcolm wrote:

This point of view is even worse — it is basically no different than Advaita Vedanta, it is not even at the level of Yogacara. It is basically a non-Buddhist point of view.

If you have never properly studied Madhyamaka, it is easy to see why you would think this was profound.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Compassion and the Basis

Content:

pothigai said:

Hello all

My understanding is that when in a state of wisdom with regards to the nature of the basis, all phenomena are of 'one taste'. Why then does the energy of the basis manifest as compassion when it is aware of its own nature?

Malcolm wrote:

The basis manifests as compassion, i.e., nirmanakāya buddhas, when a sentient being does not recognize the basis for what it is, his, her or its own nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

And in response to the direct question, 'is there a self', the Buddha did not respond, or rather, met the question with a noble silence.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the Buddha taught quite clearly there is no self in the aggregates or separate from the aggregates. He did not maintain "noble silence" on the issue. There are 14 points about which he remained silent, but the true existence of a self that was either part of the aggregates or separate from them was not a question upon which he remained silent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 10:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Non-Duality, by David Loy. I don't endorse everything he says, but I do think he's one of the few people I know that has made a real effort to tactfully look past the labels.)

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with Loy, and I told him so, 25 years ago at BU, is that he does not differentiate between ontological non-dualism [Hinduism], and epistemic non-dualism [Buddhadharma], in fact he conflates them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

You already get away with openly trying to convert people to your sect in the introductions thread of all places.

<http://dharma wheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=10&t=20696>

Malcolm wrote:

This person was already interested in Dzogchen teachings. Anyway, Dzogchen is not a sect or a tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

Man, brutal. You just insulted someone that was widely considered an Arahant in Thailand based on your interpretation of a Sutta. The Citta as described in the Thai forest tradition is not a consciousness, therefore this sutta is rendered useless in an argument against it. Ajahn Martin specifically says consciousness is a part of the khandas and not eternal. The eternal Citta is independent of the khandas

From Ajahn Pannavaddhos biography uncommon wisdom - Consciousness is necessary to experience the duality of subject and object, but it is completely extraneous and unnecessary to the original citta. So from the point of view of the reality of the knowingness which is the true citta, consciousness is superfluous because the true knowing is always present in the citta, even after all the physical and mental aggregates have disappeared.

So here you see he is referring to consciousness and the citta as two different things. Further proof the sutta is irrelevant to it. Ajahn Maha Bua was a scholar before he became a hardcore meditator under Ajahn Mun. Don't you think he knows what the pali canon says? And Ajahn Thanissaro is a follower of Ajahn Maha Bua's eternal citta. And Ajahn Thanissaro is responsible for a lot of the suttas translations into english, maybe even including the one you sent me!

Luangta Maha Bua called the citta the eternal tourist who goes from life to life. In this case, it is the conventional citta. It would not be wrong to call it a soul or to speak of souls.

Malcolm wrote:

The distinction between citta and vijñāna is a false one. Citta, vijñāna and manas are all synonyms for one thing. This point of view described above has very little difference with the point of view expounded in the Yoga Sutras — the only difference in fact is that these monks are using the scheme of the skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas, whereas the Yoga Sutras use the Samkhya scheme of purusha/prakriti. What they are describing is exactly purusha.

Maha Bua is also regarded as a total heretic by many in Thailand.

There are just so many problems with the views espoused by this monk, who would know where to begin?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 3:53 AM

Title: Re: 4 Tantra`s in Bön

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

1. "Bya-ba'i rgyud",
2. "sPyod-pa'i rgyud",
3. "Ye gshen gyi rgyud", and
4. "Ye gshen chen-po'i rgyud"

kirtu said:

How are these pronounced?

Malcolm wrote:

Jyawey gyud, Chodpey gyud, Yeshe gyud, Yeshe chenpo gyud.

It is kriya tantra, carya tantra, yoga tantra and Mahāyoga tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

Perhaps they just have another narrative they are trying to confirm which isn't an eternalist narrative. How can a Buddhist not have an eternalist narrative anyways? The Buddha describes Nirvana as the supreme happiness. How can something be a supreme happiness if there is nothing left after the five khandas break apart to experience it.

Malcolm wrote:

[Upasiva:]

He who has reached the end:

Does he not exist,

or is he for eternity

free from dis-ease?

Please, sage, declare this to me as this phenomenon has been known by you.

[The Buddha:]

One who has reached the end has no criterion [3]

by which anyone would say that — for him it doesn't exist.

When all phenomena are done away with,[4]

all means of speaking are done away with as well.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/kn/snp/snp.5.06.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Please read the post on Shin again and specifically the quotation in which Shin views are defined by Shin. Ditto for Songchol. In any case, if you are interested in Songchol please find and present your True Self to a Zen teacher. That is the best way to understand Songchol. It is also what he would say to us all so I'm back to the cushion!

Malcolm wrote:

I think he would hand him a volume of the Nirvana Sūtra and tell him to read it....according to SOB's unique hermeneutics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Talking about the self, whatever that is

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

As for the Madhyamaka view you're referencing here it's a wholly separate issue, but I would say that an analysis that dissolves the difference between cause and effect seems to me to be at the very least the beginnings of establishing a view from the ultimate side.

But untangling the two truths at any given moment is a delicate thing and easily leads to needless debate. I would favor us both taking the charitable view and assume the correctness of what the other is saying, in the context in which he is saying it.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna begins the MMK with this famous verse:

At no time and no where does anything arise from itself, from other,
from both or without a cause.

Nāgārjuna's presentation does not dissolve the difference between cause and effect, it states that one cannot coherently designate causes and effects as being either the same or different without the following flaws.

For example, the Samkhya school maintains that effects are present in their causes, violating Nāgārjuna's first maxim, "no arising from itself"; the Vaiśeṣika school maintains that causes and results are utterly distinct, violating Nāgārjuna's second maxim, "no arising from other." The third maxim, "no arising from both" is present merely for formal completeness — I know of no Indian school that proposes both.

The consequence of the first assertion is that arising is unnecessary and there can only be homogenous reproduction of the series [thus proposing that existents arise from existents]. The consequence of the second assertion is that there is arising of an existent result from a cause that has already temporally perished, [thus proposing that existents arise from nonexistents.] The consequence of the third assertion involves the faults of the first two assertions.

Nāgārjuna, and all subsequent Madhyamikas, maintain conventionally that causes are neither the same nor different from their effects in order to account for causal continuity without invoking either identity or discontinuity, thus Nāgārjuna's fourth maxim, "There is no arising without a cause," is never violated at any time.

Of course, later, Nāgārjuna shows that ultimately arising is impossible:

An existent does not arise from existent,
an existent does not arise from a nonexistent,
a nonexistent does not arise from an existent,
a nonexistent does not arise from a nonexistent —
where then is there arising?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Ocean livestream

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Yes, I've been enjoying them. I was a little surprised when he referred to "the empty, open field of our eternal self in the central channel" last night, but it's all good.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, of course, Ray is a gzhan stong pa.

dzogchungpa said:

You mean, like Dudjom Rinpoche, Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, Kalu Rinpoche, the 16th Karmapa and CTR? Whatever could he be thinking?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, just like them, and perhaps a bit more so. I doubt any of them would have used the term "eternal self."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

DGA said:

the short version is that Ch'an / Zen as represented in Tibetan texts doesn't necessarily correspond to how it's been taught and practiced by Ch'an and Zen masters.

MalaBeads said:

Although i dont know how chan/zen was taught or practiced in Hashang's time, i would definitely say this is true today. I remember reading ChNN's small book called "Dzogchen and Zen" and thinking that it did not correspond at all to how the practice was done at SFZC. Then, many years later, I heard ChNN speak of Suzuki-roshi as a vajrayana teacher.

I never met Suzuki-roshi so I don't know how he taught but I have heard some of his students say that Suzuki-roshi himself described his teaching as "Hinayana teaching with Mahayana spirit". Certainly, the precision of the forms was very Hinayana-like. And perhaps the Mahayana aspect goes without saying.

Then, a few years ago, one of Suzuki-roshi main lineage holders, Mel Weitzman, said that Suzuki-roshi had not taught them some of the more advanced practices in the lineage (at least thats how I understood what I heard him say). So there does seem to be an evolution of sorts happening in zen teaching in america. And of course, I am speaking of only one lineage in a vast and complicated school.

Honestly, I don't concern myself too much with what I consider to be ancient history (although I know that for some it is important and indeed can be a life's work). Nevertheless, I very much value what zen taught me, especially the form aspect.

Malcolm wrote:

The kind of Chan ChNN is talking about is the kind of Chan that once existed in Tibet and no longer does. It was discussed at length by Nubchen.

ChNN said that modern Chan/Zen is very influenced by Vajrayāna. There is someone who posts here occasionally, Matilda, who comes from a traditional Soto Temple family. According to her, the senior Soto Priests in Japan preserve a set of empowerments and practices in which they alone engage. It seems that the Soto school has not shared everything of their tradition with westerners so far.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

kirtu said:

“ If there were no permanent, fully illumined state, consciousness could not exist at all. This is the state of the primordial Buddha, the Buddha who has always existed even before our human buddhas were born. This part, all Tibetan Buddhists would agree with Samantabhadra/Vajradhara ...

Malcolm wrote:

No, we would not. Especially not Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 27th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So the views of various persons on this forum represent those different perspectives. You will note that in some threads, the Vedantins are referred to as 'heretics' (I forget the Sanskrit word right now, but it's definitely a pejorative.) But again, that is very much the consequence, in my view, of those centuries of debate and differentiation.

Malcolm wrote:

Tirthika — it is not pejorative. It is a term used in both Buddhadharma and Jain Dharma to describe the head of another school. It has come to mean followers of other schools. It literally means "one who crosses a ford"

The Tibetan translation of the term is mu stegs pa; where mu means extreme, and stegs means upholding, thus it means "one who upholds extremes."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 12:18 PM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

You aren't by any chance suggesting that Kongtrul's or Guarisco's understanding of this stuff might be at least as valid as that of our very own amouththatnevershuts, I mean, asunthatneversets, are you?

Malcolm wrote:

You will observe that in Elio's later translation of Nyingma tenets in in Systems of Buddhist Tantra, ppg. 305-306., done in collaboration with ChNN, he abandons the term "ground of being" for the simpler and more accurate "ground."

dzogchungpa said:

BTW, just for laughs, I point out that Guarisco, in the section on Nyingma tenets in that book, translates "bdag nyid chen po" as "total state of being".

Malcolm wrote:

It is an interesting term. If you examine the context of the term, the way it is used in Tibetan, you will swiftly see that "total state of being" does not work well.

In Dzogchen, the term bdag nyid chen po and bdag nyid accompanies the terms ngang and rang bzhin. This true in both Buddhist and Bon texts.

For example, in the Zhang Zhung sNyan rGyud, we find:

State [ngang], nature [rang bzhin] and identity [bdag nyid] are a trio.

The state is the total clarity of rig pa.

The nature is the total emptiness of rig pa.

The identity is the nonduality of clarity and emptiness.

Everything is understood as pure consummate mind [byang chub sems] through the axiom of total identity [bdag nyid chen po].

I have many similar examples from Buddhist texts. So here, I would prefer to render this term as "total identity."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:49 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that the basis is not "a basis or ground of being" since being, nonbeing, etc. are not established even slightly from the very start within the basis itself. The being of the basis is not established, so how can it form a basis for beings?

smcj said:

Yet you just conceded that Elio's use of "ground", in collaboration with ChNN, was appropriate.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is ok — not the best choice of words. ChNN himself uses "Base".

smcj said:

Anyway, the basis is just a word for one's own unfabricated mind.

...but not if you're a Shentongpa like Dudjom R. And, in fact, that was the specific point that Kongtrul was addressing and refuting by talking about the "ground" in terms where there are no buddhas and no sentient beings--no minds whatsoever.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, Dudjom, Kongtrul and I do not disagree. We understand these texts. But you do not, and so you are perpetually confused as to what they mean because you just read the words without understanding the meaning and so you imagine contradictions where in fact none exist.

And you keep on attributing a dimension of time to a state where there is no time. Dzogchen texts talk about the fourth time. That is the time of the basis, i.e. no past, present, future. Hence use of the terms like original, primordial, and so on. The basis is one's own unfabricated mind — it is not a buddha, it is not a sentient being, it is beyond time, beyond extremes, beyond expression, it has never been liberated because it has never experienced a state of bondage and so on. Accumulating merit and wisdom will not liberate it; engaging in the five heinous misdeeds [harming a buddha, killing an arhat, etc.] will not place it in bondage. There is nothing you can do to improve it, nothing you can do will harm it. It is empty, clear and inseparable. Relatively, when it is not recognized, it is called "the basis appears as the universe." At the time it is recognized, it is called "The universe arises as the basis." The basis is the basis, it is the path and it is the result. There is no buddhahood to find outside of the basis, likewise, there is no buddhahood to find outside of one's own unfabricated mind. One's unfabricated mind is buddhahood. There is no other buddhahood to realize. Everything is complete within that unfabricated mind, all of samsara and nirvana is complete there. And there are also no phenomena of either samsara or nirvana at all present in the basis.

So obviously Kongtrul has a different take on it. You may disagree, as is your right, but if you push it you're basically calling him a tirthika.[/quote]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

Ven Tong Songchol seemed to have no problem quoting Taoist teachers in his teachings, and here we have him speaking of one thing that is eternal that existed before the earth and skies came into being. And what is another thing spoken of in a similar way?

Malcolm wrote:

Of what relevance is this in the Tibetan Buddhism forum?

frankc said:

It's relevant to the interpretation that Ven Tong Songchol was speaking of the "one thing" as an insight into the true nature of phenomena, as opposed to an eternal myterious"one thing" that is never born and never dies.

Malcolm wrote:

What is the relevance of Korean Zen to Tibetan Buddhism?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:20 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

You will observe that in Elio's later translation of Nyingma tenets in in Systems of Buddhist Tantra, ppg. 305-306., done in collaboration with ChNN, he abandons the term "ground of being" for the simpler and more accurate "ground."

Ok, and the difference is...?

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is that the basis is not "a basis or ground of being" since being, nonbeing, etc. are not established even slightly from the very start within the basis itself. The being of the basis is not established, so how can it form a basis for beings?

It does not. In fact, all of this display of samsara and nirvana arise because the basis is not recognized for what it actually is. But there is not even the slightly iota of phenomena within the basis itself.

Anyway, the basis is just a word for one's own unfabricated mind. The generic basis is just a description of that unfabricated mind's characteristics, i.e. emptiness, clarity and their inseparability.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing will prevent the spread of Dzogchen teachings. All the broken samaya in the universe could not damage the spread of Dzogchen even a little bit.

One of the reasons there is so much misunderstanding of Dzogchen teachings is that till now its spread has been limited to an elite.

Adamantine said:

Is this your personal opinion?

Malcolm wrote:

The first sentence is not my opinion, but can be found in the tantras of Dzogchen.

The second is my opinion. Misunderstanding of Dzogchen is not confined to Westerners, a lot of Tibetans misunderstand it as well, even supposed Dzogchen practitioners. Sometimes I think the worst thing that happened in Tibetan religious history was gradual/sudden debate at Samye with the ensuing propaganda war by the Ba clan which was taken up later by Sarmapas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

Ven Tong Songchol seemed to have no problem quoting Taoist teachers in his teachings, and here we have him speaking of one thing that is eternal that existed before the earth and skies came into being. And what is another thing spoken of in a similar way?

Malcolm wrote:

Of what relevance is this in the Tibetan Buddhism forum?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

I can appreciate your perspective on this, but do you then disagree with the lineage masters' cautions regarding degeneration of the teachings through various inappropriate or incorrect understandings and disseminations of those misunderstandings?

I've assumed that the two main threats to proper lineage transmissions and thus perpetuity of vajra dharma traditions and their ability to successfully liberate are a) samaya breakage and b) wrong understanding that is then passed off as correct understanding.. Probably there's plenty of overlap too between a and b.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing will prevent the spread of Dzogchen teachings. All the broken samaya in the universe could not damage the spread of Dzogchen even a little bit.

One of the reasons there is so much misunderstanding of Dzogchen teachings is that till now its spread has been limited to an elite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Talking about the self, whatever that is

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The absence of identity and difference between cause and effect is on the conventional level, that is whole point. From an ultimate point of view, there is no sense in discussing the identity or difference of causes and results.

sherabpa said:

How can this be. On the conventional level, the absence of identity in cause and effect is obvious, and the absence of difference is simply false. This absence has to be on the ultimate level. Yes, there is no sense discussing it, but that does not make it conventional.

Malcolm wrote:

It is conventional, this is why both Nāgārjuna and Candrakīrti use this argument in discussing the conventional production of sprouts from seeds and butter from curds. Go ahead, examine the MMK, you will see I am correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 5:55 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Ground of being" is a term coined by the theologian Paul Tillich to describe God.

dzogchungpa said:

Malcolm, you are very fond of pointing this out but, honestly, it is not relevant.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is relevant. The choice of language in a translation informs our understanding, especially when we are new and do not completely understand the teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Ground of being" is a term coined by the theologian Paul Tillich to describe God.

smcj said:

A case in point to my observation that anything that is compared to Christianity is automatically understood to be unacceptable. I call this P.C.S.D., Post Christian Stress Disorder.

Malcolm wrote:

This is no more nor less than what the Chinese Buddhist did when they found that using Taoist terms in their translations confused their understanding of Buddhadharma. So they stopped doing so, and created a unique Buddhist vocabulary in Chinese to handle translations of Buddhist text.

On the other hand, your attachment to terms like ground of being and defense of them indicates that maybe you have not shaken the theism of your childhood. I was raised without any religion at all, so no PCSD here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

That translation is outdated, there is no such thing as a "ground of being" in Dzogchen... apart from the ālaya of course, which is pure ignorance.

Kalu Rinpoche Translation Committee. State of the art translation.

You keep making that assertion. There are multiple presentations on Dzogchen. This one you don't like. That's ok, it is not the only presentation.

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one presentation of this "cosmology [derived from Dzogchen Upadesha Tantras], the one in Tibetan. That one is very homogenous in other words, if you read one presentation of this subject in Dzogchen, you have more or less read them all.

There are many different translations of that presentation in English which range from fairly accurate to completely bogus.

Here, use of the term "ground of being" for gzhi is an unjustified translation for a straight forward and simple term.

dzogchungpa said:

You aren't by any chance suggesting that Kongtrul's or Guarisco's understanding of this stuff might be at least as valid as that of our very own amouththatnevershuts, I mean, asunthatneversets, are you?

Malcolm wrote:

You will observe that in Elio's later translation of Nyingma tenets in in Systems of Buddhist Tantra, ppg. 305-306., done in collaboration with ChNN, he abandons the term "ground of being" for the simpler and more accurate "ground."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 5:28 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

No, actually it is specifically and deliberately being presented as a "ground of being". "Myriad Worlds" is about the various cosmologies, starting with Mr Meru and such. The only subject matter the book addresses is buddhist paradigms of how the universe is. It ends with a Dzogchen cosmology, which is unambiguously a "ground of being". Excluding the presence of either buddhas or sentient beings makes that clear.

Hey, you don't have to buy it. Plenty of people have become enlightened that find such ideas heresy. But plenty of people, such as Kongtrul himself presumably, have become enlightened while holding those types of ideas. So either way is fine. It is a matter of preference.

Malcolm wrote:

No, SMCJ, the term in Tibetan is simple gzhi, basis. There is no connotation of being presented by use of the term gzhi. In fact the gzhi, the basis is devoid of any extreme of existence, nonexistence and so on. The basis is ka dag, originally pure, i.e. empty, as Master Vimalamitra states:

The basis, the state of initial original purity, is liberated because its essence is not established at all.

"Ground of being" is a term coined by the theologian Paul Tillich to describe God. The basis is not a creative force like God. It does not generate anything. Nothing arises from the basis, and nothing returns to the basis. The Six Dimension offers some clarity:

Dharmatā free from proliferation is originally pure;

it is the basis of an intrinsically pure nature;

it is free from words and syllables;

it cannot be confirmed through expression;

it is free from all conventional reification;

it is without concepts of apprehended objects and apprehending subjects;

it is without buddhas and without sentient beings;

it is without phenomena and without perception of phenomena;

no one, no thing, nothing at all.

When the essence of such nonexistence is confirmed with some words:

the essence is original purity and the nature is natural perfection.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 5:07 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

In another central text, The Fourth Council, Dolpopa challenged the Buddhist community to honestly address the logical inconsistencies in their philosophy, such as: If everything is essentially nonexistent, how does it happen that we're sitting here talking about it?

Malcolm wrote:

The main disciple of Garab Dorje, Mañjuśrīmitra has a reply:

Commoners were born and are being born in various births having coming under the power of birth, similar with the illusion of an elephant produce by an illusionist's knowledge of illusions, the illusions are confused by the illusion;

like being deceived by a dream, the happiness experienced by the dreamer is a dream that has come under the power of a dream.

frankc said:

"With loving reverence," he wrote, "I bow to Buddha, who is the supreme Self, perfect purity, and ever-abiding bliss. The ultimate refuge for beings suffering in this world is the supreme Self, the adamant spiritual being. If this were not a reality, the spiritual path would be useless and enlightenment could not exist. The living experience of reality is joy beyond joy, limitless love, all-embracing compassion, intrinsic awareness, and omniscience.

Malcolm wrote:

The 12th century Tibetan Great Perfection master Rongzom anticipates this:

To determine the greatness of the total non-existence of buddhahood, if buddhahood and non-buddhahood [108/a] are nondual, why is one seeking? Determine there is nothing to seek. The yogins in whom such a meaning is present effortlessly abide on the undifferentiated stage of Samantabhadra. The undifferentiated stage of Samantabhadra is universal stage of all Buddhas. Whatever the meaning of the Great Perfection might be, that is it.

frankc said:

“Joining my palms together in deepest respect, I appeal to you to consider that if there were no absolute reality, there could be no relative world. If there were no permanent, fully illumined state, consciousness could not exist at all. This is the state of the primordial Buddha, the Buddha who has always existed even before our human buddhas were born. This state is always fully present in each of us, but it is not available to those who argue philosophically; it is only available to the yoga practitioners who cleanse their minds in order to experience it directly.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, Mañjuśrimitra states:

Therefore, because awakening and non-awakening are the same in terms of absence of characteristics, there is nothing to accept or reject.

In accordance with the meaning of that, all those explanations of the nominal ultimate, the absence of arising and ceasing, sameness, nonduality, beyond thought, emptiness, the dharmadhātu, freedom from expression and convention, and so on are not ultimate and also are not relative.

If it is said, “This is the path in accordance with the ultimate,” that is relative.

Do not abandon or dwell in any Dharma at all, with or without doubt.

Because the meditator and the dharmadhātu do not exist, there is nothing to doubt and there is no nothing to see as ultimate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Talking about the self, whatever that is

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Hi Malcolm. Yes, understood, from the ultimate level.

But at issue with the Ajahn was his account of rebirth from what I would consider the conventional level, and my point was that his kind of reasoning was overly simple for the kind of learners he's likely to be confronted with. Lacking the resources of the Mahayana, let alone the Madhyamaka, it would seem to me better to at least be consistent with the notion of identity, and even better to bracket the whole area of the conventional self for which he can give no satisfactory answers.

Malcolm wrote:

The absence of identity and difference between cause and effect is on the conventional level, that is whole point. From an ultimate point of view, there is no sense in discussing the identity or difference of causes and results.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 4:17 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:

frankc said:

In Vajrayana Buddhism, the Adi-Buddha, or Adibuddha (Tibetan: Dang-po'i sangs-rgyas), is the "Primordial Buddha." The term refers to a self-emanating, self-originating Buddha, present before anything else existed.

Malcolm wrote:

Um, actually, this definition is completely and utterly wrong. Sorry, but it is typical Wiki-garbage.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 4:11 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:

Son of Buddha said:

(1) by his definition the Buddha was an eternalist because the Buddha taught the 4 virtues of Nirvana(permanence,bliss,self,purity) in the Buddha Nature Sutra's.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha also taught that nirvana was not permanent and not impermanent and so on in other sūtras, still in others he taught nirvana was cessation, etc.

The point is that one cannot always take what the Buddha says in the sūtras literally.

One has to discern what is definitive and what is provisional. As far as the Tathāgatagarbha sutras go, there are two ways to understand them: a provisional way which causes one to be a kind of eternalist; and a definitive way which is free from the fault of the provisional approach and has no taint of attachment to dualities such as permanent, impermanent and so on.

Of course you will respond with the three turnings of the wheel interpretive scheme, but I have already shown elsewhere in detail that the Tibetan use of this schema finds no support at all in Indian literature, especially not with Maitreyanatha, Asanga, etc., and is in fact is the system of a Korean master who commented at length on the Samdhinirmocana-sūtra, whose commentary exists in the Tibetan canon and was very influential.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 3:57 AM
Title: Re: Talking about the self, whatever that is

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

As an example let's look at a talk on rebirth by Ajahn Brahmalī, which is available on YouTube. This is not to rag on the Ajahn, who overall gave a good presentation for learners. But in his attempt to cut off clinging to self he used the identity argument in such a way as to illustrate what I've been saying.

In short, he argued for the absolute discontinuity of consciousness, from one thought moment to the next, and so the incoherence of a continuous identity. Of course this just begged the question(s). As one young woman in the room asked, What thought moment is it that is cognizing this absolute discontinuity? His answer was evasive and weak, suggesting some kind of inference.

And even a moment's reflection reveals that yes I'm not the same as I was a moment ago, but I'm also not different. (And isn't this very same point made in the Surangama sutra, if memory serves?) But there's a more serious objection yet.

The doctrine of rebirth depends for its coherence on some notion of identity, as Bhikku Bodhi points out without controversy I think in his article on rebirth (again available online). So we have this peculiar consequence that we poor benighted sentient beings are only granted identity at the point of rebirth but not in our actual lives!

Malcolm wrote:

The Madhyamaka point of view is that causes and effects are neither the same nor are they different, thus avoiding all contradictions between absence of identity and continuity. Therefore, there is no need for the doctrine of rebirth to hinge on any kind of identity proposition in order for someone to maintain continuity in a series.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

I'm afraid that Buddhists often underestimate the subtlety of non-Buddhist systems (but this goes all the way back to the reputed first sutta of the canon, the Brahmajāla).

Rongzom said:

These words of the Great Perfection, stated in very bold and coarse language, are subtle and fine like the element of space; also the systems of the lower vehicles, though spoken in subtle and very fine language, are coarse and rough like a pile of dust.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 3:44 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:
Again all the traditions, at their deepest levels, point to the unconditioned.

Nāgārjuna said:
Since arising, abiding and perishing are not established, the conditioned is not established;
since the conditioned is not established, where will the unconditioned be established?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 3:01 AM
Title: Re: Dharma Ocean livestream
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
Yes, I've been enjoying them. I was a little surprised when he referred to "the empty, open field of our eternal self in the central channel" last night, but it's all good.

Malcolm wrote:
Well, of course, Ray is a gzhan stong pa.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:56 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:
smcj said:
Tathagātagarbha is just a convention...
I'm ok with that idea.

it does not indicate anything real at all...
I'm ok with that too. I prefer adjectives such as authentic, valid, true, etc. "Real" makes it sound like an existent.

Plus I think that it is obvious that since Madhyamaka proves nothing anywhere in the universe is "real" in terms that can be logically put forward, that our ideas of what constitutes "real" is completely mistaken. It is like starting out with the assumption that there are unicorns, and then when you can't find any you ignore the fact that your assumptions about them were wrong in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:
Tathāgatagarbha does not indicate anything authentic, valid, true and so on. Why?

Because there is no authentic, real, true etc., basis for such a garbha.
"Tathāgatagarbha", just like "sentient being" and "buddha" are just conventions that do not convey any truth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Also what were the provisional dzogchen teachings provisionally taught for?

Malcolm wrote:

For people who need a teaching of a buddhahood that is not a result of a cause, causes taught in such sūtras as the Nirvana, like gathering the two accumulations and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Three Words of Dr. Jim Valby:

Introduce yourself to a delusion.

Spread it as widely as possible.

Continue in that state forever.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

I could of swore an externalist was

Malcolm wrote:

Eternalist [śāśvatavādin], not externalist [tīrthika]...

It is possible to be the former without being the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:27 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

smcj said:

The Buddha taught eternalist teachings provisionally for people of similar dispositions to yourself, people very hung up on words.

Well that's good enough for me!

Malcolm wrote:

What use is permanent, truly existent and so on, when nothing relative is established at all? True, permanent, existent, pure and so on are all relative. They only exist with respect to the false, impermanent, nonexistent, impure and so on. If the latter are not established, how could the former be established? This is so obvious, I really fail to see why people cannot grok this point.

This is why this whole dialogue is fraught with error from the beginning...

Tathagātagarbha is just a convention, it does not indicate anything real at all...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Of course you call me an externalist, it makes me wonder if you even know what an externalist is in the context of the Buddha Nature teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

An eternalist one who maintains that there is a permanent, truly existent, pure, permanent self, as you do.

The Buddha taught eternalist teachings provisionally for people of similar dispositions to yourself, people very hung up on words.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

.....do you?

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, I frankly think you do not understand the meaning of what you read. It is a very simple observation.

It's ok though, it is better to be an eternalist like yourself than someone who follows annihilationism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It increases alienation, and prevents people from making a positive connection with the teachings.

MalaBeads said:

Yes, alienation. That's a very problem in today's world. How to include everyone?

Malcolm wrote:

There are six liberations, not only one.

But if people express interest in the teachings, even only academically, they should be encouraged.

Obviously, if someone is not interested, then there is no point in evangelizing them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 26th, 2015 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

[

Also I don't have to give my interpretation of how the term self is used in the Buddhist Buddha Nature sutras, I can show you what the Sutras actually say it is..... My interpretation need not apply.

Malcolm wrote:

One is supposed to follow the meaning, not the words. In your case, I cannot say that you are observing this maxim with regards the tathāgatagarbha sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I validated Jackson's Pointing Out instructions and they were authentic in the sense that they could open a window to Rigpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Eating at restaurants that serve meat and alcohol

Content:

goldenlight said:

If Shakyamuni was horrified by mundane stuff like that then the Shakyamuni that you venerate was not a Buddha.

That is exactly what is assumed these days, The premise that Shakyamuni was above the mundane and that all phenomena are empty and devoid of existence, And with this notion people are misled to indulge in misdeeds. These are mentioned in the Shurangama Sutra, unfortunately a gem of a sutra it is and people disdain it as being apocryphal.

Malcolm wrote:

Not all Mahāyāna Buddhist read the Shurangama Sutra. For example, it did not exist in the Mahāyāna Sūtra portion of the Tibetan Canon. So Mahāyāna Buddhists in Tibet do not accept it as an authoritative sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Abhijñā and Dzogchen

Content:

pothigai said:

Generally it seems that, according to the Pali Canon, a practitioner develops the abhijñās upon mastery of the fourth jhāna. I've heard accounts of people developing them earlier as well, these experiences are mainly to do with remembering past lives. It seems that these abilities arise as a result of the mind being free of the five hindrances; the product of abiding in jhāna.

Within the Dzogchen path, are such abilities also developed? If so, at what point does this happen?

Malcolm wrote:

They develop in the second vision.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 10:41 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

According to Dolpopa, the Madhyamakas had grasped the second stage teaching, that there is no permanence in the universe, but had missed the all-important third stage doctrine.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently Yogacarins missed it as well because in their treatises authors such as Maitryanatha, Asanga and Vasubandhu pay absolutely no attention to the hermeneutic strategy of three turnings of the wheel.

Quite frankly, the fact that Tibetans in later generations such as Dolbupa pay so much attention to this strategy represents a critical failure in their scholarship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 6:52 AM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

smcj said:

However if you alter the premise, "the awakening of the sugata does not exist" to "the awakening of the sugata does exist" (as later authors do)

Malcolm wrote:

Mañjuśrīmitra was the direct disciple of Garab Dorje, a fully awakened person who attained great transference. This is the Dzogchen Forum. So....who cares what later authors say?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

But there must be some cause for the appearance of Rupakaya as experienced by sentient beings, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Are you looking for the Dzogchen answer?

tomamundsen said:

Yes, please, Loppon.

Malcolm wrote:

Mañjuśrīmitra writes in the Meditation of Awakened Mind:

Because the awakening of the sugata does not exist, his magical apparitions appear to the deluded, similar to an illusion.

Thus, the cause of the appearance of the rūpakāya is the delusion of sentient beings and nothing more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Ekayana

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Outside of the context of Chan and Mahayana sutras are there any Tibetan materials discussing this topic?

I'm not thinking of general discussions about second versus third wheel, two truths etc. But a more specific discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Sakya School advocates the Ekayāna approach based on the Lotus Sutra.

passel said:

Fascinating. Do they get this from Xiyi or is it an independently derived doctrine? I guess not too hard to arrive at since the Lotus Sutra is all about ekayana. Wouldnt require tientai help but just curious if there was any back and forth there.

Malcolm wrote:

None, no back and forth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 2:58 AM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

tomamundsen said:

But there must be some cause for the appearance of Rupakaya as experienced by sentient beings, right?

Malcolm wrote:

Are you looking for the Dzogchen answer?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I'm pretty deep into the Drikungpas at the moment therefore that's how I am understanding it too. I.e. purification of obscurations equals rigpa, including the obscuration of trying to manufacture it.

Malcolm wrote:

This approach is typical of the vehicles of cause and effect. It is not the Dzogchen approach at all, which is beyond cause and effect. In other words, Buddhahood is not held to be a result of purification of obscurations nor the accumulation of merit and wisdom.

smcj said:

This sounds to me just like the Buddha Nature teachings and much of Zen also. "The clouds cannot taint the sun", etc.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the tathagātagarbha teachings are causal vehicle teachings, and buddhahood still depends on the two accumulations, as the Uttarantra states:

The two accumulations are its cause, the result of that cause is supreme awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?

Content:

frankc said:

Can you give me some references to Zen teachers completely forthright about the true self/atman/soul just like straight in your face " THE ETERNAL UNCHANGING SOUL SEPARATE FROM THE FIVE KHANDAS EXISTING OUTSIDE OF TIME AND SPACE COMPLETELY INDESTRUCTIBLE A MYSTERY BEYOND CONCEPTS THE ETERNAL KNOWER FIVE HUNDRED MEN WITH SPEARS CAN'T TOUCH IT AHHHH" It's hard for me to find just straight teachings on this thing. Like even on the Jonang website there's barely anything.

seeker242 said:

The Lankavatara Sutra, a very popular zen sutra, talks a lot about this sort of thing. But you really don't ever get a "completely forthright" description of it. But that's not a failure of the teachings, it's a failure of the nature of words and concepts to begin with.

Then Mahamati said: Again, Bhagavan, are words themselves the highest reality? or is what is expressed in words the highest reality?

The Bhagavan replied: Mahamati, words are not the highest reality, nor is what is expressed in words the highest reality. Why? Because the highest reality is an exalted state of bliss, and as it cannot be entered into by mere statements regarding it, words are not the highest reality. Mahamati, the highest reality is to be attained by the inner realization of noble wisdom; it is not a state of word-discrimination; therefore, discrimination does not express the highest reality. And then, Mahamati, words are subject to birth and destruction; they are unsteady, mutually conditioning, and are produced by the law of causation. And again, Mahamati, what is mutually conditioning and produced by the law of causation cannot express the highest reality, because the indications [pointing to the distinction between] self and not-self are non-existent. Mahamati, words are these indications and do not express [the highest reality].

One's true self is "unconditioned" and therefore cannot be accurately described by the conditioned.

That which is unconditioned goes beyond all idle reasonings. That which goes beyond all idle reasonings, that is the Tathagata. Mahamati, this is the essence of perfect enlightenment, this is the self-nature of Buddhahood which is removed from all senses and measurements. So it is said:

79. That which is released from senses and measurements is neither an effect nor a cause; it has nothing to do with knowledge and that which is to be known; it is free from predicated and predicating.

80. There is something which is nowhere to be seen by anybody as the Skandhas, causation, enlightenment; of that which is nowhere to be seen by anybody, what description can we make?

81. It is not something made nor unmade, it is neither an effect nor a cause, it is neither the Skandhas nor not-Skandhas, nor is it other than the combination.

82. There is something that is not to be seen by the discrimination of its being, nor is it to be known as nonexistent; such is the self-essence of all things.

The Lankavatara Sutra is one of my favorites. Although, not exactly "completely forthright" in a sense. Although, depending on how you look at it, one could say it's about as completely forthright as you can get!

Malcolm wrote:

I would not place a lot of confidence in this translation, it is extremely inaccurate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa is not intrinsic to every experience. If it were, there could be no ma rig pa, and there would never be any need to point anything out at all.

asunthatneversets said:

Do you think confusion about this arises due to the fact that "rig pa" as a Tibetan term can also mean plain old, everyday "knowing"? I've seen some teachers use it in that context, such as when the relative knowing of mind as gnas gyu shes pa is referred to as rig pa in the context of gnas gyu rig gsum. This seems to create confusion and lends to the misconception that rig pa is always present.

For instance, Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche uses rig pa like that, but then makes a point to differentiate two different types of rig pa, which strikes me as a plausible example of how so much confusion arises over this principle.

In the case of stillness [gnas pa], occurrence [gyu ba] and noticing [rig pa], the word rigpa is used for noticing. Self-existing awareness [rang byung rig pa] is also called rigpa. The word is the same but the meaning is different. The difference between these two practices is as vast as the distance between sky and earth.

Malcolm wrote:

rang byung rig pa is "self-originated rig pa", it means knowledge [rig pa] of your primordial state that originated [byung] from your own [rang] discovery of it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Ekayana

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

M-la - now, bearing in mind I didn't ask the broader question whether dzogchen/ati/lamdre etc is really a Buddhist "yana" or "school" at all - how do the Sakyapas reconcile the inclusivism of this ekayana view with vehicles that include the result in the path/cause?

Malcolm wrote:

They maintain that there is one goal, and hence one vehicle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Ekayana

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Outside of the context of Chan and Mahayana sutras are there any Tibetan materials discussing this topic?

I'm not thinking of general discussions about second versus third wheel, two truths etc. But a more specific discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Sakya School advocates the Ekayāna approach based on the Lotus Sutra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 25th, 2015 at 12:10 AM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This approach is typical of the vehicles of cause and effect. It is not the Dzogchen approach at all, which is beyond cause and effect.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Ty, it gets paradoxical, however.

Your view is that, according to ati, purification as a preliminary is unnecessary since confusion itself is wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is not my view at all.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

However this somewhat refutes the very view you try to support - that there exists ma rigpa.

If preliminary yanas/dzogchen ngondro are unnecessary because confusion is always already wisdom, in what sense can there ever be ma rigpa?

If your view is correct rigpa in fact is intrinsic to every view.

Malcolm wrote:

You are countering an argument I have not made.

The 47th chapter of the All-Creating King Tantra states:

Because the Great Perfection has always been beyond cause and result, there is nothing to do and nothing to accomplish with seeking and practicing.

Having set the scriptures taught by the teachers of the view of cause [sentient beings] and result [buddhas] as standards for the phenomena of worldly characteristics, a result to accomplished is sought from a cause.

Without a cause in the mind there has never been a result because there is no arising in awakened mind [bodhicitta].

Having used an example for worldly arising phenomena, perishing after arising cannot be termed production.

Since the self-originated beyond cause and result cannot be examined, having set the standard for the phenomena of worldly characteristics, it claimed that a result is produced that is sought from a cause, that is the provisional scripture of the vehicles of cause and result.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I'm pretty deep into the Drikungpas at the moment therefore that's how I am understanding it too. I.e. purification of obscurations equals rigpa, including the obscuration of trying to manufacture it.

Malcolm wrote:

This approach is typical of the vehicles of cause and effect. It is not the Dzogchen approach at all, which is beyond cause and effect. In other words, Buddhahood is not held to be a result of purification of obscurations nor the accumulation of merit and wisdom.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Since Rigpa is intrinsic to every experience...

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa is not intrinsic to every experience. If it were, there could be no ma rig pa, and there would never be any need to point anything out at all. This distinction has nothing to do at all with "scholarly explanations." It has everything to do with being properly trained by a qualified teacher of Dzogchen however.

smcj said:

This isn't a challenge, but an actual translation question.

Isn't all experience either rig pa or ma rig pa, with normal awareness being ma rig pa? And therefore, as is suggested by the semantics, is not the root rig pa is always present, with the only differentiation between awareness and unawareness being the presence or absence of the prefix ma?

Just curious.

Malcolm wrote:

The term "rig pa " refers to a very specific kind of knowledge. Ma rig pa is the absence of that knowledge, plain and simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: Experience of Shunyata All the Time?

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Since Rigpa is intrinsic to every experience...

Malcolm wrote:

Rigpa is not intrinsic to every experience. If it were, there could be no marigpa, and there would never be any need to point anything out at all. This distinction has nothing to do at all with "scholarly explanations." It has everything to do with being properly trained by a qualified teacher of Dzogchen however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Student Teacher Relationship in Modern Age

Content:

steve_bakr said:

For a Direct Introduction to the Nature of your Mind, please read, "Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness," by Guru Padmasambhava, translated by John Reynolds. It is available on your Kindle or in print.

Malcolm wrote:

This not a direct introduction. One cannot receive direct introduction from a book.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Gyalwa Menri Wa, New Jersey, May 2016: Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

Thanks.

If the subsequent teachings are in 2016, is there some expectation of one doing a lot of accumulation before parts two and three, or...?

Garudavista said:

I had the same question and emailed my question to the director at Olmo Ling who asked Tempa Lama who said that "as long as you have received the preliminary transmission [i.e. part 1 in November], you can attend the subsequent A Khrid teachings. It's not necessary to be finished with the 100,000 recitations."

As for the meaning of nyoshi, I'm not sure either. In the context of the sentence it seems to have something to do with instructions related to the teacher's direct experience. I tried looking for the meaning of the word on Google but couldn't find anything. Malcolm, do you know what nyoshi means?

Malcolm wrote:
dngos gzhi means "main section".

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 5:21 AM
Title: Re: Buddhist teachers that teach a true self?
Content:

Son of Buddha said:
I think the Dali Lama in his book mentioned that Sakya master Rendawa taught True Self as well.

Malcolm wrote:
Hahahahahaha — Rendawa was the most staunch opponent of the Jonang School, his student was Tsongkhapa. Rendawa declared that gzhan stong was "outside the pale of Buddhism." hahahahahaha.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 5:10 AM
Title: Re: Gyalwa Menri Wa, New Jersey, May 2016: Dzogchen
Content:
DGA said:
Thanks.

Now I'm having a confuse, because it also says that ngondro isn't necessary to participate in this teaching... which is a no-brainer if it's a ngondro teaching. "ngondro" can mean more than one thing, though. It's the four thoughts that turn the mind; it's the accumulations of prostrations and so on; and then there are specific practices associated with certain Dzogchen transmissions that are also called "ngondro." If the subsequent teachings are in 2016, is there some expectation of one doing a lot of accumulation before parts two and three, or...?

I also don't know what Nyoshi means.

I'm sorry if all this is obvious in context; I'm an ignorant lout asking out of interest in Dzogchen but lacking in context or much knowledge at all about Bon. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

It just means that in some of his A khrid teachings, you should have attended section one. Here, no need since it is the preliminary section.

Here Ngondro means Ngondro, as in refuge, bodhicitta, etc. The first five or so sections involve some Ngondro teachings up to guru yoga among meditation instructions as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Gyalwa Menri Wa, New Jersey, May 2016: Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

I just had a good experience at Serenity Ridge in Virginia (they allow participants to camp it if they want, which is great--I slept in my truck).

I'm curious how these teachings are divided up into segments. What does "part one" of the A-Khrid involve? how many parts are there?

thanks

Malcolm wrote:

It is probably the A Khrid in fifteen sections — about 36 western pages. There are other instructions, the fifteen section A khrid in the version I have amounts to about 165 pages of instructions. There is also another earlier manual divided into eight or ten sections. It is about 135 pages all totaled.

I imagine, though I could not tell you for sure, that is is three sections divided by five sections. It has the usual subjects like confidence in the guru, bodhicitta, refuge and confession, mandala, supplication to the guru, etc.

So I imagine that first retreat focuses mainly on Ngondro, the second and third retreats focus mainly nature of mind, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 24th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

kirtu said:

Here's something: some people are forever trying to project their assumed universal norms onto others and force others into the structures that they have imposed on themselves mentally. For example, most Americans do this daily with their racial trauma. So we can get a good deal of exaggeration that people really think reflect actual reality.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, when someone says "Most X do Y...."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

is highly counterproductive, IMO.

MalaBeads said:

How so, malcolm? I would like to understand more.

Malcolm wrote:

It increases alienation, and prevents people from making a positive connection with the teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Gyalwa Menri Wa, New Jersey, May 2016: Dzogchen

Content:

DGA said:

Am I badly misinterpreting this? I'm trying to understand what needs are met by organizing this event in this way. As someone who is interested in the logistics of how to organize an event like this, I'm interested to know how well this serves the participants in the retreat.

Malcolm wrote:

If you think this is expensive, you should check out his program to become a long life and prosperity ritual specialist, and it is packed!

There is a market for it. But not all Bon programs are so expensive, as you know.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Do you know why he makes this seemingly controversial choice?

Is it explained why in Light of Kailash ?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he explains all of his points of view on this in LOK. ChNN makes the argument that Zhang Zhung is the origin of many Tibetan cultural practices, including elemental calculation.

As to the absence of an elemental calculation in China resembling anything like what we find in Tibet, there is the story that the Tang emperor was so incensed at the use of calculation by the Tibetan minister Gar to trick him, the emperor had all texts of calculation burned, and that the only surviving copies, known as the The Eighty Cycles of Porthang [spor thang brgyad cu skor] were brought to Tibet by Srong btsan sGam po's chinese wife, Kongjo.

The science of sa dpyad, site examination, is part of this collection of knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN generally favors the Bonpo histories on the origins of such sciences. You can read about it in Light of Kailash.

catmoon said:

You call them sciences? How very generous of you.

Malcolm wrote:

Per the OED:

science | 'siəns|

noun

the intellectual and practical activity encompassing the systematic study of the structure and behavior of the physical and natural world through observation and experiment: the world of science and technology.

- a particular area of this: veterinary science | the agricultural sciences.
- a systematically organized body of knowledge on a particular subject: the science of criminology.
- archaic knowledge of any kind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Who are the sources for Chinese influence?

Malcolm wrote:

Depending on whether you follow Chö or Bon it differs.

According to Chö, the master Duhar Nagpo introduced divinatory sciences to Tibet during the Imperial period after they were taught by Mañjuśrī on five peaked mountain. Also, Wenjo supposedly introduced them during the time of Songtsen Gampo.

According to Bonpos, it was Legtang Mangpo, who received it from Kongtse, after Kongtse received it from the Bon equivalent of Mañjuśrī, Mrawey Senge.

amanitamusc said:

Has ChNN commented on this?

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN generally favors the Bonpo histories on the origins of such sciences. You can read about it in Light of Kailash.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, the perfect site for chod is:

On red cliffs there are tsan, on black cliffs there are düd,
at lakes and springs on slate mountains, nāgas,
on most grass covered hills there are classes of gnyan.
on rock mountains are gyalpos and the'urang.

Cliffs and mountains are equivalent,
supporting happiness, sloping in the front.
Male mountains are wide, female mountains are narrow.
The mountain is the body, the lake is the heart,
the spring is the life channel, and the trees are the hair,
the crest of the elephant, the heart of the human,
the highest burden of horses and animals,
the excellent place for overcoming the opponent,
that is the place to remain for Chod.
That is called the "eye of the gnyan."

Norwegian said:

Great quote. Thanks for posting this. Where is it from?

Malcolm wrote:

Same as above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Who are the sources for Chinese influence?

Malcolm wrote:

Depending on whether you follow Chö or Bon it differs.

According to Chö, the master Duhar Nagpo introduced divinatory sciences to Tibet during the Imperial period after they were taught by Mañjuśrī on five peaked mountain. Also, Wenjo supposedly introduced them during the time of Songtsen Gampo.

According to Bonpos, it was Legtang Mangpo, who received it from Kongtse, after Kongtse received it from the Bon equivalent of Mañjuśrī, Mrawey Senge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, the perfect site for chod is:

On red cliffs there are tsan, on black cliffs there are düd,
at lakes and springs on slate mountains, nāgas,
on most grass covered hills there are classes of gnyan.
on rock mountains are gyalpos and the'urang.

Cliffs and mountains are equivalent,
supporting happiness, sloping in the front.
Male mountains are wide, female mountains are narrow.
The mountain is the body, the lake is the heart,
the spring is the life channel, and the trees are the hair,
the crest of the elephant, the heart of the human,
the highest burden of horses and animals,
the excellent place for overcoming the opponent,
that is the place to remain for Chod.
That is called the "eye of the gnyan."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Resources on Sacred Geography

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is a kind of literature called sa dpyad, literally, "site analysis" that gives various indications and sometimes even diagrams like the following: mountain_types.jpg (15.07 KiB) Viewed 4065 times

This illustration, from left to right, shows mountains according to elemental typology: wood [མེ], fire [མི], metal [རྒྱལ་ས] and water [སྐ].

It is generally held that the science of sa dbyad comes from China. The above illustration is from a text from is called The Treasury of Jewels, Chinese Site Analysis [rgya nag dpyad nor bu'i gter mdzod]. There are also site examination texts from India, having to do with mandala construction, as well as the subject of Vastu śāstra.

The dual influences of Chinese and Indian culture on these issues is demonstrated by Karma Chagme's short text on this subject. We can see here too Tibetan pre-Buddhist ideas about ancestors and so on in the way the term bla is used in this specific context. The first chapter of Karma Chagme's text states:

The accurate result of the relative site:
in general, all of the outer universe and inhabitants have the nature of the five elements.
India, China, Mongolia and Tibet are based on the way earth element has formed.

The chronicle of happiness, suffering, increase and decrease, wealth and poverty is clarified in the site examination texts of Kīlaya.
Therefore, this location of the living, such as location of the house and so on, is important.

Life [srog], the soul [bla] and consciousness [rnam shes] are a trio.
Life is taken by the ghostly butcher.
Consciousness is the slave of karma.
Having taken the form of the past life, the soul exists in the tomb site.
If the tomb site is good, that soul prospers, will protect and guard the living, and is called "being guarded by the souls of the paternal ancestors."
If the tomb site is bad, that soul flounders, and since it seeks protection in the living,
the misfortune of unbearable illnesses arise.
Therefore, the site of the tomb is important.
It was said by Ārya Mañjusfī in the Tantras of the Divinatory Sciences of China,
"If the corpse is carried to a badly analyzed site, even animals will be crushed into dust."

The text continues in the following chapter by listing various titles of Chinese and India site examination texts. Chapter three gives the general technique. Chapter four gives the techniques for picking a tomb site. Chapter five gives the specifics for picking a house site. Chapter six gives the specifics for selecting a site for practicing Chod.

FYI, the above text is a section of Karma Chagme's Mountain Dharma.

Much of this information about directions, shapes of the land and so on is to be found in elemental calculation, which is also part of the "Divinatory Sciences of China."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 23rd, 2015 at 12:07 AM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Ayu said:

Misunderstanding:

I suppose it was me, who moderated. But it was not for "attacking and missinterpreting" that person. I just edited the name. Nothing else. No warning. I just asked them, not to mention that name.

Without telling the name, I regarded the topic as "considering a problem". With telling the name this "considering" turned to slander in my eyes. The statements could be right, but with the name you can find the slander easily by google...

I'm sorry that so many people don't understand this. For me it is so clear.

Malcolm wrote:

In the United States we are used to something called "Freedom of Speech," so when you go editing things out, this offends many of us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 11:11 AM

Title: Re: Eating at restaurants that serve meat and alcohol

Content:

smcj said:

Yikes! U.D. your posts were nothing but supportive of ChNN. And I hope none of my posts are being interpreted as offensive. I think there's some bad information floating around.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Thanks! That's what I thought too!

But lama Konchog Namdrol, says that he's received complaints by the DC community on DW ...

Malcolm wrote:

I doubt it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 11:10 AM

Title: Re: Eating at restaurants that serve meat and alcohol

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Well, this lama Konchok Namdrol is harassing me and my friend because of some trespass on DW, and is threatening to get us banned from all the Buddhist forums and webcast Buddhist activities such as ChNNR's webcasts and Garchen Rinpoche's webcasts. Sorry, but we take that seriously as we are students of both lamas.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no one can ban you from DC webcasts since they are open. No one will ban you from Vajracakra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 10:06 AM

Title: Re: Eating at restaurants that serve meat and alcohol

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I was told to never post again by lama Konchog Namdrol, who has some relationship with DW that I don't understand.

Malcolm wrote:

And a relationship that no one else knows about or cares about.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I guess I'm defying that order. Ban me. I don't care.

Malcolm wrote:

How could anyone ban you? This phantom Lama has no authority here. Screw all limitations imposed by others. We have enough to deal with dealing with our own limitations.

Urgyen Dorje said:

It's ridiculous to make an arbitrary line in the sand over eating meat and drinking alcohol. Good Buddhists, here, bad ones, there.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, agreed. Liberation is not found in what one eats or drinks.

Urgyen Dorje said:

To this day. It's a pretty shitty thing all around.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup. There are no rules.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

Dan74 said:

And in Sweden, there is very little racism.

Malcolm wrote:

The most explicitly anti-gay, anti-semitic person I ever met in my life, outside of Americans I have met, was a woman from Sweden. Really, I was very surprised. I think xenophobia runs deeper among Europeans than many people realize.

Norwegian said:

Yes. I'm quite surprised Dan74 suggested this. Sweden has a lot of problems with racism and xenophobia.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Racism_in_Sweden

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nazism_in_Sweden

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Antisemitism_in_Sweden

<http://foreignpolicy.com/2014/09/16/how-a-former-neo-nazi-party-became-swedens-third-largest/>

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, I think that we can all agree that we ought to do something to help the 20 million refugees in the world today.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

Dan74 said:

And in Sweden, there is very little racism.

Malcolm wrote:

The most explicitly anti-gay, anti-semitic person I ever met in my life, outside of Americans I have met, was a woman from Sweden. Really, I was very surprised. I think xenophobia runs deeper among Europeans than many people realize.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 21st, 2015 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Malcolm, what about the time you quoted Rongzom saying first dhyana is necessary for Dzogchen practitioners?

Malcolm wrote:

What I said was that Rongzom maintains that if one has not understood the meaning of Dzogchen directly, one should meditate either sūtra or tantra style [without a bias towards either, incidentally], cultivating these five mental factors that constitute the first dhyāna, trying to maintain total attention [shes bzhin, saṃprajāna] within the horizon of complete mindfulness [dran pa, smṛtiḥ]. Thus, for many of us, developing this dhyāna is important to the degree that it assists us maintain the view. These two words, smṛtiḥ and saṃprajāna, incidentally, as the words ChNN is translating using "presence and awareness."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

passel said:

This is one of the things I wonder about- does this mean that attentional stability is optional for dzogchen? (actually seems plausible to me for certain individuals), or (more plausible to me) that the attentional stability is a necessity but is developed in a variety of alternative contexts to what has been "officially" known as "shamatha"? My suspicion is that it's the latter. (The story of Garab Dorje maintaining equipoise as the devatas blew horns in his ears, e.g.)

Straightforward shamatha has been an important part of my path and will continue to be, I can't undo my foundation, so I suppose this is just idle curiosity on my part...

Malcolm wrote:

Samadhi is innate, it is part of the 10 neutral mental factors all sentient beings possess.

You will often find in the Dzogchen tradition the idea of self-arisen concentration — this is a result of recognizing the basis [aka rig pa] and stabilizing that recognition through various practices as Ivo mentions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only that never changes is the space element. And it does not exist as such.

Harimoo said:

"The only thing that never changes is the space element".

Because time is space ?

I don't understand.

lostitute said:

How can you say that space is permanent if it doesn't exist anyway? If it's permanently never there, then anything that doesn't exist is also permanently never there and changeless...

Malcolm wrote:

Right, the characteristic of space is its total absence, which is why the element of space is defined as "non-obstruction." It and the two kinds of cessation, are the only kinds of uncompounded phenomena [dharma, lit. bearer of characteristics] there are.

Everything else is compounded or conditioned.

When you begin to delve into higher Buddhist tenets, the metaphor of space becomes more important, since emptiness is linked to it. It is the basis and container of everything without being anything at all. Since it is the basis and container of everything, everything it supports isn't anything at all, like a magician's illusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

lostitute said:

It was just an example of something that doesn't change just because you look at it or you don't.

Malcolm wrote:

The only that never changes is the space element. And it does not exist as such.

catmoon said:

Quantum mechanics says something very different. It not only has structure on the very fine scale, even when dead empty in the colloquial sense, and at absolute zero temp, it contains measurable amounts of energy.

Now the Dalai Lama says that when science and religion disagree, it is religion that must adjust....

Malcolm wrote:

Wrong space, you are talking about conditioned space.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 10:09 AM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

kirtu said:

The vast majority are not. Even so, there can be provincialism even without overt nationalism.

Malcolm wrote:

Tell that to Algerian kids in France...

kirtu said:

You are correct about that. Unfortunately the same (or similar) is true for any North African descended kid and almost any Arab kid as well.

Just like the prejudice against African-Americans, many Hispanics and American Indians in the US.

There aren't that many differences, except that Americans to their credit have been addressing both overt and subtle racism while the French just seem to flounder along. However I haven't seen this up close for over 20 yrs now. Hopefully the French have at least begun to address the issues.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Well, no. I think that European xenophobia is greatly exacerbated compared that that of Americans in general, that at least is my experience of Europeans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 10:07 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Is it a kind of space that only certain people are able to perceive?

Malcolm wrote:

No one can perceive it because it is mere absence of obstruction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

SeeLion said:

No, because space is uncompounded and never arose.

Are we sure space didn't arise at the Big Bang ?

Malcolm wrote:

The kind of space I am talking about did not arise at the big bang.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 20th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

kirtu said:

I have rarely met Europeans who have no knowledge or experience with other cultures and countries and languages.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because Europeans are jammed up next to each other. It apparently does not necessarily save them from being ignorant bigots however.

kirtu said:

The vast majority are not. Even so, there can be provincialism even without overt nationalism.

Malcolm wrote:

Tell that to Algerian kids in France...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 11:38 PM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

kirtu said:

I have rarely met Europeans who have no knowledge or experience with other cultures and countries and languages.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because Europeans are jammed up next to each other. It apparently does not necessarily save them from being ignorant bigots however.

kirtu said:

We see a rise of nationalism more of late but I would like to think that this is transient (and I have long wanted people like le Pen to leave the stage but their successors and ideology are still stubbornly drawing crowds).

Malcolm wrote:

The EU is and was a big mistake, especially for Italy, Greece and Spain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Where is?

Content:

jnanasutra said:

ཐུང་ཏིང་འཛིན་བཟང་པོ།

Malcolm wrote:

What do you mean where is Nyang Tingzin Zangpo?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 10:51 PM

Title: Re: The Nature of Buddhahood

Content:

BrianG said:

Virupa saw a Nirmanakaya before he became an arya.

kirtu said:

BrianG - when did that happen?

Thanks!

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

He is referring to Virupa's encounter with the woman we know as Nairatma, Virupa's guru. In the bios she is called a nirmanakāya, this means she was a human woman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All that was said was that Dzogchen is not a path of analysis and that Kamalashila's objections were rejected.

Astus said:

When I wrote "the very basis of vipasyana as it's been taught since the Nikayas", I meant that it teaches the primary form of analysis. .

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

Those definitions seem to support my post.

Astus said:

It is used in the context of directly accessing non-conceptuality. It is mistaking a vacant mind as the realisation of emptiness.

smcj said:

That's what I said.

The mistake being the type of awareness, which is sleep like or hypnotic, not the lack of conceptuality. The awareness is supposed to be vivid and alert. The lack of conceptuality is what lends itself to misinterpreting it as correct.

Actually Khenpo Tsultrim says in "Progressive Stages of Emptiness" that once the innate Buddha Nature expresses itself, that a Madhyamika can, out of habit, incorrectly try to analyze it.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because Khenpo Tsultrim is actually a Dzogchen practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 5:37 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

Thus it is not enough to have an experience of mind without concepts...

Malcolm wrote:

No one ever said it was.

All that was said was that Dzogchen is not a path of analysis and that Kamalashila's objections were rejected.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

chimechodra said:

Thanks tigersnest! I actually met Lynn while I was at that retreat in July and just signed up for her course.

Does anyone know if you need anything besides transmission for Vajrapani practice? I imagine there's a lung required, does anyone know if he gave the lung in the July Massachusetts retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

he gave it. He always gives it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But if you are not interested in Dzogchen practice, then my answer will not help you at all.

cloudburst said:

fair enough, but in this case I am not seeking your help, but rather attempting to have a discussion.

my point here as you know is that direct introduction introduces you to a non-conceptual awareness that is not necessarily on the path of seeing. Without the analysis enjoined by kamalashila, the union of shamatha and vipashyana, you are stuck. you are not even on the path of application at that point.

Malcolm wrote:

Sort of, though that is not really what rig pa means.

No one ever said it was the path of seeing. But paths and stages are completely irrelevant to Dzogchen. You do not need the kind of analysis advocated in sutra to realize buddhahood in the path of Dzogchen. It simple isn't a requisite.

There are other practices that one does instead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

how do you "apply" an introduction to yourself?

Malcolm wrote:

If you want to know about Dzogchen practice, then you should go study at the feet of a Dzogchen master. Then all your questions will be answered. But if you are not interested in Dzogchen practice, then my answer will not help you at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

then you apply it yourself.

cloudburst said:

apply what to your self, precisely?

Malcolm wrote:

The introduction until you are no longer remaining in doubt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 19th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

For incredibly advanced practitioners, it might be possible to attain the path of seeing outside of meditative equipoise through introduction, but the rarity of that boggles the imagination. To go around promoting this as a path that would be generally accessible I think is a huge disservice to those with interest and aspiration.

Malcolm wrote:

Introduction is a path. Once you have received introduction from a qualified person, then you apply it yourself. The only qualification one needs is interest.

In Dzogchen, it is sufficient to have an inferential understanding of emptiness, for example, derived from the eight examples of illusion.

The path itself does not necessarily involve any analytical vipaśyāna at all. It involves working with the experience of the introduction itself.

Dzogchen is not a path based on causes and results, as difficult as that is for many people to accept.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

What I have tried to highlight is that the amazement/wonder/shock technique in Dzogchen seems to be what's addressed by the quoted passage from Kamalashila.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think so. He is addressing a different problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Obviously there is a difference between practitioners who work in universities and academics who are not practitioners. I think what sangye was referring ("it has to stop") is the latter...

Malcolm wrote:

But it won't. Everything is out there for people to read. That is just the way it is. People might not like the way academics comment on Dzogchen and other Buddhist topics, but that is not going to stop anyone. And frankly, telling people who are academics they cannot come to this or that teaching unless they promise to take up the Buddhist religion is highly counterproductive, IMO.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, such analysis is not necessary in Dzogchen practice, not in any sense at all.

Astus said:

At this moment, you are free from all fixed notions of what mind might be, and liberation itself is actualized: "There is nothing there: transfixed in wonder,"

(<http://www.lotsawahouse.org/tibetan-masters/patrul-rinpoche/tsik-sum-nedek-> commentary)

Malcolm wrote:

Patrul Rinpoche states:

First is the method of introducing the view that has not yet been revealed. Generally speaking, there are many ways of bringing the view to realization. In the sūtrayāna path of dialectics the method of lung rig [scripture and reasoning* MS] is employed; that is, using the scriptural authority of the teaching of Buddha and the great masters, and through logic and reasoning, arriving at the realization of the view.

According to the common approach of Secret Mantrayāna, by means of the wisdom of example in the third empowerment, one is introduced to the real, ultimate wisdom in the fourth empowerment.

Here, according to the special approach of the great masters of the practice lineage, the nature of mind, the face of rigpa, is introduced in and upon the very dissolution of conceptual mind.

Neither of the two latter methods require analysis, as I said, "Anyway, such analysis is not necessary in Dzogchen practice, not in any sense at all."

The crucial point here is that rigpa, which abides as the ground of dharmakāya, is the primordial purity of the path of the yogins, the absolute view of freedom from all elaboration. Until you recognize this one point, then whatever meditation or practice you do, you can never get beyond a fabricated mind-made view and meditation. The difference between this and the approach of the natural Dzogpachenpo is greater than that between earth and sky, as it does not possess the essential point—the unceasing flow of clear light, which is non-meditation. So it is most important, first of all, to recognize this and this alone, and: "Recognize this as the pure awareness of dharmakāya".

I don't know why you bother citing Patrul Rinpoche, as he merely illustrates my point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

DGA said:

At this point, I'm having a hard time tracking what is meant by "conceptual" and "analysis" in this discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Analysis is conceptual and discursive by nature.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Can you learn and practice Tibetan Buddhism from books?

Content:

Ervin said:

I bought a book today, it's called Stillness insight and emptiness, Buddhist meditation from the ground up. Written by Lama Dudjom Dorjee.

So I was wondering if I can simply buy books and practice meditation and precepts, etc without a teacher and sangha?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing in Buddhadharma may be truly learnt unless you learn it from a teacher. Buddhadharma is an oral tradition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And a counterclarification from the same text, pg. 153.

Unshakable by the likes of Mārā, when one cultivates suchness with the power of zeal, then the stage of zealous conduct is distinguished on the basis of intense zeal. The bodhisattva existing in this stage, although still an ordinary person, has completely passed beyond all the calamities of a fool and is endowed with innumerable qualities like samadhis, spells, freedoms, superknowledges and so on.

Astus said:

And the preceding sentence says: "as long as one does not directly experience the suchness (tattvam) of the selflessness of the personality and of dharmas, (there is) only a very intense zeal"

However, as shown in my previous collection of clarifying quotes, meditation is about direct perception, and through vipasyana that is what is achieved. The zealous stage is about aspiring to that direct experience, it is the time of practice on the basis of the instructions, required before realisation is attained.

The text continues in the section on zealous conduct:

"But when one would ascertain the non-dual knowledge which is devoid of the forms of the object and subject, then this is the degree of penetration designated "The best (worldly) condition" (agradharma). And this is called "The samadhi without interval" because, in fact, immediately following it one enters into suchness."

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that you kept denying there was a conceptual meditation on suchness and thus, were quoting passages not in accordance with their meaning.

Anyway, such analysis is not necessary in Dzogchen practice, not in any sense at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 9:09 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus, still, this shows a yogin who has not yet achieved the path of seeing.

Astus said:

Here are some further clarifications then from Adam's translation of the 1st Bhavanakrama, key terms underlined by me:

Malcolm wrote:

And a counterclarification from the same text, pg. 153.

Unshakable by the likes of Mārā, when one cultivates suchness with the power of zeal, then the stage of zealous conduct is distinguished on the basis of intense zeal. The bodhisattva existing in this stage, although still an ordinary person, has completely passed beyond all the calamities of a fool and is endowed with innumerable qualities like samadhis, spells, freedoms, superknowledges and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 5:19 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Your mistake is assuming I am talking about SDR — I am not, I am talking about the attitude exemplified by Sangye.

Adamantine said:

There's a saying "when all you have is a hammer all you see is nails" ever heard it?

There's some students of ChNN that like to weave illusions of conflict in order to proclaim the superiority of their Guru and his style. It's quite silly and it's been going on here among more or less the same handful of people over and over for years.

Malcolm wrote:

Huge projection.

Adamantine said:

It was never intended to have this one quote decontextualized and posted on an Internet forum and for other students of other Lamas to follow the advice.

Malcolm wrote:

No kidding.

Adamantine said:

I know, I know, some people here believe they fall into the category of sublime beings but I'm not easily convinced by you. Take care.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahahaha. What a laugh.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

catmoon said:

It seems to me that Astus and Malcolm are both correct here. If one is focusing on an "image both conceptually and non-conceptually" perhaps this includes both your views, since focusing non-conceptually must in some sense entail the abandonment of the image, because it is conceptual in nature. Likewise, focusing on the image conceptually is indeed one step removed from actual suchness.

Malcolm wrote:

It just means that there is no discursiveness with regards to the object, that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The term "rtogs pa" in Tibetan means either "to realize" or "to understand." Here it means the latter more than former.

The conclusion is not false, it is merely a conceptual approximation that is cultivated on the path of application. And the text does not switch topics, you just are not following the gradualist perspective of Kamalashila correctly.

Astus said:

In Adam's translation (p 207):

"When a yogin does not actually hold firmly to the nature of any entity, then he enters nonconceptual samadhi. And he also understands the absence of inherent nature of all things."

And while he uses understanding there, the previous sentence says one realises nonconceptual samadhi, and it is because of that that one can understand emptiness. If the suchness there were just an imagined concept, it wouldn't be nonconceptual samadhi.

Malcolm wrote:

Even hindus have nonconceptual samadhis; one can have a nonconceptual samadhi on a concept. Thus, still, this shows a yogin who has not yet achieved the path of seeing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, Astus, this part of the text is not talking about the first bhumi. This is talking about heat on the path of application where in fact you reflect on generic concepts of emptiness.

Astus said:

That does not really fit with the description of what is performed during meditation.

"In this way, when the person does not firmly apprehend the entity of a thing as ultimately existing; having investigated it with wisdom, the practitioner engages in non-conceptual single-pointed concentration. And thus the identitylessness of all phenomena is realized."

Then that conclusion of vipasyana is false. Or in the following paragraphs it switches topic to describe the path from a different perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

The term " rtoḡs pa " in Tibetan means either "to realize" or "to understand." Here it means the latter more than former.

The conclusion is not false, it is merely a conceptual approximation that is cultivated on the path of application. And the text does not switch topics, you just are not following the gradualist perspective of Kamalashila correctly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 18th, 2015 at 12:16 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

I think you're the ones conflating issues. SDR never said anything about distribution or security clearances of classical Dzogchen texts. That's an issue you've created as a straw man.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, I am merely pointing out that it is senseless to keep certain classical Dzogchen texts restricted. There is no decent reason for it any more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only that never changes is the space element. And it does not exist as such.

Harimoo said:

"The only thing that never changes is the space element".

Because time is space ?

I don't understand.

Malcolm wrote:

No, because space is uncompounded and never arose.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"This is the path of engaging in a union of calm abiding meditation and insight. Its focuses on the image conceptually and non-conceptually." pg. 140.

Thus, "This suchness is a generic image of suchness, it is not real suchness," as I said.

Astus said:

According to HHDL's commentary (p 141) it doesn't refer to some image but it's a synonym:

"Then once more continue your meditation on the union of special insight and calm abiding, which is also known as focusing on the reflection both conceptually and non-conceptually."

And Kamalashila continues:

"Thus, through this progress, a yogi should meditate on suchness for an hour, or half a session in the night, or one full session, or for as long as is comfortable. This is the meditative stabilization thoroughly discerning the ultimate, as taught in the Descent into Lanka Sutra."

It is on suchness, not some image of suchness. And that's what is in the text in every place, directly seeing suchness, not simply an image or concept of it.

The quote provided in my previous post states: "apprehends the selfless nature of all phenomena", and that's the very result of the vipasyana. It would be quite pointless to achieve simply a generic concept, since for that there is no need to perform any meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Astus, this part of the text is not talking about the first bhumi. This is talking about heat on the path of application where in fact you reflect on generic concepts of emptiness. This is why the text says on page 143, "If you act thus, your meditative stabilization will actualize that emptiness that possess the supreme of qualities," meaning that you have not yet actualized the first bhumi and the path of seeing.

HHDL's comments bear my point out. Seriously, you have a deep misunderstanding of this text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Just chanced upon this post from Malcolm from this thread

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=17097&start=40> which somehow communicates in its own way what SDR and ChNN are getting at ... I'm quite confused by the straw men that have been scattered throughout this thread considering..

Malcolm wrote:

That is because you are conflating two issues:

Necessity for transmission

Distribution of classical Dzogchen texts

No one disputes that the former is needed to properly understand Dzogchen, let alone realize it.

However, what we have been discussing is the question of whether the burden of treating classical Dzogchen texts like a state secret, with security clearances and so on, is really necessary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This suchness is a generic image of suchness, it is not real suchness.

Astus said:

"Thus such a mind in the entity of ultimate bodhicitta included within the path of seeing, which apprehends the selfless nature of all phenomena is generated. Through this achievement one enters into the path focusing on the reality of things and one is then born in the family of tathagatas, enters the bodhisattva category without flaws, turns away from all migrations, abides in the suchness of bodhisattvas and attains the first bodhisattva bhumi (spiritual level)."

Malcolm wrote:

No Astus, the passage you cite above, "If and when the mind is spontaneously engaging in meditative equipoise on suchness free of sinking and mental agitation, at that time it should be left naturally and the efforts relaxed." [pg. 139] Is followed in the text by:

"This is the path of engaging in a union of calm abiding meditation and insight. Its focuses on the image conceptually and non-conceptually." pg. 140.

Thus, "This suchness is a generic image of suchness, it is not real suchness," as I said.

You are quoting Kamalashila all out of order and disregarding the sequence of his presentation of śamatha and vipaśyāna. That is just bad scholarship.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 7:52 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

smcj said:

A couple of sentences later he mentions that it is possible to present Dzogchen as a stand alone practice without a context (like ChNN does evidently), but Gyaltrul R. always taught him that it was part of the Path.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen has its own basis, path and result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 7:51 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

chimechodra said:

Would you happen to know if this was given at the end of the July retreat in Massachusetts? (Also is there a list of what lungs he gave where? Hard to keep track!)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he gave it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Ready for some comic relief?

Content:

catmoon said:

Oh btw it's worse than that. My analysis of Nagarjuna (which is of course authoritative) shows that instead of solving the excluded middle problem, by adopting a four pole logic system, he actually increases the excluded middle problem manyfold. This simple logical problem invalidates almost everything he said. Well not invalidates... but removes the seeming pillars of logic that support his arguments, reducing them to mere suppositions.

To wit: Instead of a single excluded middle between yes and no, we get the following middle grounds, most of which are chronically excluded and never mentioned:

Between yes and no

Between yes and (both yes and no)

Between yes and (neither yes nor no)

Between no and (both yes and no)

Between no and (neither yes nor no)

Between (both yes and no) and (neither yes nor no)

Edit: and it gets worse still because there are tripolar middle grounds and even a quadripolar one!

Malcolm wrote:

All of these are automatically negated by the non-affirming negation of yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 7:38 AM

Title: Re: Ready for some comic relief?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no excluded middle in Buddhadharma.

catmoon said:

Yes there is. See? We just excluded it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this does not work.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 7:34 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

you did not provide a very detailed presentation.

Astus said:

Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>:

"What properly examines suchness from within a state of calm-abiding meditation is penetrative insight."

"When suchness is properly meditated upon with wisdom, purified transcendent wisdom is realised. Since wisdom alone can realise suchness and can effectively eradicate the obscurations, I shall therefore search for suchness through wisdom while engaging in calm-abiding meditation. And I shall not remain content with calm-abiding meditation alone.

What is suchness like? It is the nature of all phenomena that ultimately they are empty of the self of person and the self of phenomena. This is understood by the perfection of wisdom and not otherwise."

"What is thoroughly realised by the mind too is realised as being empty. By realising that, the very identity which is established as the aspect of the mind, like the identity of physical form, etc., is also not ultimately perceived. In this way, when a person does not ultimately see the identity of all phenomena through wisdom he would not analyse whether physical form is permanent or impermanent, empty or not empty, contaminated or non-contaminated, produced or non-produced and existent or non-existent.

Just as physical form is not examined, similarly feeling, recognition, compositional factors and consciousness are not examined. When the object does not exist, its particularities also cannot exist. So how can they be examined? In this way when the person does not firmly grasp on to the entity of a thing as ultimately existing, having investigated with wisdom, then the practitioner engages in a non-conceptual single-pointed concentration. And thus identitylessness of all phenomena is also realised."

"In this way one who has entered in the suchness of the selflessness of person and phenomena is free from concept and analysis because there is nothing to be thoroughly examined and observed. One is free from expression and with one-pointed mental engagement one automatically enters in meditation without manifest discrimination. Thus one very clearly meditates on suchness and abides in it."

"If and when the mind is spontaneously engaging in meditative equipoise on suchness free of sinking and mental agitation, at that time it should be left naturally and the efforts relaxed."

Malcolm wrote:

First Kamashila sets forth his objective. Then he describes the means he wants to use to get there. A realized bodhisattva has no need for the following: ""If and when the mind is spontaneously engaging in meditative equipoise on suchness free of sinking and mental agitation, at that time it should be left naturally and the efforts relaxed."

This suchness is a generic image of suchness, it is not real suchness.

Many people do not have this idea. They meet Buddhadharma and then spend lots of time refuting a self they never believed existed to begin with.

The general idea of self includes that it remains the same from one day to another. What not many people have is a more sophisticated soul/atman view.

Many commoners do not really have this idea — first they have to be brainwashed into refuting a self most of them will readily agree they do not have, unless they have a belief in a soul. Many atheists are quite happy they have no soul, and if you tell them their "self" is a cognitive imputation, they happily go along with this idea.

Umm, no.

How so? That something is only a conventionally agreed name means that it has no basis beyond the concept.

That is not merely what conventional means. For example, according to one famous presentation of Madhyamaka, things are not non-existent in the relative. The term vyavahāra has come to mean a mere designation in some Buddhist circles, but even here, there are levels of vyavahāra, holding that this or that is vyavahāra does not mean that one is not also a realist. For example, "water" is vyavahāra, but its qualities of limpidity and wetness are parāmartha dharmas according to Sautrantikas. For example, according to one famous presentation of Madhyamaka, we cannot say a car is nonexistent, even though it is conventional, we can only say that there is no inherent car in a car, not that there is no car in that which is conventionally termed "a car" because such a thing has been designated on the basis of its parts. Why? Because that which is conventionally designated a car functions as a car, and hence it is car. According to this specific brand of Madhyamaka, a car has a basis beyond its concept, its parts. One cannot designate a bunch of sticks and leaves a car and expect to drive anywhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: Ready for some comic relief?

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

[1] The Excluded Middle walks without feet, on no discernible path, and never arrives. Even the Excluded Middle sometimes wonders: what's the point?

[

Malcolm wrote:

There is no excluded middle in Buddhadharma. Also the middle is negated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Bhuddists are the master race

Content:

catmoon said:

Well not all of them, not everywhere, but those Sherpas certainly are if you happen to find yourself climbing above 25,000 feet.

Recent genetic studies are looking at the mutations that allow Sherpas and other Tibetans to tolerate altitude easily. The weird part is one of the mutations causes Sherpas to make FEWER red blood cells. When a Westerner without the mutation is progressively exposed to higher altitudes, we make more blood cells to compensate. This process gets more and more extreme the higher we go, until in the death zone, we run into problems with blood viscosity which lead to High Altitude Pulmonary Edema and High Altitude Cerebral Edema, both life-threatening conditions.

Now the Sherpas don't do that. They make a pretty normal number of blood cells and avoid many problems, thanks to a mutation that seems to be less than 10,000 years old.

Another mutation looks like it is involved with oxygen metabolism. Maybe they don't pile up lactic acid via anaerobic metabolism to the extent we do. Maybe they can scavenge oxygen out of the blood stream better. No one knows yet but its an area of active research. This one is an older mutation.

There are quite a number of mutations that occur with roughly a 90% frequency among Tibetans, and some of them run as low as 1% frequency among Han Chinese. I find it really intriguing that we are so close to understanding the hows and whys of it all. A significant possibility is that it may be possible to develop an injection that will turn you into a Sherpa for a while.

How effective are these mutations? A few years back there was a massive problem on K2 and people were dropping like flies. If you enter the death zone, normally you have about 48 hours to get down before you become nonfunctional. That's a death sentence at altitude. A fellow name Pemba Gyalje Sherpa (sp?) began rescue operations, and by the time he was done he had spent 90 continuous hours in the death zone. Basket case right? Nope, when he was done he just hiked off the mountain. He was fine.

Of course it might be entirely due to Buddhist mental discipline and the help of Tara but somehow I don't think so...

Malcolm wrote:

Denosovians, man...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

chimechodra said:

Thanks Malcolm! Does the SSI store have any Chenrezig/Avalokitesvara sadhana texts (and maybe even an explanation manual/guide?) for anyone who has received general transmission? I've only ever practiced Chenrezig in the context of my local Kagyu center on their Wednesday nights, and this is the only item I see on the SSI site:

http://shangshung.org/store/index.php?main_page=product_info&cPath=74_94_100&products_id=240

Would this be recommended? Let me know, thank you!

Malcolm wrote:

You need the lung for this, but it is given at every retreat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

cloudburst said:

Aren't they falsifiable though? For example, If someone just proved things existed by way of and essence, or that consciousness had a material basis ?

Malcolm wrote:

Not for the ordinary consciousness of regular folks.

cloudburst said:

As I understand it, for something to be falsifiable, there simply has to be some way that it could be shown to be false.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, to the consciousnesses of ordinary people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is, it is the conceptual emptiness meditated/cultivated during heat on the path of application.

Astus said:

Still, Kamalashila does not talk about conceiving emptiness but realising it directly.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, you did not provide a very detailed presentation.

Astus said:

An experience of permanence is going to a place and seeing the same rock there, year in year out. Does not mean the rock is permanent, but it is the kind of thing that provides common people with their notion of permanence and durability.

It is a notion of permanence, a concept, that can be removed by directing them to analyse what they actually experience.

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously, this does not work — case in point, eternalists.

Astus said:

No, actually they are not. A lot of Buddhist training involves planting ideas in people's heads that actually they don't hold.

Like the endurance of a real self?

Malcolm wrote:

For example, yes. Many people do not have this idea. They meet Buddhadharma and then spend lots of time refuting a self they never believed existed to begin with.

Astus said:

No, Madhyamikas understand nonarising [It is Yogacaras who do not], their problem is clinging to true relative truth.

How could it be true if it is conventional? The very meaning of conventional is that it is not true.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no.

Astus said:

it is a critique of grasping in different systems, as already explained above.

It does not actually address the systems but reinterprets them according to his preferences and thus criticises systems that never existed. It's like those non-Buddhists who attack the Dharma because they misconstrue it as nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Sure it does. Rongzom knows these things much better than you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 4:10 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

cloudburst said:

Aren't they falsifiable though? For example, If someone just proved things existed by way of and essence, or that consciousness had a material basis ?

Malcolm wrote:

Not for the ordinary consciousness of regular folks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

catmoon said:

I begin with the Kalama sutta, which enjoins the careful examination and application of what we learn of dharma, and reaching our own judgments.

It does nothing of the kind.

I hold the same view as Vima here. What's wrong with it?

Malcolm wrote:

The Kalamas sutta is addressing the Kalamas people, who were not Buddha's students. But in the end, they became Buddha's students.

Once you become a student of the Buddha's, then:

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying in Savatthi, at the Eastern Gatehouse. There he addressed Ven. Shariputra: "Shariputra, do you take it on conviction that the faculty of conviction, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation? Do you take it on conviction that the faculty of persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation?"

"Lord, it's not that I take it on conviction in the Blessed One that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction in others that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation. And as for me, I have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment. I have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation."

"Excellent, Shariputra. Excellent. Those who have not known, seen, penetrated, realized, or attained it by means of discernment would have to take it on conviction in others that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation; whereas those who have known, seen, penetrated, realized, and attained it by means of discernment would have no doubt or uncertainty that the faculty of conviction... persistence... mindfulness... concentration... discernment, when developed and pursued, plunges into the Deathless, has the Deathless as its goal and consummation."

http://www.buddhasutra.com/files/pubbakotthaka_sutta.htm

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dear reader, note that supernatural = fairyland = insanity.

catmoon said:

Duly noted. This is perhaps one of your deepest insights.

What's that you say? You were being sarcastic?

Well then, extraordinary claims require extraordinary evidence, so I think the burden of proving the existence of the supernatural now lies with you.

BTW I'm not just poking you in the eye here, nor do I dispute the existence of the supernatural, it's just the argument looks like it has this hole in it.

Other than that I think you're in better form than ever. Go Malcolm!

Malcolm wrote:

Oh no, you misunderstood — I was pointing out that our friend here was making rather disrespectful analogies.

Things like rebirth, buddhafiels, etc. are completely unfalsifiable. But saying that something is not falsifiable is not suggesting that it is equivalent to a flying spaghetti monster or horns on a rabbit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

chimechodra said:

Would this just be mantra practice within the natural context of something like a Chenrezig Sadhana,

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

lostitude said:

It was just an example of something that doesn't change just because you look at it or you don't.

Malcolm wrote:

The only that never changes is the space element. And it does not exist as such.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

lostitute said:

I don't see why? You can experience something permanent but not always be in the right frame of mind to experience it. It is like perceiving background noise, you actually hear it only if you pay sufficient attention to it.

Astus said:

Permanence excludes causality. Being recognised is a change in conditions. Also, if it is one's permanent self, the self is the one that should recognise itself, and since it is permanent, it either always knows itself or never.

lostitute said:

I guess this philosophy really isn't for me then... to me, whether you open or close your window to let the sunlight come in, won't change anything about the sun itself... but ok, doesn't matter, each to his own

Malcolm wrote:

The sun is also not permanent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Now while I do have a strong streak of rationalism - as do you, my new dharma buddy, the Venerable Malcolm - that's not my fundamental mental disposition - which is more properly labeled "pantheistic". For as long as I can remember I have had that well-attested sense of the aliveness of things, of trees and rocks as well as sentient beings, and not just on sunny days. Of course this kind of feeling is tucked into or appropriated by most religious traditions where one can find its warrant. In the Gospel of Thomas, for example, where we find Jesus saying, "The kingdom of God is spread upon the Earth but men do not see it", and of course in many Zen sayings and Zen inspired poetry.

Now someone with this disposition may point to this and call it God or Brahmin and, while not necessarily being in error, may be adding a head to the one that's already there. That's why I've always been drawn to Buddhist dependent origination and the middle way as perhaps a more accurate and direct approach.

Of course I only speak for myself, but one with this disposition may experience, by moments at least, objects and beings, including one's own person, as a kind of transparency, as being particular instances of one energy, but a single energy that cannot be reified into some kind of literal "one".

Now just to be precise, I'm not calling myself a "pantheist"; I'm only copping to that disposition, and like all mental dispositions it's only the beginning to much that needs to be worked out and developed.

I could babble on of course, and you know already what a terrible blabbermouth I am, but all this is to explain why I find it so weird to be called a "materialist", just because I find no evidence for or need to believe in particular theories about the nature of consciousness.

So you see I may well be an idiot, and maybe just as annoying as any other, but I thought it was of use to at least point out precisely what kind of idiot I am.

Malcolm wrote:

Finally, something from your heart, rather than a bunch of insouciant intellectualism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

However, the knowledge obscuration is abandoned at the very end, at buddhahood, because it is more fundamental than the afflictive obscuration. Thus there is an non-afflictive ignorance that is the ignorance of which produces self-grasping, which even tenth stage bodhisattvas retain, and the afflictive ignorance which is the basis of taking birth in the three realms, abandoned on the seventh stage.

cloudburst said:

Can you do better than just asserting your view?

Malcolm wrote:

Can you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And again, the mind of analysis is a very coarse mind. That itself is a block for realization. For example, with our ordinary eyes we cannot see very subtle things. Likewise, with our ordinary conceptual minds we cannot realize what which is subtle and hard to realize. The best we can do is generate a coarse conceptual simulacrum. Then, in order to generate the subtle mind necessary for realizing the true nature of things, well, it takes a long time through sūtrayāna methods, many eons, just to even realize the first bhumi.

Astus said:

What defines coarse and subtle mind for you? No simulacrum is mentioned in the Bhavanakrama or other texts I'm aware of.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is, it is the conceptual emptiness meditated/cultivated during heat on the path of application.

Astus said:

Sure.

And what is reliable? Something one can grasp and hang on to?

Yes, just like people have convincing experiences of ropes as snakes.

Nobody sees snakes all the time, they at best think there is a permanent substance behind/within what they can experience in the six senses.

Malcolm wrote:

An experience of permanence is going to a place and seeing the same rock there, year in year out. Does not mean the rock is permanent, but it is the kind of thing that provides common people with their notion of permanence and durability.

Astus said:

Again, here is your claim that you have to begin with a position, only to abandon it later. This is like believing that in order to walk barefoot, one must first put on shoes and then take them off.

As noted before, people are already in the state of assuming positions and it is not adding another to point out the error.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually they are not. A lot of Buddhist training involves planting ideas in people's heads that actually they don't hold.

Astus said:

And yet, again and again, so-called Madhyamikas make strenuous efforts to defend what they know is not true. This is the problem with Madhyamaka, again identified by Rongzom:

So, there are three things not understood: homogeneity (unity of the two truths), non-duality (unity not conceived as 1+1) and non-arising (lack of substance to come or go).

Malcolm wrote:

No, Madhyamikas understand nonarising [It is Yogacaras who do not], their problem is clinging to true relative truth.

Astus said:

Unless this is merely a critique of style and not content, but in that case it is an aesthetic question.

Malcolm wrote:

it is a critique of grasping in different systems, as already explained above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 17th, 2015 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

muni said:

Namkhay Norbu Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

Namkhay Norbu, not Namkhay Norbu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

to be more precise, knowledge obscurations arise from having had afflictive ignorance since beginningless time. like the smell of garlic in a wooden box, the smell has its origin with the garlic but persists after the garlic has been removed.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. The knowledge obscuration precedes the afflictive obscuration, in other words, the latter arises from the former.

cloudburst said:

can you prove that? Im interested.

Malcolm wrote:

Prove it? How can you prove anything?

However, the knowledge obscuration is abandoned at the very end, at buddhahood, because it is more fundamental than the afflictive obscuration. Thus there is a non-afflictive ignorance that is the ignorance of which produces self-grasping, which even tenth stage bodhisattvas retain, and the afflictive ignorance which is the basis of taking birth in the three realms, abandoned on the seventh stage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Patrul Rinpoche's The Vision of Clear Light is a practice text, not a classic? The Four Dharmas of Longchenpa?

Malcolm wrote:

Again, these books are commentaries by Rinpoche on specific texts, connected with ChNN's transmission for his students.

But Longchenpa's text of the four Dharmas has been openly published for decades now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Malcolm, if your newest opinions in this thread (which have already shifted sharply from your initial comments at the beginning) are truly mirroring those of your root Guru's (ChNN) in opposition to your other Guru's (Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche)—which is the impression you've been giving—then can you explain why such a great proportion of texts in the Dzogchen Community's bookstore

<http://shop.shangshungfoundation.com/en/best-sales?p=2> -not just sadhanas but also teachings / explanations of Dzogchen- are restricted?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about practice texts. I am talking about the great classics, like the Seven Treasuries, the 17 Tantras, Yeshe Lama, Guhyagarbha Commentaries, Nyinthig Yazhi, and so on.

I have no problem with practice texts being restricted within the communities who use them. For example, I am an SMS student, I have no problem with the SMS texts being restricted to people who have done the levels to which they correspond — none whatsoever.

I am broaching a wider issue.

Adamantine said:

There's a number of teachings on Dzogchen in the restricted list- not only practice texts as you are claiming - do I need to list them all here?

Malcolm wrote:

Any texts on the restricted list are connected with ChNN's transmission for his students, i.e. practice texts, but classical texts like Supreme Source, Marvelous Primordial State, Primordial Experience and so on are not restricted at all.

Again, I am addressing the issue of restricting great classics, foundation texts, not texts which belong to this or that community.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 10:41 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and as pointed out above, it is a very slow approach because it relies on a coarse mind.

Astus said:

How slow? If someone cares to study a bit, then follow through the instructions, it is not that difficult. And I'm not bringing up here the whole minimum three aeons schedule, just the fairly ordinary person interested in the Dharma with the proper conditions to accept the teachings, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Kamalashila would — he is the very epitome of a gradualist.

And again, the mind of analysis is a very coarse mind. That itself is a block for realization. For example, with our ordinary eyes we cannot see very subtle things. Likewise, with our ordinary conceptual minds we cannot realize what which is subtle and hard to realize. The best we can do is generate a coarse conceptual simulacrum. Then, in order to generate the subtle mind necessary for realizing the true nature of things, well, it takes a long time through sūtrayāna methods, many eons, just to even realize the first bhumi.

Astus said:

So you admit that all analysis is unreliable.
Is there anything reliable?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure.

Astus said:

Well then, it is pretty clear your notion of impermanence is merely an imputation, because there are plenty of counterfactual experiences of permanence.
I'm not sure I follow you here. Are you saying that there are experiences of permanence?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, just like people have convincing experiences of ropes as snakes.

Astus said:

There is only one stream of momentary consciousness. It functions through the six sense organs like a monkey jumping from one window to the next. For example, when it functions through the eye, it is called "eye consciousness", when it jumps to the ear, it is called "ear-consciousness." But one does not possess multiple consciousnesses at the same time. To propose that one does contradicts the basic definition of vijñāna-skandha.

No, there was no mention of multiple consciousnesses at the same time. However, the mind-stream does not affirm a single consciousness either, rather a series of many. The monkey's simile means that consciousness occurs where the hand and the branch makes contact, but there is no monkey going from one place to another. As the sutta explains: "what's called 'mind,' 'intellect,' or 'consciousness' by day and by night arises as one thing and ceases as another"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.061.than.html>), and in another speech: "Consciousness, monks, is classified simply by the requisite condition in dependence on which it arises. ... Just as fire is classified simply by whatever requisite condition in dependence on which it burns"

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.038.than.html>).

Malcolm wrote:

Since it functions in a serial stream, we can call it one thing for the purpose of conversation, just as we can refer to the collection of aggregates as a self, for the purpose of conversation. It does not mean that there is a unitary Astus in your aggregates.

Astus said:

In the contrary, Madhyamakas also take this stance, as Nāgārjuna states; "If I had a position, I would be at fault; since I alone have no position, I alone am without fault." That is where one has to arrive at, after due analysis. You know, relative truth first.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, here is your claim that you have to begin with a position, only to abandon it later. This is like believing that in order to walk barefoot, one must first put on shoes and then take them off.

Astus said:

The problem with Madhyamaka is that it has a theoretical view: the two truths. That is called an expedient means, and it has its use. It does not stand alone as some statement of ultimate value.

Malcolm wrote:

And yet, again and again, so-called Madhyamikas make strenuous efforts to defend what they know is not true. This is the problem with Madhyamaka, again identified by Rongzom:

Since in the Madhyamaka system, the ultimate is understood as free from proliferation, non-arising is established. At that time there is no difference between non-arising, naturelessness, emptiness and selflessness. Nevertheless, since they assert a true relative truth, the category of "established as homogenous" is not understood.

And lest you think the critique is only aimed at sūtra, Rongzom continues:

Since the system of Secret Mantra asserts the two truths to be inseparable, homogeneity is established. At that time there is no difference between homogeneity, non-arising, naturelessness, emptiness and selflessness. Nevertheless, due to anxiety about not being able to practice uniform behavior and not being able to remove that anxiety quickly, for that purpose they undertake ascetic hardships. Therefore, the category “all phenomena are established to be non-dual” is not understood.

Astus said:

Madhyamaka analysis does not address the nature of the mind; it merely rejects claims for existing existents and that is all.

Malcolm wrote:

True nature is no nature. What other nature is there to address?[/quote]

Yes, that is the Yogacara view:

Since in the Yogacāra system the nature of subject and object are not asserted, the natureless is established. At that time there is no difference between naturelessness and emptiness and selflessness. Nevertheless, since they assert the dependent, arising from cause and conditions, the category of “established as non-arising” is not understood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Malcolm, if your newest opinions in this thread (which have already shifted sharply from your initial comments at the beginning) are truly mirroring those of your root Guru's (ChNN) in opposition to your other Guru's (Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche)—which is the impression you've been giving—then can you explain why such a great proportion of texts in the Dzogchen Community's bookstore

<http://shop.shangshungfoundation.com/en/best-sales?p=2> -not just sadhanas but also teachings / explanations of Dzogchen- are restricted?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about practice texts. I am talking about the great classics, like the Seven Treasuries, the 17 Tantras, Yeshe Lama, Guhyagarbha Commentaries, Nyinthig Yazhi, and so on.

I have no problem with practice texts being restricted within the communities who use them. For example, I am an SMS student, I have no problem with the SMS texts being restricted to people who have done the levels to which they correspond — none whatsoever.

I am broaching a wider issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

the hysteria about publishing books on Dzogchen is a little absurd. Every published book on Dzogchen should come with disclaimer that one will not discover the state of Dzogchen by reading a book.

DGA said:

Hysteria though? I haven't seen any hysteria in this thread by any participants in it or anyone quoted in it, but I have seen some hyperbole. Who do you think is hysterical over this issue?

Malcolm wrote:

I mean the historical hysteria about this issue over the years. I used to be of the strong opinion that these books should be locked in a vault, and that only the elect should be able to peer in it. My thinking about this has changed markedly over the years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

muni said:

Is Namkhay Norbu Rinpoche or your Master (other Masters) advising to read Dzogchen books in order to discover Dzogchen/ Nature? Discover "better" than the pointing out?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, Dzogchen is not in a book; this is why the hysteria about publishing books on Dzogchen is a little absurd. Every published book on Dzogchen should come with disclaimer that one will not discover the state of Dzogchen by reading a book. And as I pointed out, published books about tantric rites are much more fraught with potential for abuse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The extremes are not there, they are not established, they never existed from the beginning.

Astus said:

The problem is that they are thought to be established, although they are not. And that's the basic mistake.

Malcolm wrote:

It's not going to be rectified through proofs and negations.

Astus said:

But you don't even need to make these conceptual assumptions and then go about eliminating them. This is a very dim-witted approach.

Ignorance is already present, no need to establish it, only to point it out as the source of the problems.

Malcolm wrote:

We all understand ignorance is the source of the problem. The question is how to deal with it.

Astus said:

No, really it is much simpler than that. They need to receive direct introduction — then they need to work with the instructions of the lineage, which in general do not involve any analysis whatsoever, at least in Dzogchen.

Same happens everywhere else. One learns the teaching, understands it, then applies it. Analysis is following the guidance of the teachings to confirm for oneself its validity, like checking if there's a self in the sensory areas.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and as pointed out above, it is a very slow approach because it relies on a coarse mind.

Astus said:

If all perceptions are inconstant and unreliable, then all analysis is unreliable.

Yes, even the teachings are empty, conventional and conditioned. If there were a teaching of the ultimate nature, then it would really contradict universal emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

So you admit that all analysis is unreliable.

Astus said:

Analysis is using the teachings to do an investigation. So when it talks about checking if there is any permanent element within the physical area, it's not just theorising whether that is the case or not, but looking at one's own present experience. This is what I have said before and say now.

Malcolm wrote:

Well then, it is pretty clear your notion of impermanence is merely an imputation, because there are plenty of counterfactual experiences of permanence.

Astus said:

No one is positing an ultimate perceiver here — the point there are not six consciousnesses apprehending six different kinds of media. There is one consciousness functioning through the six sense organs. The point is that when one understands that the magician is not real, one immediately understands that his tricks are also false. Going through and analyzing the six external sense objects is a waste of time.

There are a number of problems with positing a single consciousness, as taught from the early texts on in the context of the 18 dhatus. Actually, that's what one should recognise during analysis, that the mind is not a single entity but a series of instances, and then one can go further to see that even instances are not graspable as distinct entities. That's how the emptiness of both self and dharmas are confirmed. Looking for that single perceiver is no different from looking for the self and not finding it anywhere.

Malcolm wrote:

There is only one stream of momentary consciousness. It functions through the six sense organs like a monkey jumping from one window to the next. For example, when it functions through the eye, it is called "eye consciousness", when it jumps to the ear, it is called "ear-consciousness." But one does not possess multiple consciousnesses at the same time. To propose that one does contradicts the basic definition of vijñāna-skandha.

Astus said:

Madhyamaka, in reality, merely serves as a corrective to the realism of the three lower tenet systems. It has no tenet system of its own. This is why Madhyamaka has not independent path which is separate from the path of Yogacara. The path of Yogacara and Madhyamaka is the same path, five paths and ten stages.

This interpretation of "corrective to the realism of the three lower tenet systems" makes sense only in the Tibetan system where only Vajrayana is viewed as something practical, while the so called sutra teachings are reduced to mere theory. Kamalashila does not seem to see that way, nor do other Madhyamikas. As for the path, why should it come up with a new one? It is a Mahayana teaching for bodhisattvas.

Malcolm wrote:

In the contrary, Madhyamakas also take this stance, as Nāgārjuna states; "If I had a position, I would be at fault; since I alone have no position, I alone am without fault."

Astus said:

The kinds of analysis Madhyamaka engages in is meant to serve as a corrective to realism.

If by realism you mean the basic grasping at supposedly real entities, then yes. If by that you mean only a theoretical view, then it is limiting the scope of the teachings for no good reason.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with Madhyamaka is that it has a theoretical view: the two truths.

Astus said:

Saying that the nature of mind is "empty-clarity" does not really add anything. When it is said that the mind is empty, that's not the same as saying there is no mind. Since the mind is per definition aware, saying that its nature is empty is the same as saying that awareness is empty, but the awareness of it is not diminished by this at all. Similarly, saying that a ball is red doesn't mean it is not also round, since being a ball means that it is round.

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka analysis does not address the nature of the mind; it merely rejects claims for existing existents and that is all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point I am making is that intellectual analysis will only result in an intellectual apprehension of the object of analysis. Even when you are finished with the analysis, for example, the famous diamond sliver analysis, and so on, still in the end you are left with the concept "emptiness", "nonarising", "freedom from extremes" and so on, even though, as Mañjuśrimitra points out, since the conceptualized extreme does not exist, therefore the extreme to analyze does not exist. Therefore, conventional analysis by mundane minds cannot be used in an ultimate analysis because they cannot escape their own conceptual clinging, indeed they are always with concepts.

sherabpa said:

This is a standard objection to the mahayana analysis which is refuted by Shantideva in ch 9:

109

'But when the process of analysis is in turn made an object of analysis
This too may be analyzed
And thus we find an infinite regress'.

110

If phenomena are truly analyzed
No basis for analysis remains.
Deprived of further objects, it has no basis
Which is called 'nirvana'.

This is standard stuff, you must know this.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this is the Madhyamaka POV. Mañjuśrīmitra finds some fault with this line of reasoning for the reasons above.

sherabpa said:

The vajrayana was not taught because ultimate reality is inaccessible through the sutras. That is a great denigration of the sutras. Rather, it was taught because of the four superiorities.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say that ultimate reality was inaccessible through sūtra, I pointed out that in the beginning that the kind of analysis that Astus now deems necessary, with his new-found enthusiasm for the Bhāvanakrama, is not necessary, and various faults to be had with such an analytical approach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

to be more precise, knowledge obscurations arise from having had afflictive ignorance since beginningless time. like the smell of garlic in a wooden box, the smell has its origin with the garlic but persists after the garlic has been removed.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. The knowledge obscuration precedes the afflictive obscuration, in other words, the latter arises from the former.

cloudburst said:

so contra to your usual interpretation of shantideva, you now claim that emptiness IS an object of mind?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course not, read the thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 3:38 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

there are things that arise as a result of this ignorance, such as contaminated feelings, contaminated karma, knowledge obscurations etc. but at its root, the ignorance that is the root of samsara is a conceptual error.

Malcolm wrote:

Which ignorance are you talking about? The one at the head of the twelve nidanas, or the knowledge obscuration of ignorance? They are not the same thing.

cloudburst said:

afflictive ignorance.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, then you have it turned right round on its head when you state the knowledge obscuration arises from afflictive ignorance. If this were the case, there could be no arhats, nor could there be eighth stage bodhisattvas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

there are things that arise as a result of this ignorance, such as contaminated feelings, contaminated karma, knowledge obscurations etc. but at its root, the ignorance that is the root of samsara is a conceptual error.

Malcolm wrote:

Which ignorance are you talking about? The one at the head of the twelve nidanas, or the knowledge obscuration of ignorance? They are not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, just because I think these books should be out there and available to the interested does not mean that I think such books should not also come with pretty stern statements about who such books are really intended for.

We can create a culture of respect for the teachings without having to enforce restrictions on classic texts.

For example, when the Bonpos published some instructions on Thogal, ChNN told everyone they should not read the thogal sections of that book. He did not say they should not buy it, etc. I think by and large everyone obeyed his request — I know I did.

I think it is much more strange that books on all the procedures of doing Kilaya practice are openly published for anyone to read, and no one says boo about those books, but when it comes to Dzogchen, everyone freaks out a little. And frankly, I think instructions on smad las rites should more restricted than any Dzogchen tantra, which is pretty vanilla by comparison [you won't find any smad las rites in any Dzogchen tantra].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

cloudburst said:

when we reach the eighth ground we become free of afflictive ignorance altogether, and are liberated from samsara. Cut the root, kill the tree.

It may be noted here that of the two obstructions that need to be removed, karmic formations isn't specified.

Malcolm wrote:

In some presentations, karmic obscurations are listed as a separate obscuration, for example, in the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā and the Buddhāvataṃsaka-nāma-mahāvaiṣṭya-sūtra among many others. In the Ārya-mahāmokṣadīśunpuṣyakramtyapāpaṃśodhana-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra, and any number of Indian commentaries, both sutric, and especially tantric, there is a discussion three obscurations.

When we become a first stage bodhisattva we are liberated from samsara in the sense that now our Buddhahood is guaranteed. Even during patience on the path of application we are guaranteed not to take rebirth in the three lower realms and so on.

At the eighth stage, since we are free from afflictive obscurations, we now have power over birth, but this does mean we are free from the knowledge obscuration of ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

conebeckham said:

མ་རིག་འདུ་བྱེད་མེད་མེ་འབྱུང་།

དེ་མེད་འདུ་བྱེད་མི་འབྱུང་ཞིང་།
ཕན་ཚུན་རྒྱ་ཕྱིར་དེ་གཉིས་ནི།
རང་བཞིན་གྱིས་ནི་མ་གྲུབ་ཡིན།

Nagarjuna, Seventy Stanzas, verse 11--Ignorance arises in dependence on karmic formations, and vice versa.

cloudburst said:

Cone did you translate this yourself? this is wonderful!

conebeckham said:

Let me know if you need a translation.

cloudburst said:

thank you that's very kind!

conebeckham said:

Nagarjuna, Seventy Stanzas, verse 11--Ignorance arises in dependence on karmic formations, and vice versa. Let me know if you need a translation.

cloudburst said:

of course everyone knows that all the dependent related links are dependent, but which is called "the root" of samsara? Which immediately precedes karmic formations, and thus can be considered it's immediate cause? Why does Nagarjuna say that when ignorance is stopped, compositional activity is stopped?

Malcolm wrote:

མ་རིག་འདུ་བྱེད་མི་འབྱུང་།
དེ་མེད་འདུ་བྱེད་མི་འབྱུང་ཞིང་།
ཕན་ཚུན་རྒྱ་ཕྱིར་དེ་གཉིས་ནི།
རང་བཞིན་གྱིས་ནི་མ་གྲུབ་ཡིན།

Ignorance [the first link of dependent origination] is not produced without formations [the second link], without it, formations are not produced — because they mutually cause [each other] both of them are not established.

The root of samsara is not the afflictive ignorance in the chain of dependent origination.
The root of samsara is the ignorance that is a knowledge obscuration.

For certain, a clear distinction is drawn between these two in Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 16th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

ngodrup said:

Similarly, with amply respect for the opinions of Loppon-la,

I concur with Lama Pema here. What is missing in having many translations out is that the wang, lung and tri is not widespread.

Malcolm wrote:

It is actually more widespread than there are texts to support those.

ngodrup said:

Our merit is good enough to hear of dharmas like dzogchen, but weak enough that we have wrong views about tantra and dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

C'mon, with all due respect, even Tibetans have wrong views about tantra and dzogchen.

ngodrup said:

And then we wonder why it is hard to have stability in the practice.
We wonder why we have yet to see any rainbow bodies in the west.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, with all due respect, rainbow body is not the main point of practicing the teachings.

ngodrup said:

I'm surprised that Shenpen Rinpoche's words are controversial to anybody.
He's showing concern that dzogchen fulfills its function for qualified students who can actually make use of them. We need to, as Lama Pema says here, popularize the idea that co-operating with one's teacher/s is the main criterion.

Malcolm wrote:

"Qualified" means you are a student who is interested in the teachings and makes the effort to go get them.

In any case, I also not proposing anything radical at all. Rather, I am observing that people are not as stupid and deluded as you might conclude from Shenphen Rinpoche's talk, and second, that the dissemination of classical Dzogchen literature will have a positive effect on the world, not a negative one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

pemachophel said:
Loppon-la,

You know I respect your opinion, but I don't agree with the following:

"the cat is out of the bag anyway, so we might as well do our best to present the best possible translations available to the widest number of people so they can encounter the teachings"

Rather I think we should do a better job of explaining and popularizing the notion that proper transmission of Dzogchen requires wang/ngo-tro, lung, and tri and that, if any are missing, the process doesn't work. This includes doing a better job of explaining that "the process" is supra-conceptual and is not a matter of intellectual understanding.

Malcolm wrote:

I can understand why you feel that way. Of course, I agree with you that Dzogchen needs to be transmitted in a proper way, but Dzogchen teachings are not secrets to be kept as if they were classified information. At this point in time, people who do not read Tibetan are at a severe disadvantage, even if they have transmission. So for this reason, it is necessary to openly publish the classics, because in fact, all the raw information is out there already anyway; both in academia and in popular books available to the general public. Anyone can buy Alan Wallace's publication of Dudjom Lingpa's Dzogchen collection. Anyone can buy Yeshe Lama on Amazon. These are but two examples. The cat is out of the bag, and we ought to acknowledge this fact. Anyone can get Germano's thesis, etc.

pemachophel said:

IMO, popularizing the Dzogchen texts even more widely and openly will only result in those teachings losing more and more of their power.

Malcolm wrote:

The predictions in the sgra thal 'gyur tantra concerning the spread of Dzogchen teachings throughout this world indicate that it is the last teaching to remain in this world before the teachings completely disappear. It is similar to the principle that at first the hells disappear, and then each realm above it, until all that remains is the upper form realms. Likewise, in this world system, first the worldly systems will disappear, the lower yānas, then the outer tantras, then the two lower inner tantras, and in the end, the only teaching which will remain is the Dzogchen teaching. Of course, Dzogchen was also the first teaching ever to be taught in this eon. All teachings spread from there.

So we should not be too worried about the teachings losing their power. Dzogchen is the essence of all of the teachings, it will never lose any of its power, ever, just like the sun and the moon will never lose their power to illuminate until this world system is destroyed completely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Some of these same issues are covered from Sangye Khandro's POV in this recent interview: <http://www.tricycle.com/blog/no-adaptation-required>

Excerpt:

Have there been other problems in the transmission of the Vajrayana? Let me give you one example. An abbot—who works with my partner Lama Chonam and me—is coming to the United States soon to teach Dzogchen. He will give the empowerment, the reading transmission, and the instructions. But there will be restrictions on who can participate. It's very important to him that no academic researchers be present unless they are there to actually practice. He is concerned about Westerners getting these transmissions, going back to their universities, and then teaching or publishing, out of context, what they were given. This is a problem in the West, and those of us who understand proper transmission need to speak out about it. It needs to stop.

MalaBeads said:

Thank you for the link to the article and thank you to Khandro Sangye for doing it. I had no idea there was such a problem with academics and universities.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there isn't. But Khenpo Namdrol, to whom she is referring, is probably upset at the fact that Germano [as well as others] has been using Dzogchen material in classes at UVA for decades. The thing is, he has produced a fair number of pretty good scholars are also actually interested in practicing the teachings. And some who have no interest at all, but are in it for the intellectual exercise and cultural studies. My personal opinion from reading his papers and hearing him describe what he thinks Dzogchen means is that he has misunderstood key points, but I could say the same for a lot of faithful traditionalists as well. I also do not buy his speculative historical analysis of Dzogchen. But in this article I think Sangye is being a little over the top. Dzogchen teachings belong to humanity. And the cat is out of the bag anyway, so we might as well do our best to present the best possible translations available to the widest number of people so they can encounter the teachings. Frankly, invocations to Rahula are much more problematical as widely available texts than say the Rig pa rang shar tantra, IMO.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

If there were no pre-existing concept of a tiger, someone saying that there is no tiger in the house would make no sense. In both cases one needs to have the assumption of a tiger. And that view of a real tiger is the mistake everyone has. Without seeing for oneself that there is no tiger, the mistake remains.

Malcolm wrote:

This is very similar to the argument Gelugpas make about inherent existence — they insist that the object of negation is inherent existence — but no one has any idea of what inherent existence is until they are informed that this is what they looking for and negating.

Astus said:

One already has the view of substantial entities, conceiving things as independent objects.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, maybe not.

Astus said:

That is the misconception that needs to be eliminated. At the same time, one is normally unaware of the presence of wrong view, so it has to be highlighted as the source of the problem. Thus the structure of the four noble truths and the twelve links. So it is not the case that the extremes are not there, because they are the basis of all the problems.

Malcolm wrote:

The extremes are not there, they are not established, they never existed from the beginning.

Astus said:

Even if you think you have confirmed the absence of extremes, this is just an intellectual confirmation. In order to actually confirm this, you have to go beyond the conceptuality of the mind. Conceptual analysis will not get you there. Conceptual investigation will not get you there.

The extremes are conceptual assumptions. And just like with any other wrong view, it can be corrected through understanding it to be wrong. And that understanding requires concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

But you don't even need to make these conceptual assumptions and then go about eliminating them. This is a very dim-witted approach.

Astus said:

What you work with is the concepts themselves. They are your experiences. So you observe them: where does this thought come from, where does it go? You do this until you understand that concepts do not come from anywhere nor go anywhere. Then you can go beyond concepts. But even this is still a conceptual exercise. It should only be done after receiving direct introduction on the basis having the experience of a moment of ordinary mind.

Similarly to samatha, in vipasyana one goes from the grosser to the subtler objects, simply because that is normally easier. But eventually one arrives at investigating the mind to see that thoughts are inconstant and unreliable. A moment of mind without concepts becomes a memory in the next moment and then serves as just another concept, thus people can even imagine it to be a real self and set up a duality of thoughts versus no thoughts. Then they need to look again and integrate all experiences to see that all has the same nature as the mind. That way it becomes an analysis in the reverse order.

Malcolm wrote:

No, really it is much simpler than that. They need to receive direct introduction — then they need to work with the instructions of the lineage, which in general do not involve any analysis whatsoever, at least in Dzogchen.

Astus said:

As pointed out, mundane direct perceptions are deceptive.

All perceptions are inconstant and unreliable, and when that is recognised, there is no more basis for attachment. It doesn't matter whether it's an elephant or just the illusion of an elephant.

Malcolm wrote:

If all perceptions are inconstant and reliable, then all analysis is unreliable.

Astus said:

The reason it is not recognized is because of lack of introduction. Someone might, eventually exhaust their concepts through analysis, and understand. But this is a very slow route, it takes eons.

Analysis is directed investigation, that is: vipasyana. Not theorising or arguing. That "slow exhaustion of concepts" is a straw man.

Malcolm wrote:

But above, you clear indicate that you have to adopt a theory to investigate. So you are now contradicting yourself.

Astus said:

No, you merely need look at the perceiver who uses the six sense media, and understand it is not established in any way, mere empty clarity. You do not need analysis, you need direct introduction through experiences.

Analysis is exactly like that, except it does not posit a perceiver but investigates the six areas as they are and confirms directly that there is nothing to grasp.

Malcolm wrote:

No one is positing an ultimate perceiver here — the point there are not six consciousnesses apprehending six different kinds of media. There is one consciousness functioning through the six sense organs. The point is that when one understands that the magician is not real, one immediately understands that his tricks are also false. Going through and analyzing the six external sense objects is a waste of time.

Astus said:

Since the kind of analysis used by Kamalashila and which are you now advocating involves coarse conceptuality, it is very difficult, virtually impossible through analysis to discover the nonconceptual empty clarity of the mind and go beyond mind. But when one works with direct introduction, it is very easy.

In a sense it is understandable that analytical meditation had been put away as too complicated and more experiential methods were raised as the direct path.

Madhyamaka had become a large heap of arguments and theories, so no wonder many felt that it is too slow and such.

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka, in reality, merely serves as a corrective to the realism of the three lower tenet systems. It has no tenet system of its own. This is why Madhyamaka has not independent path which is separate from the path of Yogacara. The path of Yogacara and Madhyamaka is the same path, five paths and ten stages.

Astus said:

The same happened to abhidharma. But that doesn't mean it was always like that or that's how it was meant to be used.

Malcolm wrote:

The kinds of analysis Madhyamaka engages in is meant to serve as a corrective to realism.

But these days, proponents of Madhyamaka analysis spend lots of time building up realisms just to tear them down, like small children who build sand castles, believe they are real for a little while, and then act like conquerors when they demolish their sand castle with a kick.

Astus said:

Dzogchen and Mahamudra emphasising that one should go directly to the nature of mind, however, is practically not different from analysis.

Malcolm wrote:

This demonstrates you have not really understood Dzogchen teachings. Sūtra Mahāmudra indeed involves a fair amount of analytical investigation, but that is not surprising since it is called "Sūtra" Mahāmudra for a reason.

Astus said:

It goes through the same steps of establishing a calm mind, then investigating that very mind to ascertain its emptiness, finally arriving at the unity of samatha-vipasyana.

Malcolm wrote:

This really is not the principle of Dzogchen teachings on any level at all.

Astus said:

If the mind were not looked into it would be simply just samatha. Kamalashila arrives at the nature of mind as well:

"One analyses by thinking that just as the mind, the identity of all phenomena too is like mere illusion. In this way when the identity of the mind is individually examined by wisdom, in the ultimate sense it is perceived neither within or without. It is also not perceived in the absence of both. Neither the mind of the past, nor that of the future, nor of the present is perceived. When the mind is born, it comes from nowhere and when it ceases it goes nowhere because it is inapprehensible, undemonstratable and non-physical."

Malcolm wrote:

This is not the nature of the mind. The nature of the mind is not only emptiness. The result of this analysis epitomizes the fault the Kun byed rgyal po Tantra is pointing out to which exists in the sūtras of the bodhisattva pitika:

The sūtras of bodhisattvas...

assert dharmatā as empty space through the investigation and analysis of the two truths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 10:07 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

the absence of the four extremes is not something that really can be confirmed with ordinary thinking and cognitions because it is not an object.

The face of prajñāpāramitā is not different than all appearances [this is fundamental tenet of Ati yoga, one of things that differentiates it from Chan/Zen, etc.], hence it is an object of mind, an experience

cloudburst said:

Please, from your point of view, what is the difference between the "absence of the four extremes" and the "face of prajnaparamita?"

Malcolm wrote:

The absence of the four extremes is a conceptual construction; appearances are suchness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

Garudavista said:

Vimalakirti432, you may also benefit from watching Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche's talk "Is there Buddhism without Rebirth?" that he gave at The UC Berkley Center for Buddhist Studies:

I hope this helps.

Malcolm wrote:

This is what he was critiquing.

In fact, Dzongsar's rambling presentation was pretty weak.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Finding there is no tiger in the room is not a matter of analysis.

Astus said:

One checks each room if there is a tiger there. Similarly, one checks the aggregates if there is a self there. If this is not analysis, then what is called analysis is not analysis. And probably this is where the misunderstanding of analysis lies, mistaking it for theorising instead of informed observation and investigation of phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

And hence the fault of conceptualizing.

One should walk into a room, and discover what is there without first imagining "Oh! If there is a tiger there, I better go find out!"

What you are essentially recommending is going through a conceptual exercise of imagining that something is there, and then spending time to find out whether what you imagine is true.

If, on the other hand, someone tells you, "There are no tigers in that house", it may be the case that you have some doubt and need to confirm this for your self. Likewise, if someone tells you that there is no self in the aggregates, then you look and you will not find one. Of course it is up to you to look, and not leave it as a mere concept.

Astus said:

It is, providing you have ascertained there is no tiger. Otherwise, you can analyze whether there is or is not a tiger in a room until the end of time, without being one step closer to the truth. This is the problem with Madhyamaka analysis. Again, as above, vipasyana is not theorising.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the kind of vipaśyāna analysis you are now favoring is really, because unlike tigers and snakes, the absence of the four extremes is not something that really can be confirmed with ordinary thinking and cognitions because it is not an object. Therefore, you have to imagine something to negate and so on.

In other words, having seen a tiger, one can know what the absence of a tiger is because there are signs by which tigers can be apprehended. But there are no signs by which an extreme can be apprehended, and hence the analogy breaks down as it must.

Even if you think you have confirmed the absence of extremes, this is just an intellectual confirmation. In order to actually confirm this, you have to go beyond the conceptuality of the mind. Conceptual analysis will not get you there. Conceptual investigation will not get you there.

What you work with is the concepts themselves. They are your experiences. So you observe them: where does this thought come from, where does it go? You do this until you understand that concepts do not come from anywhere nor go anywhere. Then you can go beyond concepts. But even this is still a conceptual exercise. It should only be done after receiving direct introduction on the basis of having the experience of a moment of ordinary mind.

Astus said:

Yes, so it is not a matter of analysis. It is a matter of direct perception.

There is direct perception, yes. The analysis is pointing one's perception in the right direction.

Malcolm wrote:

As pointed out, mundane direct perceptions are deceptive.

Astus said:

The reason it is not recognised is because of the lack of direction, and that is what the teachings and the analysis performed based on the Dharma helps with.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason it is not recognized is because of lack of introduction. Someone might, eventually exhaust their concepts through analysis, and understand. But this is a very slow route, it takes eons.

Astus said:

Thus, there is no real need for analysis. One does not need to understand mere that there is no tiger in a house, one needs to understand that tigers, houses, snakes and indeed all phenomena are completely equivalent with illusions — this is the real intention of Mahāyāna.

The tiger is a metaphor for substance, the house for the six sensory areas. Realising that the six senses are insubstantial, illusory, is all there is to know. The way to realise that is observing clearly what the six senses actually are, that is, looking through the rooms, and that is analysis.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you merely need look at the perceiver who uses the six sense media, and understand it is not established in any way, mere empty clarity. You do not need analysis, you need direct introduction through experiences.

Since the kind of analysis used by Kamalashila and which are you now advocating involves coarse conceptuality, it is very difficult, virtually impossible through analysis to discover the nonconceptual empty clarity of the mind and go beyond mind. But when one works with direct introduction, it is very easy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 2:36 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

I do want in a separate post to address the whole problem of tone...

Malcolm wrote:

I think you are tone deaf. You have no idea how disrespectful your presentation is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Hi Wayfarer. Thanks for your helpful comments, which don't sound at all dashed off.

As for your inference that I'm a materialist I understand why you say that but I still have to disagree. As you suggest, the "natural" and the "super" are slippery and relative terms. I have no commitment to materialism but rather as I've said to collapsing a distinction rooted in primitive notions.

Malcolm wrote:

You seriously need to read The Savage Mind by Levi-Strauss.

Vimalakirti432 said:

I sometimes feel it's my way I'm saying things...that causes people problems.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, like when you say: "Here I would add that whatever way one takes "Buddha fields", on a sliding scale from fairyland to metaphor to straight on reality..."

Vimalakirti432 said:

And no I don't think this is a rewriting of anyone's tradition, as some have suggested, but a reframing of the dharma for a specific concrete situation, as Buddhism has always done.

Malcolm wrote:

Gotta love the jargon.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 15th, 2015 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A conceptual knowledge of emptiness is still a mere concept, and results in being fettered. A simulacrum, not the real thing.

Astus said:

Ignorance is based on the mistaken concept of self. Removing that is wisdom. Knowledge of emptiness as a mere concept is not knowledge of emptiness. The conceptual knowledge of emptiness is when the concept of substance is proven to be false. Just like if one were to think that there is a tiger in the house then there would arise fear from entering it. But if one actually goes and checks the rooms and find no tiger, from the confirmed knowledge of that the fear vanishes.

Malcolm wrote:

Finding there is no tiger in the room is not a matter of analysis.

Astus said:

We might say that "there is no tiger in the house" is a conceptual knowledge, but what it means is that the idea of there being a tiger is removed, so in that sense it is relinquishing the concept.

Malcolm wrote:

It is, providing you have ascertained there is no tiger. Otherwise, you can analyze whether there is or is not a tiger in a room until the end of time, without being one step closer to the truth. This is the problem with Madhyamaka analysis.

Astus said:

It is not that one just sits far from the house and wonders whether there is or there isn't any tiger, one actually has to check it for himself.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, so it is not a matter of analysis. It is a matter of direct perception.

Astus said:

Same goes for vipasyana, it is not merely theorising about there being a self or not but actually looking for it. Although it could be said that searching the house for a tiger is still based on delusion, without actually doing a thorough analysis, one will not just enter the house.

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is the following: when one is analyzing things like lions, tigers and bears, in reality these are mundane objects. Further, direct perceptions with mundane sense organs is not a priori veridical. You could very well see a rope as a snake an alley, in this case your [mistaken] direct perception is a snake, and as far as you are concerned, there must be a snake there. This shows the limitation of your analogy with ordinary sense organs.

Rongzom uses the example of the reflection of a black snake in the water to show the errors of various tenet systems. He explains:

[H]igher and lower views are solely differentiated on the basis more and less attachment to reality in appearances.

For example, if there is reflection of a black snake in the water; some will see a snake, [48/a] and will leave due to their fear. Likewise, even though phenomena which are a source of suffering are like an illusion, they are abandoned by the śrāvakas who perceive them as real.

Even though some understand that the black snake is a reflection, believing that it is harmful if touched, rely on medicine; likewise in the system of the Prajñāpāramita, even though the relative is like an illusion, since there is a view in which functional agents exist, one develops the pristine consciousness concerning the knowable and relies upon the medicine of great compassion.

Since some understand that the black snake is a reflection and will not cause harm even if touched, and are able to communicate to those with anxiety that its touch has no power. Likewise, in the systems of kriya and outer yoga tantra, even though it is comprehended there is no fault in lower conduct and substances, they do not have the capacity for intrepid behavior. But they have the capacity of the behavior to make offerings to deities, perform the conduct of strict discipline, accomplishment substances, etc.

Some understand there is no fault in touching a black snake even if touching it has the ability to cause harm, because that anxiety is rapidly removed due to the existence of the strict discipline of subjugation.[49/a] Likewise, the system of inner yoga "stands on the neck" of practice to quickly render all phenomena equal. One's behavior specifically corresponds to the strict discipline of the absence of virtue and misdeeds in phenomena and the absence of pure or impure in food.

Since some, possessing an undeceived mind regarding the characteristic of a reflection of a black snake, see all of those behaviors as the behavior of children. Leaving aside the others, abandoning existents, etc.;, even the subjugation of that very reflection of a black snake like a heroic warrior is seen as a childish idea. Accepting and rejecting, or a mind fabricating the condition of those does not develop, and moving and seeking do not occur. Likewise, since the system of the Great Perfection comprehends and is the culmination of the comprehension of all phenomena as totally equivalent to illusions, that being the case, the mind is not confused by the power of appearances and there is no ability of develop formations — there is no accepting, no rejecting, no moving and no seeking. As such, this culmination of the comprehension of being like an illusion is also proven to the culmination of comprehending the two truths as inseparable. Thus, there is no real need for analysis. One does not need to understand mere that there is no tiger in a house, one needs to understand that tigers, houses, snakes and indeed all phenomena are completely equivalent with illusions — this is the real intention of Mahāyāna.

Astus said:

In order to be free from conceptualisation of extremes one has to see that there is nothing to conceptualise about.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not require analytical investigation.

That is fine if one thinks nirvana comes about from causes, which is a characteristic approach of the causal vehicle a.k.a, the vehicle of characteristics.

If realisation has no causes, there is neither path nor teachings. Nirvana is the elimination of ignorance, and that happens through correct understanding and correct contemplation. Vajrayana is no different, since it is itself a path with instructions and practices.

[/quote]

Nirvana is not the elimination of ignorance. Nirvana is the elimination of afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 10:05 PM

Title: Re: The problem of nihilism

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Here I'm talking about the dualistic notion of escaping out of life, of the otherworldliness we find from the beginning in the texts. The non-dual orientation of the Mahayana in theory should be the cure. Unfortunately the Mahayana has at the same time transformed the idea of escape into the unconditioned into a different kind of escape into supernatural notions of the Buddha and Buddha realms.

I've often been stuck by the essential strangeness of Mahayana sutras. They tend to begin with interesting core ideas, images, metaphors, etc. but then balloon out into mountains of repetition and hyperbole so that what starts out as a useful kind of poetry that supports one's practice finally becomes an alternate universe that substitutes a fairyland for the real.

Malcolm wrote:

Bias alert! Here you go again, trolling another forum.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Of course the Mahayana texts no doubt assumed the forms they did for many reasons, among which is the fact they were probably more chanted than read.

Malcolm wrote:

Total nonsense.

Vimalakirti432 said:

But the point is not the sutras themselves but what they represent, a kind of over-the-top supernaturalism, where the Mahayana, pardon the pun if there is one, kind of loses its mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Dear reader, note that supernatural = fairyland = insanity.

Vimalakirti432 said:

In fact this happens almost literally. One of the debates in Tibetan Buddhism, for example, is whether a Buddha can have any mind at all, any thoughts or concepts, or whether she is a kind of robo-buddha, driven on by a previous bodhisattva career to help beings mindlessly. In this way a Buddha becomes so utterly, inhumanly transcendent that you need intermediaries to somehow connect with the human level, bodhisattvas like Avalokiteshvara, just as in theistic religions where an utterly transcendent God also demands intermediaries, Jesus in the Abrahamic line and Krishna in the line of Sanatana dharma, as examples.

Malcolm wrote:

You really deeply misunderstand the point of a buddha's spontaneous activity.

Vimalakirti432 said:

The result is that many traditions of the Mahayana are so heavily invested in supernatural concepts, realms and impossible states beyond being that for me at least they constitute an obstruction, and are therefore problematic as a cure for nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

Here, supernatural = impossible.

Vimalakirti432 said:

But now the liberal, like Garbo, will finally speak his own sort of truth. To that end keep in mind that I'm a fool with no standing and who speaks only for himself. What I offer is no more than a short glimpse into how a typical liberal thinks about these questions. So in that sense I may be doing no more than providing ammunition for fundamentalists everywhere!

Malcolm wrote:

You are hardly a liberal. A "liberal" follower of Buddhadharma does not call Sukhavati Vyuha "a fairy land." A conservative materialist might though.

Vimalakirti432 said:

I begin with the Kalama sutta, which enjoins the careful examination and application of what we learn of dharma, and reaching our own judgments.

Malcolm wrote:

It does nothing of the kind.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Here's what I see. I think without much controversy I see the core of Buddhism as dependent origination.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is the core of Buddhadharma. Score one for Vima!

Vimalakirti432 said:

From dependent origination all the other key ideas are derived - impermanence, the questioning of the nature of identity and so on, really the whole framework of the dhamma. And here, bare-bones as it seems, is the first phase of the cure for nihilism.

This first phase can be seen in many passages of the pali canon, where we read that certain of the Buddha's followers were immediately liberated, simply upon hearing about the principle of dependent origination. Initially this seems strange, at least to me, given the lack of explanation in the text. But on reflection I think we can fill in the blanks and assume that for some of his followers the intuition of dependent origination was enough, and that all its basic implications quickly followed.

Malcolm wrote:

Śariputra was already a follower of Saṃkhya, so of course dependent origination made sense to him immediately.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Here I locate the beginning of the second phase in the cure for nihilism, for here was an expansion of the practice that well before the Mahayana developed the sense of interrelatedness between beings, of their connectedness, so that even under the ideology of the arhats institutions were built that allowed people to see more clearly their inextricable network of relations, how the idea of a single isolated being was incoherent on the level of precious human birth, and that they were part of a larger whole, a spiritual community immune to annihilation. (Admirable friendships is not just half the spiritual life, it is the whole of the spiritual of life, says the Upaddha Sutta.)

Malcolm wrote:

Just as a personal self is incoherent, so is a social or communal self.

Vimalakirti432 said:

This development returns us to the problems of Buddhist realism, which are particularly acute in respect to the aggregates. The aggregates were wise and advanced medicine perhaps in the beginning, for the Buddha was known to say what was most skillful in the context of needs of the person he was facing. But by setting up separate categories for mind and body, i.e. dualism, the aggregates committed Buddhism to just the kind of habitual habits of mind that dependent origination in its deepest implications I believe overcomes.

Malcolm wrote:

The division of nāma and rūpa is ancient and pre-Buddhist. It is obvious that the mind is not the body. Lose a finger, your mind is not diminished one little bit. Lose your mind, your body immediately begins to decay and rot.

The point of the aggregates is merely to show there was no self in them or apart from them. The aggregates cover afflicted phenomena, whereas the *āyatana*s and dhātu cover both afflicted and nonafflicted phenomena.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Ideas of the "material" and the "spiritual" are in fact habits of mind that go back in most cultures to very early human history, and arise as consequences of our particular evolution on our particular little planet we call home. Solid things hurt when they fall on our heads, and when the breath leaves the body and someone dies we feel that some switch has been turned off, that some substance has left. So understandably many of the first words for entities like "soul" also meant "breath" - "pneuma" in Greek, "prana" in Sanskrit, and so on. On the most primitive level, which like it or not, is still at the root of our mental habits, I believe it's as simple as that.

Malcolm wrote:

Prāṇa does not mean breath, it means life. There is a vāyu, a wind, called prāṇa-vāyu, the wind that sustains life.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Nagarjuna, by drawing out the full implications of dependent origination, breaks this primitive dichotomy down, shows that mind and body, emptiness and form, are not separate but an interdependent reality that resists all conceptualization and mental fabrication. A materialist denies spirit, an idealist denies matter, both in some sense toy with nihilism. Nagarjuna, by appearing to deny everything denies nothing. His middle way, as he maintains, is not nihilism but its cure (except for the hopelessly incurable who would posit emptiness as real). His rigorous analysis definitively shows that dependent origination is indeed deep, subtle and hard to fathom.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Nāgārjuna points out that nothing is established and that everything is a mere convention.

Vimalakirti432 said:

And so to sum up my liberal version of the dharma: when drawn out in its full implications, dependent origination is the definitive cure for nihilism and the fear of annihilation, in at least three phases: (phase 1) We are not separate and so have nothing to fear; (phase 2) we are not alone but interdependently involved with endless other beings; (phase 3) we are expressions of the non-dual fabric of things as they are, beyond all conception, perennially arising and re-arising, ever-renewing windows on reality.

Malcolm wrote:

We are also not the same. The idea of nonseparation is just another false identity proposition, refuted in opening praise of the MMK which is cited from the Prajñāpāramitā: i.e. not ceasing, not arising, not going, not coming, not annihilated, not permanent, not different, not identical, not the same... Thus, we are not interdependently involved with endless other beings, this is something Nāgārjuna rejects explicitly since he refutes the dominant condition among the four conditions [as well as the other three] in the first chapter of the MMK. There is no nondual fabric of things as they are, this is an entirely foreign notion to Buddhadharma. In Nāgārjuna's view, there is no ultimately no arising or ceasing. Arising and ceasing are merely conventions grounded in not seeing how things are.

Vimalakirti432 said:

That was a lot of ground to cover in a relatively short space, so there's bound to be much open to criticism.

Malcolm wrote:

You said it, not me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 8:04 PM

Title: Re: a former student of aroter seeks help!

Content:

tingdzin said:

It might be useful to keep it simple for awhile: read basic unglamorous Buddhism and do basic unglamorous practice, examining carefully not only the motives of the people who want you "on board" with their beliefs, as well as your own possible motives in being attracted to this or that group.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in the case of the DC, we want you to convert people by handing out flowers at the airport....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

If you discriminate that phenomena are identityless

And meditate by discriminating them in this way,

This is the cause for the result of attaining nirvana.

Peace will not come about through any other cause."

Malcolm wrote:

That is fine if one thinks nirvana comes about from causes, which is a characteristic approach of the causal vehicle a.k.a, the vehicle of characteristics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 6:26 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So you are claiming that the conceptual knowledge of emptiness, the conceptual knowledge known to a mundane authority, is sufficient?

Astus said:

Knowing that fire is hot is a conceptual knowledge. If one has never encountered fire, it is an unconfirmed conceptual knowledge. If one has encountered fire, it is a confirmed conceptual knowledge. Similarly, only hearing about emptiness without knowing what it means is just verbal information. Once it becomes clear what emptiness refers to in one's present experience, it is a confirmed conceptual knowledge. For example, one sees fire and knows that it is fire. If one sees fire without knowing what fire is, that has no power to inform one's knowledge (and therefore subsequent actions), while knowing fire without ever seeing one has no power to inform one's actions (as there is no use of that knowledge in any situation).

Malcolm wrote:

This does not help your case at all. A conceptual knowledge of emptiness is still a mere concept, and results in being fettered. A simulacrum, not the real thing. For example, The Ārya-niṣṭhāgantabhagavajjñānavaipūlya-sūtraratanānanta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states

For example, space is does not impede. In the same way, all objects are like space. Total nonconceptuality does not impede. Total nonconceptuality is freedom. Total conceptuality is a fetter. Total nonconceptuality cuts the fetters.

Here, when we should understand that the term "mundane" eye refers to exactly the kind of mundane authorities Mañjuśrimitra is critiquing.

It is this analysis with mundane authorities that goes exactly nowhere.
That mundane analysis is the view uninformed by emptiness, the thinking of an ordinary being (prthagjana).
Having a view of emptiness does not make one an ārya.
Analysis is the method by what one can arrive at confirming what one has learnt and understood.
But this contradicts the Saddharma-pundarika sūtra:
That which does not analyze or conceive phenomena, Mañjuśrī, is called "the procedure of a bodhisattva."
And the Ārya-pitāputrasamāgamana-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:
If it is asked "What is the samadhi that illuminates all phenomena?," here, for the purpose of engaging all phenomena, the bodhisattva mahāsattva does not mentally engage in any conceptuality or analysis
It also contradicts the Ārya-tathāgatajñānamudrā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:
The consciousness without concepts about all phenomena is unobscured.
And the Ārya-sūraṃgasamādhi-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:
Whoever does not conceptualize existence or nonexistence is free from the bonds of Māra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Eating at restaurants that serve meat and alcohol

Content:

KeithBC said:

Lots of people do lots of things that I disagree with. Life is too short to get upset by all of them. It is their karma, not mine.

Even if a Buddha image is there with a purely commercial or decorative intent, it does no harm and may do some good. If meat is on the menu (as it is at 99.9% of restaurants here), my responsibility is to not order it, not to change the menu. If, by increasing demand for vegetarian meals and decreasing demand for meat, I motivate the owners to change the menu, so much the better.

If people are in a teachable mood, I am willing to help them. If not, c'est la vie.

Om mani padme hum

Keith

Tenso said:

I agree it's their karma but it's still a sign of disrespect to many serious practitioners. No other religions would tolerate their prophets being displayed for purely commercial and decorative purposes.

Malcolm wrote:

Apart from Trumpism...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

kirtu said:

"he got us into a war" - which should have worked against Bush. Instead we had the spectacle of uneducated teen singers declaring "he is our President and we should follow him/trust him to conduct the war" and she and her ilk were actually listened to!

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, getting into a war usually favors a politician's chances of re-election.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No one has ever won a Presidency by appealing to the unhinged in the US, contrary to world opinion, they just don't have enough votes compared to blacks, latinos and white women.

kirtu said:

Food for thought:

Blacks - 13.6% of population

Latino/Hispanic citizens - 12% of population

White women (est) - 39.47% of population

65% of total population

So why was George Bush elected twice? Especially the second time? The demographic argument doesn't explain elections in every case by itself. Other factors are at play as well.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the first time, he had the Supreme Court win it for him. Second time, he got us into a war and was elected because Kerry has all the charisma of a wet blanket.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 14th, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

By saying that arriving at the conceptual understanding of emptiness is insufficient and it should go beyond.

Malcolm wrote:

So you are claiming that the conceptual knowledge of emptiness, the conceptual knowledge known to a mundane authority, is sufficient?

Astus said:

By saying that analysis does not result in insight into the nature of concepts and so in non-attachment.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think it is contradicting sūtra at all. For example:

The Buddhāvatamsaka-nāma-mahāvaiṣṭya-sūtra:

The so-called "seeing" by which the mundane eye sees, the seeing lacking higher perception [vipaśyāna], sees phenomena as evil.

If seen with higher perception [vipaśyāna], nothing is seen.

Or the Bodhisattva-pitika:

Again, so-called higher perception [vipaśyāna] is seeing just how all phenomena are; seeing the reality of all phenomena; seeing that non-otherness of all phenomena; seeing the emptiness, seeing the signlessness, seeing the lack of aspiration of all phenomena. Again, so-called higher perception [vipaśyāna] is not seeing with a cause, not seeing without a cause, not seeing birth, perishing or abiding, not seeing an objective cause — also the best seeing is not seeing at all.

Or the Ārya-sāgara-nāgarāja-pariṣcchā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

In the same way, there is the higher perception [vipaśyāna] that all phenomena are without cause, without persistence, isolated, totally unestablished. As such, whatever is seen, that is the vipaśyāna of all phenomena. Therefore, if there is higher perception [vipaśyāna] regarding all phenomena, when someone sees a phenomena, it is not higher perception [vipaśyāna]. If it is asked why, seeing phenomena is not higher perception [vipaśyāna] because a cognition is not cognizant.

Here, when we should understand that the term "mundane" eye refers to exactly the kind of mundane authorities Mañjuśrimitra is critiquing.

It is this analysis with mundane authorities that goes exactly nowhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

There are at least two problems with that view:

1. it supposes there is something to gain beyond concepts, instead of realising the nature of conceptuality.

Malcolm wrote:

How?

Astus said:

2. it denies what is taught in the sutras and shastras: that vipasyana results in wisdom, practically negating the validity of all paths but the vajrayana.

Malcolm wrote:

How?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 11:00 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

passel said:

Malcolm- "A perfect śamatha is nothing more than the first dhyāna, attended by five mental factors: vitarka, vicara, prithi, sukha and ekagraha. This is a universal definition."

I'd have to know a lot more than I do to label anything a universal definition (weird concept that), but that's not the definition Wallace uses. "The attainment of Shamatha" according to him is post 9th stage, accompanied by shinjiang (which he describes in a very specific way), and he equates it not with the first dhyana but with access concentration.

Malcolm wrote:

He is mistaken.

passel said:

Access concentration/ the attainment of shamatha, according to him is a state devoid of any objects of the 6 consciousnesses, only the alaya and the alaya-vijnana remain. That's an insanely high bar, not attainable in an afternoon.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, he is mistaken,

The state you describe, attainable in an afternoon, sounds interesting and probably worthwhile, but this demonstrates my point. Yogis can use the same tools to very different ends. Not a problem, imo.

You ought to read the Abhidharmakośha where this definition of the first dhyāna is set out, then compare with the Bhavanakrama, Rongzom Chokyi Pandita, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 9:45 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

passel said:

Bottom line, meditation lineages have house styles and house interpretations of received texts, and they differ from one another. You can't assume that one yogi's 5th stage of Shamatha is the same as another yogi's 5th stage of Shamatha, or even that they mean the same thing by Shamatha.

Malcolm wrote:

A perfect śamatha is nothing more than the first dhyāna, attended by five mental factors: vitarka, vicara, prithi, sukha and ekagraha. This is a universal definition.

The idea that it takes a year to develop this experience is ridiculous. If you understand what you are doing, you can develop this experience in as little as a single afternoon.

Since the mental factors of vitarka and vicara drop off above the first dhyāna, when one's motivation is to engage in vipaśyāna, it is not appropriate to cultivate anything more than this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Okay your various points/responses here are fair enough but arguable, but I guess I should make clear what I mean when I talk about false imputations regarding my views.

I've come back to this repeatedly so maybe this is a waste of bytes but again you insist on calling me a materialist when I insist I'm nothing of the kind.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't accept rebirth or karma so, at the very least this makes you an ucchedavādin.

Vimalakirti432 said:

So you must see the lack of reciprocity here. I'm not telling you that you're a taoist, or a secret Presbyterian or even a supernaturalist as such. I'm accepting your views as you express them. I'm only saying that as a fellow traveller of Buddhism I personally don't accept its supernatural aspects, and I guess I would be expecting the courtesy of having my views, while certainly challenged, in the end accepted on their own terms.

Malcolm wrote:

But I don't accept that it is proper for a practitioner of Buddhadharma to reject rebirth and karma. I don't accept that it is a proper view to label these things pejoratively "supernatural", which we know is just a hedge word for "superstitions."

Vimalakirti432 said:

Now I understand there is a kind of impulse or even duty in the tradition to refute what are considered wrong views, and this would lead you to what would be considered in some other setting to be discourteous. So no I'm not about to get upset and rant etc. - unless this qualifies as a rant!

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm.....labeling rebirth and karma "superstitions" is actually pretty damn discourteous in a Mahāyāna Buddhist forum.

Vimalakirti432 said:

So again I think we've taken this as far as it can go. I'm by no means a scholar but I've read widely enough in the traditions to be familiar with what you're bringing in here and so unlikely to radically change my views. But perhaps in my next life!

Malcolm wrote:

You have merely left us with an undemonstrated assertion: "karma and rebirth are supernatural beliefs [aka superstitions] and therefore I do not accept them." You have refused to defend this statement in anyway, and have spend most of the time in this exchanging invoking your right to believe whatever you want and be respected for it. I will respect you for believing whatever you want, but not as a follower of Buddhadharma. Whatever you are following, it is not Buddhadharma.

And in particular, you chose to launch this unsubstantiated polemic in the Tibetan Buddhist forum — what the hell did you expect?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 4:40 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

I'm no logician but here I see Dharmakirti as using the old sales guy trick. You don't ask the customer if she wants ice cream but whether she wants chocolate or vanilla. In other words, you force your victim to choose between a false and unnecessary dichotomy, and ordering something they don't want.

Malcolm wrote:

But you have to choose.

Vimalakirti432 said:

I would suggest that as with most of the words we use we don't even know what we mean by "physical". We set up definitions in legitimate ways, in the natural sciences for example for pragmatic purposes, but also in what I consider illegitimate ways, in the interests of defending a certain metaphysical view or system.

Malcolm wrote:

I know precisely what I mean: "physical" [rūpena] refers to any entity that possesses hardness, heat, motility or liquidity in some degree or another. This covers everything on the periodic table of elements and all qualities they can possess or demonstrate, indeed it covers every type of physical phenomena, down to the smallest we can experimentally observe or even imagine, as well as the largest and everything in between.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Here we have what is called the hard problem of consciousness. To oppose the thesis that Dharmakirti is defending is not to assert the contrary but merely to say that neither of the alternatives he offers can be established.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a hard problem at all. You are conscious [unless you are Turing machine], so am I. It is established at the outset you have a mind. So where does it come from? What is its origin? Etc. These are not hard problems, except for materialists.

Vimalakirti432 said:

But this we find in all apologetics everywhere, the misuse of reason in defence of the faith. But logic can't establish this kind of thing, only yogic experience. So when an arhat or practitioner claims such knowledge I can only tip my hat and wish them the best. But when anyone tries to establish this kind of thing through logic I can only shake my head. Reason has many uses, but this isn't one.

Malcolm wrote:

The only one using apologetics here is you. What you are doing is called "eel-wriggling."

Vimalakirti432 said:

As for non-duality, I assume you mean that matter emerges from mind, i.e., the reverse of materialism? But in a previous post I've already touched on that, so I won't repeat myself here.

Malcolm wrote:
Please indulge us.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 4:14 AM
Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth
Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:
Again I don't want to be drawn into a pointless debate, which you would probably agree would be unskillful for both of us.

Malcolm wrote:
That depends, if you start calling me names and jumping up and down and carrying on like this,, maybe it will be unskillful. Otherwise...

Vimalakirti432 said:
1. My assertion as to seeing things as they are without false imputations etc. hardly commits me to what you're calling "materialism". My point all the way through is that both "material" and "spiritual" are constructs. But here I think we get into the philosophic weeds that can hardly be cleared out in this kind of forum.

Malcolm wrote:
First we have to establish what an authority is. Buddhadharma accepts three kinds, direct perception, inferences based on direct perceptions and testimony.

Vimalakirti432 said:
2. I'm sure you're aware that Nagarjuna was also called a nihilist by many of his contemporaries. Now I'm not saying that my views adhere precisely to Nagarjuna in all respects, but I see myself here as beginning with his fundamental view of things, and not with some notion of materialism, ancient or modern. If my views come across differently then perhaps I'm not expressing myself very well.

Malcolm wrote:
Nāgārjuna has no position with respect to the ultimate existence or nonexistence of things, nevertheless, conventionally he accepted rebirth and karma, even in the MMK he makes it very clear he advocates the Arya Sammitya position with respect to karma — supporting their concept of the avipraṇāśa amongst all possible options. In the Pratītyasamutpāḍakarika he also makes it clear that conventionally he accepts rebirth and karma.

Vimalakirti432 said:

3. As for the relationship between what we could call nikaya Buddhism and Mahayana, Madhyamika, etc., I'm sure you know better than I do that it's extremely complex and that views on this depend on who you're talking to. So it seems to me pointless to set up and then cling to anything like a precise analysis of these relationships.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not that complicated.

Vimalakirti432 said:

4. No there is nothing supernatural about mind, karma and rebirth, which is precisely my point, and no I don't believe that saying this eviscerates the dharma, but only offers alternate skillful means.

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha taught six dhātus, not only five — with consciousness being the sixth. Now, dhātu does not mean that there is one unified element, which is why we also have the idea of the sattva dhātu, the dhātu of sentient beings.

It is not a skillful means to cater to people's annihilationist tendencies any more than it is a skillful means to cater to their eternalist tendencies [though indeed the Buddha has said the latter is preferable to the former]. You have jumped on the horse only to fall off on the other side [annihilationism].

Vimalakirti432 said:

Otherwise, you appear to be well grounded in your tradition with firm shradda so of course I have to respect your point of view, even where I see that it may lead you to inaccurate imputation of an alternate way. And you may be correct in every respect.

Malcolm wrote:

First, before you make judgements about the imputations of others, you have to establish that your own cognitions are authoritative. Are you quite certain you are not the one making false imputations, i.e., false inferences?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Just a slight correction: I meant avoiding speech no likely to be of further use. I guess I can also add that I could respond to several of your points in discussion, but that we lack the basis to make that discussion fruitful. Again, with metta and all the best.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course we have no basis for further discussion because you are a priory committed to physicalism. You fail the first step of the heuristic that Dharmakīrti lays out in his proof of rebirth, i.e. do you think that the cause of a moment of mind is material or mental?

You seek refuge in some putative nonduality of matter and mind, and I am happy to understand that mind and matter are nondual, but in precisely the opposite way you intend.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

Hi Malcolm. Here I would only maintain once again, that "materialist" is an unfair imputation in my case, and in the case of many others who consider themselves non-supernaturalists. But I guess we'll have to leave it there, in the interests of right speech. In this case, that means speech not likely to be of further use. I invite you to carefully read my other posts, if you're interested in fully understanding my views. We obviously have different predispositions, so from my side no harm no foul. With metta.

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing supernatural about mind, nor is there anything supernatural about karma and the ripening of karma.

Your very use of the term "supernatural" to describe phenomena such as karma and rebirth places you squarely in the Carvaka camp. The Carvakas were not fools, and I don't take you to be one, they were very sophisticated thinkers who were a dominant school in pre-Hindu India. But it is undeniable that negating rebirth and karma eviscerates the Buddha's teaching and his Dharma.

The negation of rebirth and karma on a relative level is an extreme view, ucchedavāda, annihilationism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

1. As for the definition of "materialist", my point is that the tulku is setting up a straw man argument, replacing a variety of possible opposing points of view with a dimwitted, comic book version of a "materialist" of no real interest to anyone.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not matter what colors and shades you want to paint a materialist in, a materialist will always hold matter as a first principle, and consciousness as derivative from physical processes.

Vimalakirti432 said:

2. As for consciousness as an emergent property of matter, some certainly hold that view, but my point again is that the old dichotomy material/spiritual has been so subverted by what we now know of the uncanny nature of so-called "matter" as to render the old dichotomy meaningless. Does that mean that anything goes, that anything can happen? No, it simply means that we attend to what's there, without imposing dualities, and with a minimum of distorted, inaccurate or unskillful imputations.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is all to say that at the end of the day, consciousness is asserted to follow physical laws, hence materialism — and this observation is identical to the carvaka point of view.

Vimalakirti432 said:

3. As for different views of rebirth in Buddhism, I'm sure you're aware that most Theravadins have a very literal view of rebirth, kamma, nibbana, etc. and certainly would never say that rebirth from the ultimate side is "mumbo-jumbo" as the tulku did.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they would — rebirth is irrelevant from the point of view of paramatthadhammas.

Vimalakirti432 said:

So while I agree that nearly everything in the Mahayana is prefigured in the early suttas, we can't ignore the significant differences. Certainly Theravadins don't.

Malcolm wrote:

The only substantially important different is whether the antarabhāva, aka bardo, is accepted or rejected. This is dealt with in the Koshabhaṣyam

Vimalakirti432 said:

4. As for karma rooted in volition I agree, but again I can't subscribe to the supernaturalist amplifications of this idea that you note here.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, because you are a materialist, and therefore reject rebirth, and consider the ripening of karma described by the Buddha as "supernaturalist." It's ok, I mean, I don't care whether you accept rebirth or not — but it is impossible to practice Buddhadharma correctly without accepting rebirth, you know, the "supernatural" kind, not the bullshit revisionism we see bandied about these days. At best, you might, as in the Kalamas sutta, be able to have a bit of relaxation by practicing the four brahmaviharas, but you certainly will not enjoy liberation.

What you fail to understand is that in Buddhadharma, matter is regarded as an emergent property of minds, not the other way around.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 13th, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Matt J said:

Then what is the role of concepts in Dzogchen teachings?

Yet all of these schools use concepts eventually to undermine concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence the critique from a Dzogchen perspective.

The point I am making is that intellectual analysis will only result in an intellectual apprehension of the object of analysis. Even when you are finished with the analysis, for example, the famous diamond sliver analysis, and so on, still in the end you are left with the concept "emptiness", "nonarising", "freedom from extremes" and so on, even though, as Mañjuśrimitra points out, since the conceptualized extreme does not exist, therefore the extreme to analyze does not exist. Therefore, conventional analysis by mundane minds cannot be used in an ultimate analysis because they cannot escape their own conceptual clinging, indeed they are always with concepts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Matt J said:

Yet all of these schools use concepts eventually to undermine concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence the critique from a Dzogchen perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism and rebirth

Content:

Vimalakirti432 said:

It was particularly telling that he appeared to conflate these posited materialists with ancient Indian materialists or nihilists, the charvakas.

Malcolm wrote:

There is very little difference in their point of view.

Vimalakirti432 said:

In fact, with the advance of the sciences and especially of physics and cosmology what does the term "materialist" even mean?

Malcolm wrote:

It means one believes that consciousness arises as an emergent property of matter.

Vimalakirti432 said:

So while later Mahayana, Madhyamika and Tibetan Buddhism re-imagined rebirth in ways still unthinkable for Buddhist realists like the Theravadins, we should allow the same process to happen in modern Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense, Mahāyāna concepts around rebirth, as well as those of Madhyamaka and so on are based grounded in the Abhidharma tradition of Sarvastivāda.

Vimalakirti432 said:

Rebirth and karma, I feel, are most properly seen in the deep context of interdependent origination, of infinite causes and conditions, and do not depend on ancient physiology, or on the notion of isolated streams of becoming, which violates the logic of the Mahayana in any case (non-distinctions, interpenetration, etc.).

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are properly seen in the context of what the Buddha taught: that is unique beginningless mindstreams have volitions, direct physical and verbal actions based on the volitions, and reap the results of those volitions in the future. In this case, Tibetan Buddhists mainly depend on the Sautrantika/Yogacara explanation for ripening, but not exclusively.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 5:49 PM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

dreambow said:

It seems the Canadian economy is very rocky and the USA have over 90 million people jobless...its staggering!

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this figure includes retirees and teenagers...it is not really like that

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 5:08 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

Boomerang said:

I just finished listening to the webcast from Singapore. Am I allowed to start practicing guru yoga and the Song of Vajra now? I'm not a member of the Dzogchen Community as of yet (registering today), but want to be on the list ASAP. I always thought you had to be a member first, but is that not even necessary as long as you tune in to one of Rinpoche's public webcasts?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Yes, but you won't have access to replay.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 11:18 AM

Title: Re: a former student of aroter seeks help!

Content:

inbetween said:

Then I found this! I am glad you saved this...I won't dare to think of...

I apology the whole sangha and Buddha for my sins and beg for help! I cannot do this on my own.

respectfully inbetween

Malcolm wrote:

You should make a connection with Chogyal Namkhai Norbu. He is running webcast retreat today actually, it starts in four hours roughly.

<http://webcast.dzogchen.net/index.php?id=live-webcast>

Boomerang said:

Is it okay to just drop in and watch the webcast without having any idea what's going on?

Malcolm wrote:

yup

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 10:42 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The reality, my friend, is that you cannot tell which of the two moons are true, because in fact neither are.

LastLegend said:

I know you have faith in your experience and guru. That's why Pure Land is superior my friend. FAITH.

Malcolm wrote:

Certainty is better than faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

"you are like a man holding a book in a language he does not understand, sagaciously informing everyone else that they do not understand it either."

Actually that was precisely my position in the consort practice discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understood that you did not understand it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you feel you are speaking from a position of definitive authority. In other words, you must yourself be a master of sūtra. Otherwise you are like a man holding a book in a language he does not understand, sagaciously informing everyone else that they do not understand it either.

LastLegend said:

No sir. I have no such arrogance right now, and I am not that ignorant to make judgment about other Paths without knowing what they really understand. But here is my view:

The language in Sutra is hard to understand. This is the reason why people get caught up with the teachings/tools more than what's the teachings are pointing to. Language of Zen Patriarchs are to understand as well.

Malcolm wrote:

So I guess it is the latter: "you are like a man holding a book in a language he does not understand, sagaciously informing everyone else that they do not understand it either."

The reality, my friend, is that you cannot tell which of the two moons are true, because in fact neither are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 6:09 AM

Title: Re: a former student of aroter seeks help!

Content:

inbetween said:

Then I found this! I am glad you saved this...I won't dare to think of...

I apology the whole sangha and Buddha for my sins and beg for help! I cannot do this on my own.

respectfully inbetween

Malcolm wrote:

You should make a connection with Chogyal Namkhai Norbu. He is running webcast retreat today actually, it starts in four hours roughly.

<http://webcast.dzogchen.net/index.php?id=live-webcast>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: CNN Odzer Chenma retreat sept 11-13

Content:

Tigersnest said:

I was unable to listen to the retreat, was the invocation different then the Practice which DC usually uses?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 5:36 AM

Title: Re: Practicing in the midst of relationship problems

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Many difficulties regarding relationships in my life lately.

Marital problems possibly leading to divorce or separation soon.

One very important friendship dissolving into fights and negativity. We are temporarily not speaking.

Another heading in the wrong direction that makes it difficult for me to know how to proceed.

Still another with a sudden "change of heart" that makes me very nervous.

Outside of that, there is only one person I see regularly, as I'm a very private person. So nearly all of the important relationships in my life are, to put it bluntly, in the shitter in some form or another.

I've never had insomnia or such strong feelings of aloneness as right now.

I'm not sure how to bring them to the dharma path.

It's made shamatha very difficult, to say the least.

Of course this brings home the samsaric qualities of every relationship. But how bittersweet to see it in your own life, and in such a large amount at one time. My instinct isn't towards cultivating insight but just some way to not feel so bad.

For now, I just say some mantras, manis mostly.

Thanks for anyone's advice, who has maybe been in a similar situation.

Malcolm wrote:

At the end of the day, Dharma is our only companion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 5:24 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtra does not contain all teachings. If it did, there would be no need for Vajrayāna and so on.

LastLegend said:

Very few understand Sutras, they think they really do but they don't.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you feel you are speaking from a position of definitive authority. In other words, you must yourself be a master of sūtra. Otherwise you are like a man holding a book in a language he does not understand, sagaciously informing everyone else that they do not understand it either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

LastLegend said:

Zen...

Malcolm wrote:

If everything were in sūtras, there would be no need for Zen either, a path, like Dzogchen, famous for saying it is outside of the scriptures.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

LastLegend said:

People keep downplaying Sutra path as a conceptual path but actually Sutra contain all teachings for all capacities.

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtra does not contain all teachings. If it did, there would be no need for Vajrayāna and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

Kamalashila's Bhavanakramas are instructions for meditation. I dare say that even the Middle Treatise of Nagarjuna is good for meditation, not to mention the many prajnaparamita sutras. Just as Vajrayana texts can be taken for purely philosophical writings, so can the teachings of the Buddha can and often are mistaken as theoretical matters. Analysis is not meant for achieving an objective statement but to attain insight. I'm not even sure why it happens that while it is obvious that the Dharma is for liberation, teachings are regularly dismissed as if they were products of a bored academic. It is another thing that philosophy is viewed with contempt, calling it idle talk. But once we rename it as ideology, it becomes more apparent how thoughts govern action.

For instance, when there is a teaching about the aggregates, it is not about abstract ideas with no relevance to one's personal life and experience, but instructions on what and how to investigate in order to see the true nature of reality and gain liberation. It is always about direct seeing, that's what vipasyana is. Reducing the words of the Buddha and numerous teachers to mere theorising is not just insulting but inconsiderate and ignorant. (And I'm not saying here, Cone, that you are like that, these are just my general observations.)

It is not a question of conceptuality but how those concepts are understood. Keeping a distance between oneself and some ideas is when it is mere theorising, fantasising about things that have no weight. On the other hand, when a concept is taken seriously, when it is reflected on and connected to one's experience, that is heeding the advice and following the teachings. It becomes a personal matter. Just like when one can listen to any teacher and not find anything noteworthy in his words, if that teacher is seen as one's guru, even the most innocent movements become Dharma instructions.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is your original question:

How can it be argued that the popular methods lacking the conceptual methods of discerning appearances are valid?

Mañjuśrimitra in the Meditation of Bodhicitta would have replied to Kamalaśīla in the following way:

When analyzing the extremes of deconstruction and proofs for entities by the reason of direct perception and so on, after that domain of those who follow the stream of concepts is defined as authoritative, because the conceptualized extreme does not exist, there is no extreme to analyze, and if there is no core, what can be defined as an authority?

Therefore, the conventions of mundane analysis are not necessary in this yoga.

Keep in mind, the Meditation of Bodhicitta is a text aimed Mahāyānis just like Kamalaśīla, oriented towards showing that this kind of analysis is just not necessary at all in Mahāyāna. That in fact, it is an obstacle to understanding the real meaning of Mahāyāna.

The point is that the methods of conceptual analysis are invalid for ultimate analysis, as Mipham points out in his commentary on this text:

...a mundane authority is not valid for an ultimate analysis,

Why is this important? Because in general, the whole notion of direct perceptions, inferences, and so on are defined on the basis of of the conceptual cognitions of ordinary people. Therefore:

Therefore, the conventions of mundane analysis are not necessary in this yoga.

Which yoga? Mahāyāna yoga.

So the question must be turned around:

How can it be argued that conceptual methods of discerning appearances are valid?

Incidentally, Mañjuśrimitra never once uses the term "Ati yoga" or "Dzogchen" in this text, though he does make reference to Vajrasattva, Mahāyoga concepts and Samantabhadri. He also on the other hand uses Prajñāpāramitā references, even working the name "Arhat Subhuti" into the text to represent a principle of the teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

Clarence said:

Okay. Thanks.

Anything in your book about the difference?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a brief discussion of śamatha and vipaśyāna in section on the method of practice, chapter eight, specifically in the transcendent state of the sugatas section.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 2:15 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This Dzogchen style. Very supple, produces flexible wood, very green, hard to break. In Dzogchen style śamatha you actually engage all six sense objects with your six senses, there is nothing to accept and nothing to reject, nothing to follow, nothing to ignore.

Clarence said:

Sounds very much like regular Trekchod, no?

Malcolm wrote:

A little, but really it has to do with the definition of one pointed. In sūtra style one pointedness, one is focusing one's mind on one point, in a very concentrated way, while ignoring everything else. Also in Dzogchen, sometimes we use this experience as well.

But there is also another meaning of one pointedness, meaning that all sense contact all their objects.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

Boomerang said:

Wallace for example, in teaching shamatha without a sign, says ignore all thought, feelings, body sense and just focus on the awareness of awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Thus is sūtra style. Very rigid, produces brittle wood, very dry, easy to break.

Boomerang said:

Tsoknyi R, in teaching the same practice (he calls it shamatha without support- they are both mikpa mepe shine) gives a much more relaxed approach, where all the senses are open and you are not particularly ignoring anything, just not getting involved with it.

Malcolm wrote:

This Dzogchen style. Very supple, produces flexible wood, very green, hard to break. In Dzogchen style śamatha you actually engage all six sense objects with your six senses, there is nothing to accept and nothing to reject, nothing to follow, nothing to ignore.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Here, what is being recommended is the intimate instructions of the guru

Astus said:

There is little difference between someone orally giving the instructions or handing over a book containing the same instructions.

Malcolm wrote:

Who said the instructions were the same? Certainly not Kengyur Rinpoche.

Sword of Wisdom is a Madhyamaka text. Not a Dzogchen text. It is best not to confuse one with the other.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 12:40 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

smcj said:

There really isn't any other kind...the name "Sūtra Mahāmudra" is like calling a donkey an Arabian stallion.

I've used "Sutra Mahamudra" to mean the type that approaches it through shamatha, vipassana, then Mahamudra. "Tantric Mahamudra" I've used for completion stage practice and the 6 yogas. Is that not correct?

Malcolm wrote:

Kongtrul clearly states that "Sūtra" Mahāmudra is for people who do not have the capacity for the two stages. It is a style of mixing sūtra practice and the view expressed in the dohas. But it is a slow and gradual path, since it is sūtrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 12th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What page are you thinking of?

Astus said:

The practice of those who perceive appearances in the manner of sense objects, p 269-

274.

That is within the section of "An explanation of the key points of the practice", within the chapter "The Extraordinary Path of Practice of the Great Perfection".

Malcolm wrote:

Pg. 271:

"The shamatha and vipashyāna deriving from oral instructions do not depend on the reading and analysis of the texts.

Here, what is being recommended is the intimate instructions of the guru over and above the sūtrayāna style analysis mentioned in the previous paragraph, and which you were claiming above was critically necessary, without which no progress could be made at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 11:55 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

..."not in Tantric Mahamudra".

Malcolm wrote:

There really isn't any other kind...the name "Sūtra Mahāmudra" is like calling a donkey an Arabian stallion. Sure, they both have four legs, sure they both belong to the Genus equis, sure one can mate with the other, but the latter will always be a much superior steed to ride.

Astus said:

Also, in vol 2 of Jigme Lingpa's Treasury of Precious Qualities at the end of the discussion of the path of Dzogchen he gives not only a direct but also an analytical method. So, even if there are other methods, it is considered quite efficient if Vajrayana masters have no problem including it in their teachings on the highest levels.]

Malcolm wrote:

What page are you thinking of?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

Boomerang said:

What are other approaches?

Malcolm wrote:

As mentioned, mantra practice is considered to be one of the best methods of training in Shamatha.

It very much depends on your proclivities.

My advice is that you be like a bee and seek out a few different teachers and approaches before settling on one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: How important is shamatha, and practices before shamatha

Content:

Boomerang said:

My understanding is that traditionally, you need to master shamatha before you do most practices, such as secret mantras and tonglen, with ngondro being the only exception. But if a part of ngondro is Vajrasattva, how can you effectively do that if you haven't already mastered shamatha?

Have most people who do yidam practice and highest yoga tantra completed long shamatha retreats? It's supposed to take 6 months in retreat to master shamatha, isn't it?

Is there a definitive list of practices that are considered A-okay before one has done a shamatha retreat? Is it effective to do non-ngondro prostrations, like the 3 heaps sutra, before mastering shamatha?

Malcolm wrote:

This is only one approach, very much based on the Lam Rim approach. It is not the only approach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So, analysis serves no purpose, we are to seek a guru? Is that the point?

Malcolm wrote:

It all depends on how fast you wish to wake up.

Wayfarer said:

Kind of makes having the need for an internet forum moot, doesn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

Internet forums are breeding grounds for conceptuality, some of them however are worse than others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Is the consciousness that engages in analysis deluded or undeluded? Is the object of analysis delusive or non-delusive?

If either the consciousness or the object are respectively deluded or delusive, there is no means by which the analysis can result in non-delusion.

If on other other hand the consciousness or the object is respectively non-deluded or non-delusive, the analysis is unnecessary.

Astus said:

That's some nice analysis you present.

Malcolm wrote:

You have to speak to the analytical in language they understand.

Astus said:

...supposing a separate realm is a mistake.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence the deviation of Madhyamakas two truths.

Astus said:

The reason analysis works is because it removes wrong views and eventually attachment to any view. Analysis is a means, not an end. And analysis is required because the wrong views that generate all the problems are conceptual.

Malcolm wrote:

Madhyamaka analysis is not required, it is merely the approach of sūtra. It also does not produce the real view free of conceptuality.

Astus said:

But let's not stop there. Is there a consciousness to be deluded or undeluded? Is there an object to be deluded or undeluded? Since neither a consciousness nor an object can be established, talking about their state of ignorance and enlightenment is like describing the graceful stance of the son of a barren woman.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. Therefore, since there is no consciousness nor object to be established discussing their analysis is like discussing the horns on a rabbit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 9:26 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Analysis merely substitutes one conceptual attachment for another, thus blocking the seeing of the truth; which one already sees anyway without knowing that one is seeing it. The question is really, "what does one hope to find in analysis?" Is there something to find? If there is nothing to find, than the analysis itself is a deviation from reality.

Astus said:

Analysis results in the elimination of attachment...

Malcolm wrote:

Is the consciousness that engages in analysis deluded or undeluded? Is the object of analysis delusive or non-delusive?

If either the consciousness or the object are respectively deluded or delusive, there is no means by which the analysis can result in non-delusion.

If on other other hand the consciousness or the object is respectively non-deluded or non-delusive, the analysis is unnecessary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 6:05 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually I did.

Astus said:

I don't see how "the intimate instructions of the guru are important" is an explanation for it, but it seems there is nothing more than that.

Malcolm wrote:

You have to receive them from a guru. Then you will understand. Until that point, there is nothing more to say.

Astus said:

Everyone is already experiencing suchness directly. It simply needs to be pointed out through experience. It is not discernible through analysis. The analysis itself is the obstacle.

Pointing out through experience - since one cannot directly transfer experience to another, there are only teachings one can follow to confirm reality for oneself.

Malcolm wrote:

A direct introduction is an introduction done through your own experience; it is not a transfer of experience.

Astus said:

What blocks the vision of reality is conceptual attachment. Analysis removes that attachment, thus allows the experience of insight.

Malcolm wrote:

Analysis merely substitutes one conceptual attachment for another, thus blocking the seeing of the truth; which one already sees anyway without knowing that one is seeing it.

The question is really, "what does one hope to find in analysis?" Is there something to find? If there is nothing to find, then the analysis itself is a deviation from reality.

As chapter thirty-eight of the Kun byed rgyal po states:

The sūtras of bodhisattvas assert the stage of Samantaprabhaḥ, and assert dharmatā as empty space

through the investigation and analysis of the two truths.

The great bliss of Ati Yoga is awakened mind beyond investigation and analysis, that which is beyond investigation and analysis is obscured by the sūtras.

The Great Perfection explains that investigation and analysis are error in the sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you want those instructions, you will have to go and get them.

Astus said:

You said that Vajrayana is exempt from analysis, but then did not support that with an explanation of how could that be.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, actually I did.

Astus said:

How so? The direct experience of suchness is what Vajrayana teaches, isn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone is already experiencing suchness directly. It simply needs to be pointed out through experience. It is not discernible through analysis. The analysis itself is the obstacle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

smcj said:

I think it's 100% true. People can make the most amazing ornate cages out of dharma.

I'm going to go out on a limb and say that none of my teachers would agree with that statement. The issue never arose, so I can't say for sure, but none have ever shown the slightest sympathy to that kind of idea.

Malcolm wrote:

None of your teachers are teachers of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 3:09 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

As for directly accessing the view of suchness, Kamalashila writes,

Malcolm wrote:

Kamalashila's citation is completely irrelevant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 3:08 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

The question is about those instructions, that you say do not involve analysis.

Malcolm wrote:

If you want those instructions, you will have to go and get them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

...I suppose Malcolm would have to clarify there, being that it's his translation.

Malcolm wrote:

Phenomena is chos, dharmin; nonphenomena is chos min, i.e., dharmatā; the former is the relative, the latter is the ultimate. Since they are merged, there is no such thing as an ultimate phenomena, don dam chos, paramārthadharma.

In other words, the two truths of Madhyamaka are a deviation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The limitation of Madhyamaka vipaśyāna is that it is an intellectual analysis.

Astus said:

What does it limit? Unless it is argued that vipasyana does not result in wisdom, it works.

Malcolm wrote:

Vipaśyāna is conceptual. That is its limitation. Plus, Madhyamaka analysis is ultimately dualistic.

Astus said:

You say Vajrayana is different, and that's fine, but it has not yet been clarified how and in what way.

Malcolm wrote:

It has been clarified, you just refuse to listen:

As such, in order to recognize that concepts are dharmatā, the intimate instructions of the guru are important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 11th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

smcj said:

Dzogchen teachings are secret because their meaning is obscure to those who still are involved with the vehicles of cause and result.

That's worded a little strangely. It implies that someone who is not involved with the first 8 yanas, such as a secular person, will have an advantage over a Dharma practitioner in understanding Dzogchen. I'm going to guess that is not what you meant.

Malcolm wrote:

That can in fact be the case.

smcj said:

Of all the teachings of the Buddha, Dzogchen/Mahamudra is most prone to misunderstanding because of the ease with which it can be reduced to something pedestrian. It is the perfect example of the ChNN's quote:

A human being has his limits. And thus in every conceivable way, with every possible means, he tries to make the teaching enter into his own limits.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, what ChNN here is saying is that vehicles of cause and result place limitations on the possibility of liberation because of their limitations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is no special object to be apprehended.

Your question was, "Is analysis necessary." In sūtra yes; in Varjayāna, no. As

Vimalamitra states in his Buddhahood in This Life:

If it is objected, "If afflictions are liberated into dharmatā without antidotes, there is no need for purification on the path. Otherwise, liberation would require no effort," for what reason would those who do not understand be liberated? Asserting that those who understand are liberated merely by recognizing concepts as dharmatā is the fruit of one's wishes. As such, in order to recognize that concepts are dharmatā, the intimate instructions of the guru are important.

Astus said:

There is still no explanation given what kind of experience it is that can take one to realising suchness.

Malcolm wrote:

That is correct. I did not provide the entire chapter for you.

Astus said:

Also, that quote is basically asserting the supremacy of Vajrayana and the ineffectiveness of analysis without giving a reason. And it misrepresents vipasyana as if it were mere intellectual exercise.

Malcolm wrote:

The limitation of Madhyamaka vipaśyāna is that it is an intellectual analysis. But in reality, as it is said in the Soaring Garuda, one of the five early Dzogchen extracts translated by Vairocana, addresses the deviation of Madhyamaka analysis which should be addressed the following way:

Since phenomena and nonphenomena have always been merged and are inseparable, there is no further need to explain an “ultimate phenomenon”.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

So it seems we are both agreeing with Shenphen Rinpoche's points, only one or two people here ridiculed them and you weren't one of them. . .

Malcolm wrote:

I agree that Dzogchen can be misunderstood, but refusing to discuss it does not lend to clarity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 11:32 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

I'm sure you're right about the intent of that story but my intent in mentioning it was just as one example that throughout the history of Dzogchen transmission there's been many reasons for it to be kept more undercover, whether it is to avoid jealousy, orthodoxy, ridicule or misunderstanding, or all of the above, or a plethora of other potential reasons.

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen teachings are not secret, they are for everyone, if they are interested. The way you demonstrated your interest is by seeking out transmission.

When we say Dzogchen teachings are "secret", it does mean they are secret in the sense of a classified document which only people with proper clearance can read — though certainly this is a prevailing attitude evinced by the plethora of "restricted books." Dzogchen teachings are secret because their meaning is obscure to those who still are involved with the vehicles of cause and result. This is the real sense of secrecy in Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

tomamundsen said:

I voted for <http://www.jill2016.com/> in 2012 and I'll vote for her again next year. Although I'm probably just throwing away a vote for Bernie.

Malcolm wrote:

My plan is to vote for Bernie in the primaries, and if he does not win, to vote for Stein.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The face of prajñāpāramitā is not different than all appearances [this is fundamental tenet of Ati yoga, one of things that differentiates it from Chan/Zen, etc.], hence it is an object of mind, an experience. Therefore, it is viewed correctly and incorrectly. Hence, introduction is necessary. Without introduction, buddhahood is not possible.

Buddhahood is not a result of effort or analysis. The difference between a buddha and sentient being is just the difference recognition and nonrecognition.

Astus said:

All appearances are such. Are you saying that there is an appearance that is more such? If not, and what matters is recognising the suchness of any appearance, there are no special objects to be apprehended. As Kamalashila <http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>: "With the knowledge that the mind is without an end and a centre, no identity of the mind is perceived. What is thoroughly realised by the mind too is realised as being empty. By realising that, the very identity which is established as the aspect of the mind, like the identity of physical form, etc., is also not ultimately perceived."

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is no special object to be apprehended.

Your question was, "Is analysis necessary." In sūtra yes; in Varjayāna, no. As

Vimalamitra states in his Buddhahood in This Life:

If it is objected, "If afflictions are liberated into dharmatā without antidotes, there is no need for purification on the path. Otherwise, liberation would require no effort," for what reason would those who do not understand be liberated? Asserting that those who understand are liberated merely by recognizing concepts as dharmatā is the fruit of one's wishes. As such, in order to recognize that concepts are dharmatā, the intimate instructions of the guru are important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 10:15 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hence, the purpose of introduction. For example, one may see faces in a crowd everyday and never recognize them; but when they are introduced to you, you will never fail to recognize them again.

Astus said:

If the face of prajnaparamita could be pointed at, it would have to be an object of mind, an experience, and as such it could be viewed both correctly and incorrectly. It wouldn't be the end of conceptualisation, but rather an opportunity for further proliferation. How is that avoided?

Malcolm wrote:

The face of prajñāpāramitā is not different than all appearances [this is fundamental tenet of Ati yoga, one of things that differentiates it from Chan/Zen, etc.], hence it is an object of mind, an experience. Therefore, it is viewed correctly and incorrectly. Hence, introduction is necessary. Without introduction, buddhahood is not possible.

Buddhahood is not a result of effort or analysis. The difference between a buddha and sentient being is just the difference recognition and nonrecognition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 6:07 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no experience outside of suchness. Therefore, experiences can be used to introduce suchness.

Astus said:

Experiences are already such, but not everyone sees in such a way. What occludes such seeing are not experiences in general but the identification with some of them, thus establishing a self, and the habitual substantialisation of appearances, that is, attachment to concepts. If even temporary cessation of ideation cannot overcome that fundamental ignorance, what kind of experience is it that can?

Malcolm wrote:

Hence, the purpose of introduction. For example, one may see faces in a crowd everyday and never recognize them; but when they are introduced to you, you will never fail to recognize them again.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Saoshun said:

You know that US will fall anyway and there will be a war in 20-50 years from now? US have so much debt that only war can help with it, like hitler did.

DGA said:

Are you saying that Hitler's response to the conditions of Weimar Germany after the Treaty of Versailles was justified?

put differently: Are you defending Nazi aggression on a Buddhist discussion board?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

With regards to the OP quote, it is no secret that many Lamas have different styles of transmission based on their own understanding and how they feel the teachings will root the most deeply and effectively in their students hearts.

Malcolm,

I remember you explaining something quite similar to us on e-sangha. The word I remember you using at that time was "fiefdom" though. How in old tibet, each lama had their own fiefdom. This stayed with me because I often thought about how much of a transition they all had to make, coming out of Tibet as they did. Lama Chime often said that he went directly from living in the eighth century to living in the twentieth century.

There are many approaches to practices. Why? Because everyone is different and the fact that everyone is different is not a trivial matter.

Malcolm wrote:

No doubt, but that was not the point I was addressing. It is however its own point. Glad I belong the kingdom of ChNN.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

And we are off topic again sort of-- the point isn't keeping things secret it's about authentic transmission. Shri Singha didn't just write it down and publish it widely in Tibet-- he gave an oral transmission to Vairotsana until both of them were satisfied with his understanding, then he left to return to Tibet to bring the teachings there, and transmit them from master to disciple. You can read the different lineages of Dzogchen and how they were transmitted to whom and how they were carried forth in the History of the Nyingma book of HH Dudjom Rinpoche. Nowhere does it say "and then this disciple never met a human master but found a text in a bookstore and achieved full realization after reading it over and over again". It is through the master disciple relationship that the teaching has always been transmitted- not through books - and this is what ChNN teaches and what you yourself affirmed at the beginning of the thread.

Malcolm wrote:

I was addressing the intent of the story you raised. The purpose of Śrī Simha's teaching Dzogchen in such a ridiculous fashion had nothing to do with generally keeping Dzogchen teachings secret, it had to do with fooling the Indian King and Panditas so Vairocana could return with Dzogchen teachings Tibet.

Everything in Buddhadharma needs to be transmitted from master to disciple, no exceptions, even sūtra knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Even in the time of Majusrimitra these Dzogchen teachings were kept quite secret to avoid both misunderstanding and persecution from the orthodox establishments, so I am not sure why the idea that it's important to receive transmission and/or authorization to read certain texts is suddenly a controversial idea.

Malcolm wrote:

Garab Dorje said if there is no interest, one student is too many; but if there is interest, 100 is too few.

Garab Dorje himself had hundreds of human students, not only one.

Adamantine said:

Not sure how that is relevant to anything I said, number of students is not really a part of the question is it? Anyway Shri Singha was whispering the Great Perfection teachings through a long copper pipe to Vairotsana in the middle of the night, only teaching the cause and result teachings to him openly during the light of day.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because, as we know, that Indians were jealous and did not want to let Tibetans receive the teachings. Therefore, to confuse the their diviners, in the earliest account we have [from the Bairo rgyud 'bum], Śrī Simha devised a ridiculous method of granting the teachings:

On the surface of three large boulders he placed an iron jar inside of a net. After the ācarya sat inside of it, he had the top filled with water and closed. Having run a clay pipe through a hole in the wall, those two monks where on the outside of the wall. As a precaution, they put their boots on backwards, they put long hoods on their heads, and listened.

When the Indian King tried to find out who had given the teachings to the Tibetans: Since it was asked which person bestowed them, also no one wished to reply, it was said “It is necessary to examine the mirror”. The mirror diviner said “The abbot who is explaining the Great Perfection, the Dharma of transcendent intimate instructions, is sitting on a rock, his body is filled with eyes. He is seated on the surface of three large rocks. A lake has arisen over his head. He is giving the explanation with a long beak. Two with long deerskin hoods are listening from outside.”

Since the Dharma protecting king and all the pandits said “This is incredible, are they emanations of an asura? They cannot be clearly identified from the mirror. It must be no other than the two Tibetans. It is clear from the water divination that a swift runner must be sent.”

This indicates that the Great Perfection was quite well known to the Indians at that time, not such a huge secret.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

BrianG said:

The military industrial complex isn't written in stone. It can always be dismantled, if people have the desire to.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, hence the reason for supporting Bernie Sanders.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Adamantine said:

Even in the time of Majusrimitra these Dzogchen teachings were kept quite secret to avoid both misunderstanding and persecution from the orthodox establishments, so I am not sure why the idea that it's important to receive transmission and/or authorization to read certain texts is suddenly a controversial idea.

Malcolm wrote:

Garab Dorje said if there is no interest, one student is too many; but if there is interest, 100 is too few.

Garab Dorje himself had hundreds of human students, not only one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 2:18 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Saoshun said:

You know that US will fall anyway and there will be a war in 20-50 years from now? US have so much debt that only war can help with it, like hitler did.

BrianG said:

The US has roughly 20 trillion in debt vs 200 trillion in assets. If you have 200 dollars, and you owe 20, you are in pretty good shape.

Also, the US is already at war.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really, though it may seem that way.

This is why we need to bring a guy like Sanders in. He will put an end to this once and for all, so I believe.

We put Obama in office to end the war in Iraq and Afghanistan. He did, but not very well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtra works with analysis, Vajrayāna works with experiences.

Astus said:

How can experience make one understand suchness, when the error lies not in what is experienced but in how that experienced thing is viewed?

Malcolm wrote:

There is no experience outside of suchness. Therefore, experiences can be used to introduce suchness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: European refugee crisis

Content:

dreambow said:

Yes Germany is doing more than its fair share.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, they need the influx of population to bolster their labor force.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 10th, 2015 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And that is a good thing for the world, especially Asia.

BrianG said:

Business in arms is wrong livelihood, and isn't good for anybody.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, but these people are not Dharma practitioners, none of them. They are worldly people. So we work with circumstances. The Eisenhower speech is very nice. Day late and a dollar short to trot that one out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

What other tool is there but correct analysis?

Malcolm wrote:

In Sūtra? None.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about sutra. It does not apply to Vajrayāna. Apples and oranges.

Astus said:

How so? Vajrayana doesn't aim at a different emptiness, does it?

Malcolm wrote:

Sūtra works with analysis, Vajrayāna works with experiences.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

smcj said:

Lol, like what is the success rate for ChNN's students? Who is doing the counting?.

Malcolm wrote:

He is, and it is high. He is very satisfied with his students in general, or so he has said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Analysis or Nothing

Content:

Astus said:

If, as Kamalashila states, analysis is a necessary element of the path, it excludes all other options to reach insight into the nature of reality. Consequently, there can be no direct methods (pointing to the nature of mind, empowerment, direct introduction, etc.) that avoid using analysis. How can it be argued that the popular methods lacking the conceptual methods of discerning appearances are valid?

"Those who do not meditate with wisdom by analysing individually the entity of things, but merely meditate on elimination of mental activity, cannot avert conceptual thoughts and also cannot realise identitylessness because one lacks the light of wisdom. If the fire of consciousness knowing phenomena as they are is produced from individual analysis of suchness, then like the fire produced by rubbing wood it will burn the wood of conceptual thought."

(<http://www.preciousteaching.org/sutra/kamalasilas-bhavana-krama-the-middle-meditation-stage/>)

"Thus it is on the basis of obtaining unobscured knowledge that one understands every single teaching of the Buddha. Hence without the discernment of reality there is no arising of perfect knowledge, nor also the abandonment of the afflictive obscurations." (Necessity of Bhutapratyaveksa, Bhavanakrama 3, in Martin T. Adams: Meditation and The Concept of Insight in Kamalasila's Bhavanakramas (thesis), p 247)

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about sutra. It does not apply to Vajrayāna. Apples and oranges.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:
Norwegian said:
Ivo,

The master that practically demanded that ChNN started teaching Dzogchen, was His Holiness the 16th Karmapa.

Malcolm wrote:
Actually, this is not true.

Karmapa asked ChNN to teach his students in Italy. ChNN replied, I will teach your students, but I will not run a Kagyu Center [which is what the Karmapa was after]. I will teach them according to what I understand. I heard ChNN himself explain it this way.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 10:20 PM
Title: Re: POTUS 2016
Content:

Dan74 said:
So while I think you make many good points about the candidates, Malcolm, I don't quite see what you base this on:

Malcolm wrote:
But the reality of the situation is this — Britain and the EU, the Saudis and so on are using the US as a proxy to to control terrorist organizations that are harmful to them. Basically the capitalist European North, while making disapproving noises in some sectors, tacitly, and in many cases explicitly, approve of US military actions. that is just how it is.

Dan74 said:
As far as I can tell, the EU is largely at America's beck and call as many recent events have demonstrated (for instance the Bolivian presidential plane incident https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Evo_Morales_grounding_incident).

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, that is my point. The so called "civililzed" countries that KD is referring to depend on the American Hegemony, and even though they squawk Anti-American sentiments on occasion, their security has been dependent on US power since the end of WWII.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 10:17 PM
Title: Re: POTUS 2016
Content:

BrianG said:

The U.S. has nineteen aircraft carriers, compared to China's single used Russian aircraft carrier. China can not project power on anywhere near the scale the US can. No matter where someone is reading this in the world - the US has warships nearby, and can land Marines on your countries soil within 24 hours. The same can not be said for China.

Malcolm wrote:

And that is a good thing for the world, especially Asia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

lostitude said:

Besides the remarks I've already made, I really can't see how it would make a practical difference whether you believe in rebirth or not. At the end of a day, in either case you are practising NOW, in THIS life and you are trying to end suffering starting here and now. Not in a million lifetimes from now. Some even want to reach liberation in one lifetime. And that's one more reason why I think the quote was misused.

If someone doesn't believe in rebirth, he could well be inclined to seek nirvana in this very life even if it is the only one. If it's not ok to go through samsara for eons, then it's not ok to go through it even for a lifetime, and as little as I have read so far, I know this is something the Buddha has said himself. Even a second of samsara is not worth living. So I really don't see why such a perspective of practice should be frowned upon or disparaged in such a way. The goal is the same and the means to achieve it are the same.

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the entire teachings:

If you have attachment to this life, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

If you have attachment to samsara, you do not have renunciation.

If you have attachment to your own purpose, you do not have bodhicitta.

If you have grasping, you do not have the view.

This means if you are only working for this life's happiness and freedom from suffering, you are not a Dharma practitioner. If you are practicing Dharma for higher rebirth only, you do not have renunciation. If you are only interested in your own liberation, you do not have bodhicitta, the motivation to become Buddha for the benefit of everyone. If you have grasping [to the view of self, etc.], you do not have the view.

The fact is that someone who does not accept rebirth automatically has wrong views and thus will not even be capable of stream entry. They will not understand why they are suffering and therefore, will not be capable of removing the cause of their suffering, just as a doctor who does not properly diagnose the cause of an illness will not be able to apply the proper treatment for that illness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 9:41 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

BrianG said:

China is not bombing Tibetan women and children with robots, and I already stated that it's domestic policy is disgusting. I'm not sure which part of this strikes you as false.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, one, the US is not bombing "countries" anymore. It is using drones [of which I disapprove incidentally] to target non-State actors who are targeting US assets in terrorist plots.

Karma Dorje said:

Yes, like he said: Bombing women and children with robots. You guys may not have invented English, but you sure are good at euphemisms!

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm....they are also killing women and children with bombs — it really doesn't matter whether your delivery system is a drone or a suicide bomber, the result is identical. I don't approve of either. These terrorists, aka non-State actors, are not in a position of moral superiority to the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

lostitude said:

Anders was talking about solving the issue of suffering, which is very different from being 'only focused on happiness for this life' which in turn is quite different from 'being attached to this life' as I understand it in English.

Malcolm wrote:

No, more or less it is the same thing. Absence of suffering is happiness — you may wish to contest this definition, but this is pretty much how happiness is defined by Buddhadharma.

lostitude said:

Sure but you just wrote something completely different when you compared absence of suffering to 'being only focused on happiness in this life' and 'being attached to this life'. For starters I can't see how you can be truly happy if you are attached to this life which you know is bound to end. There can't be true happiness without detachment in this regard. So your quote can't possibly apply to someone who wants to end suffering, even in this life...

I'm saying this because of that quote you mentioned, which, as you are using it, is supposed to disqualify those who strive to eliminate suffering in this life from being true dharma practitioners. It may be the case at the end of the day that they are not true dharma practitioners as you say, who am I to judge, but that's not what your quote says, as I read it at least, so I wonder why you came up with it there.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are attached to this life, you try to eliminate problems, suffering, in your life thinking of only this life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

lostitude said:

Anders was talking about solving the issue of suffering, which is very different from being 'only focused on happiness for this life' which in turn is quite different from 'being attached to this life' as I understand it in English.

Malcolm wrote:

No, more or less it is the same thing. Absence of suffering is happiness — you may wish to contest this definition, but this is pretty much how happiness is defined by Buddhadharma.

Eliminating suffering in this life is palliative, it does not address the root issue, the three afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms along with their cause, self-grasping.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: Buddhism loses all purpose if you don't believe in reinc

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"If one is attached to this life, one is not a Dharma practitioner."

If your goal is to simply end suffering in this lifetime, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

lostitude said:

But why do you assume that trying to solve the issue of suffering in this life implies being attached to this life? To me it's like saying, trying to become a bodhisattva in this life is being attached to it...

Malcolm wrote:

Meaning, if you are only focused on happiness for this life, you are not a Dharma practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Questions about Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

It's a little disheartening sometimes when gurus jet in for the empowerment then jet out to the next one.

Malcolm wrote:

One of the things that ChNN said in the first retreat I ever attended with him is that a Dzogchen Guru's job is to make you independent from them. This is a very different message from the standard guru idea in Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

BrianG said:

China is not bombing Tibetan women and children with robots, and I already stated that it's domestic policy is disgusting. I'm not sure which part of this strikes you as false.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, one, the US is not bombing "countries" anymore. It is using drones [of which I disapprove incidentally] to target non-State actors who are targeting US assets in terrorist plots.

There are problems with US policy, such as the idea that we are at war with terrorists, and such policies need to be changed. It is insane to be at war against an enemy that is so poorly defined, and there is too much room for abuse.

But the reality of the situation is this — Britain and the EU, the Saudis and so on are using the US as a proxy to to control terrorist organizations that are harmful to them. Basically the capitalist European North, while making disapproving noises in some sectors, tacitly, and in many cases explicitly, approve of US military actions. that is just how it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Questions about Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

chimechodra said:

I guess my real question is, what's the difference between a person simply watching a DC webcast, buying some books and trying to do these really advanced practices in their home, and say some rank beginner buying a restricted text and trying to do some of the complex practices on their own, outside of the fact that the former person received khrid-lungs and DI in order to properly be empowered to work through these practices? Lots of masters and traditional texts say that you should have a close personal relationship with a guru, proper guidance and personal instruction, and whatnot, but since ChNN is constantly travelling it seems very difficult to receive these, so all you're left is with a bunch of books with complex practices to try on your own. They say you can never learn Dzogchen from books, but working with the materials from that retreat, it basically feels like I'm trying to learn Dzogchen from books... It's rather overwhelming.

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you contact an SMS teacher through Tsegyalgar.

ChNN teaches in such a way that the "personal guidance" thing is not really so necessary. However, if you have a pressing practice question, you can always email him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: ChNN practice from a dream

Content:

passel said:

I doubt ChNN teaches anything like this, but just curious if it resembles anything he teaches?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, September 9th, 2015 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Clarence said:

Well, if America collapses the vacuum will be filled by either Russia or China. I know I still prefer the US over those two.

BrianG said:

Chinese domestic policy is disgusting, but it's "soft power" foreign policy, of buying countries instead of bombing them, is humane relative to America's "hard power" foreign policy. Of course, China exploits and screws over the countries it buys, but that's better than being bombed by robots.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, this is completely false, it is just that China at this point has confined itself to bombing nations "within" its borders. You know, like Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Brian:

Sanders has consistently voted against the war in Iraq.

He is not in favor of the US unilaterally warring against ISIS. He feels that they are threat, certainly, but that the Saudis need to step up and that the US should play more of supporting role, while Turkey and the Saudis deal with this. Iran is already involved.

BrianG said:

I would prefer it if America quit its' war addiction cold turkey, however, I suppose that is not possible.

I am extremely skeptical that an anti-plutocrat is going to be very effective, even if he wins. How would he get the support of a completely bought congress?

The fact that he is not suffering from Ron Paul style media snubbing however, is very promising, and unexpected. A self-proclaimed socialist doing as well as him in the polls is also unprecedented as far as I know, and he is starting to move ahead of Hillary.

An ineffective socialist in the presidency is the best option available, and I agree with most of Sanders views, so the least hypocritical option would be to vote for him. But I think America requires much more than a change in the presidency.

Malcolm wrote:

Bernie is not an ineffective "socialist." He is not a "socialist," he is actually a Keynesian. All of the so-called called social democracies that he admires run on more or less Keynesian lines. Just like FDR's New Deal.

He is a very effective legislator, actually. Bernie actually gets stuff done.

You have to understand that the history of American Politics since the New Deal involves a concerted effort by the business class in America to destroy it. Most people have forgotten that America's economy was strongest when taxes on personal income over 250,000 was at its highest. This forced CEO's to shovel profits back into their businesses. $250,000 in 1955 is $2,226,250 in today's dollars. If someone cannot be content on a 2 million dollar a year salary, they have a greed problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Do you think SDR is talking about Crystal and the Way of Light? I have no idea what he is referring to. In any case, i am re-reading that one, im sure I didn't understand it when I first read it. But that was a long time ago. Maybe I'll understand more this time.

Malcolm wrote:

Most Nyingmapas were super offended by Crystal when it came out.

DGA said:

By "most Nyingmapas," do you mean lamas? ordinary folk? anyone go on the record about it? Has the mood changed since then?

Malcolm wrote:

Lamas.

Not really. As for on the record, well, it is all hearsay at this point.

Now that ChNN has many students, well, Tibetans are hesitant to criticize success, but there is still of lot of discomfort with his approach.

Basically, the difference between a real teacher of Dzogchen and someone who only teaches Dzogchen as a theory is that real teachers of Dzogchen teach Dzogchen as the basis. Others teach it as a result of a path, like Mahāmudra. In a real sense, when Dzogchen is taught as the apex of the nine yānas for example, this is merely to contrast Dzogchen with the eight vehicles of cause and result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: The Future of World Religions: Population Growth Project

Content:

seeker242 said:

Do you think the fact that there is essentially no religious freedom in China has some type of effect on this?

Indrajala said:

You can openly practice religion in China provided it doesn't antagonize or threaten the state. I think a lot of westerners have a distorted image of China still being something similar to what existed under Mao, but it really isn't like that at all.

Malcolm wrote:

Unless you are a Tibetan. In which case you have no passport, and are not allowed to travel.

Indrajala said:

Religious activities and organizations deemed threatening to the state or society are restricted, but the average Buddhist temple or Christian church is of no consequence and in fact the local government might even pay for it.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true.

Indrajala said:

For the Beijing pastor, this anti-Christian campaign is part of a stated objective by the new leadership to promote Chinese cultural traditions such as Confucianism and Buddhism. It is no coincidence that much media attention was devoted to Xi's visit to Confucius's birthplace in February. On that occasion, according to the Chinese news agency Xinhua, Xi called for the propagation of a nationwide "ethical doctrine" with "fundamental socialist values" based on "traditional Chinese culture". According to pastor Joy, among themselves party members often use the pejorative expression yang jiao to designate Christianity. It translates as "foreign teaching".

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/jul/05/china-christianity-wenzhou-zhejiang-churches>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Questions about Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

fckw said:

I'm actually contemplating of giving it a try for some time already. Not that I strictly need more instructions (well, there's always room left for learning more though...). But I'd love to hear the same teachings I already got from a different angle. I often judge a teacher by the number of high-quality students s/he produces. And from what I've observed so far ChNN is quite extraordinary.

Just one more question: In another thread it was mentioned that ChNN on the last day of a retreat gave out

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=4052&start=3480#p285843>.

How do I have to interpret this? Reading through this list it'd be impossible to practice all these things. At the same time, there are for example individual mantras listed, which in my eyes are quite useless without having a complete instruction set. So, how do I have to understand this? What if someone would like to have a complete instruction set for something like, let's say, Simhamukha and not just a single mantra?

Malcolm wrote:

Right, these are all secondary practices — so if there is something that you find interesting, you can purchase the book and if need be the, the cd/dvd whatever.

He gives all these transmissions in case one needs them at some time.

In the beginning though, learning the thuns and the Ganapujas are quite enough for secondary practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

BrianG said:

America is in it's 14th year of continuous warfare, which both Bernie Sanders and Donald Trump supports. They are both in favor of combating ISIS, both in favor of continued bombing in the middle east, the differences are very minor.

Malcolm wrote:

Brian:

Sanders has consistently voted against the war in Iraq.

He is not in favor of the US unilaterally warring against ISIS. He feels that they are threat, certainly, but that the Saudis need to step up and that the US should play more of supporting role, while Turkey and the Saudis deal with this. Iran is already involved.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

mossy said:

i have always been a conservative. i like small government/ personal responsibility

Malcolm wrote:

Under Republican administrations, the size of the Gvt. always increases. The only time the size of the Gvt. decreased in recent history was under Bill Clinton, who also balanced the budget. The Bush II ruined all of that, along with the economy, stripped us of our civil liberties, used 9/11 as a pretext to punish Hussein, etc.

Nevertheless, small government does not necessarily equal good government, nor to a large government necessarily equal bad government. These categories are too simplistic.

mossy said:

and liberty over the larger more controlling government supported by the democratic party.

Malcolm wrote:

Both parties are parties of "big government."

mossy said:

this new popularity surge of non-politicians in the republican party is the result of our disappointment in the republican politicians. we are sick of voting in people who say what we want to hear but never act on their words.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, frequently, Republicans run on an irresponsible platform of unrealistic tax cuts and promises to "reduce the Gvt.", but when they get into office they have to deal with the Gvt. as it actually is, not with how they fantasize it should be run.

mossy said:

trump is educated and runs has done business all over the world and he is not taking bribes from special interest groups. voting for trump (or other non politicians) sends a powerful message to the republican establishment that they cant keep running the same game on us.

Malcolm wrote:

Trump is educated, even though he talks and behaves like a dumbass — but he thinks nothing of letting his companies go bankrupt. He has filed bankruptcy four times in eighteen years, that is an average of one bankruptcy every 4.5 years. How is this good business? If anything, this just proves that wealthy people in this country are treated differently than the little guy, just as white kids are treated differently than black kids when it comes to being busted for possession of marijuana:

But Trump's multiple spells in bankruptcy court, and the little effect they have played on his abundant wealth, highlights the stiff gap between how businesses and consumers are treated amid financial strife. The Trump businesses, as with many companies, were afforded significant leeway in the hope they could recoup those massive debts.

http://www.washingtonpost.com/business/economy/what-trump-didnt-say-about-his-four-big-business-bankruptcies/2015/08/07/bc054e64-3d12-11e5-9c2d-ed991d848c48_story.html

Also, Trump is not a "conservative". He was a registered Democrat from 2001 to 2008.

He said to CNN:

Before Donald Trump was a front-running Republican presidential candidate, the real estate mogul believed that the nation's economy ran better when Democrats were in control and that Hillary Clinton would be a strong negotiator with foreign nations.

"In many cases, I probably identify more as Democrat," Trump told CNN's Wolf Blitzer in a 2004 interview. "It just seems that the economy does better under the Democrats than the Republicans. Now, it shouldn't be that way. But if you go back, I mean it just seems that the economy does better under the Democrats. ...But certainly we had some very good economies under Democrats, as well as Republicans. But we've had some pretty bad disaster under the Republicans."

<http://www.cnn.com/2015/07/21/politics/donald-trump-election-democrat/>

But because he is a racist dipshit, as soon as Obama got elected, he seized on the birther conspiracy — which automatically proves he is insane.

mossy said:

as for the democrats voting in this election, please don't vote for Hillary. she is the most dangerous candidate running. even though i don't agree with Bernie sanders and would not vote for him myself, i will admit he is a lot better than Hillary.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not a Democrat — I am voting for Sanders because he is the only honest guy in the race who has a chance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 11:34 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is because people give into cynicism that racist demagogues like Trump get elected to begin with. But hey, if war is what you like, voting for a guy like Trump is just going to get you a war.

Karma Dorje said:

Firstly, I never give in to cynicism. It takes a good deal of work and constant vigilance. In case you haven't noticed, voting for anyone in the US gets you a war. It's what you guys do. Other countries may make stuff or deliver services, you guys bomb brown people. Didn't Carlin establish that a decade ago?

Malcolm wrote:

I can understand your antipathy towards US foreign policy, but what I cannot understand is your apparent hatred for Americans which causes you to say things like, "If you really believe that countries get the leaders they deserve, there is simply no other choice."

And apparently, you are satisfied with what you perceive to be the status quo and so you sit on the sidelines and jeer, apparently hoping for more destructive policies and actions, even when such sentiments are counterproductive to the ends that you want. Or are you so cynical that you do not believe that the US can evolve from its present destructive courses of action? Basically, having a reasonable leadership in the US is in everyone's best interest, I would hope that you would not be encouraging the international rise of political demagoguery, and I would imagine that you do not fail to see that having a person like Trump in power will inevitably lead to further chaos and destruction, mostly of other countries. In this case, it seems, if the US is getting the leaders it deserves, those leaders just keep wreaking havoc on others. Unfortunately, we did not get it right with Obama. Hopefully, with someone like Sanders we would get it right, because the Democrats and Republicans are deeply out of touch with reality and the rest of the world, for the most part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:58 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am totally voting for Trump if he makes it to the general election. If you really believe that countries get the leaders they deserve, there is simply no other choice.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the only problem with that is when you vote for the US Prez, you are voting for the a person who can really render harm to the world at large, so somehow your cynical policy leaves a lot to be desired.

Karma Dorje said:

Come on Malcolm, get over yourself. If voting could change the system it would have been made illegal a long time ago.

It's not cynical, I am merely voting for the greater entertainment value. Four more great years of the Daily Show and Last Week Tonight. Besides, I am long razor wire and chain link fence.

Malcolm wrote:

It is because people give into cynicism that racist demagogues like Trump get elected to begin with. But hey, if war is what you like, voting for a guy like Trump is just going to get you a war.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: Questions about Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

fckw said:

Ok, thanks for answering. Does this essentially mean that there exists a recommended practice path, but no mandatory one, and it is my own responsibility to not jump ahead of what I'm actually capable to do, although I might have received the teachings already during a retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

The practice path begins with receiving direct introduction, and then working to stabilize that recognition within oneself. There are many different approaches to this from learning Vajra Dance to Yantra Yoga, doing the special Dzogchen preliminaries and so on — no single approach suits everyone, but in general everyone tries a bit of all of it until they figure out what is working for them.

But at base, the main emphasis is on Ati Guru Yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:44 AM

Title: Re: Questions about Dzogchen Teachings

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

1.b Norbu Rinpoche recommends that people do the special Dzogchen preliminaries after receiving transmission. Whether you do or not is up to you.

swooping said:

Are these the Rushen?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and semzin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 9:43 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I am totally voting for Trump if he makes it to the general election. If you really believe that countries get the leaders they deserve, there is simply no other choice.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the only problem with that is when you vote for the US Prez, you are voting for the a person who can really render harm to the world at large, so somehow your cynical policy leaves a lot to be desired.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 5:03 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

swooping said:

Right, but the the long thun has a lot of work with the guardians that I have not learned yet. Can it be done without the longer guardian work?

Malcolm wrote:

You can the guru yoga of the long thun without the extensive invocations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Direct Introduction

Content:

fckw said:

If I may add a one or two questions here: I still don't really understand how the organization works.

1. Assuming I'd like to receive Dzogchen teaching.

a. Are these given in retreat or through webcast or both?

b. What are the preliminaries (besides becoming member of the organization)? None, specific Dzogchen rushen, ngöndro or others?

2. Assuming I'd like to receive tantric teachings.

a. Are these given also in webcasts or only in retreat?

b. What are the preliminaries? Nöndro?

Malcolm wrote:

1.a Teachings are given during retreats, most retreats are webcast.

1.b Norbu Rinpoche recommends that people do the special Dzogchen preliminaries after receiving transmission. Whether you do or not is up to you.

2.a Depends on what you mean by tantric, but in general, yes, many tantric teachings are giving during retreats, creation, completion and so on. There are many books and and so on you can obtain for the various cycles that ChNN teaches.

2.b None, apart from a sincere interest in the teachings. If you want to Ngondro, fine, if not, also fine. It is up to you and your understanding of what you need. ChNN only gives one "mandatory" practice: Ati Guru Yoga, mindfulness and working with circumstances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

swooping said:

The more general question (group of questions) has to do with semde, longde and upadesha and the rushens and semdzins. I understand that the four yogas of semde are associated with the first statement of Garab Dorje and the Longde series refers to the second statement; I believe that means that trekchod and thogal are related to the third.

Malcolm wrote:

The first statement refers to the basis, the second statement refers to the path and the third statement refers to the result.

swooping said:

How do the Rushens and Semdzins fit into the above, if at all? Are the Rushens for experiencing and the semdzins for not remaining in doubt? Also, are the rushens, semdzins, four yogas and longde something that is generally continued for a lifetime, or until liberation, or are they practiced until getting to a certain place (I know that doesn't sound "non-gradual," but I hope you know what I mean) and then left behind?

Malcolm wrote:

Rushan, Semzin, four yogas, Longde, etc., are all connected with the second statement.

swooping said:

For example would it be inappropriate to do the seven line prayer to Padmasambhava followed by his guru yoga in the short thun,

Malcolm wrote:

This is the long thun yoga.

swooping said:

or is only using Garab Dorje and the three A's appropriate?

Malcolm wrote:

This is the short thun guru yoga. There is also a medium thun Guru Yoga. There is also Ati Guru Yoga.

swooping said:

Is there a place in the short thun where it would be appropriate to practice a rushed or semdzin meditation?

Malcolm wrote:

After the Dogpa, and before the mantra of authentication.

Or, do Ati Guru Yoga and directly enter those practices.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 8th, 2015 at 1:57 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Unknown said:

Bernie Sanders has jumped out to a nine-point lead over front-runner Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire, and he's gained ground on her among Iowa voters in the Democratic presidential race, according to a pair of brand-new NBC News/Marist polls.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.nbcnews.com/meet-the-press/bernie-sanders-leads-hillary-clinton-9-n-h-gains-iowa-n422111>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 7th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

Regarding media and internet exposure of Sanders vs Trump, just snapped these now:

I wonder what it's like on the tellie?

Malcolm wrote:

No idea, but this is instructive:

<http://publiceditor.blogs.nytimes.com/2015/09/04/looking-ahead-evaluating-bernie-sanders-coverage-in-the-times/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, September 7th, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Direct Introduction

Content:

Pinus said:

@Malcolm:

for technical reasons alone?

Malcolm wrote:

Because in order to receive direct introduction you must participate in the introduction with a live master, so you are both in that same state together. A recording is not a living being. It has no mind, therefore, you cannot share the state of the master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Direct Introduction

Content:

Pinus said:

@Malcolm: thank you. What would we do without youtube?!

Malcolm wrote:

Webcast must be attended live...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

Yeah, I find it extremely hard to talk to progressives and Democrats now, online is even worse. Everyone always jumps to racism, guess what.....I am black.....well half black half Italian.....still I am a healthy tan complexion and no way look white. So not a racist old white guy here.

.....

Mossy, I don't know if you'd be willing to do this, but I'd be really interested to know what attracts you to Trump over the other candidates.

/

Malcolm wrote:

Not replying for our friend Mossy here, but black voters are likely to respond positively to xenophobia aimed at Latinos:

African Americans have long been receptive to the anti-immigrant concepts behind Trump's campaign. Simply put, the jobs, housing and other opportunities that immigrants take come largely at the expense of blacks who were born in the United States.

https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/donald-trump-doesnt-need-latino-voters-to-win-the-nomination/2015/09/04/9fd2e40c-524f-11e5-933e-7d06c647a395_story.html

According to this writer, Trump needs to convince a majority of black voters to abandon the Democratic Party for him. Not likely, considering the history of the Republican Party since the majority of Southern Democrats abandoned the Democratic party over abortion and other issues...

The other thing, which is really clear, is that we do not have an "immigration problem." This is just a fantasy concocted by Trump to create media hysteria and whip up the Tea Party folks into a xenophobic frenzy.

Required reading:

<http://www.nytimes.com/roomfordebate/2015/09/03/is-immigration-really-a-problem-in-the-us/as-an-undocumented-alien-first-generation-college-grad-i-am-a-problem>

The so-called illegal immigration problem was entirely caused by US interference in Latin American countries, the war on drugs, NAFTA, etc.

Illegal immigrants are not here to steal your job, rape your wife or daughter, etc. Illegal immigrants are not responsible for the heroin epidemic sweeping the US. Why? Well, the junkies are right here, they are your neighbors, US citizens with a drug problem, often created by prescriptions for painkillers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

And if Trump should get the nomination, which he will not, then yes - any Republican over any Democrat.

Malcolm wrote:

That is very flexible thinking...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

mossy said:

Yeah, I find it extremely hard to talk to progressives and Democrats now, online is even worse. Everyone always jumps to racism, guess what.....I am black.....well half black half Italian.....still I am a healthy tan complexion and no way look white. So not a racist old white guy here.

.....

Malcolm wrote:

Racism isn't owned by white people — there are plenty of Blacks, Latinos, Jews, Asians and so on who are racists.

And I did not say that anyone who voted for Trump was a racist; I said he was a racist and that anyone who voted for him was a fool. I still stand by that assessment, as harsh as it seems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

You will almost never find a major political poll sample bigger than 1500 folks... so deal with it.

Malcolm wrote:

You voting for Trump, NW? If so, well you know what I think of people who would vote for him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: Early survey usa poll

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

<http://www.surveyusa.com/client/PollReport.aspx?g=d950cadf-05ce-4148-a125-35c0cdab26c6>

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty narrow sample...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Direct Introduction

Content:

Pinus said:

Thanks for sharing, Malcolm.

Both teachers have my respect and gratitude for bringing their teaching to the West. I read some of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu's works a while ago, from his remarkably extensive bibliography. Too bad Kunzang Dechen Lingpa passed on already. Luckily Norbu is still around, isn't he? Norbu spoke quite freely about the teachings as far as I remember, which I found very refreshing, although learning from books is not really all too instructive - especially for a Dzogchen newb like me. Maybe I get a chance to meet him sometime.

Did you get a chance to receive a direct introduction from him? Or how does he work?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there are many web casts, free. He always gives transmission during these.

Depending on your circumstances however, it is good to go see him in person and meet with many fellow students. Practicing with others in the beginning is important. So contacting your local gar is an important first step.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 3:07 AM

Title: Re: Direct Introduction

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Find a Dzogchen master.

Pinus said:

Thanks for your recommendation. I'm not sure if I am at that point yet. But anyway, do you mind me asking who your Dzogchen master is?

Malcolm wrote:

Several, but principally Chogyal Namkhai Norbu and the late Kunzang Dechen Lingpa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 1:34 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

What advice do you wish you had been given, if you don't mind my asking?

Malcolm wrote:

I wish someone had said to me in 1987, "You should go meet Norbu."

Instead I heard lots of negative things from Vajradhātu people, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

The messages are no good, but I suspect a great many people who like him, are not david dukes, but pretty ordinary folks who see a self-made successful man, a political outsider, a straight-shooter, etc.

David N. Snyder said:

He's not entirely a self-made man. He worked in his father's real estate development company, later working on his own. Bad business decisions left him bankrupt. He received some money from his father, I think around $2 million and then made that into about the $5 billion he has now. He referred to the $2 million from his father as something "small". Perhaps small compared to what he has now, but certainly an amount 99% of us never have seen or received.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he was totally born with a silver spoon in his mouth. Not a self-made man, by any stretch of the imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 1:23 AM

Title: Re: Turiiya

Content:

Matt J said:

But as for the first, I think it is hard to correlate "being" with "emptiness" since they are opposites.

monktastic said:

Just to stir the pot a little: "form" and "emptiness" are also seeming opposites.

Malcolm wrote:

Having totally abandoned matter, signs and aspirations, and also meditating on the three doors of liberation is the activity of Māra — matter is empty.

-- Mañjuśrīmitra

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... but in the meantime somehow I was bullied into thinking I had to do ngondro and so on by the local Kagyus and Sakyas ...

dzogchungpa said:

It's kind of hard to imagine someone bullying you into thinking something.

Malcolm wrote:

I was young, and had no contacts with Buddhists outside Vajradhātu and the local Sakya center, until I met HHST.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, September 6th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Most likely, everyone will agree that dzogchen is not found in books. And also that dzogchen is not discovered by studying. That is not to say that studying is not useful, it is useful, but it is not dzogchen.

I for one am quite glad that my first introduction to dzogchen was before I had ever read anything at all about it. Perhaps the time for a complete novice to be introduced to dzogchen is passed, I don't know. I would hope not though. It is quite helpful to know nothing at all about dzogchen before you encounter it. Quite difficult nowadays but maybe not impossible.

Anyhow, just thought I would throw my two cents into the discussion.

Bye.

Malcolm wrote:

I read Crystal and the Way of Light when I was 25: it is amusing that I was really puzzled by the idea of self-liberation because I had been reading Mahāyāna, which I thought meant that one was to attain buddhahood for everyone. I thought it was a super interesting book though, but in the meantime somehow I was bullied into thinking I had to do ngondro and so on by the local Kagyus and Sakyas, so I started out in a traditional way. When I was 26, before meeting Sakya Trizin, I had a very interesting dream about ChNN. Still, I wound up in Sakya because I was interested in Hevajra. Then in 1992, I met ChNN.

Really glad I read Crystal though even though I had not a clue what it meant at the time.

MalaBeads said:

Do you think SDR is talking about Crystal and the Way of Light? I have no idea what he is referring to. In any case, I am re-reading that one, I'm sure I didn't understand it when I first read it. But that was a long time ago. Maybe I'll understand more this time.

Malcolm wrote:

Most Nyingmapas were super offended by Crystal when it came out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

MalaBeads said:

Most likely, everyone will agree that dzogchen is not found in books. And also that dzogchen is not discovered by studying. That is not to say that studying is not useful, it is useful, but it is not dzogchen.

I for one am quite glad that my first introduction to dzogchen was before I had ever read anything at all about it. Perhaps the time for a complete novice to be introduced to dzogchen is passed, I don't know. I would hope not though. It is quite helpful to know nothing at all about dzogchen before you encounter it. Quite difficult nowadays but maybe not impossible.

Anyhow, just thought I would throw my two cents into the discussion.

Bye.

Malcolm wrote:

I read Crystal and the Way of Light when I was 25: it is amusing that I was really puzzled by the idea of self-liberation because I had been reading Mahāyāna, which I thought meant that one was to attain buddhahood for everyone. I thought it was a super interesting book though, but in the meantime somehow I was bullied into thinking I had to do ngondro and so on by the local Kagyus and Sakyas, so I started out in a traditional way. When I was 26, before meeting Sakya Trizin, I had a very interesting dream about ChNN. Still, I wound up in Sakya because I was interested in Hevajra. Then in 1992, I met ChNN.

Really glad I read Crystal though even though I had not a clue what it meant at the time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 10:58 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

Appeasement? Are we already at the reductio ad Hitlerum stage?

Yes, I'd be very sorry if he was elected and like you I am really happy Bernie Sanders's ideas are getting some serious exposure. I hope he goes further than anybody expects.

But one of the matters that is profoundly wrong in the political discourse in the US, the way I see it, is actual absence of such. People get hot under the collar if you even mention the candidate they don't like, it is so black-and-white (no pun intended this time). There is a wide-spread inability to even try to even countenance the other point of view and this dogmatism and polarisation is a very serious issue, IMO.

Malcolm wrote:

Australia is a Parliamentary system, like Canada, no? So you don't vote directly for your prime minister. For us, the stakes are a bit higher.

Dan74 said:

I mean here we are preaching to the choir. But out there on the streets, in your neighbourhood, there are probably some decent folk who look at what you and I look at and see a very different picture. They should be reached. Otherwise the progressives are repeating the mistake that is going to consign them to irrelevance - elitism.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out above, in general also the Republicans are pretty horrified by Trump.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 10:03 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

The messages are no good, but I suspect a great many people who like him, see a self-made successful man, a political outsider, a straight-shooter, etc. None of this may be accurate, and they are glossing over very serious issues with him, I agree, but that's not my point.

I am seeing the loathing and scorn across partisan divides in the US which is neither healthy, nor something we, as aspiring bodhisattvas, should promote, IMO.

Just like you reach out to folks who misunderstand the Dharma and explain matters for the umpteenth time, with the same spirit I think it's good to reach out to people on the other side of the political divide and discuss in good faith, in a language they understand, in order to bridge the gulf and to educate.

Don't you think so?

/|

Malcolm wrote:

Explaining to someone they are a fool for supporting a loudmouth racist hate monger is pretty understandable language, no? Or is Neville Chamberlain someone we should regard as a role model in such discussions?

I can understand your desire for harmony, but if Trump were elected, you and everyone else in the world will be really sorry.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

mossy said:

Can't stump the trump.

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, Trump is a racist loudmouth who will actually cause the world at large more harm than good. Anyone who votes for Trump is an ignorant fool.

Dan74 said:

Do you think this last comment helps the situation? The US already appears to be so polarised, throwing grenades at the other side, you just further erode a chance of understanding, a chance of reaching people who for whatever reason are attracted to Trump.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean people like David Duke?:

People who support Trump are an embarrassment. Trump represents the worst qualities of American culture, not the best. People attracted to his message of hatred and xenophobia are fools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

tingdzin said:

A sidelight: as a sometime translator, I can affirm that it is really difficult to put Dzogchen into English without distorting it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not that hard. What is hard is that young translators rely too much on older translations, many of which are unduly contaminated by outside influences.

tingdzin said:

Janet Gyatso said in one of her books that Chatral Rinpoche even thought it was a waste of time to try.

Malcolm wrote:

Good thing ChNN does not feel this way.

tingdzin said:

...books alone just won't do.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed.

tingdzin said:

Another sidelight: so-called "Dzogchen" is now unfortunately very trendy, but if it is not a part of your own main practice tradition, there is no real reason you should try to study it in depth.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't agree. Everyone should learn Dzogchen. Dzogchen is for anyone who is interested in it, not just Nyingmapas. Nyingmapas do not own Dzogchen.

tingdzin said:

In the end, though, there's nobody looking over your shoulder. As with all Buddhism, you have to be an adult -- you make your own choices and take the karmic consequences. But you might examine the purity of your motives VERY DEEPLY before you discard the traditional guidelines and ignore the traditional warnings.

Malcolm wrote:

If your motive is to wake up as fast as possible, then study Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

mossy said:

Can't stump the trump.

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, Trump is a racist loudmouth who will actually cause the world at large more harm than good. Anyone who votes for Trump is an ignorant fool.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Malcolm, I was surprised when I did an in-depth political questionnaire to find I actually align almost 100% with Green Party policies. I had just assumed I was a Dem, when according to said website I was only some 60% on board with them. I wonder if part of this stupid two-party nonsense in the US is people not really knowing what all the different parties actually support.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a question of getting one of the two major parties to move towards the platform you like.

The cultural conservatives have been very successful at moving the Republicans to the right, now the left is beginning to have some success moving the Democrats back to where they were 40 years ago after the civil rights movement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

Trump with Palin as Vice-Pres! Lets drive the meme to its absurd (but hopefully not inevitable) conclusion.

PS This wouldn't be my actual vote, in case the humour doesn't come across, not that I am eligible to vote in the US.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no way Trump will ever win the election.

Kunzang said:

Sure there is. He could run third party/independent splitting the Republican vote thus winning the election for the Dems.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if Bernie does not win the primary, then I will vote for the Green Party again. So the Dems better well feel the Berne.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, September 5th, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Poll - Meditation with western worldview?

Content:

pael said:

Sogyal Rinpoche writes in his book (Tibetan book of living and dying) that you can have vision of rigpa when you see lightning.

Malcolm wrote:

Hahahaha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

conebeckham said:

Pardon my French, but who the frak voted for Carson?

Srsly?

Malcolm wrote:

The single platform right to life person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 11:36 PM

Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

If you are looking that way, check out the Buddhist priests executed by the Japanese for opposing the Empire. There are several anarchist leaning Buddhist thinkers in pre- and post-war Japan.

Going west, Korean monks led the anti-Japanese/anti-Korean gov't uprisings before annexation, but I am not sure if that counts here. The 1980s saw the development of Masses' Buddhism (Minjung Bulkyo) in Korea and there are a couple of English language books about it. It is definitely anti-state, but was so incoherent and poorly thought out that there is little intellectual engagement possible, except as a historical study of the more wide ranging shift of Korean Buddhism to more enagement with civilians.

If memory serves, there are some early 20th Century Chinese Buddhist thinkers who at least flirted with serious engagement with anarchist thought.

This should be enough for you to look these people up if they are of interest to you.

Malcolm wrote:

Anti-state = incoherent and poorly thought out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

It looks like landslide DW support (so far) for Bernie Sanders. He is too socialist for me, but I do like him on several important things:

Malcolm wrote:

Bernie is about as socialist as FDR. The main difference? FDR was part of the NYC aristocracy, Bernie Sanders dad was a Jewish plumber who emigrated from Poland.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Direct Introduction

Content:

Pinus said:

The other thing is, that Buddhism has found a way to teach about 'emptiness beyond concepts'. That's quite an attainment! Anyone that spontaneously experiences emptiness or 'shunyata' is typically too perplexed to let it turn into 'direct understanding' (isn't that what you call 'rigpa' in Dzogchen?).

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Pinus said:

But by it's conceptualization it becomes more difficult to elicit. On the other hand, the right knowledge may bring the direct experience about in the recipient if the conditions are good (isn't that what you call 'direct introduction' in Dzogchen?).

Malcolm wrote:

No.

Pinus said:

Do you understand the word Dzogchen more as a generic name of a path, like yoga is a generic term (both of which happen to be about self-liberation, respectively the realization of our true nature or self)?

Malcolm wrote:

No. Dzogchen is not a generic name, it is a specific term that refers both to one's state and a specific path to reach it. Yoga is very far away from the meaning of Dzogchen, and is a path of renunciation, not self-liberation.

Pinus said:

- Do you also take the study into practice ?

Yes, although there doesn't seem to be an essential difference between theory and practice. My experience is, that it's more like two sides of one coin. At least for me, since it were spontaneous experiences that lead me to study emptiness in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:

Find a Dzogchen master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

Trump with Palin as Vice-Pres! Lets drive the meme to its absurd (but hopefully not inevitable) conclusion.

PS This wouldn't be my actual vote, in case the humour doesn't come across, not that I am eligible to vote in the US.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no way Trump will ever win the election.

Dan74 said:

This has been said before, no?

Malcolm wrote:

Let's put it this way — my dad is a conservative albeit moderate Republican. He hates Trump and will never vote for him. Trump is completely alienating the moderate Republicans. They won't vote for him. Trump is appealing to the crazy right wing of American Politics. No one has ever won a Presidency by appealing to the unhinged in the US, contrary to world opinion, they just don't have enough votes compared to blacks, latinos and white women.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Dan74 said:

Trump with Palin as Vice-Pres! Lets drive the meme to its absurd (but hopefully not inevitable) conclusion.

PS This wouldn't be my actual vote, in case the humour doesn't come across, not that I am eligible to vote in the US.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no way Trump will ever win the election.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: POTUS 2016

Content:

Tenso said:
Trump. He's got the cajones to make a good prez.

Malcolm wrote:
He certainly has more balls than brains.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 9:09 PM
Title: Re: Anarchist Buddhist teachers, present and past?
Content:
frankc said:
Looking for an introduction to some teachers, present and past, who shine a sort of anti-state, anti-government, anti-authoritarian mind set. Not anti-guru, but more of a political and social rebellious sort of thing. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:
Real teachers work with circumstances, not ideologies.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 10:38 AM
Title: Re: POTUS 2016
Content:

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 5:25 AM
Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism
Content:
Sara H said:
Uh, no, not really most people do not consider it the same. Including large numbers of Vajrayana practitioners

Malcolm wrote:
Uh huh, yes, really, we do. What other people think is of little import to our identity. We consider ourselves Mahāyanīs.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 4:39 AM
Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism
Content:
Sara H said:
Yeah, no, this sub-board is not talking about Vajrayana Malcolm.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna is a part of Mahāyāna, whether you like it or not.

The board and title of the thread does not say, "The Mahāyāna Sūtra idea of karma and vegetarianism."

Unless of course you want to discriminate against those follow Mahāyāna Dharma who also happen to be practitioners of Secret Mantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Sara H said:

The Hevajra Tantra is a Vajrayana text.

Vajrayana Buddhism has it's entirely own take on both the Pali cannon, and the Mahayana texts.

It is a third vehicle of Buddhism, entirely in it's own right.

Malcolm wrote:

It refers to itself as "Uncommon Mahāyāna." In other words, the motivation is the same, the outline of the path is the same, the five paths and ten stages, and the result is the same, the three kāyas — only the means are different, and therefore, the conduct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, September 4th, 2015 at 1:24 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Hevajra Tantra, a Mahāyāna Scripture, the teaching of the Buddha, is also very clear: "Those with compassion eat meat."

Astus said:

Couldn't find that in either the Snellgrove or the Farrow-Menon translation. Could you give its location please?

Malcolm wrote:

It's there, but concealed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Sara H said:

The Mahayana Sutras are very clear on vegetarianism.

Malcolm wrote:

The Hevajra Tantra, a Mahāyāna Scripture, the teaching of the Buddha, is also very clear:

"Those with compassion eat meat."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Poll - Meditation with western worldview?

Content:

Pinus said:

spontaneous rig pa

Malcolm wrote:

This does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 8:58 PM

Title: Re: Does Zen result in Buddhahood as described in sutras?

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Buddhas can display all the 6 abhijnas, different powers etc.

Astus said:

"You say, 'A buddha has six supernatural powers. This is miraculous!' All the gods, immortals, asuras, and mighty pretas also have supernatural powers—must they be considered buddhas? Followers of the Way, make no mistake! For instance, when Asura fought against Indra and was routed in battle he led his entire throng, to the number of eighty-four thousand, into the tube in a fiber of a lotus root to hide. Wasn't he then a sage? Such supernatural powers as these I have just mentioned are all reward powers or dependent powers.

Those are not the six supernatural powers of a buddha, which are entering the world of color yet not being deluded by color; entering the world of sound yet not being deluded by sound; entering the world of odor yet not being deluded by odor; entering the world of taste yet not being deluded by taste; entering the world of touch yet not being deluded by touch; entering the world of dharmas yet not being deluded by dharmas. Therefore, when it is realized that these six—color, sound, odor, taste, touch, and dharmas—are all empty forms, they cannot bind the man of the Way, dependent upon nothing. Constituted though he is of the seepage of the five skandhas, he has the supernatural power of walking upon the earth."

(Record of Linji, p 20, tr Sasaki)

Malcolm wrote:

The sixth abhijñā is the one that exhausts contaminants. That is unique to āryas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 5:42 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Longchenpa Finding Ease and Comfort trilogy (does that even count as a Dzogchen text?)

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely a Dzogchen text, kind of a Lamrim based on Dzogchen Sem sde.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The caveat is, that it really is better to have the transmission for texts you want to read...

Johnny Dangerous said:

Sure, that's sensible. I've mainly just read general books on Dzogchen view, and basic Trekcho advice, since it seems to be so relevant to Mahamudra meditation. I assume you mean things like practice texts, tantra commentaries, etc?

Malcolm wrote:

It is better to have the transmission for what you want to read. Of course, you can always get the transmission later.

There is little point in buying books on Ngondro and sadhanas apart from the ones you are doing [glances over shoulder at huge library of unused books...]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

That's interesting, and makes sense. On the other hand, how do you know what and what not to read? I've taken a DI, but feel lost in Dzogchen practices, have other Vajrayana commitments, but find myself relating to the view of Dzogchen. How would I even know what I am supposed to read? Is he talking about reading in general, about seeking out practices one is not qualified for, reading Tantras one isn't supposed to?

Malcolm wrote:

Read what you want, but avoid reading about tögal until you have received tögal instructions.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Ah, OK no problem then.

Malcolm wrote:

The caveat is, that it really is better to have the transmission for texts you want to read...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

That's interesting, and makes sense. On the other hand, how do you know what and what not to read? I've taken a DI, but feel lost in Dzogchen practices, have other Vajrayana commitments, but find myself relating to the view of Dzogchen. How would I even know what I am supposed to read? Is he talking about reading in general, about seeking out practices one is not qualified for, reading Tantras one isn't supposed to?

Malcolm wrote:

Read what you want, but avoid reading about tögal until you have received tögal instructions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche on Reading Dzogchen Books

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I almost posted this myself, but I was afraid I would get in trouble.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, I guess it is up to each person to decide for themselves what they will read and what they will not read. Having said that, I concur that there are many people who get themselves into trouble by reading books for which they do not have the transmission.

There are certain forums where this is blatantly obvious.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: knowledge of a bodhisattva and/or stream enterer

Content:

DGA said:

Does it follow, then, that someone who does not "get it" with regard to dependent origination / rebirth lacks the characteristics of a first-bhumi bodhisattva or stream enterer?

Malcolm wrote:

Absolutely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: knowledge of a bodhisattva and/or stream enterer

Content:

DGA said:

Would a stream enterer or bodhisattva necessarily have direct knowledge of how rebirth works? (as distinct from accepting karma/rebirth as a doctrine, or understanding it doctrinally)

Astus said:

Direct knowledge of how it works on what level? Seeing one's own past lives and the process of rebirth of others' is a matter of possessing the super-knowledges (abhijna) of past lives and the divine eye. Those abilities are not necessarily possessed even by an arhat, while non-buddhists may also have them. On the other hand, because of gaining insight into how the mind works, they know clearly how dependent origination works.

DGA said:

What is the difference between knowing, directly, how dependent origination works as opposed to how rebirth works? (bracketing the siddhi of seeing one's own or any one else's past or future lives)

Malcolm wrote:

None.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, September 3rd, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: knowledge of a bodhisattva and/or stream enterer

Content:

DGA said:

Would a stream enterer or bodhisattva necessarily have direct knowledge of how rebirth works? (as distinct from accepting karma/rebirth as a doctrine, or understanding it doctrinally)

Malcolm wrote:
Yes.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, September 2nd, 2015 at 2:02 AM
Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?
Content:

rachmiel said:

I'm surprised no one mentioned what I (and others) consider to be the most off-putting aspect of (Advaita) Vedanta: that it asserts (incontrovertibly!) Brahman is the one true absolute reality.

For me, this is a show-stopper. To believe it, thus to be enlightened, requires imo a leap of faith. And, having grown up Catholic, belief/faith are pretty much no-no's for me.

lostitude said:

Don't you believe there are devas you can't see, bodhisattvas you can't see, ghosts you can't see, hell and heavens you can't see, etc. ? Isn't that the same as believing in God and angels and demons and the like? Doesn't it require a leap of faith? In my opinion, as a newcomer, it definitely does. Buddhism comes with such a huge mythological pantheon that could make catholicism blush...

Malcolm wrote:

The difference is — and it is fundamental — from a [Mahāyāna] Buddhist point of view, all of this is predicated on the common and deluded perceptions of sentient beings — in other words, though it seems real, none of it is at all real. It is all just dreams and illusions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 10:37 PM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand this is the theory — from a Buddhist point of view, it is wrong.

lostitude said:

Fair enough, but even from a buddhist POV wouldn't a buddhist have to accept that this kind of view can actually make sense, from a logical/mathematical perspective, which I assume is the same kind of logic used by buddhists to accept basic buddhist tenets. The theory might well be wrong, but given that it's based on logic, doesn't it go to show that causation might not be universal after all?

Malcolm wrote:

Logic is very limited. In any case, among the reasons we accept beginningless multiple repeating universes is that this is the experience of many yogis, not just the Buddha, which comes from recalling their past lives.

lostitude said:

Oops sorry then I guess I just didn't understand. You're saying you're not talking about physical space, maybe that's the part that threw me. What kind of space then are you talking about?

I know that matter obstructs, space does not. But space can be obstructed by matter. In fact all the space we know about and commonly experience is obstructed by matter.

Malcolm wrote:

I clarified for you already, there are two kinds of space discussed in Buddhadharma: unconditioned space and conditioned space. The former is absence of obstruction, the latter is volume.

lostitude said:

The earth is actually the characteristic of matter we call solidity, and so on. The earth is a specific object. Solidity is a concept that can describe many different things. I can touch something solid but i can't touch solidity... I can only ascribe it to other concrete objects such as earth.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, since you do not understand the basic terms of the conversation, it is hard to have this conversation with you. In Buddhadharma in general, but also in Indian cosmology in general, earth = solidity, water = liquidity, fire = heat, air = motility: these are the four basic characteristics of matter, from a Higgs boson up to a super nova and everything in between. Unconditioned space is considered a fifth "element", and consciousness is considered the sixth. The universe is made up, from a Buddhist point of view, only of these six elements. When we say these things are elements, it does not mean they are single substances. When we say consciousness is an element, we mean the aggregates of all consciousness taken together is a component or element of the universe, since the universe contains sentient beings.

lostitude said:

Unconditioned space is not a characteristic of matter, but because of space, matter can form and perish.

So do you mean, maybe, space as a conceptual dimension? Just like time basically?

Malcolm wrote:

Space is not treated as a conceptual dimension.

lostitude said:

Which logic are you referring to? Certainly not the logic of Aristotelian propositions and so forth.

I'm referring to the logic that leads you to say, for example, that it makes no sense to have a causeless cause, or that you can't be one thing and its opposite at the same time. The basic logic you have probably used to start out in buddhism deciding that it made more sense than other paths.

Malcolm wrote:

A, so you are referring to propositional logic. Buddhist logic is anti-Aristotelian, which is why, among other things, it categorically rejects first causation, Aristotle's unmoved mover and so forth, upon which Christian, Islamic and Jewish theology is erected.

lostitude said:

BTW thanks for taking the time to reply. I realise you have nothing to gain from this and I'm the only one learning new stuff here.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand you are trying to get your intellectual bearings in a new field of study, no problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What makes you think there was no time prior to the big bang? The big bang happened in time. In any case, Buddhist thinking about these issues is predicated on serial expansions and contractions of the physical universe.

lostitude said:

Actually according to the theory, time started with the big bang, as time is just one of several dimensions along with spatial ones. There was no time before the expansion, according to the theory. This does not mean that the theory is right, but at least it points to the fact that logic and mathematics allow the possibility of time having a beginning and being caused by something apparently uncaused.

Stephen Hawking said:

At this time, the Big Bang, all the matter in the universe, would have been on top of itself. The density would have been infinite. It would have been what is called, a singularity. At a singularity, all the laws of physics would have broken down. This means that the state of the universe, after the Big Bang, will not depend on anything that may have happened before, because the deterministic laws that govern the universe will break down in the Big Bang. The universe will evolve from the Big Bang, completely independently of what it was like before. Even the amount of matter in the universe, can be different to what it was before the Big Bang, as the Law of Conservation of Matter, will break down at the Big Bang.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I understand this is the theory — from a Buddhist point of view, it is wrong.

Stephen Hawking said:

Where does it exist? The universe we know is not empty, so it's bound to have its emptiness obstructed here and there, even if there was more emptiness than matter in it.

You may have 'absence of obstruction' on a local level, but then it would be limited, hence conditioned if I got you right.

Malcolm wrote:

I told you already, space is everywhere. Matter obstructs, space does not.

Stephen Hawking said:

Also, can a 'characteristic' really be considered as a phenomenon? it looks more like a purely conceptual thing to me.

Malcolm wrote:

The earth is actually the characteristic of matter we call solidity, and so on.

Unconditioned space is not a characteristic of matter, but because of space, matter can form and perish.

This space is not the same kind of space referred to in physics. They do not have a math for this.

Stephen Hawking said:

Because similarly one could then say that logic is unconditioned, since it is (supposedly) always the same and not influenced by anything (you can't change logic). And yet of course logic pervades our conditioned world.

Malcolm wrote:

Which logic are you referring to? Certainly not the logic of Aristotelian propositions and so forth.

In any case, even space is not something which is ultimate, according to Madhyamaka reasonings. It is still unconditioned though.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 12:34 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

lostitude said:

(By the way, is the big bang singularity unconditioned? it seems to meet the criteria of being uncaused, doesn't it?)

Malcolm wrote:

No, since it produces effects, it [the big bang] itself must have a cause.

Dan74 said:

A kind of a timeless cause, maybe, because there was no time prior to the Big Bang and causation generally implies time?? Not sure how that would work, but...

Malcolm wrote:

What makes you think there was no time prior to the big bang? The big bang happened in time. In any case, Buddhist thinking about these issues is predicated on serial expansions and contractions of the physical universe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

lostitude said:

(By the way, is the big bang singularity unconditioned? it seems to meet the criteria of being uncaused, doesn't it?)

Malcolm wrote:

No, since it produces effects, it [the big bang] itself must have a cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 9:41 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, unconditioned space is not affected in anyway by the presence or absence of anything.

lostitude said:

Then does unconditioned space even exist? If so, where?

Malcolm wrote:

It exists as the characteristic of absence of obstruction. It exists everywhere.

lostitude said:

If you want to understand Buddhadharma coherently, I suggest you start with Abhidharma, Vasubandhu's critical presentation, then work your way through Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

Sure, but that will take me about, how many lifetimes exactly?

Malcolm wrote:

Seven years.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 6:17 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The only other unconditioned phenomena which exist, according to Buddhadharma, are two the kinds of cessation: simple cessation, which is the mere absence of causes; and analytical cessation, which is a result of insight a.k.a., nirvana. .

lostitude said:

How would he know that? how can one assert that one knows everything that exists?

Malcolm wrote:

A buddha is omniscient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 6:15 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The invoked principle is the homogeneity of cause and effect. Unconditioned phenomena are uncaused, and being uncaused, are incapable of acting as causes. For example, unconditioned space, defined as the simple absence of obstruction, can neither affect nor be affected by conditioned elements such as earth, water, fire or air. Why? Because the latter four elements are conditioned or compounded, and the former element, space, is unconditioned or uncompounded. "

lostitude said:

I'm not quite sure I get it: when you bring an element such as earth into 'absence of obstruction', it is affected in that it is reduced by the presence of earth... Just like the emptiness in an empty room diminishes as I enter it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, unconditioned space is not affected in anyway by the presence or absence of anything.

The space your are referring to is conditioned space or volume.

If you want to understand Buddhadharma coherently, I suggest you start with Abhidharma, Vasuabandhu's critical presentation, then work your way through Yogacara and Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

lostitute said:

Also, about conditioned and unconditioned phenomena being mutually exclusive, this also makes me think about ember that sometimes emits a flame, sometimes doesn't. The fact that the flames come and go indicates nothing about the ember changing or being the same.

Malcolm wrote:

This indicate that the ember changes state, with a resulting fluctuation in flames — hence an ember is conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

lostitute said:

What I don't understand, is the transition from this : First you have to identify the characteristics of unconditioned phenomena. They do not arise, abide or cease — further, they are uncaused. Conditioned phenomena arise, abide and cease — further, they are caused.

To this : Since there is radical difference in kind, there is no point of contact between the former and the latter

I don't see how the conclusion follows so naturally from the premise. There's no obvious logic here that I can identify. It looks more like an intuitive statement than a logical one. Unless there's a missing step in the reasoning, which you didn't include because you thought it was obvious.

Malcolm wrote:

The invoked principle is the homogeneity of cause and effect. Unconditioned phenomena are uncaused, and being uncaused, are incapable of acting as causes. For example, unconditioned space, defined as the simple absence of obstruction, can neither affect nor be affected by conditioned elements such as earth, water, fire or air. Why? Because the latter four elements are conditioned or compounded, and the former element, space, is unconditioned or uncompounded. Unconditioned/uncompounded [asaṃkṛta] means "that which has not been assembled out of parts."

The only other unconditioned phenomena which exist, according to Buddhadharma, are two the kinds of cessation: simple cessation, which is the mere absence of causes; and analytical cessation, which is a result of insight a.k.a., nirvana.

Emptiness is also unconditioned, but it is not included among the dharmas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation, in Buddhadharma, is strictly the elimination of afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms. It really does not matter what school one belongs to.

Indrajala said:

Chan and Zen can often be nebulous with respect to what liberation is and what happens afterwards (the laundry?). There's also Pure Land which is based on the belief that liberation will come postmortem. Mahāyāna's traditional understanding of 'liberation' is not what you describe strictly speaking: you are only liberated from involuntary rebirth after a certain point way down the path, but until then you're committed to engaging in beneficial activities, though ideally your wisdom prevents suffering while your compassion enables continued countless rebirths rather than seeking arhatship.

Malcolm wrote:

All this is beside the point — but address your rebuttal — Chan/Zen do not offer some special model of liberation separate and unique. It is based on common Mahāyāna. Pure Land Buddhism may hold that one is liberated after one passes away from here in Sukhavati, but nevertheless that liberation is still a result of eradication of afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms. And this is merely a variation on the never-returner.

It may be the case that in the common Mahāyāna path one does not eradicate afflictions that cause rebirth in the desire realm until the eighth bhumi, nevertheless, this is because the bhumis of Mahāyāna stream entry are 1-6, once returner is the seventh bhumi, never-returner is eighth bhumi and so on.

Still, the model is all based on the afflictive obscurations that cause rebirth in the three realms. Liberation is not omniscience.

Stream entrants up to Arhats are all liberated, will never take rebirth in the three lower realms, and their final liberation is guaranteed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 2:52 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

A more realistic position is that what Hindus and Buddhists means by "liberation" is only superficially similar.

Indrajala said:

Either side led to people having consistent and enriching experiences of some kind, which may or may not be mutually comparable depending on who you talk to. Perhaps the Buddhists had different versions of liberation too. In fact, this very much seems to be the case. What liberation means to a Pure Land practitioner (perhaps a vision of Amitabha near death) is different from what it would be to a Vajrayana or Zen practitioner.

Basically I'm just saying don't be so dogmatic.

Malcolm wrote:

Liberation, in Buddhadharma, is strictly the elimination of afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms. It really does not matter what school one belongs to.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, September 1st, 2015 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There can never be any point of contact between conditioned and unconditioned phenomena.

lostitude said:

Ok but on what basis can you make such a statement? It's far from self-evident... so what's the rationale behind it?

Malcolm wrote:

First you have to identify the characteristics of unconditioned phenomena. They do not arise, abide or cease — further, they are uncaused. Conditioned phenomena arise, abide and cease — further, they are caused.

Since there is radical difference in kind, there is no point of contact between the former and the latter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 11:46 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Indrajala said:

A more tolerant position would suggest they achieved different but for them equally enriching experiences.

Malcolm wrote:

A more realistic position is that what Hindus and Buddhists means by "liberation" is only superficially similar.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

There can never be any point of contact between conditioned and unconditioned phenomena.

Isn't that why all things are correctly seen as primordially pure?

Malcolm wrote:

This just means that all things are empty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Indrajala said:

At the end of the day, there's actually no such thing as Buddhism in the singular.

...

Perhaps all my experience with Buddhist traditions has resulted in me becoming a crypto-Hindu or pseudo-Stoic.

dzogchungpa said:

IJ, I totally understand where you are coming from. For me the key was finding the right teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

Which means your answer to the question:

What persuaded you that Buddhism has got it right over Vedanta?

Is probably "nothing".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

Indrajala said:

Malcolm cites Nāgārjuna

Malcolm wrote:

The question was:

What persuaded you that Buddhism has got it right over Vedanta?

My answer was Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 10:13 PM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Christ. I guess I can't make anybody pleased. I have people on DW upset with my disrespect of the dharma because of my posts. I have people elsewhere upset with my disrespect of DW and of the dharma because of my posts. Then when you try to settle up, people are annoyed at that.

Screw it. This is toxic.

I've more than taken everyone seriously and at face value.

/eyes looking for the nearest exit/

Malcolm wrote:

You unleashed this by posting someone else's hate speech here. Not everyone should be taken seriously or at face value. If some crazy people are needling you on another forum for posts you make here, screw them. If your friends on that forum are too dense to delete this kind of hateful speech, are they really your friends? There is nothing but nonvirtue in the speech of the people who authored the posts that you crossposted here. The only real question I have for you is why can't you see their words as hate speech? And why would you want to spread that hate speech here?

And since the people who authored those words apparently read posts here: I have some advice for you. You need to start over. Start at the beginning. You have not understood one thing about Buddhadharma. You are like stones in the bottom of the ocean.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Time appears in Brahman yet Brahman does not know what time is.

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

Something conditioned cannot appear in something unconditioned because there can never be a relationship between the conditioned and the unconditioned without the unconditioned becoming conditioned.

lostitute said:

Would it be possible to develop this idea? what is this impossibility based on?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

There can never be any point of contact between conditioned and unconditioned phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Dude. It's not my content. It's a response to content I post here and on my mate's blog.

I've been told to make myself accountable to DW. I'm doing it.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have a problem with you. I have a problem with the vile content of the posts you are are crossposting from elsewhere.

And why do you feel you have to take this seriously? Why do you feel that you need to crosspost this drek? What useful purpose can it possibly serve? Honestly, on Vajracakra I would never allow this kind of posting. I would delete it immediately. We just don't need this kind of hate speech in Buddhist forums and people who author it should be shut down.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I guess I have a problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Please just stop crossposting the vile nonsense that is being written by that "Lama." Is that really too much to ask?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

So I start taking this lama at face value, and adjust my posts here, adjust my posts on the blog, and eventually take him to task, and similarly accordingly adjust my posts here, and my posts on the blog. In the process I learn it's not Malcolm...

Malcolm wrote:

And, I am not a "Lama", important or otherwise.

Urgyen Dorje said:

so that still leaves me with somebody my DW veteran mates describe as an "important DW lama" who should be taken seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? Why should this absolutely vile individual be taken seriously?

Urgyen Dorje said:

Then I'm moderated for attacking and misrepresenting this lama, so obviously this lama is a seriously important person around here, so I go back to trying to understand how all of these personal criticisms are legit.

Malcolm wrote:

No one knows who this Konchok Namdrol is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Please do not post anymore of this poison here!!!

Urgyen Dorje said:

I have absolutely no idea what your problem with me is. If you notice, I'm the one that was instructed to take this guy seriously and to adjust according to his criticisms, and after determining he was a little off, tried to take his ranting in a meta-direction instead of just discarding it completely. I am not the one saying he's crazy. I'm trying to mold something of a silk purse out of a sow's ear. So it's not clear to me what I'm poisoning. According to this lama, all of my posts on DW have been poisonous, and in retrospect, maybe that's true. I don't really know. I'm not accustomed to dharma brothers talking to each other like this.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have a problem with you. I have a problem with the vile content of the posts you are are crossposting from elsewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 11:23 AM

Title: Re: Why Buddhism over Vedanta?

Content:

coldmountains said:

What persuaded you that Buddhism has got it right over Vedanta?

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 11:14 AM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Given that the person making these claims is a) a lama and b) a member of this forum,

Malcolm wrote:

What qualifies this person as a "Lama"? Why should we take their title seriously since they are anonymous?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Cosmological questions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

If mind streams are without beginning, how can individual mind streams carry on with the creation and dissolution of universes? What I mean is, when karmic winds etc. stir duality, and eventually lead to different classes of beings and samsara, doesn't this mean that mind streams last one universe, and no more? How is this explained in the various versions of Buddhist cosmology?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, all the levels of the world that perish are below the third and fourth rupadhātu heavens. All sentient beings are either born there or they are formless realm beings.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Ah right, I'd forgotten this.

Aren't there two kinds of destructions though, doesn't the one 'by water' wipe out everything, or nearly?

Malcolm wrote:

Everything below the third and fourth rūpadhātu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 12:35 AM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What I feel you need to understand is that there is only one valid interpretation of the dharma.

Crazy. The very idea that there is a valid interpretation of Dharma is bullshit. There is realization of the Dharma, and that is not an interpretation.

This must be the case as there is only one reality that this the object of the Buddha's valid cognition.

This is also nonsense. Why? Because such things as valid cognition and so on do not apply to Buddhas. They are beyond all such categories. This person is obviously a wingnut in the Drikung school who has choked on Gongchig.

Anything other than this one valid interpretation of the dharma is actually an attack on the dharma. It is a war against the liberation of beings. It is a war to inflict suffering on beings.

Craziness.

Yes, there is a war being fought for the integrity of the dharma. The dharma is being polluted by Western democratic and post-modern ideas.

Buddhadharma can't be polluted by anything — more craziness.

It is being polluted by ideas such as tolerance, quality, and freedom. It is only the dharma that gives these things. Attempting to afford these things from outside the dharma is an attack on the dharma, an attack on the liberation of beings, and a war to inflict suffering on beings. But the dharma is also attacking the dharma with a proliferation of views and paths. If we tolerate this by encouraging and tolerating Buddhist diversity, then we are paving the world with roads to hell.

More craziness.

You seem to feel compelled to defend the democratic values of your society, claiming that they create the freedom and the space to practice the dharma. You also seem to feel compelled to have tolerance for people of other faiths. If you understand causality, this is a systematic deconstruction of the dharma. It is an attack on the Three Jewels.

What we need now to support the dharma is compassionate intolerance, compassionate bigotry. To relieve the suffering of beings we need to invoke our protectors and pray to our lineage masters to destroy people of all non-Buddhist faiths. We need to pray to destroy every fragment of non-Buddhist philosophy. Yes, we should destroy books. Yes, we should destroy temples and churches and mosques. This is the only road to freedom for all beings. I would say yes, we should even destroy beings, the right beings. People are better off dead than doing anything other than practicing Buddhism.

Sheer lunacy, absolute nihilism. They should understand that they have violated all of their samayas by encouraging this kind of violence, they have abandoned all compassion and bodhicitta. This person clearly does not understand Dharma.

When I read your posts on DW, I feel you are the most disgusting type of person.

Somebody who rationalizes the sins of others, encouraging this bad karma. You are also the type of person who leads beings astray by teaching secular subjects. People don't need to understand science and philosophy. People need to understand dharma. You are a degenerate lapsed practitioner. You have no right or place integrating any of these things into your practice or encouraging others to do the same.

Same as above. They should read Mahāyāna Sūtralaṃkāra with regards to sciences., etc.

You need to just shut the frak up. And die.

Sheer and utter crazy lunacy.

Please do not post anymore of this poison here!!!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Turiiya

Content:

Matt J said:

I think one could make a credible argument roughly correlating the last two features, and I think this is where people get the idea that they are the same. But as for the first, I think it is hard to correlate "being" with "emptiness" since they are opposites.

Malcolm wrote:

Lhun grub and thugs rje are, in Dzogchen, the basis of error. When people become confused about the basis, they become confused about its appearance. What appears is lhun grub. That can be a ground for deviation.

And yes, Ka dag, the essence, can never be "being."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 31st, 2015 at 12:12 AM

Title: Re: Rebirth and picking up where one left off

Content:

lostitude said:

Thank you.

So when a stream-enterer in a previous life is born again, he is guaranteed to reach at least stream-entry in this new life, and probably reach a further level as well? Just to make sure I understood it well.

Malcolm wrote:

In the Hinayāna system, a stream entrant is guaranteed to reach the stage of an arhat within seven lifetimes.

There is no such guarantee in Mahāyāna because the path is necessarily longer. It takes two incalculable eons to reach the eighth bhūmi, and another incalculable eon to reach buddhahood after that. So, one does not necessarily progress beyond the level one reached in the past life, but eventually one will. Once one has reached the first bodhisattva stage, one no longer returns to samsara, so to speak, meaning that one's progress to buddhahood is a certainty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Towards a Buddhist Fundamentalism: Part II

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I've stripped all identifying information according to the DW ToS...

What I feel you need to understand is that there is only one valid interpretation of the dharma. This must be the case as there is only one reality that this the object of the Buddha's valid cognition. Anything other than this one valid interpretation of the dharma is actually an attack on the dharma. It is a war against the liberation of beings. It is a war to inflict suffering on beings.

My friend was less than eloquent in describing the problem. Yes, there is a war being fought for the integrity of the dharma. The dharma is being polluted by Western democratic and post-modern ideas. It is being polluted by ideas such as tolerance, quality, and freedom. It is only the dharma that gives these things. Attempting to afford these things from outside the dharma is an attack on the dharma, an attack on the liberation of beings, and a war to inflict suffering on beings. But the dharma is also attacking the dharma with a proliferation of views and paths. If we tolerate this by encouraging and tolerating Buddhist diversity, then we are paving the world with roads to hell.

You seem to feel compelled to defend the democratic values of your society, claiming that they create the freedom and the space to practice the dharma. You also seem to feel compelled to have tolerance for people of other faiths. If you understand causality, this is a systematic deconstruction of the dharma. It is an attack on the Three Jewels. What we need now to support the dharma is compassionate intolerance, compassionate bigotry. To relieve the suffering of beings we need to invoke our protectors and pray to our lineage masters to destroy people of all non-Buddhist faiths. We need to pray to destroy every fragment of non-Buddhist philosophy. Yes, we should destroy books. Yes, we should destroy temples and churches and mosques. This is the only road to freedom for all beings.

I would say yes, we should even destroy beings, the right beings. People are better off dead than doing anything other than practicing Buddhism. When I read your posts on DW, I feel you are the most disgusting type of person. Somebody who rationalizes the sins of others, encouraging this bad karma. You are also the type of person who leads beings astray by teaching secular subjects. People don't need to understand science and philosophy. People need to understand dharma. You are a degenerate lapsed practitioner. You have no right or place integrating any of these things into your practice or encouraging others to do the same.

You need to just shut the frak up. And die.

Malcolm wrote:

The person who wrote the above is a crazy person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Rebirth and picking up where one left off

Content:

lostitude said:

Hello,

One thing that's not explained in what I have been reading about karma and rebirth, is how exactly the benefits in the previous life of a buddhist are carried over to the next lives. For example, at what point does the reincarnation of a great master reconnect with the spiritual level reached previously? Is the same level still present at birth (like, if he died a stream-enterer he is reborn with the same spiritual characteristics as a stream-enterer and instinctively perceives what any stream-enterer should perceive about dharma), or does he have to undergo the same type of training as any other child, except that the whole process goes much faster for him?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

The latter is generally held to be the case until one becomes an eighth stage bodhisattva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 10:47 PM

Title: Re: Turiya

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The funny thing is, Buddhism is never more like Christianity than when Buddhist scholastics make ever more emphatic distinctions to prove how they are the only ones who are right.

Malcolm wrote:

Did you ever hear of a little thing called the Nine Yānas? Or do you think the teachings of Dzogchen tantras are somehow irrelevant to the conversation?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Riwo Sang Cho of Namkha Jigme

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

So, doing the Riwo Sang Cho of Namkha Jigme, it got me wondering about all these spirit provocations and uprisings and the like discussed on DW in various threads.

My instructions on this practice is that Riwo Sang Cho is good for these things, but talking to a couple mates who are students of //, they insist this isn't the case, and that I'm probably just pissing off Gyalpos, Nagas, Don and the like.

They said the same about other Sang offerings.

I am not familiar enough with the bestiaries of beasties to really know what to think.

Opines?

Malcolm wrote:

Sometimes Sang offerings can cause provocations rather than prevent them. But generally speaking, they are beneficial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Cosmological questions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

If mind streams are without beginning, how can individual mind streams carry on with the creation and dissolution of universes? What I mean is, when karmic winds etc. stir duality, and eventually lead to different classes of beings and samsara, doesn't this mean that mind streams last one universe, and no more? How is this explained in the various versions of Buddhist cosmology?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, all the levels of the world that perish are below the third and fourth rupadhātu heavens. All sentient beings are either born there or they are formless realm beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Compassion vs. non-proselytism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Engaging in proselytization means you are trying to condition someone. This is not the way of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Compassion vs. non-proselytism

Content:

Paul said:

Historically Buddhism has been spread by missionaries. The best adverts for dharma that I've seen has been just how impressive certain practitioners/teachers have been. They have been powerfully magnetic as a result of their practice & people are naturally impressed.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. This is a Western Historical misconception.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Compassion vs. non-proselytism

Content:

lostitute said:

Thanks.

But I don't really understand how you can benefit them if you never take the initiative to explain to them how dharma works.

Malcolm wrote:

If they ask, you explain. If they don't, you mind your own business.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Can the Buddha become angry?

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Can the Buddha become angry?

What do you think

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

As in suffering from the affliction of dvesha or krodha? Absolutely not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.dalailama.com/messages/dolgyal-shugden>

Boomerang said:

Thanks. I thought the problem was more gyalpos than just that one.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many gyalpos. They are a class of being, some of the more powerful ones are controlled through entities like that one, or Pehar and so on.

But the Tibetan Gvt. got into trouble because they relied on this Gyalpo and entered into intense sectarianism at the top.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

lostitute said:

Oh, probably just gyalpo worship. Tibetans probably have horrible karma and now they're paying for it, right Malcolm?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, The Tibetan Nation was brought down by gyalpo worship. If you understood anything at all about Tibetan History, you would understand that HH Dalai Lama has even admitted this.

The Tibetan Govt. had terrible karma for many reasons, also the HHDL has admitted this.

Boomerang said:

I would like to know more about this. Could you direct me to any sources?

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.dalailama.com/messages/dolgyal-shugden>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

lostitude said:

Oh, probably just gyalpo worship. Tibetans probably have horrible karma and now they're paying for it, right Malcolm?

Malcolm wrote:

Any suffering one experiences in this life is the result of negative karma from past lives.

The Tibetan Nation was in fact brought down by gyalpo worship. If you understood anything at all about Tibetan History, you would understand that HH Dalai Lama has even admitted this.

The Tibetan Govt. had terrible karma for many reasons, also the HHDL has admitted this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

lostitude said:

This is how karma works. You don't believe me? Read Vasubandhu.

What I don't believe is that Eidhul-Adha is the cause of strife and misery in the Muslim world. Again, this is very reminiscent of witch-hunting, with undertones that I find myself very uneasy with.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, there is Hindu animal sacrifice, Muslim animal sacrifice, Animist animal sacrifice — it is all the same to me. Everywhere in the world where this is allowed to continue in a large way is fraught with all kinds of problems.

It is all evil, more evil that merely slaughtering animals for food. That too is evil, but not as evil as animal sacrifice. Slaughtering animals for food is motivated mainly by desire. Slaughtering animals for religious reasons is done mainly out of ignorance.

Of course war is even more evil because always involves killing people for religious or political reasons.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: CNN Odzer Chenma retreat sept 11-13

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Will this retreat be webcast?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 30th, 2015 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

lostitude said:

Again, the vast majority of Muslims don't send any animal to be sacrificed, simply because they don't own one. Eidul-Adha sacrifices are usually done by wealthy families that go buy a few dozen sheep, have them slaughtered, keep one for the head of the family to slaughter, and then give the meat to the local mosque where it is then given out to the needy. In the Muslim countries where I have lived, that would represent about one family out of ten, or less.

Malcolm wrote:

Do they support it? For example, let us say you are soldier in a unit of 100 soldiers. This group kills one man. If everyone in that group of soldiers approves of the action, they bear the karma of killing that one man times the number of people in the group, thus each soldier now bears the karma of killing one hundred men.

For example, all the Americans who approved of the killing of Iraqis and rejoiced in it each bear the amount of karma times the millions of Americans who approved of that killing. The same is true of any war and all soldiers in it. This is why the Buddha clearly explains that soldiers Never take higher rebirth.

In the case of sacrifice it is the same. If you approve of the killing of animals for sacrifice, or even for consumption of meat, you bear the responsibility of all of the animals whose deaths you are knowingly involved in. If you approve in general of Eidul-Adha then you are culpable for all those deaths times the number of people who approve and rejoice.

This is how karma works. You don't believe me? Read Vasubandhu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 29th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is the sacrifice of animals, not the eating of meat. It is the same with Jews in Israel. If anyone wonders why there is so much violence in these regions of the world, Africa, Middle East, South America, Mexico and so on, it is largely due to the practice of sacrificing animals.

lostitude said:

Especially when you consider the fact that most Muslims have never touched a knife to slaughter a sheep. If only for the fact that they can't even afford to buy one in the first place.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no difference between doing the sacrifice and sending an animal to be sacrificed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 29th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

lostitude said:

@Malcom, again that strange theory about evil befalling meat eaters... what did the Dalai Lama eat to find himself in exile, what did Tibetans in general do to be afflicted by such misery? That really sounds like the arguments used by witch hunters in the Middle Ages when they had a bad crop.

Malcolm wrote:

Which theory are you referring to?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 29th, 2015 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

zenman said:

Pointing unaware or semi-aware fields of one's mind is also something that I am familiar with when working with a teacher. Invaluable pointing! I'd say. FCKW, did that particular dull state have a specific name? Is that mentioned in Brown's book? The reason I am asking is because I have also received this pointing (not from Brown). I didn't avoid it though but pierced it.

fckw said:

Sorry, I don't want to go into details here, because I am not a qualified teacher.

Edit: Malcolm's comment actually explains it nicely.

Malcolm wrote:

I did mean to say coarse and subtle expressions. The subtle expression of lethargy is much harder to notice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 29th, 2015 at 2:49 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

fckw said:

Maybe Bon lamas are more open with giving out Dzogchen teachings in general? I have no idea. Does any of you guys know more about this? Maybe there is generally no Ngöndro requirement for the A-Khrid system, could that be?

Malcolm wrote:

There is a separate ngondro for all Bonpo systems of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

frank123 said:

Dullness in Samatha leads to rebirth as an animal? Really?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, really.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

That actually wasn't my point.

Since the man knows all the differences between these traditions and approaches and views, his statement, which reflects a larger unity, is not made out of ignorance. He's giving an instruction and I'm wanting to learn.

Malcolm wrote:

You presented it as a religious statement, "For me, I just have faith in the one who holds the throne of Jigten Sumgon, in particular, the present Drikung Kyabgon, who is an ocean of teachings, transmissions, and qualities..."

Urgyen Dorje said:

I guess I don't understand. I'm out of line for expressing faith in Drikung Kyabgon?

Malcolm wrote:

No, but since you framed your confidence in religious terms, no one can disagree with him without offending your religious sensibility.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

For me, I just have faith in the one who holds the throne of Jigten Sumgon, in particular, the present Drikung Kyabgon, who is an ocean of teachings, transmissions, and qualities. Obviously His Holiness is aware and well educated on all the points discussed here, given that he is a scholar and researcher in early Tibetan history, as well as a holder of mahamudra and dzogchen lineages.

Malcolm wrote:

Once the holiness of one's authority is invoked, conversation over.

Urgyen Dorje said:

That actually wasn't my point.

Since the man knows all the differences between these traditions and approaches and views, his statement, which reflects a larger unity, is not made out of ignorance. He's giving an instruction and I'm wanting to learn.

Malcolm wrote:

You presented it as a religious statement, "For me, I just have faith in the one who holds the throne of Jigten Sumgon, in particular, the present Drikung Kyabgon, who is an ocean of teachings, transmissions, and qualities..."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chogyal Namkhai Norbu stresses that the Chan examined by Nubchen is not the same as Zen. He asserts that modern Zen has been deeply influenced by Esoteric Buddhism.

DGA said:

This is interesting, but potentially complicated. What does ChNN mean by "esoteric Buddhism" in this context? Different writers mean different things by the term. It can mean, for instance, the mantrayana lineages transmitted through China to Japan that are Indic in origin. Or it can mean something else...

Some might argue that the "transmission outside the scriptures" upheld by contemporary Zen schools may correspond to a kind of direct introduction and transmission. I'm too ignorant to make a claim on this, or to rule it out categorically. Here is one description of what I'm alluding to:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=69&t=20488&start=40#p298602>

Malcolm wrote:

He means Vajrayāna, Shingon/Tendai. I have even heard him claim that Dzogchen influenced Chan, not the other way around. Certainly, Chinese monks received teachings from Vairocana, Vimalamitra and so on, they did not all clear out in one day.

Of course, I don't know what authority he is making that claim, just that he has made it on occasion.

Also, China is not so far from Tibet, and there were a number of Chan masters who in fact were Tibetans from far-eastern Tibet, or so I read in some academic book somewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 8:54 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

For me, I just have faith in the one who holds the throne of Jigten Sumgon, in particular, the present Drikung Kyabgon, who is an ocean of teachings, transmissions, and qualities. Obviously His Holiness is aware and well educated on all the points discussed here, given that he is a scholar and researcher in early Tibetan history, as well as a holder of mahamudra and dzogchen lineages.

Malcolm wrote:

Once the holiness of one's authority is invoked, conversation over.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 8:11 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Dan74 said:

The trouble with this question is that only someone who is trained in both Dzogchen and Zen can even begin to properly address it. And then the rest of us will still be none the wiser really.

Sure I believe that Zen training can lead to complete liberation and so can Dzogchen, but this is just a belief. Those who believe that one can and the other one can't will similarly hold beliefs. Basically they are of no value outside supporting one's practice, ie of no objective value.

Or so it seems to me.

/|

Malcolm wrote:

The the question of the similarities and differences between Chan and Dzogchen arose because some early Tibetologists erroneously asserted that Dzogchen derived from what we call Early Northern Chan.

There is a book by a 9th century Tibetan master, Nubchen Sangye Yeshe, which extensively examines the differences in the positions of Kamalashila and Hashang Mahāyāna, favors Hashang in terms of sūtrayāna presentations, but nevertheless asserts that Mahāyoga, even though gradual, is more efficacious than EN Chan because Mahāyoga has direct introduction, something lacking in EN Chan as it was practiced in 8th century in Tibet. Needless to say, it presents Atiyoga, Dzogchen as the pinnacle of vehicles.

Chogyal Namkhai Norbu stresses that the Chan examined by Nubchen is not the same as Zen. He asserts that modern Zen has been deeply influenced by Esoteric Buddhism.

The upshot is that when we have discussions of the relationship between Chan and Dzogchen, this has virtually no bearing on what people now a days practice as Zen, Chan or Son. For example, the Koan system did not even exist during this period of time, there was no Rinzai, no Soto, etc. The Chan under question is Early Northern Chan, and its sources and influence in Tibetan Buddhism all but ended in the 790's when the Tibetans chose Indian Buddhism as the gold standard.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

zenman said:

Is this method widely or at all used by other teachers/lamas?

fckw said:

I'm not sure if this question is directed to me. Personally, I don't know any other Buddhist teacher who teaches this way. Mr. Brown a few times told the story when he attended teachings given by a Tibetan yogi. Apparently he had received an invitation by H. H. Dalai Lama (?) who had announced these teachings to be somewhat special. Now, the special thing about the teachings were that said yogi actually performed the practice while teaching it. This left a deep impression.

One notable exception of someone also teaching in this style (but having made up his own meditation system for better or worse) is <http://anaditeaching.com/>, whose eclectic teachings I personally find quite interesting.. However, it's nothing I personally practice or have practiced. (Brown and him are in no way affiliated.)

One of the most important meditation instructions I ever received from any teacher to me was given by Brown. He pointed out to me a state of mind in meditation which is quiet and calm and relatively free of thoughts - but it's not bright and clear. It's fundamentally a state of dullness that leads nowhere. I immediately knew what he meant and from then on completely avoided this state. I had gone already much further in my meditation, but sporadically got stuck during meditation in that state without understanding it. None of my former teachers had ever pointed this out to me before.

zenman said:

I am familiar with this way of teaching, that is, the teacher doing the practice at the same time when giving students instructions. I don't know a better way to pass meditation teachings than this.

I also know Anadi. Somehow interesting fellow. However I haven't been able to make any sense of what he actually says. He keeps on repeating his terminology (while his students in the vids keep asking him the same questions again and again) but manages not to explain what he actually means. I like untraditional and creative approach but unfortunately I just cannot follow what this man means, despite of having listened to him for couple of hours.

Pointing unaware or semi-aware fields of one's mind is also something that I am familiar with when working with a teacher. Invaluable pointing! I'd say. FCKW, did that particular dull state have a specific name? Is that mentioned in Brown's book? The reason I am asking is because I have also received this pointing (not from Brown). I didn't avoid it though but pierced it.

Malcolm wrote:

It is called bying in Tibetan, means torpor, lethargy etc. It has both a coarse and a dull expression. Often time in śamatha, people get involved in a sort of dull clarity that they imagine is śamatha, but instead is a state of dullness. This is commonly mistaken for śamatha, but it leads to rebirth as an animal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 6:50 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Hasn't the Brahman / Jiva effectively been handled like an absolute and relative truth, or what do you consider the difference?

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

In Madhyamaka, ultimate truth is nothing more nor less than the absence of inherent existence of relative entities due to their dependent origination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

For whom is this an illusion? Certainly cannot be an illusion for this universal consciousness, because then consciousness would possess delusion and thus liberation would be impossible. If this universal consciousness cannot be deluded, māya is impossible and also liberation is impossible.

Kaccāni said:

But don't you then end up at the same point as Madhyamaka, when emptiness is empty, and there is nothing to be liberated?

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

No, because there is no two truths theory in Advaita. Madhyamaka is based on the two truths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Crypto-Buddhism, Crypto-Taoism, Crypto-Dzogchen...

Content:

DGA said:

IHow much Mahayana Buddhist music is Persian in origin, by the way?

Malcolm wrote:

\

Just Tibetan Monastic Music.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This is incoherent. How can such universal consciousness have parts?

Kaccāni said:

Yes, that's the main criticism at the doctrine and as I understand Advaita says they're one, the twofoldness is an illusion (the Advaita-version of "maya").

Malcolm wrote:

For whom is this an illusion? Certainly cannot be an illusion for this universal consciousness, because then consciousness would possess delusion and thus liberation would be impossible. If this universal consciousness cannot be deluded, māya is impossible and also liberation is impossible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 28th, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Vedanta would now say: Yes, but everything expresses itself as consciousness, which appears to be the common denominator of it. As plant-consciousness cannot be argued, because the questions are arising in human-consciousness as subject, only the question of "what is human consciousness?" has to be dealt with. The Vedic answer would be "part of a bigger consciousness called Brahman that encompasses everything. The Universe as one living being where some parts of it are fallen to the illusion that they are really separate entities.

Malcolm wrote:

This is incoherent. How can such universal consciousness have parts?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 27th, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Others made a similar objection to Shankara in his day. His reply:

For as between the illustration and the thing illustrated, nobody can show equality in every respect over and above some point of similarity in some way, which is sought to be represented. For if such an all-round similarity exists, the very relation between the illustration and the thing illustrated will fall through.

--- Brahma Sutra Bhasya: III.ii.19, 20

Usually when Advaitins focus on the unconditioned, they use analogies related to space. No, that is a logical error. The pot depends on the clay, but the clay does not depend on the pot. The clay would still exist whether or not anyone ever made a pot out of it.

Malcolm wrote:

The clay itself also depends on causes and conditions and is composed of the four elements whether or not it is ever made into a pot.

In other words the analogy fails because clay is conditioned, thus it cannot be used as an example of an unconditioned entity forming the substrate for conditioned entity. Space, being unconditioned, does not form anything at all, since it is a simple absence of obstruction.

Shankara's reply to objections is sheer sophistry.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 27th, 2015 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan Zen

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Therefore, there is no essential difference between Zen, Mahamudra, and Dzogchen teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there is an essential difference. It is described in detail by Nubchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 27th, 2015 at 10:22 AM

Title: Re: Turiya

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Hello all,

Vedanta, beyond the "3 normative states of consciousness" (here: waking, dream and (in early texts) deep sleep), knows a fourth state: turiya. It is characterized as "permanent insight into reality, but without the distraction of an inner or an outer world".

Would you say that this "turiya" corresponds to what dzogchen knows as "rigpa", or would you rather classify it as what ChNN calls "Shine", i.e. the calm, non-conceptual state of mind of Sutrayana?

Best wishes
Kc

Malcolm wrote:

First, I have never seen such a definition of Turiya, but in any case, Turiya is not rig pa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 27th, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

No, that is a logical error. The pot depends on the clay, but the clay does not depend on the pot. The clay would still exist whether or not anyone ever made a pot out of it.

Malcolm wrote:

The clay itself also depends on causes and conditions and is composed of the four elements whether or not it is ever made into a pot.

In other words the analogy fails because clay is conditioned, thus it cannot be used as an example of an unconditioned entity forming the substrate for conditioned entity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Semen

Content:

Tigersnest said:

Yes that is what happens thank you for your answer: I have read so much about seminal loss from different points of view, I remember a text saying when a practitioner loses their semen the mamos become furious- maybe a more experienced practitioner could elaborate on that. Anyhow thank you- I am still not clear how it can be considered purely a waste product after all it is the purified essence of the body even if it is the "impure" aspect - it is the most pure of the impurities if that makes sense

Malcolm wrote:

It is a snyigs ma, a waste tissue. In the process of the development of the tissues of the body, the final waste tissue is semen, and the final constituent tissue is ojas, the most refined aspect of the five elements in your body. . If you lose your ojas, this is very bad. If you lose your semen, this is not a problem providing you are not also losing ojas with it [and this can only happen if you are living on a very restricted diet with no meat or animal fat of any kind, for example a vegan diet.]

For example, hair, teeth, and so on are also waste tissues.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Per Madhyamaka reasoning, but not according to Vedanta.

Vedanta disagrees with the "not from itself" causation. The primary example is the clay-pot. The pot depends on the clay, but the clay does not depend on the pot.

Where Vedanta gets fuzzy how it explains the mechanism of maya. But there is a famous story about an Advaitin yogi who had everything figured out except for maya. He was told not to worry about it. I think Vedanta runs into trouble because it has to square its findings with the Vedas.

Malcolm wrote:

Time cannot depend on Brahman; if it did, Brahman would be conditioned.

The clay depends on the four elements. It is also conditioned, which is why it can form another conditioned entity.

Vedanta's roots are Samkhya. It never really manages to escape those roots, which is why it never really manages to overcome the Madhyamaka refutation of satkaryavāda — even though this point of view was rejected by Gaudapada in favor of ajativāda, which he borrowed from Madhyamaka.

By contrast the roots of Madhyamaka view and all Buddhist teaching in general is dependent origination. The Buddhist concept of nonarising found in the Prajñāpāramitā comes out of this insight.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Pechafying Things

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I have the need, well, desire, to typeset some practices as pechas. One of my teachers says it's more respectful to the dharma to have them as pechas, and to carry and wrap the pechas in the traditional sense, as opposed to 8.5x11 sheets in a binder. I also find it immanently practical, as pechas fit on a puja table nicely. I also find it immanently practical as I can easily drop in accessory prayers from a second pecha if I need to. With book sized texts, it's a pain.

So, I am looking for recommendations on pecha formatting texts. I can read Tibetan Uchen just fine, convert it to Wylie. I've typeset Uchen in different word processing programs using Wylie. I'm really open to any solution, including commercial options.

If people have some practical advice in terms of what works best re printing, type setting, formatting, etc., that would be great.

Malcolm wrote:
talk to the esukia people.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 9:02 PM
Title: Re: How do we work with our bodies, our identities?
Content:
Urgyen Dorje said:
No Buddhist would suggest that grasping at self is something that needs to be transcended.

Malcolm wrote:
Huh? Of course they would. That is exactly what needs to be transcended. Grasping at self is the cause of samsara.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 9:44 AM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:
Matt J said:
That's why time depends on Brahman and not the other way around. If one wants to get technical, one can say that time and space are an illusory appearance of Brahman. In fact, Advaitins teachers often argue that time is change, and that change is only known against a backdrop of changelessness (the atman).

The Advaita view I am familiar with has at least three levels of reality: 1) the really real (sat), or Brahman, which is beyond time, space, etc. 2) the really unreal (asat), such as the horns of a rabbit or the son of a barren woman, and 3) the real/unreal, or "mithya" which has both qualities. Time would be "mithya", and therefore dependent on Brahman. This "mithya" is compared to a dream which is both dependent on and at the same time non-different from the dreamer. However, while the dream depends on the dreamer, the dreamer does not depend on the dream.

Malcolm wrote:
Time cannot depend on Brahman, time is conditioned, Brahman is not.
Time cannot depend on Brahman; if it did, Brahman would be conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus if time, something conditioned, appears in "knowing", that knowing is conditioned.

Kaccāni said:

Ah. So then. In the moment that "time" appears in the knowing, it must be conditioned.

If nothing conditioned appears, it gets a taste of Brahman.

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

If something can appear in knowing, knowing is already conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 5:27 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Not even a knowing in between?

Ok. It appears in the knowing then

Malcolm wrote:

There is nothing in between the unconditioned and conditioned. Things are either conditioned or unconditioned. Something conditioned cannot become unconditioned and vice versa.

Thus if time, something conditioned, appears in "knowing", that knowing is conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Kaccāni said:

Time appears in Brahman yet Brahman does not know what time is.

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

Something conditioned cannot appear in something unconditioned because there can never be a relationship between the conditioned and the unconditioned without the unconditioned becoming conditioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

The Vedantin answer is that Brahman is beyond time. Time depends on Brahman.

muni said:

God created everything, but who created God?

Malcolm wrote:

Time cannot depend on Brahman, time is conditioned, Brahman is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Towards A Buddhist Fundamentalism?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

JD...

The thing is... a person can express a point like a maniac, and still have something to say. The UniBomber is a good example. So this [Edit name] might express himself like a nutter, but I think he's trying to say something many of us on DW have tried to articulate, though not in a coherent and unified fashion. While lama KN is trying to assert a vajrayana fundamentalism, I think many of us would identify ourselves as something of vajrayana conservatives. I consider myself in that crowd, even though it appears I have convinced people the contrary.

UD

Malcolm wrote:

Nah, he is just being an asshole.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:
Malcolm wrote:
You could have said Brahman is beyond time.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 1:28 AM
Title: Re: How do we work with our bodies, our identities?
Content:
Johnny Dangerous said:
Which is a more conducive identity for making merit, thinking of yourself as a mexican tranny, or as a Buddha?
You're still missing the point, and the major question of the thread. The question is more how does one think of oneself as a Buddha if one IS a mexican tranny?

Malcolm wrote:
Simple, Mexican transvestites, Donald Trump and Samantabhadra all have the same state.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 26th, 2015 at 12:19 AM
Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?
Content:
smcj said:
He clearly states that he is picking and adapting teachings for what he views as Western culture.
Having just watched the video twice, at the end of the video what I hear him say is that he is picking the teachings that are appropriate for the West. I didn't hear him say he was 'adapting' them. That's still taking an editorial position, but it falls short of the insinuation that by adapting them he is corrupting them.

Big difference.

Malcolm wrote:
It remains to be seen who attains rainbow body and in what traditions in the West.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 11:59 PM
Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?
Content:
fckw said:
You are looking for something to criticize without having met the guy at all. Am I right?

Malcolm wrote:
No. People are free. If he wants to be a guru, that is his business. If people want to study with him that is their business.

fckw said:

But to nevertheless diligently answer your question: No. The level 2 courses he taught so far were, to the best of my knowledge, always together with Rahob Rinpoche. The idea of "adapting Dzogchen to the West", I don't know where you have this one from.

Malcolm wrote:

From a video of his where he is discussing his translation efforts:

<http://www.pointingoutway.org/stories>

He clearly states that he is picking and adapting teachings for what he views as Western culture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

The Vedantin answer is that Brahman is prior to space and time

Kaccāni said:

I particularly like the word "prior" in that sentence

Best wishes

Kc

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, since it is a contradiction in terms. Brahman cannot be prior to time. It is impossible, prior is a time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Towards A Buddhist Fundamentalism?

Content:

smcj said:

The person who wrote that post is a total nutjob. Real Buddhist Taliban, not a follower of Buddhadharma.

I'll second that. For the record, I could care less if someone has formal refuge. My main guru is Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, and he makes it very clear that things like refuge, bodhisattva vow ceremonies and so on are of no consequence. If you are a real practitioner, then you don't have rules and you don't need rules. Rules are something relative, as ChNN says, even Dzogchen rules are relative. If you try to strictly follow Dzogchen rules, you will be arrested.

While fully acknowledging that this is valid Dharma, just for the record it is too high a teaching for me and my practice. Early on I established a Gelug Lam Rim type perspective and that isn't just going to go away in this lifetime. That's ok, Dharma is a multi-lifetime project.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not against these things, they are just not essential. I see too many times people saying things like, "Oh, you have to take refuge before you take this empowerment..." and so on. This is nonsense. Every empowerment has refuge built right into it.

This is just a method used to control and condition others. If you show up at a teaching, this is refuge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Towards A Buddhist Fundamentalism?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I wish it were that simple. Maybe it is.

I'm a little shaken.

Dan74 said:

UMI = undiagnosed mental illness, it's more common than we think.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, now I get it — you thought I was this guy because of part of my refuge name, Namdrol. I am KUNGA Namdrol, not Edit name. Also I am a Loppön, and this is a higher title than "Lama". Sheesh.

I was wondering why you thought I had asked you to pick a text method, and other statements you made that I thought were from left field about my point of view.

For the record, I could care less if someone has formal refuge. My main guru is Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, and he makes it very clear that things like refuge, bodhisattva vow ceremonies and so on are of no consequence. If you are a real practitioner, then you don't have rules and you don't need rules. Rules are something relative, as ChNN says, even Dzogchen rules are relative. If you try to strictly follow Dzogchen rules, you will be arrested.

The person who wrote that post is a total nutjob. Real Buddhist Taliban, not a follower of Buddhadharma. He makes me look nice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Towards A Buddhist Fundamentalism?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

From comments to my dharma bro's blog.

From an extended conversation elsewhere on the internet. It makes me ponder the formation of a Buddhist fundamentalism. I had thought the author was also active here, but I doubt that at this point.

Malcolm wrote:

On what forum is this?

Is it public?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Towards A Buddhist Fundamentalism?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

From an extended conversation elsewhere on the internet. It makes me ponder the formation of a Buddhist fundamentalism. I had thought the author was also active here, but I doubt that at this point.

Malcolm wrote:

On what forum is this?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 9:41 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since everything is included in emptiness, emptiness is the ultimate, supreme truth.

Wayfarer said:

Perhaps you can explain to us how that can be reconciled with the statement that 'śūnyatā is taught only as a remedy for dṛṣṭi, but those who cling to śūnyatā are incurable'.

Malcolm wrote:

This is why the Vimuktasena states that Prajñāpāramita teaches the emptiness of emptiness. For example, he says:

Since all phenomena are empty of emptiness, that is the emptiness of emptiness. In other words, the recognition that all phenomena are empty here is the emptiness of all phenomena. Further, the reason for the emptiness of that emptiness is to avoid conceptually grasping to it [emptiness].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

Bakmoon said:

I've looked online and I can't find that kind of information about his lineage yet.

DGA said:

Any takers on this one? I'm interested to know who has authorized him to teach trekchod & thogal. Or anything for that matter.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the point is that he hires Tibetan co-teachers to get around that issue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

anjali said:

Since everything is included in X, X is the ultimate, supreme truth.

The reason why one regards reality as different from oneself is that one has not known, through enquiry, the true nature of X.

As it is X that appears as everything, those who have known the truth of X have known the truth of everything.

Malcolm wrote:

Since everything is included in emptiness, emptiness is the ultimate, supreme truth.

The reason why one regards reality as different from oneself is that one has not known, through enquiry, the true nature of emptiness.

As it is emptiness that appears as everything, those who have known the truth of emptiness have known the truth of everything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

All I'm saying is that the meaning of dharma has a lot less to do with black marks on a paper and everything to do with an unbroken oral tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but this has never been a point of contention.

Urgyen Dorje said:

You said to pick a textual methodology.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think I said this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

A teacher who was understood the meaning of Dzogchen texts would not teach them as theistic cosmology.

Malcolm wrote:

Which means you agree that Dzogchen texts have a specific meaning, and that it is invariable.

Urgyen Dorje said:

But he or she might teach the bodhisattva precepts from the vantage point of Mind Only versus Middle Way dependent upon the students needs.

Malcolm wrote:

It is fine to teach either, it is not fine to mix them up. Why? Because they have different intentions.

The words and meanings of these texts are set in tradition, and whole correspondence theories between words and meanings are not popular in the West, that is precisely how the texts themselves unpack themselves. And teachers must teach according to the intention of the text, without adding or subtracting a word.

And it is only a realized being or somebody who understands the intention according to the oral tradition who is able to do this.

But the meaning is in either case not arbitrary nor adaptable to students. Instead, it is the student who must adapt to the meaning. We do not adapt the meaning to the student.

I don't own Derrida stock. I'm looking at ways of looking at texts that point back to the guru, the oral tradition, the lineage of blessings, and not just the texts themselves so we can get beyond an endless debate as to what texts really mean. Have realization? Hold oral tradition? Lineage holder? Then you know. Otherwise not.

But this has nothing to do with "post structuralism" and everything to do with the fact that Buddhadharma is an oral tradition, in essence.

If we decide that there is a life to Buddhist texts beyond marks on paper, and if we recognize the oral tradition of the lineage to be what unlocks the meaning of those marks on a piece of paper-- then we examine a teacher, his or her qualifications, and his or her qualities, and study those texts with that person.

Again, this has nothing to do with some post-structuralist vanity. Words in Dharma texts have invariable meanings. They are not arbitrary nor are they infinite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 6:03 AM

Title: Re: Nudity

Content:

tomschwarz said:

Of course you can discuss buddhist nudist ideas online)))). Don't forget that you will die soon. When you die, according to my dear dead father who was a very compassionate doctor, the first thing that happens is that you pee on yourself, defecate on yourself, stick your tongue out and turn blue. Now want to practice the 4 steps of dissolution)))) like his holiness the dalai lama does every day? Ok.

Malcolm wrote:

I was discussing practices, specifically — these things should not be discussed online.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

fckw said:

His teaching style is very traditional actually.

Malcolm wrote:

His stated goals are to cherry pick Tibetan traditions for practices he deems suitable for western culture and to rework scholarly translations into practice oriented language.

This may appeal to some, but not to me.

For one, if you are a practitioner translator, you are already doing this. The idea of adapting Dzogchen to the West is more than a little hubristic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

The space of possible textual interpretations is infinite. In terms of dharma texts, what makes a textual interpretation valid is the valid cognition of a realized being who can pick specific textual interpretations from many according to his or her realization and the needs of his or her students.

Malcolm wrote:

No, they cannot not. For example, you cannot interpret Dzogchen texts as theistic cosmology merely because you might have some people who come from a strong theistic background as students.

The words and meanings of these texts are set in tradition, and whole correspondence theories between words and meanings are not popular in the West, that is precisely how the texts themselves unpack themselves. And teachers must teach according to the intention of the text, without adding or subtracting a word.

Urgyen Dorje said:

The idea I'm playing with is Derrida's basic one liner that everything is context.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I know, and I think Derrida is an intellectual dilettante — but hey, that's just me.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I think with dharma texts that context is the valid cognition of realized beings and the oral tradition of lineage masters that continues that valid cognition. Without that context those texts can be anything. And people do make them anything. So for me, there are dharma texts, marks on pages, and the unbroken lineage of realization that unlocks those texts. The marks on the page make no sense without the unbroken lineage of realization to unlock them. This is why it's absurd, from my side as a practitioner, when academics study texts without any reference to the living tradition, and when students attempt to study texts without any guidance from the living tradition. I think an approach like this shuts down academic chauvinism, false lamas, teacher-less students, modernists, all in one swoop.

Malcolm wrote:

What you desire is the opposite of your method. And in any case, this notion of "valid cognition of realized beings" is highly problematic. How does anyone know who is realized and who is not? This is why texts have words, and those words have invariable meanings. Even if you are not realized, as long as you understand and convey the meaning, there is always a possibility someone can wake up from the meaning you have communicated as long as you have a valid lineage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

DGA said:

OK, I'll put it my question differently. You've said that you've attended his teachings. What does he teach when he teaches?

fckw said:

Meditation mainly. Sutra-Mahamudra in level 1, Dzogchen in level 3 (Trek Chöd) and 4 (Tögel), and a mix in level 2. His teaching style is very traditional actually.

Malcolm wrote:

So, he is giving direct introduction in level 2?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Nudity

Content:

tellyontellyon said:

There seems to be some Buddhist practices that may involve nudity? Does anybody have any knowledge or experience of this? What is the purpose?

Ayu said:

Seems there isn't anybody yet who knows about it or likes to tell anything. Where did you hear from such practices?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and they should not be discussed online...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

None of what you are saying gives teachers an infinite license to interpret texts however they like.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm really not trying to bust chops. This is something I've pondered for a while. It's also not something I'm overly committed to. It's something I'm exploring. It's not something I have a profound intellectual commitment to.

If it's against the view of dharma, please red pill me on that.

From my vantage point, this approach immediately derails the views of many who feel that they can study the dharma on their own by reading texts without resorting to a teacher. It also derails the views of many who feel that they can just buy books and complete a shedra without relying on teachers for clarification of the difficult points in the source materials. It also derails the view that many have that they can expound on tantric materials, dzogchen, mahamudra, after simply receiving instructions.

From my vantage point this puts everything back on the valid cognition of a buddha. Might be a realized teacher, might be a holder of the oral tradition and lineage of blessings of a realized teacher.

But definitely something trans-textual.

Without this, the texts are just marks on paper. Or we're as good as blind. As such a post structural approach to texts gives the dharma texts an infinite space of interpretation according to the realization of the teacher and the needs of the students.

Malcolm wrote:

I really don't agree with this idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 3:50 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I'm pretty sure i've read a book by Traleg Kyabgon Rinpoche with a forward by Wilbur.

Malcolm wrote:

The way that works is that Publisher X agrees to publish Author Y's book, and then the Publisher goes out and asks someone they think is influential in the target audience to write a forward. It does not mean that the author necessarily condones the person who wrote the forward, or vice versa, as crazy as that sounds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

As such a post structural approach to texts gives the dharma texts an infinite space of interpretation according to the realization of the teacher and the needs of the students.

Malcolm wrote:

I really don't agree with this idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Daniel P Brown - Pointing Out Way?

Content:

fckw said:

He knows enough Sanskrit and Tibetan to read and translate the relevant root texts he teaches himself. He's involved in some translation project for important Bön root texts he received directly from H.H. Menri Trizin that, to my knowledge, so far have not yet been translated.

Malcolm wrote:

All the Bonpo texts he is working on have already been translated at least once. [A Khrid, Six Lamps]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Just things can exist or manifest simply because they have no fixed nature, similarly texts can have meaning, in particular liberative substance, because they have no fixed textual meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

'When I use a word,' Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, 'it means just what I choose it to mean — neither more nor less.'

'The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make words mean so many different things.'

'The question is,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'which is to be master — that's all.'

Alice was too much puzzled to say anything; so after a minute Humpty Dumpty began again. 'They've a temper, some of them — particularly verbs: they're the proudest — adjectives you can do anything with, but not verbs — however, I can manage the whole lot of them! Impenetrability! That's what I say!'

'Would you tell me please,' said Alice, 'what that means?'

'Now you talk like a reasonable child,' said Humpty Dumpty, looking very much pleased. 'I meant by "impenetrability" that we've had enough of that subject, and it would be just as well if you'd mention what you mean to do next, as I suppose you don't mean to stop here all the rest of your life.'

'That's a great deal to make one word mean,' Alice said in a thoughtful tone.

'When I make a word do a lot of work like that,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'I always pay it extra.'

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 25th, 2015 at 12:14 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I agree which is why I'm curious why my post structural view of text/context renders my Buddhist view faulty.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think I ever said that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

rory said:

Malcolm's religious take on philology reminds me of the 19th century Christian angst over Biblical Criticism.

Malcolm wrote:

I have no angst about Western scholarship on Buddhist History, I just don't think any of it is definitive since it consists of shifting fads of opinions and methods and means very little to practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: The courage of no convictions

Content:

Dan74 said:

Malcolm, I think the simile of the physician, ie skilful means, is exactly the right one for this topic, thank you for your example. In my day job (maths) I deal with certainties (and certain uncertainties - statistics) but in matters of the heart it is different, isn't it? To diagnose the persons illness is hard, especially over the web, but to know the right medicine for that person is practically impossible, IMO. What certainty can there be in such an uncertain endeavour? Skilful means are not about certainty but about skill. So the question then becomes whether certainty is skilful, ie helpful. What do people think about that?

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma is not really a matter of the heart. It is a certainty that we are all suffering from the three or five poisons. People like to make a big story about the 84,000 different Dharmas, but in reality these are just three groups divided among the three poisons. The kind of Dharma one practices depends on inclination and fortune.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 9:01 AM

Title: Re: New schools in early buddhism

Content:

lostitude said:

]Let me give you an example that particularly caught my attention, and I quote from the book I'm reading on early buddhism:

'The Vibhajjavādins argued against the view, held by the Sarvastivādins and Pudgalavādins, that some Arahats could regress from their state after temporarily attaining it'.

First, I wonder how such a debate can help me attain liberation. Second, it would logically follow from such a question, that none of those who debated it were Arahats themselves, otherwise the answer would be obvious to them. Unless of course I completely missed the point, which is perfectly possible too.

Malcolm wrote:

You completely missed the point of the argument. And the argument was debated by Arhats. Arhats can have different opinions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 3:27 AM

Title: Re: traditions in transition

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not if I can help it.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Yes, i'm sure your online polemics will have a huge effect on mainstream Buddhism in the west.

Malcolm wrote:

Absolutely, haven't you noticed a massive decline in subscriptions to the big three mags? No? (Damn!).

Johnny Dangerous said:

Dharma-lite™ is not even Dharma. It is imitation Dharma. All this was predicted by Guru Rinpoche and in the tantras.

Yep, and IIRC he also talked about how people would act towards one another in this age, including Dharma practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

Yes, including the outrageous supposition that most of this behavior was motivated by provocations of various kinds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: traditions in transition

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

BTW, it seems that Osel Tendzin, aka Thomas Rich, may have achieved a clear thugdam.

Malcolm wrote:

That is what some say, I have my doubts though...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: traditions in transition

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Until people can get past that hurdle, surface-level "Dharma-lite" is going to be the mainstream version of Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Not if I can help it.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Unlike some folks I don't think "Dharma-lite" practice should be an object of derision, or an excuse to mock and vilify the people practicing it, but I do think, and do hope that people come to see that it is incomplete compared to what's available.

Malcolm wrote:

Dharma-lite™ is not even Dharma. It is imitation Dharma. All this was predicted by Guru Rinpoche and in the tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: traditions in transition

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What are the solutions?

We need some realized westerners to emerge.

dzogchungpa said:

I think there are one or two somewhere or other.

Malcolm wrote:

While I have met some Westerners who understand the meaning in a concrete sense, I have yet to meet anyone I would call "realized."

But since ChNN denies he is realized, that sets the bar pretty damn high. So we will just have to wait and see if there anyone in our generation achieves something like rainbow body or has a clear thugdam or has relics.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 24th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: traditions in transition

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

What exactly are the concerns? For example, is it that the quality of teachers is declining?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Is it that the traditional course of study is compromised?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Is it that the fundamental concepts of theory and practice are being eroded?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Are Western philosophical and religion notions being transferred into the tradition?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, like translating gzhi, which simple means basis, as ground of being.

Urgyen Dorje said:
What are the solutions?

Malcolm wrote:
We need some realized westerners to emerge.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:56 PM
Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions
Content:
Urgyen Dorje said:
Ya. And I think it's the same with people I'm describing. One never knows until one explores the common ground.

Malcolm wrote:
They will find the Dharma with you or without you. It is inevitable.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:44 PM
Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions
Content:
Urgyen Dorje said:
Well, this is how I became a Buddhist 25 years ago. I reached out in an interfaith dialog and found some common ground with a Buddhist, and then sought out formal Buddhist training with the same lama.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, because you had a strong karmic connection with Dharma from a past life, specifically Dzogchen teachings, so you reconnected with the Dharma in this life. That, my friend, is the only way it works.

This is why I have the six syllables in my sig, because anyone who sees them creates a positive cause to connect with the Dharma in a future life, specifically Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:35 PM
Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions
Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
These are people who have done enough research, generally as Christians, to come to a Buddhist center to learn about these things, or to reach out to a Buddhist in the community like myself, to ask about these things.

Malcolm wrote:

I generally tell them what HHDL says, they should stay Christians. They should explore their own tradition more deeply.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Calming the mind and generating love and compassion is a natural common ground between Christianity and Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, but Christians don't need Buddhism to be calm and generate love and compassion, nor do Muslims, or Hindus and so on.

If your mind is calm because you have taken Jesus as your personal savior and you generate compassion and love out of Christian exercises, fantastic. We can all agree that being calm, loving and compassionate is a good thing.

Interfaith gatherings, like peace conferences, don't change anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Well, this instruction seems to work.

The common ground obviously isn't vajrayana. The point of contact is generally shamatha and the four immeasurables.

]

Malcolm wrote:

These things are not Buddhist. They are shared in common with Hinduism already.

If people want to meditate, and they are theistically inclined, I send them to Yoga. I have no interest in converting, modifying or conditioning anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

This is their instruction for bringing people to the dharma when people express interest.

That's all. Nothing more, nothing less. Start with common ground, cultivate that, introduce some related practices-- move on from there. People generally pick up a Buddhist practice, or take some useful things back to their own religion.

Malcolm wrote:

If someone wants to learn Buddhist practice, they have to become a Buddhist. Giving Tara mantras to Christians is useless.

There is no such thing as a Hindu/Buddhist; Muslim/Buddhist; Christian/Buddhist. etc. You either take refuge in the Three Jewels or you don't. It is really simple. And I don't mean getting a groovy Tibetan/Chinese/Pali/Japanese name and so on. If you want to follow the Buddha's path, this means you have understood something is lacking in the path you follow. If you think the path you follow is perfect and complete, then there is no need for you to follow Buddha's path, or borrow anything from it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:11 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

MiphamFan said:

So if I became a nomad, farmer or something who has to kill animals at least occasionally, I should just feel bad about it?

I remember reading in Perfect Conduct that killing animals doesn't break the vow to avoid killing completely, although it should be confessed.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, you feel bad about it. For example, one of the reasons for dgu gtor is to apologize and confess all negativities done during the past year, especially killing cattle and sheep or hunting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I've watched my teachers do interfaith dialog, some of them for decades.

Malcolm wrote:

"Interfaith" assumes we are just trying to communicate with others to live in a harmonious way. Then we say nice things and complement each other on our mutual qualities.

It's all bullshit of course, because everyone just goes back to criticizing each other and thinking the other is deluded once everyone returns to their temple, mosque, church or synagogue. This is how samsara is.

Educating is different. If someone wants to be educated, then they have to listen. If people have the karmic fortune to meet Buddhadharma, they will. This is why we do not convert, or bother to evangelize. We don't have a mission. People are responsible for themselves. No one is going to save them. The universe does not care and there is no all-powerful god who cares either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm just going to throw myself on the fire here...

When having an interfaith dialog, one can either focus on the differences between the paths or the similarities. If one focuses on the differences, the conversation will be about nothing but differences, and that's fine. But if one focuses on similarities, and those similarities may only be "similar" in that they reflect the other persons interests, one has a point of connection. A point of connection is more important than an ocean of differences if one wants to acknowledge and nurture some one's interest in dharma. Not every difference and confusion needs to be addressed at once. So generally the approach to real interfaith dialog is to find common ground on a couple points and share there.

So here we have a Muslim with a serious interest in Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

If a non-Buddhist person is interested in the Dharma, that is great. But in order to understand what Dharma is they have to understand first the differences between the Dharma and the religion they are currently following.

Otherwise, as the Dalai Lama said of Christians interested in emptiness in Tucson in 2005, "It is none of their business."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Malcolm, BTW what about offerings to Indo-European gods? Ancient Greeks and Indians both sacrificed animals before eating them. Still Indra/Zeus is a deva, not a preta.

Malcolm wrote:

One, are you quite sure that Indra and Zeus are the same entity? Two, are you sure Zeus is a deva?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 8:59 PM

Title: Re: Helen Tworikov, Tricycle Magazine: Anti-Vajrayana Bias?

Content:

tingdzin said:

I pretty much agree with Urgyen Dorje. She definitely has an agenda, and while a good part of it may well be down to trying to keep a periodical alive and in mass circulation (not an easy task) by making Buddhism "approachable", that is not the whole story. Teachers and teachings from any tradition (including Zen and TB, which are, as Rory notes, the favorites) which ignore a modernist approach, which seriously challenge the comfortable cultural and ethical assumptions of educated middle-class Americans and Europeans, or which in general dispense with a touchy-feely, ego-nurturing approach seem pretty thin on the ground in that mag. Once in a while, there are gems, it's true, but usually it's the same old safe teachers and teachings, "the usual suspects", from an obviously vetted list, that get the most ink.

Malcolm wrote:

Barnes and Nobles Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Devin666 said:

So basically every institution (or in many cases) has some spirit that feels that the whole thing is its property and supports it or whatever? I am also wondering why the dkor bdag would keep one poor as long as one has debt, what is the connection there? Should it not try to help or is dkor bdag more like a group energy or so? Is it an individual thinking spirit?

Malcolm wrote:

Because you have a debt, it depletes your prosperity. A dkor bdag is a kind of individual entity associated with public institutions like monasteries, sometimes they even have names. Generally however, they do not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: New schools in early buddhism

Content:

lostitude said:

Hello,

I have been reading about early buddhism and the multiplication of different schools of thought following a number of schisms. Some of them seem to be quite divergent from each other, sometimes even opposed (like sarvastivada and theravada) in their theories about reality, existence and so on, which makes me wonder if all those treatises and theories were really written and developed by 'attained' people or rather by simple philosophers who tried to rationalise the universe using the brain instead of through direct knowledge, like western philosophers did with Christianity? Also, are these developments still seen as useful and exploitable in terms of spiritual development today, or simply as a phase in buddhist history?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats are not omniscient. They are not Buddhas. They are free of samsara, they will not take rebirth in samsara, but they do not have the same level of knowledge as a Buddha. Therefore, in explaining the Buddha's teachings, they gave rise to the 18 different schools, as the Buddha predicted. This has nothing to do with Mahāyāna, which is separate thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 7:36 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Devin666 said:

Malcom, did you see my question?

Malcolm wrote:

The idea is applied to institutions in general. It is not written down somewhere in a book.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

Stupas have no magic power of their own.

Malcolm wrote:

"Once, a dog was chasing a pig, and as the pig was running away, it circumambulated the stupa. The pig did not have any kind of virtuous motivation. It had no idea that the stupa was a holy object and that it could be purified and liberated by circumambulating it. The pig had never registered for a meditation course! Because of the kindness of the dog that chased it, the pig did one circumambulation of the stupa, and after the pig died, it was born in the higher realm of Tushita."

<http://www.lamayeshe.com/article/chapter/chapter-34-march-2-b>

Why pig benefitted? Where stupa magic come from? I'm curious.

paël said:

This story cannot be taken literally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 7:15 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

So at the end of the day, the differences you mention seem to be of a purely theoretical nature, at least I can't see what their concrete implications would be, if I were to seriously embark on the buddhist path?

Malcolm wrote:

It really depends on which school you are interested in. Zen, Son and Theravadin schools [for different reasons] do not seem to have much problem accommodating theists. Most expressions of Tibetan Buddhism however would require you to take refuge in Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, and that means you would have to relinquish your former religious affiliations and beliefs. They would maintain one cannot find refuge in non-Buddhist deities if one has found refuge in the Buddha. So there is a difference in refuge.

There is a difference of view — Buddhadharma utterly rejects the notion of an efficient creator god, or even a formal one. It instead proposes there is no absolute beginning, and relies in the notion of dependent origination and emptiness to explain everything. The Buddha maintained that views other than the view of dependent origination were false.

There is a difference in path — since Buddhadharma rejects God in toto because of the view of dependent origination, liberation depends solely on one's own efforts and there is no external moral agency that one has to satisfy or worship. Liberation depends solely on recognizing one's own nature. There is nothing with which to unify, no transcendent principle binding all beings together, etc.

There is a difference in conduct -- we will leave this aside for now.

There is a difference in result — the result of practicing Buddhadharma is Buddhahood. Buddhahood cannot be attained in non-Buddhist paths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

You and I might be. A bunch of people in Ferguson aren't... or parts of Camden... Detroit... LA... Chicago... or on some of the Indian Reservations... just saying.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think Americans live in constant fear.... We are pretty comfortable.

Compared to people in India or even in most of Mexico, people in Camden, Ferguson, Detroit, Chicago and so on are miles higher in their standard of living and opportunities, just saying...even with racist cops...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Cutting Hair

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is calculation for this from what is called 'bras rtsi, the calculation of results. It is a part of Tibetan "astrology."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:18 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Incidentally, I will leave you with a summary of a Buddhist refutation of theism:

The critique of puru.sa centers on the dilemma posed by puru.sa's (a) motives (if he is motivated by another, he is not self-sufficient; if he is motivated by compassion, he must create a perfect world, while if he cannot create a perfect world, he is not powerful; and if he is motivated by "amusement," then he is both cruel and dependent on the instrument of amusement, namely, the cosmos)(120) and (b) potency (if he is able to create all things, he must do so immediately, for potency entails immediate generation).(121)

<http://ccbs.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/jackson.htm>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:05 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitute said:

What would the Buddha have eaten and commanded people to eat, in the absence of any crops in the middle of a desert? Let's be realistic.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha, so far as we know, ate what was offered to him, and did not command anyone to do anything, apart from to avoid killing. I think you deeply do not understand the world view of Buddhadharma, leaving aside my own views about other religions.

lostitude said:

And it is just as prevalent in South-East Asia and Central Asia as well as many other parts of the world. So no, you didn't address this association you're making...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and had you read more carefully, you would have noticed that I included India, Mexico and S. America. etc. All these places have deep problems.

lostitude said:

They live in constant fear and paranoia.

Just like the US and right now, Europe. Or South Korea. You clearly want this belief of yours to be true...

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think Americans live in constant fear, not Europeans. We are pretty comfortable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 9:02 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

You can also admit that you have not attained any significant level of insight granting you sufficient direct knowledge of what a Buddha would perceive if he was talking to a sufi 'qutb' (one of the highest spiritual levels in sufism). And that you're disparaging other religions based on your readings and deluded perceptions of what you think they are.

Malcolm wrote:

I know what a Buddha would perceive. He would perceive someone with a mistaken view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 8:23 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

So have you attained stream entry, Malcolm, or not yet?

Malcolm wrote:

The issues is not what I have attained or not attained.

lostitude said:

Of course it is. How could you be passing such judgements without a certain level of attainment allowing you clear and direct insight into those religions you denounce? That would be quite unreasonable.

Malcolm wrote:

The reason it is not an issue is that I can claim anything and how could you judge my claims? So the issue is moot and irrelevant.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The philosophical revolution in Islam happened after Muslims converted Central Asia and came into contact with the [Hellenized] Central Asian Civilizations.

lostitude said:

That's very inaccurate. Among the best known sufis is Hassan al-Basri for example, who died long before the conquests of Central Asia.

Malcolm wrote:

I was not talking about Sufism.

lostitude said:

What you seem to forget is that islam first appeared in a country where the main staple is meat. Arabia is mainly desert, with no possibility of cultivating crops (except in the far South). Back then, slaughtering your own camel for a guest was a huge thing, a tremendous mark of esteem and generosity. Now slaughtering it for the sake of Allah and distributing the meat to the poor who barely have anything to eat was probably one of the most praiseworthy acts that could be performed in such a situation.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Muslim, perhaps. I don't think the Buddha would agree.

lostitude said:

In Abrahamic religions just like in buddhism, any act is religious insofar as it is motivated by a specific intention with 'karmic' results.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you don't really get my point.

lostitude said:

You can point out all the exceptions and nuances you want. They don't matter. What matters is that in these places that I mentioned, millions of animals a year are ritually sacrificed or killed according to religious rules, and the karmic results are exponentially worse than Tysons and Hormel.

That's a pretty wild association to make. Over half of the African continent does not practice religious slaughters as seen in Abrahamic religions, yet subsaharan Africa is in a much more dire situation than many Muslim countries...

Malcolm wrote:

Animism is very prevalent in sub-Saharan Africa. I addressed this.

lostitude said:

As for Israel, aside from being officially at war, I hardly see how Israelis have a miserable life in Tel Aviv.

Malcolm wrote:

They live in constant fear and paranoia.

lostitude said:

Animal sacrifice is the rule in Islam, not the exception. It is a duty, actually, one many Muslims may find distasteful, but a duty nevertheless.

Again, it is a duty because it is rich people's duty to feed the poor, on those special occasions. If islam had appeared in Asia, maybe it would have consisted in soybeans. The whole idea is that of a sacrifice = renouncing something dear to you. The fact that it's an animal is secondary.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is primary, from a Buddhist POV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 7:44 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

So have you attained stream entry, Malcolm, or not yet?

Malcolm wrote:

The issues is not what I have attained or not attained.

In any case, I do not practice according to that Hinayāna system, so the question also does not apply.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 7:02 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

Uh huh, and that makes it eternal, which is why Buddhists are in the lowest Islamic hell. How could you possibly tell? You have no idea what Allah as the matrix of existence could mean, because you have neither attained nirvana, nor attained the state attained by the sufi saints who expounded this notion.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no matrix of existence, no ground of being.

lostitude said:

So you're simply rejecting something you don't even understand.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, if you say so.

lostitude said:

Where did I say that? I said that they were places where you can get loads of good karma. Just like the tombs of some Muslim saints. What is the difference?

Malcolm wrote:

You can't get loads of good karma from anything external. You can only get "loads of good karma" by having positive intentions and then carrying them out.

lostitude said:

You can taste it before you get there. This is called "stream entry."

So basically it's like getting to the top of the Empire State Building on a rainy and cloudy day with 1/2mile visibility, and comparing it with the view on a clear day with unlimited visibility like in nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is more like getting on the elevator.

lostitude said:

Theistic religions do not make any sense

To you, which is fine. If you have trouble understanding them though, you can either look for explanations or say that you don't understand them. Any other attitude is just equivalent to mere rejection, which I don't think would be conducive to stream-entry... it really sounds like the kind of grasping that Nagarjuna warned against, the idea that you can understand the true nature of reality in a neat set of concepts and reject all other systems that seem to be contradictory.

Malcolm wrote:

They are well refuted by Vasubandhu, Nāgārjuna and so on.

lostitude said:

they contradict direct perception

They don't contradict the perceptions of those who have reached an advanced stage in those traditions. Which is not your case... so obviously they will contradict your own direct perception.

Malcolm wrote:

Creationism is contradicted in direct perception. There is no such thing as an unmoved mover, etc. Everything that arises, arises from a conditioned cause. An uncaused cause is impossible. This is demonstrable both through direct perception and inference.

lostitude said:

You are the one making the argument from direct perception. In this case, what can be more foolish than believing a creator god no one has ever seen? Because you have seen nirvana maybe?

Malcolm wrote:

Nirvana and God are not commensurable concepts on any level.

lostitude said:

What if God was not something to see, but maybe something to experience? What is truly foolish is to judge something you haven't even begun to understand. Can you really attain stream-entry with such a mindset? I must say I'm quite surprised.

Malcolm wrote:

If it can be experienced, it is relative. A relative mind cannot experience anything unconditioned. It is simply impossible. Also, in Buddhadharma there are only three unconditioned things, generally, space and the two kinds of cessation. [In Mahāyāna we add emptiness, but that is beyond discussion here].

Nirvana has two meanings but it is not an experience. It is a kind of knowledge that you will no longer take rebirth in samsara because you have exhausted afflictions, and second, when you die, your continuum ceases with regard to afflictive rebirth in the three realms. Beyond this, we move in the Mahāyāna Buddhology, which is a little more complex.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 6:18 AM

Title: Re: the unconscious, the shadow, and buddhism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the idea that there are subconsciousness processes in the mind is rejected out of hand in Buddhadharma. And not every school of Buddhism subscribes to this idea of traces.

For the most part, dreams are held to be pretty meaningless. Just another bardo of illusion.

jorden said:

So then I might not be understanding the difference between being ignorant of karmic conditioning and the effect it has on people (if you can put it that way) and subconsciousness processes that influence your life without you knowing it. I might even be misunderstanding subconsciousness in this context... Is subconsciousness rejected because it is defined as something that cannot ever become known/brought in awareness? Or is it that I'm comparing the seemingly similar effects (i.e. stuff you are unaware of affects what you do in both Buddhadharma and analytical psychology) but missing the very different view on the structure of consciousness?

Malcolm wrote:

Consciousness is unitary and momentary, only one at a time. There are mental factors that accompany it, but you really need to study Abhidharma to fully understand the differences.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: Helen Tworikov, Tricycle Magazine: Anti-Vajrayana Bias?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

They each have their own nuances, but the intention is to prevent the view of a modern western Buddhism- - whatever that is.

Malcolm wrote:

Hey, I thought that was my job!

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 6:04 AM

Title: Re: the unconscious, the shadow, and buddhism?

Content:

jorden said:

So am I correct in understanding that there is at least a superficial similarity between the concept of unconscious processes and habitual tendencies/patterns (in that both in their respective views cause us to do (and dream) all kinds of crazy stuff without us really having any control), but a big difference in the way meaning is (or is not) attached to them?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the idea that there are subconsciousness processes in the mind is rejected out of hand in Buddhadharma. And not every school of Buddhism subscribes to this idea of traces.

For the most part, dreams are held to be pretty meaningless. Just another bardo of illusion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 5:58 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

The text of "The Supreme Source" cuts through all provisional teachings and what remains is "Pure and Total Consciousness" only. It cuts through every practice and belief dearly held.

Malcolm wrote:

Kun byed rgyal po is a sems sde text. It is principally concerned with the first statement of Garab Dorje, "Direct Introduction." It does not address the second two statements, "Remain without doubt" and "Continue in that state." [The three statements of Garab Dorje may actually be found in the ultimate root tantra of all Dzogchen, the origin of all Dharma teachings and specifically, all Dzogchen teachings, the sGra thal 'gyur Tantra.]

steve_bakr said:

I have been given to believe that the Direct Introduction to the Nature of Mind, which is Intrinsic Awareness (Rigpa), the Primordial State, is sufficient for all three statements.

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa is not the primordial state. Chogyal Namkhai Norbu states this again and again and again. If you choose not to listen to him, what can I say?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 5:43 AM

Title: Re: the unconscious, the shadow, and buddhism?

Content:

jorden said:

If

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, dreams come from activated traces.

jorden said:

I am confused now. What am I missing then in trying to compare these karmic traces in Buddhism and unconscious processes as in analytical psychology? They seem pretty much the same to me. They even produce dreams!

Jorden

Malcolm wrote:

In general dreams are the exhaustion of "junk" karma, and do not have any meaning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: the unconscious, the shadow, and buddhism?

Content:

jorden said:

Thanks Malcolm. I looked up vasana and saw that the Wikipedia article also mentioned Bija (seeds) and alaya (storehouse). Do you have a reading suggestion for an introduction to these concepts? I have heard alaya mentioned once in connection to a teaching on karma. The context of my question is that I'm doing contemplation on the four thoughts and I am not very well versed in the Buddhist thinking on karma. I have more experience with Jungian thought, so I have tried approaching karma from that direction. And do you know if there is a connection between vasanas and dreams?

Malcolm wrote:

IN general, dreams come from activated traces.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 4:56 AM

Title: Re: the unconscious, the shadow, and buddhism?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no shadow concept in Buddhadharma, nor is there a concept of a conscious and unconscious mind in Buddhadharma.

jorden said:

And habitual patterns/tendencies we are ignorant of? Don't they form a structure in our mind?

Malcolm wrote:

You are talking about traces [vasanas], these are imprints of actions that remain latent our mindstream until activated by specific causes, according to one theory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Islam = heaven and hell are eternal

lostitude said:

Not exactly.

First, hell is presented as 'eternal' (in Western languages) only for those who do not believe in Allah as being the matrix of existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Uh huh, and that makes it eternal, which is why Buddhists are in the lowest Islamic hell.

For others, hell is just a transitory existence that goes upward as 'bad karma' ripens, through skin-burning among other niceties

Same as heaven, which has several stages and from what I remember there is a possibility to move up from one stage to another.

Second, the word translated as 'eternal' (usually khalid) has been very much debated among Muslim scholars as to what it really means. Is it really absolute eternity, or is it one of those semitic exaggerations to signify 'a very long period of time'. Many have favored the second option, on the basis of some evidence which I don't remember, with this same word being used for obviously non-eternal events.

lostitude said:

There is no concept of everything is one in Buddhadharma. That is Advaita, one without a second and so on.

Yet that's what Kaccani took about 3 pages to try to explain to me: I'm no different from the object I perceive, all is the same and at the end of the day, since everything is conditioned, nothing exists for real. But maybe I got that wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm no, you really have it wrong here.

lostitude said:

Karma comes from one's own intentions, not places.

Well if it's a bone of contention within buddhism, it's not my problem All I know for certain is that stupas is a very buddhist thing, and that the belief that worshipping around them and circumambulating around them gets you huge amounts of good karma, is a very buddhist belief.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a bone of contention within Buddhism. Everyone accepts this definition since the Buddha stated it, Nāgārjuna repeated it, and so on.

Stupas have no magic power of their own.

[/quote]Fortunately I don't live in a so-called 'islamic' country.[/quote]

Fortunately.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: the unconscious, the shadow, and buddhism?

Content:

jorden said:

I have two questions, I hope this is the appropriate forum (if not perhaps one of the mods can suggest a better place?):

Is there a Buddhist concept resembling the psychological shadow a la Jung (an unconscious aspect of the personality which the conscious ego does not identify in itself. Because one tends to reject or remain ignorant of the least desirable aspects of one's personality, the shadow is largely negative. (Wikipedia))?

And can somebody point me in the direction of Buddhist thoughts on the relation between our conscious and unconscious mind. If there is such a thing? What terms would I be looking for?

Thanks in advance for any thoughts on this,
Jorden

Malcolm wrote:

There is no shadow concept in Buddhadharma, nor is there a concept of a conscious and unconscious mind in Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

You're missing the point. Yes you can be certain that nirvana exists. But you can't know what the view is like from there, until you reach it.

Malcolm wrote:

You can taste it before you get there. This is called "stream entry."

lostitude said:

So wait until you reach it before judging other religions, because that's the only valid vantage point, as I was saying.

Malcolm wrote:

Theistic religions do not make any sense and they contradict direct perception. You are the one making the argument from direct perception. In this case, what can be more foolish than believing a creator god no one has ever seen?

lostitude said:

As long as you haven't reached nirvana, you are still deluded,

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not the case. You need to understand something more about the path structure of Buddhadharma that you do. In Buddhism, one wakes up long before one achieves Nirvana. Once one has woken up, one is not longer deluded. That initial awakening is called "stream entry." In Mahāyāna is the first bhumi. But even before the first bhumi there is the second stage of the path of application, where one's samadhi so closely resembles the actual experience of awakening is it called "peak."

lostitude said:

and you see the world and other religions in a deluded way. Just because you can see nirvana looming in the distance doesn't help you know what perspective you will enjoy once you get there.

Malcolm wrote:

You think this, because you have not properly studied the Dharma.

lostitude said:

Now if you have got reports from people who have reached nirvana unequivocally saying that all other religions are bad, I'd be interested to read that.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of bad — it is a question of not attaining liberation. And the Buddha most certainly commented on this point in several sutras, for example, the Mahāparibinnana sutta which was already cited in this thread:

"In any doctrine & discipline where the noble eightfold path is not found, no contemplative of the first... second... third... fourth order [stream-winner, once-returner, non-returner, or arahant] is found. But in any doctrine & discipline where the noble eightfold path is found, contemplatives of the first... second... third... fourth order are found. The noble eightfold path is found in this doctrine & discipline, and right here there are contemplatives of the first... second... third... fourth order. Other teachings are empty of knowledgeable contemplatives.

<http://www.accesstosight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.16.5-6.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

I'm giving those details because now that I'm reading up on general buddhism (not just zen), I keep bumping into strikingly similar themes in both religions.

I thought satan/shaytan was purely abrahamic, we have mara in buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:
Mara /= Satan.

lostitude said:
Same for heaven and hell.

Malcolm wrote:
Islam = heaven and hell are eternal

Buddhadharma = heaven and hells are just part of the six realms of existence, impermanent.

lostitude said:
I was especially surprised by this story about one of the buddhist hells in which beings are constantly burned and when the skin is completely burnt, it is replaced by a new one for more burning. This is word-for-word a verse in the Quran. It would almost seem as if Muhammad went on a road trip to India in his hippie years.

Malcolm wrote:
Western hells are clearly based on Buddhist hells, doubtless via Mani.

lostitude said:
Then there are other apparent similarities (I'm saying apparent because I'm already out of my depth there, it gets too conceptual for me), such as the sufi view of 'unity of existence/being' (wahdat al wujud) which basically says that everything that 'is', is one. Which includes Allah. But at the same time you have this verse in the Qur'an that says that Allah is not comparable to anything (which implies that for all ends and purposes, Allah/God does not exist in this universe, since nothing within this universe is like Him).

Malcolm wrote:
There is no concept of everything is one in Buddhadharma. That is Advaita, one without a second and so on.

lostitude said:
Then of course you have karma in buddhism, and good deeds and bad deeds in islam and their consequences.
You also have 'baraka' in islam, which would be the equivalent of good karma, and baraka is especially available around tombs of saints and of course the tomb of the Prophet, and the Kaaba and some holy mosques. Just like buddhist stupas.

Malcolm wrote:
Karma comes from one's own intentions, not places.

lostitude said:

You have many different planes of existence beyond the wordly plane in buddhism, in islam what is commonly referred to as 'Heaven' is actually subdivided into many planes too, the very last one being some kind of fusion with Allah and disappearance into Him. Something that sounds just as un-conceptualizable as nirvana.

Malcolm wrote:

All planes of existence in Buddhadharma are worldly, from Avici hell to Bhavagra.

lostitude said:

What mainstream islam lacks for me is a clear path for spiritual progression. Sufi schools could have offered me that maybe, but I just haven't had a chance to join one. And I feel this very strong resonance about islam and buddhism as you put it, which is why I really feel like at least trying some buddhist practices and see where they get me. If it can't hurt me, why not just try.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][[/quote]

Nope, it cannot hurt you to try. Though I would be cautious about sharing your apostasy with other Muslims. In some places it can get you instantly killed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You see the skyline of New York City long before you arrive there. You don't need to have arrived at the Empire State Building to know it is there. You can see it from a distance.

lostitude said:

But you have no idea what the view from the Empire State Building is like until you reach the top. Same goes with other religions you're trying to look at without even having reached the top of the mountain that is nirvana, the only clear vantage point. Inference and testimony will never equate direct knowledge. Especially when they are flawed, which is very often the case, as the disagreements within historic buddhist schools have shown, according to my modest readings on this topic so far.

Malcolm wrote:

We don't need to see the view of the Empire State Building for ourselves. Since we are certain it exists, we can trust the reports of others who have ridden the elevator to the top. Of course, seeing for oneself is always better, but it certainly does not mean we need to disbelieve the reports of others who have been to the top of a building we can plainly see for ourselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 3:30 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

If you are not yourself free from samsara already, there is no way you can know that... because you don't know what exactly leads to liberation since you haven't trodden that path yet. All you know is a few vague descriptions of it, but that's very far from knowledge.

Malcolm wrote:

This argument is incorrect. It presumes there is only one form of correct knowledge, direct perception. But in fact, Buddhadharma accepts three forms of valid knowledge: direct perception, inference and testimony.

lostitude said:

That's the problem I was alluding to earlier. Some people seem to believe that they know as much as bodhisattvas or buddhas, simply from reading or hearing stuff about what they said or did, and having a few years of practice behind them. I think it would be much wiser to keep one's judgements on hold until one reaches liberation. Then you can see with your own eyes. Until then, why not just say 'I don't know', and be content with saying 'buddhism is what works for ME' ?

Malcolm wrote:

Some of us have been practicing Dharma long enough to have sufficient experience to be quite certain that what Buddha and other masters of Buddhadharma before him and after him have stated is true. Arriving at that confidence requires putting Buddhadharma into practice in one's own life. That starts with beginning to cultivate mundane correct view. What is that?:

This is the suffering, this is the cause, this is its cessation, this is the path.

You see the skyline of New York City long before you arrive there. You don't need to have arrived at the Empire State Building to know it is there. You can see it from a distance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 2:50 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

I forgot to respond to your post: I certainly wasn't talking about the Buddhist sangha in particular. When I praised Ugyen Dorje's attitude and hoped more people were like him/her, I meant the human community in general. So far it seems to me that the buddhist community is actually a million times more open minded than some of the Muslim communities I have been involved in.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course followers of Buddharma are open minded. We understand that everyone is afflicted by the three poisons, since this is the direct cause of samsara and rebirth. We understand that every thing that everyone does, even if it is positive, even if we are followers of Buddhadharma, is tainted with the three poisons unless or until we cut the three poisons off at the root because we have woken up. And awakened people have nothing but compassion for everyone. However, as far as I know, there are no awakened people posting on this board.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

smcj said:

I've heard the basic idea about nagas is that there is one wherever there is a nice spot. So a nice beach or a nice meadow would have one. I guess that means Yosemite and Yellowstone have really big ones.

I'm not subscribing to that theory, but I do find it esthetically pleasing. So now when I go into nature to a really nice spot I mentally make an offering and give thanks to the local naga. Whether or not there actually is a naga doesn't matter to me. I find it a beautiful way to enhance my enjoyment of the spot. And if there actually is a naga, well then there's nothing wrong with being a polite guest.

Just as long as they don't ask me to take sides with the whole garuda/naga conflict.

Malcolm wrote:

Better make sure it is a nāgā positive day, or you are just going to piss them off.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Maybe, but I still don't see how you know that the IRS, say, has nonhuman protectors.

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe you should reflect on that...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 23rd, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Helen Tworkov, Tricycle Magazine: Anti-Vajrayana Bias?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I don't read Tricycle or Shambhala Sun because I feel they have ideological and sectarian biases. Sometimes they drop a great article or interview.

Malcolm wrote:

What is Shambhala Sun's ideological and sectarian bias?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 11:10 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

what do I do differently with that information?

Malcolm wrote:

Practice Drollo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, there is no reason not be tolerant of other religions, for the same reason that we are tolerant of afflicted people, including ourselves.

The general motivation for all religions, even religions which advocate harming others, is to promote happiness and well-being. However, other religions arise out of ignorance of how things actually are and propose ineffective solutions for the problems they intend to address.

We have to recognize that the beliefs and and practices of other religions do not lead to liberation, are at best palliatives for human problems, and at worst, cause rebirth in lower realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm down with that now. Like our own Sonam Dragpa turned gyalpo. Yes. Martyrdom could be seen as a gyalpo factory. iMO especially crusaders and jihadis.

Malcolm wrote:
Definitely.

Anyway, for example, we have the example of Muhammed — from whom did he receive the Koran? An entity called Gabriel, who presented himself as a conveyor of the word of God. How is this any different at all from Tibetan oracles, New Age channelers and so on? Nothing, in my view.

We have constant information from the OT Prophets that they communicated directly with a being they gave various names, and they report this entity took and takes a generational interest in their people from a very early time.

The "chosen people" meme has been one of the most destructive in human history because it gives a certain population a teleological claim to primacy and favor. The Israelites used it to wipe out enemy tribes, the Christians used to to forge their hegemony, causing massive genocides in the Americas, both north and south, the Muslims used it and are using it today, even the Communists used it with the myth of the proletariat [Communist eschatology is strictly Abrahamic in nature].

Monotheisms, as a class of religion, are entirely imperialistic in their ambitions, and this is one of the chief reasons I think they are all gyalpo driven, regardless of what individual Christians, Jews and Muslims [and Communists] may believe and whatever concept of God they may hold.

M

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 9:37 PM
Title: Re: Sequence of the elements
Content:

kashmir said:

Why is it that during the purification of the elements E Ho. etc, the sequence is space, wind, water, fire, earth. While most depictions of Thigles using the simple five colors, the sequence seems to be Blue, Green, Red, Yellow, Surrounded by white (Space, Wind, Fire, Earth, Water?)

Malcolm wrote:
The sequence in the thigle has a specific meaning that can be found in the Dzogchen tantras. It is not arbitrary. But I am not going to discuss it here.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 9:31 PM
Title: Re: Earth Termas - real objects?
Content:

Nosta said:

Chokgyur was the name, sorry for my mistake.

Earth Termas being real is something extraordinary, and something that shows that reality is illusory. If not, how could it be possible to take out objects from air or rocks?

I suppose that in the present times there are not tertons able to do such things.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure there are. I have met two of them, now deceased, but they both revealed earth termas.

Khenpo Jigme Phunstok

Kunzang Dechen Lingpa

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

When people walk away from this thing, they universally use the language of "I don't believe in this any more".

I guess spirits could simply be draw to people on different forms of that trip depending upon their intensity and negativity. As you've said in another post, I can see spirits being drawn to the crucifixion, and I could see them being worked up about the idols being removed from the Kaaba.

Malcolm wrote:

I was making a different point when discussing the crucifixion — I was saying that such kind of executions of religious people are precisely the kind of thing that causes creates gyalpos.

gDon do not depend on our beliefs. Saying that we do not believe in other kinds of sentient beings that are formless is like two ants on a leaf arguing about whether humans exist or not, to borrow an image from Sakya Pandita.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

jnanasutra said:

Provocations do not just govern humans, they also govern strange diseases like SARS, HIV, MERS, etc., all of these things are governed by nonhuman beings such as mamos, tsen, nāgas, gyalpos, etc.

Where is the proof? I would like to hear arguments other than "my lama said so" and "such-and-such buddhist text says so"...these are too self-referential.

Malcolm wrote:

One either accepts the authority of texts and persons or not. It's up to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, even secular institutions have their nonhuman protectors, whether they recognize them or not.

dzogchungpa said:

May I ask how you know this?

Malcolm wrote:

There are non-human beings — you can call them elementals or bhūtas — everywhere. Some are harmful, some are not, but all are possessive. They don't just inhabit churches, mosques, synagogues and temples. They inhabit houses, etc. They are also not unintelligent, they know where they are and why they are there — being formless, they have seven times more clarity than embodied beings in the desire realm possess in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 8:56 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

lostitude said:

Besides, the way animals are sacrificed and the method used in Islam were described by Muhammad himself, and in his time it was by far the most merciful and painless way to kill.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan nomads certainly would not agree. They think suffocation is kinder.

Still, from the point of view of Buddhadharma, killing of any kind is a nonvirtuous act, and is motivated by either the poisons of desire, hatred or ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Water Bowl Offerings

Content:

Terma said:

How do you guys dispose of your water bowl offerings? I have no house plants to nourish with water, so what should I do? Pour it on the lawn outside?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Earth Termas - real objects?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chogyal Namkhai Norbu also witnessed earth treasure being revealed by his uncle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 8:51 PM

Title: Re: The courage of no convictions

Content:

Dan74 said:

Often a poster with strong convictions and the stamina to argue them come what may earns kudos, while putting forward something other than a firm position is seen as being a fence-sitter, PC, wishy-washy and weak. I want to argue a position of no position, as a good position to have quite often.

...

What do you think?

/

Malcolm wrote:

When one is a doctor, one has to diagnose illness. Illnesses come complete with symptoms. When you understand the cause of a disease, you can eliminate it. This approach has nothing to do with "taking positions." Making excuses for the symptoms or the cause merely leads to more illnesses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 6:10 AM

Title: Re: Helen Tworkov, Tricycle Magazine: Anti-Vajrayana Bias?

Content:

DGA said:

I recall reading some time back that there was a sense among some that Tricycle Magazine, back when it still mattered, had an anti-Vajrayana, pro-Zen bias to it. Further, this reflected the shift of the editor, Helen Tworok, from a disciple of Trungpa to a Zen practitioner.

Wherever I read this has been sucked away into the ether.

Anyway, can anyone corroborate this idea? It's useful to have these things available to a google search for future reference.

Malcolm wrote:

It was more of an Anti Trungpa Bias.

Anyway, like most Buddhist controversies, it was a tempest in a teapot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 5:57 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

I think we agree on the major points.

That the Abrahamic traditions aren't dharma paths, no matter how contemplative and mystical they might be.

That gyalpo provocations are real and have causes and solutions as indicated in the tradition.

Red pill me though on why the Abrahamic god actually exists? In that case I would probably interpret many things differently...

Malcolm wrote:

Religions do not form without cause. As far as I am concerned the actual "god" of the OT, NT and Koran is a rgyal po, more than one. rGyal pos delight on conflict and causing people to break samaya.

And it seems to me that whatever adaptations of Greek Philosophy and so on Christians, Jews and Muslims may have made, again and again all three religions traditions become involved in paranoia, dominance and political power [the Jews, post Temple, much less so because of their long history of persecution, but these days, Israel?]. For this reason I personally think that backbone of these traditions is sustained by a rgyal po/rgyal pos, and it can be more than one.

You kept asking the question, are all these people rgyal po worshippers — of course not. I never said they were. If your philosophical definition of the divine is drawn from Aristotle or Plotinus, of course not.

But it does not mean that you are not in the company of people whose concept of god feeds right into and feeds the egos of this kind of dregs pa.

There can be many kinds of gdon associated with a religion. There gdon associated with the US Government, dkor bdags [owners of donations, literally] and so on.

One reason why it is so hard for people to get off of the dole is that when one gets into debt with the government or the banks, and so on, the influence of the dkor bdags who rule your debt, Gvt. property and so on, keep you poor until you get free of the debt by paying it off.

Some people never get free, and this kind of provocation can be passed on in families for generations. This is why it best not to carry much debt. And if you have debt you cannot pay, it is better to declare bankruptcy.

I am sure some of you reading this think I am insane, thinking "What? Spirits who have an interest in Bank and Welfar debt? What a crazy idea!" In reality, even secular institutions have their nonhuman protectors, whether they recognize them or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 22nd, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

But I have my own experience. People who have a vision of their deity as being wrathful and punishing and angry, well, they tend to have issues. They tend to dislike a lot of people. People who have a vision of their deity as an embodiment of love, are, well, generally loving people.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know, I have met some really angry Tara and Chenrezi practitioners, and conversely, I have met some Drollo practitioners who are as loving and gentle as can be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 10:28 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm not a Jungian by any stretch of the imagination. Jungians have certainly mucked up people's interpretation of Tibetan Buddhism. However, I do think his general trend in seeing theological constructs as reflections of the individual psyche as pretty reasonable.

Jung

Malcolm wrote:

I have never had any use for this quack.

You will not be surprised to learn I have zero use for Psychology in general. It is a complete psuedo-science, at least, the Freudian, Jungian and streams stemming from them are. They are more like literary fantasy than anything else, as far as I can tell.

YMMV

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

So while I totally believe in gyalpo uprisings as I've witnessed some weird stuff first hand, I have always thought it pointless, as a Buddhist, to fuss too much about theistic systems given that deity is a projection.

Malcolm wrote:

Or, a deceiving entity like Brahma in the Kevaddha sutta that I referenced. I think the latter is more likely than the former.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Jung

Malcolm wrote:

I have never had any use for this quack.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Caodemarte said:

...metaphor (including "ground of being," "existence") since finite beings are incapable of understanding infinite being.

Malcolm wrote:

Being is being. Finite or not, it is an extreme.

Karma Dorje said:

And yet, when we look at Kabbalah in any depth, "being" only reaches as far as Kether, with the three veils of ain, ain soph and ain soph aur serving as greater and greater scope of understanding of the non-arising of being.

Buddhist dharma is undoubtedly more explicit about emptiness and has a much larger collection of methods to demonstrate it, but it is not really true that it is the only place we find this understanding.

In any case, it is enough to say that Buddhadharma accomplishes what it sets out to do.

Malcolm wrote:

This kabbalistic doctrine is an attempt to provide an alternate explanation to Christian ex-nihilo creationism. It is in no sense an exercise in exploring the non-arising of being. In fact, ein, according to the Zohar, here just means that God is too subtle to describe, whereas ein soph is God prior to his self-manifestation. This resembles nothing at all in Buddhadharma, and is wholly predicated on Plotinus's emanationism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That is, unless you somehow believe [against all evidence, archaeological and otherwise] that Tibet was empty of humans until it was "discovered" by China.

Indrajala said:

No, I'm just saying a self-identifying Tibetan nation doesn't seem to exist until at least the sixth century. People lived there, but whether they thought of themselves as having a common identity and being a unique nation, is questionable.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, the core Tibetan identity is based on the four clans [rus bzhi]. These four clans rallied around a single dynastic family, from approximately the late 2nd century BCE. It is not clear when Tibetans began to call themselves Tibetans, but it was not early. This dynastic family in turn were vassals of the Zhang Zhung kings until the 7th century, when Srongtsam Gampo had their ruler, Ligmincha, assassinated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 9:33 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I thought, likewise, the teaching on 'the emptiness of emptiness', was that emptiness teachings are themselves only expedient means, and a remedy for clinging to things that 'the worldly take to be important'.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no, not according to Madhyamaka and Yogacara. According to Madhyamaka, the emptiness of emptiness is, strictly speaking, the emptiness of the emptiness of phenomena, meant to counter clinging to the idea that emptiness is itself an entity.

According to Yogacara, however, it is somewhat more complicated. But it is not as you have summarized it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Caodemarte said:

...metaphor (including "ground of being," "existence") since finite beings are incapable of understanding infinite being.

Malcolm wrote:

Being is being. Finite or not, it is an extreme.

Caodemarte said:

My larger point here is that before we all, including me, criticize the simplistic beliefs of others we first check to see if the problem is that we have a simplistic understanding of those beliefs. We often assume that we understand when we don't. I think we all agree that a good Buddhist POV would be to always check your assumptions.

Malcolm wrote:

All samsaric vehicles are either eternalist or annihilationist. There really is no third alternative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 2:37 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Caodemarte said:

"We can have a thread about texts, and doctrine, and how it can be variously interpreted." This applies to other religions is only if you know what texts, and doctrine, and how it has been and is variously interpreted. This requires some study of reputable sources.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure.

Caodemarte said:

Assuming that Abrahamic religions, for example, believe there is magical being living in the sky (as the Pope recently criticized the naive view of Christianity among Christians) demonstrates that one has not made that effort.

Malcolm wrote:

Obviously there are many people who subscribe to this belief, if the Pope had to criticize it. So how have the Catholic Theologians defined God then?

Caodemarte said:

The one absolutely and infinitely perfect spirit who is the Creator of all. In the definition of the First Vatican Council, fifteen internal attributes of God are affirmed, besides his role as Creator of the universe: "The holy, Catholic, apostolic Roman Church believes and professes that there is one true, living God, the Creator and Lord of heaven and earth. He is almighty, eternal, beyond measure, incomprehensible, and infinite in intellect, will and in every perfection. Since He is one unique spiritual substance, entirely simple and unchangeable, He must be declared really and essentially distinct from the world, perfectly happy in Himself and by his very nature, and inexpressibly exalted over all things that exist or can be conceived other than Himself" (Denzinger 3001).

Reflecting on the nature of God, theology has variously identified what may be called his metaphysical essence, i.e., what is God. It is commonly said to be his self-subsistence. God is Being Itself. In God essence and existence coincide. He is the Being who cannot not exist. God alone must be. All other beings exist only because of the will of God.

Malcolm wrote:

There are fifteen problems with this definition. So this is the definition of God, it is a nice tidy philosopher's definition and just as sterile. It is also perfectly Aristotelian in nature [as are similar Islamic definitions]:

[Et vita autem] And life also belongs to God; for the actuality of thought is life, and God is that actuality; and God's self-dependent actuality is life most good and eternal. We say therefore that God is a living being, eternal, most good, so that life and duration continuous and eternal belong to God; for this is God.

Yes, the doctrine of the Rapture is a Scottish innovation.

Theologians like Tillich were pretty clear that God existed, this is why he uses the term "ground of being" to describe God. A term, sadly, that has been misappropriated by some translators of Dzogchen texts [without any reasoned basis at all].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Kabbalah has doctrines specifically about the inability of the thinking human mind to comprehend ain-soph, no-thingness.

The difference is, it has this weird theistic underpinning that seems to butt up against that, and it also believes in something from nothing. In other ways though, it's surprisingly non-theistic. Same with some of the Sufi literature I have read.

Malcolm wrote:

It might surprise you to learn that I have read quite a bit in Kabbala. But in the end, it is more neo-platonist than anything else.

Johnny Dangerous said:

There are a lot of shades of even 'exoteric monotheism' that aren't bible-thumpers or Jihadis, and seem quite reasonable, including in their ability to acknowledge these sorts of experiences. Granted, their acknowledgement wouldn't square with our view..but that is precisely the "tolerance" part, we don't need our views to agree with others to respect them.

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of Christians are "cultural" Christians. They don't believe Jesus is going to save them, they don't believe in heaven. In many respects they are like "Secular" Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Since by definition, outside Dharma, there are no transcendent religions, I think the world is a place where there are a lot of deep forces of a nonhuman variety shaping human actions on many levels. This is pretty standard point of view for a Tibetan Dharma Practitioner.

I don't think this is the part anyone was objecting to. For my part, I share some of these beliefs, and think that some practitioners of monotheism are engaging in something that will, and does lead to something bad, and are spurred on by some conflict-gobbling big ugly. That said, I know plenty of other practitioners of those faiths who are very far from being in that category, despite sharing a common religion, who I do not think are engaged in anything like this at all. Additionally, when one looks at different parts of these religions, one does find practitioners who seem to be doing something meritorious. Maybe you could say they are practicing well in spite of the religion, but even so, they are.

Worldly, yeah, probably, but plenty not worthy of condemnation in the least. To me, that is tolerance..viewing them all with suspicion is not.

Malcolm wrote:

I never condemned anyone, though there was some pretty hysterical assertions that I was. Of course, I wasn't so, damn the torpedoes and full speed ahead.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

When you disagree with someone and it matters--I disagree with Boko Haram, for example--then address one's criticisms to the harmful actions, and leave the business of reflecting on the doctrinal basis for Boko Haram's (or ISIS's, or the Klan's, or whomever else's) horrible deeds to those who hold those views.

Malcolm wrote:

ISIS, Boko Haram, definitely under the influence of a provocation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

If you were making some other point than a general demonization of monotheists, it was lost on me. Can you explain what you actually meant?

Malcolm wrote:

Specifically, I was talking about animal sacrifice and its negative consequences.

Secondly, I voiced my opinion that the Abrahamic God bears the attributes of what we would call in Tibetan Buddhism, a rgyal po, keeping in mind that in reality such entities are in fact formless pretas.

It is very clear in the OT and the Koran that this god demands blood sacrifices. So they are offered up.

We generally accept that the pantheon of Hindu devas are real, albeit worldly entities. For example, Shiva, often portrayed as a transcendent deva in Hindu sources, is a worldly protector in Buddhist sources.

I take Orishas seriously because I have relatives from Haiti, and their experience with Voudou practitioners, and because of my experience with the Sangoma I mentioned and my experienced in SA in general.

I take Japanese Kami seriously, because I have been in Japan.

I take the whole range of provocation illness [gdon nad] quite seriously because I work in Tibetan Medicine. Not only that, one of my main gurus was the chief exorcist/weather controller for the Tibetan Gvt.

So, I don't think that religions form around nonentities, apart from the Flying Spaghetti Monster:

Since by definition, outside Dharma, there are no transcendent religions, I think the world is a place where there are a lot of deep forces of a nonhuman variety shaping human actions on many levels. This is pretty standard point of view for a Tibetan Dharma Practitioner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I would hope so, but apparently the answer is no, we cannot tolerate other religions and must view their practitioners in an exclusively negative light, even when we do not actually have a grasp of their full range of practices.. if i'm reading the discussion right from some quarters.

Malcolm wrote:

You are reading someone's gloss of my position. That is not my position. But people keep insisting it is so...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 12:43 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, I now have a very good reason why the Chinese did not know anything about Tibetans prior to the Tang.

Indrajala said:

Or there were no self-identifying Tibetans in the Han dynasty.

I think you need to reevaluate your wishful ideas.

Malcolm wrote:

There were clans of people who spoke Tibetan dialects, who later adopted the name "Bod pa." These people referred to themselves as the The dMu,gDong, sGra, etc., different clans, but they were all related by a common culture, language, religion and fealty to Zhang Zhung, with however their own king.

That is, unless you somehow believe [against all evidence, archaeological and otherwise] that Tibet was empty of humans until it was "discovered" by China.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Indrajala said:

[

There is also the fact that we live in age where materialist conventions are the norm and you must operate within that paradigm to be taken seriously.

Malcolm wrote:

What, to get a job? Maybe, maybe not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 21st, 2015 at 12:27 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ergo, whether you intend it to be or not, your methodology is rooted in the western tradition of logical positivism, it is therefore materialist, even if you are not in terms of your personal beliefs a materialist or a physicalist.

Indrajala said:

I accept that western materialism as a methodology produces valid knowledge. It has its flaws and limits, but it works quite well when attempting to explain the conventional world which we experience. It won't explain or account for most immaterial causal factors, but as a tool it does a good job in specific areas of investigation.

That being said, you don't use a screwdriver where you need a hammer. I'm quite comfortable with using different intellectual tools to address different issues.

There is also the fact that we live in age where materialist conventions are the norm and you must operate within that paradigm to be taken seriously. If I was writing in medieval India or China it would be different, but this is the early 21st century in the Anglosphere. It is much the same when you used the term "evidence-based" approach to Buddhist studies, or any historical inquiry. How wide or narrow is the evidence? This is where bias comes in, yours, mine, everyone's.

Sure, but I operate within the norms of the secular academy when working from an academic context. I have to use certain intellectual tools which are calibrated according to prevailing conventions and expectations. I personally tend to work from a perspective of philology, which you call myopic, and I am aware of its limitations which is why I try not to introduce too much speculation on my part. The outcome, hopefully, is a better perspective on historical realities and developments, which can answer some of the questions I proposed above.

There's also the fact I enjoy what I do and the way I do it. It propels me to read many texts in Chinese, Japanese and Sanskrit, which are transferable skills to non-academic endeavors.

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, I now have a very good reason why the Chinese did not know anything about Tibetans prior to the Tang.

Indrajala said:

Zhang Qian had been very lucky to escape twice from Xiongnu captivity, and he was not anxious to enter their territory again. On the basis of the bamboo and cloth he had seen in Bactria, he thought that there must be an alternate route to the west. If those southwestern Chinese goods had reached Bactria from India, there had to be a more direct route connecting India and China. He suggested to Wudi that he send expeditions to explore other ways to get to India that circumvented the Xiongnu. Wudi took his advice and did so, but without success. In order to get from Sichuan to India, the only possible land route was to cut through the mountainous regions of Yunnan, which was then outside the bounds of China. People living in that area saw no benefit to themselves from any encroachment of Han trade routes into their territory. They resisted or killed any intruders. As a result, dangerous though it might be, the steppe route remained the most viable thoroughfare to Central Asia and parts further west.

Malcolm wrote:

Liu, Xinru (2010-06-10). The Silk Road in World History (New Oxford World History) (Kindle Locations 215-220). Oxford University Press. Kindle Edition.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

My apologies then.

I don't know you so it's not clear whether this is a "discussion" or a "lesson".

Malcolm wrote:

People are free to believe what they want. I have my specific point of view. It does not mean other people are wrong. They have their point of view also. It is possible for two people to have a disagreement over the same set of facts, and for both people to be right — at least that is my experience. Points of view are relative, and they change. It's a conversation. But there are some, like our invertebrate friend, who invoke academic exceptionalism when it comes to discussing Western Religions on any level.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

If you look just at texts, I'd agree with you. The Abrahamic texts are pretty grotesque for the most part. My only point of departure is that there is an extra-textual aspect to all religion, and as Tibetan Buddhists we should be pretty aware of that as our texts are grotesque separated from the living tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, the anuttarayoga tantras can be seen as pretty gross and repellent. This is why they are supposed to be secret. But we don't do a very good job of that as a tradition, for example, Buddhadharma Quarterly this month has a picture of Vajrayogini on the cover drinking from a skull cup.

Urgyen Dorje said:

In this case you just make a choice to not examine the extra-textual dimensions of the Abrahamic tradition because your mind is made up on the texts. That's a very academic approach.

Malcolm wrote:

Texts inform people's choices. For example, do you really think Israel would be as intense about eliminating Palestinians from Israel if they did not have a convenient narrative derived from their textual tradition? I don't. Would there even be an Israel at all unless this narrative existed to inform European guilt about permitting the holocaust? I don't think so.

Much has been said about mystics. Mystics and mysticism can be perverse, look at Himmler, etc.

I am convinced, seriously, that human beings do not act negatively the way they do without nonhuman provocations, especially when it comes to large scale events like the holocaust, the cultural revolution, the 1918 Influenza epidemic and so on. Human beings are basically decent, over all. But they can be twisted pretty easily.

Provocations do not just govern humans, they also govern strange diseases like SARS, HIV, MERS, etc., all of these things are governed by nonhuman beings such as mamos, tsen, nāgas, gyalpos, etc.

Urgyen Dorje said:

That said. I don't believe you one bit. I've seen you assert your version of Buddhist orthodoxy in many threads. If one disagrees one's view and practice is at fault. Period. You've not said it in such clear terms, but that's the implication.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so you are equipped with the hermeneutical manual you need to read my posts? You can read my hidden intent?

People are free to believe what they want. I have my specific point of view. It does not mean other people are wrong. They have their point of view also. It is possible for two people to have a disagreement over the same set of facts, and for both people to be right — at least that is my experience. Points of view are relative, and they change.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Why can't you accept the fact that there is a Christianity, Judaism, Islam, etc. that exists outside the texts?

Malcolm wrote:

When did I ever say there wasn't? I should have thought my story about my experience with Sangoma would have been enough to let you know that I make a distinction between people and whatever it is they think they believe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

What's frustrating to me is that this whole argument against the Abrahamic tradition was based on approaches to their texts which Buddhists struggle against with academics.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not my approach.

Urgyen Dorje said:

The straight up gloss was that Abrahamic practitioners were all gyalpo worshipers, and thus responsible for a whole spectrum of problems in the world because of gyalpo provocations and uprisings.

Malcolm wrote:

I think there is plenty of indications in the Old and New Testament and so on to indicate that the God of Abraham, Moses, Jesus and Mohammed is a mundane worldly entity, capricious, jealous, often homicidal, and definitely biased — whose whole relationship with his followers is based on a covenant predicated on the passover sacrifice.

Urgyen Dorje said:

It's an assertion that one is not a proper Buddhist unless one embraces a certain narrative about the Abrahamic tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, you are indulging in projections. I never once stated you were not a "proper" Buddhist if you did not agree with me. You can have any narrative you like about Abrahamic religions. Hell, you can go to Church, Synagogue or Mosque for all I care. You can go hang about with Tibetan Gyalpo worshippers, please be my guest. Do pujas with them. The hilarious thing is that most faithful and loyal followers of HHDL will sooner go to Muslim festival of sacrifice than spend on minute with the Gyalpo folks.

You just vehemently object to my point of view. That's ok. I don't post things in order to get people to agree with me.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Say anything good about members of the Abrahamic path, and one is embracing gyalpo worship and everything comes along with that.

Malcolm wrote:

More projection. I never made such a statement. But carry on with your hyperbole.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Only for those unwilling to investigate such things in the framework they belong to.

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty well acquainted with the framework

treehuggingoctopus said:

I beg to differ.

EOT for me.

Malcolm wrote:

You underestimate my education, and don't seem to be able to accept I don't subscribe to the idea that we can excuse some tale of genocide on the basis that we are not equipped with the proper "hermeneutical framework" to understand this. This at best cultural relativism.

The fact is that these books, the OT, are not read solely by academicians. They are read mostly by ordinary people. Unlike Islam, which has a sophisticated tradition of jurisprudence, there is no such tradition for the OT in the West. Yes, the Talmud is such a text, but that is not read by your average Christian. Your average Christian will read this and take it face value.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Whatever goodness or value there is in the world is the result of Buddha's activity.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think this point of view will go over very well with the Taliban.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

This reminded me of an old talk by the late patriarch of the (Korean) Jogye Order, Seongcheol Sunim where he says that to compare the teachings of Christianity to Buddhism is like throwing egg at a boulder but in practice here in Korea, it is the other way around, meaning that Christians do a great deal with their faith and Buddhists so little.

To extend his simile, one can easily fry the egg and feed people, but in order to carve a beautiful Buddha out of the boulder, a great deal of work and skill are required. In the absence of such, the boulder just sits there and takes space.

It just comes across as so much unnecessary hubris lambasting other religions, whatever for? The Dharma makes us no better than the best camera lens would make me a world-class photographer. It's what we do with it that matters.

/

Malcolm wrote:

The point of the topic is "tolerance for other religions" in the context of the issue of animal sacrifice. See the OP.

Dan74 said:

Come on, Malcolm, we've moved past that, haven't we?

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. Look, you are the mod. If you don't like the topic, you can close it, delete it, etc. It is up to you. I won't be offended.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Only for those unwilling to investigate such things in the framework they belong to.

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty well acquainted with the framework, I just don't make excuses for stories about "divinely-inspired" tribal genocide and try diffuse them by claiming that there is some hermeneutic needed with which we are not acquainted in order to understand such tales.

It is like claiming that there is some deeper meaning to Buddha's watching the Śākya being carried off into slavery. There is no deeper meaning — he watched his cousins being slaughtered and enslaved.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I have to red pill you on the fact that Christians don't necessarily embrace every aspect of their scriptures. I know plenty of Christians who have never even read the Old Testament. I know plenty of Christians who only work with the New Testament, and many who just work with the Synoptic gospels. There are plenty and don't even work with the source texts and work with catechisms and other extracanonical texts. Others don't even touch the textual tradition.

treehuggingoctopus said:

To even start analyzing such passages as the one Malcolm cited bona fide requires an extensive training in Biblical hermeneutics.

Malcolm wrote:

Not really. It is a pretty straight forward account of an exhortation to go butcher another tribe, and a subsequent rebuke for failing to follow orders precisely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

This reminded me of an old talk by the late patriarch of the (Korean) Jogye Order, Seongcheol Sunim where he says that to compare the teachings of Christianity to Buddhism is like throwing egg at a boulder but in practice here in Korea, it is the other way around, meaning that Christians do a great deal with their faith and Buddhists so little.

To extend his simile, one can easily fry the egg and feed people, but in order to carve a beautiful Buddha out of the boulder, a great deal of work and skill are required. In the absence of such, the boulder just sits there and takes space.

It just comes across as so much unnecessary hubris lambasting other religions, whatever for? The Dharma makes us no better than the best camera lens would make me a world-class photographer. It's what we do with it that matters.

/|

Malcolm wrote:

The point of the topic is "tolerance for other religions" in the context of the issue of animal sacrifice. See the OP.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:52 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

c) belongs to a body of totally different cultural, historical, linguistic and conceptual contexts than the ones which make up the framework of Buddhadharma. To interpret and judge a concept coming from such a far removed milieu in Buddhist terms is to miss the point totally. Apples to oranges.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just an excuse. A creator deity is a creator deity. You can gussy it up in all the Hellenistic Philosophy you want, but at the end of the day, what you have in the Abrahamic tradition is a Henotheism modified by monotheism from the Persians [elevating their rather blood thirsty, genocidal tribal deity into a supreme principle], and philosophy from the Greeks, with a dash of the mystery cults thrown in for good measure.

treehuggingoctopus said:

*Btw, you do realize that the majority of monotheist theologians would see both options you gave as totally unacceptable? Nor would they argue that God exists in the way that a table can be said to exist.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, all thanks to Plato. They have a great debt to Plato.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:46 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Buddhist textual tradition makes no mention of the Abrahamic traditions...

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, Kalacakra makes mention of the Abrahamic tradition, and the reference is not flattering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

MiphamFan said:

THO, Malcolm is just giving the Buddhist perspective. Sure the Abrahamics have all kinds of gradations among themselves, but none of them are supramundane from a Buddhist view.

If you have some kind of ecumenical PoV fine, but this is not supported by any Buddhist texts.

treehuggingoctopus said:

There is nothing in our scriptures that would establish it for a fact that what Abrahamics worship is an evil spirit.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not use the word evil, spirits, being mundane creatures, are nice to their followers and not so nice to their enemies, for example, 1 Samuel 15:

1 Samuel also said unto Saul, The LORD sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore hearken thou unto the voice of the words of the LORD.

2 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt.

3 Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass.

4 And Saul gathered the people together, and numbered them in Telaim, two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand men of Judah.

5 And Saul came to a city of Amalek, and laid wait in the valley.

6 And Saul said unto the Kenites, Go, depart, get you down from among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them: for ye shewed kindness to all the children of Israel, when they came up out of Egypt. So the Kenites departed from among the Amalekites.

7 And Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur, that is over against Egypt.

8 And he took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword.

9 But Saul and the people spared Agag, and the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them: but every thing that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly.

10 Then came the word of the LORD unto Samuel, saying,

11 It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandments. And it grieved Samuel; and he cried unto the LORD all night.

12 And when Samuel rose early to meet Saul in the morning, it was told Samuel, saying, Saul came to Carmel, and, behold, he set him up a place, and is gone about, and passed on, and gone down to Gilgal.

13 And Samuel came to Saul: and Saul said unto him, Blessed be thou of the LORD: I have performed the commandment of the LORD.

14 And Samuel said, What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?

15 And Saul said, They have brought them from the Amalekites: for the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the LORD thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed.

16 Then Samuel said unto Saul, Stay, and I will tell thee what the LORD hath said to me this night. And he said unto him, Say on.

17 And Samuel said, When thou wast little in thine own sight, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel, and the LORD anointed thee king over Israel?

18 And the LORD sent thee on a journey, and said, Go and utterly destroy the sinners the Amalekites, and fight against them until they be consumed.

19 Wherefore then didst thou not obey the voice of the LORD, but didst fly upon the spoil, and didst evil in the sight of the LORD?

20 And Saul said unto Samuel, Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the LORD, and have gone the way which the LORD sent me, and have brought Agag the king of Amalek, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites.

21 But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto the LORD thy God in Gilgal.

22 And Samuel said, Hath the LORD as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the LORD? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.

23 For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the LORD, he hath also rejected thee from being king.

24 And Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned: for I have transgressed the commandment of the LORD, and thy words: because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice.

25 Now therefore, I pray thee, pardon my sin, and turn again with me, that I may worship the LORD.

26 And Samuel said unto Saul, I will not return with thee: for thou hast rejected the word of the LORD, and the LORD hath rejected thee from being king over Israel.

27 And as Samuel turned about to go away, he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle, and it rent.

28 And Samuel said unto him, The LORD hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou.

29 And also the Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent: for he is not a man, that he should repent.

30 Then he said, I have sinned: yet honour me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel, and turn again with me, that I may worship the LORD thy God.

31 So Samuel turned again after Saul; and Saul worshipped the LORD.

32 Then said Samuel, Bring ye hither to me Agag the king of the Amalekites. And Agag came unto him delicately. And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past.

33 And Samuel said, As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the LORD in Gilgal.

34 Then Samuel went to Ramah; and Saul went up to his house to Gibeah of Saul.

35 And Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death: nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul: and the LORD repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.

So here we have a channeler [prophet], who shows up at Saul's door, and informs him that the LORD has told him to annihilate another tribe. Samuel castigates Saul for taking plunder, rather than following the scorched earth policy the LORD has ordained. Then Samuel, just to make a point, slays Agag, a duty in which Saul has failed. And apparently, the LORD regretted his decision to make Saul the king of the Israelites.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm going to drop a pro tip on ya here:

It's one thing to say that Buddhism is the only path that leads from samsara.... and asserting that the Abrahamic religions all worship a demon Gyalpo.

It's subtle. Just try to catch it if you can.

This back pedaling is BS. That Malcolm "just said that these were samsaric" is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

The God of Abraham, Moses, Jesus and Mohammed

a) Does not exist

b) Is a mundane entity [i.e. does not exist in the way the adherents of the Abrahamic religions imagine]

There is no third choice.

Given that Judaism, Islam and Christianity are a revealed religions, [through the angel Gabriel no less, in the case if Islam], I am inclined towards b.

In Buddhadharma, we have always been comfortable with the idea that a mundane entity deceives others into believe they are the creator of the universe and so. For example:

"So the monk approached the Great Brahma and, on arrival, said, 'Friend, where do these four great elements — the earth property, the liquid property, the fire property, and the wind property — cease without remainder?'

"When this was said, the Great Brahma said to the monk, 'I, monk, am Brahma, the Great Brahma, the Conqueror, the Unconquered, the All-Seeing, All-Powerful, the Sovereign Lord, the Maker, Creator, Chief, Appointer and Ruler, Father of All That Have Been and Shall Be.'

A second time, the monk said to the Great Brahma, 'Friend, I didn't ask you if you were Brahma, the Great Brahma, the Conqueror, the Unconquered, the All-Seeing, All-Powerful, the Sovereign Lord, the Maker, Creator, Chief, Appointer and Ruler, Father of All That Have Been and Shall Be. I asked you where these four great elements — the earth property, the liquid property, the fire property, and the wind property — cease without remainder.'

"A second time, the Great Brahma said to the monk, 'I, monk, am Brahma, the Great Brahma, the Conqueror, the Unconquered, the All-Seeing, All-Powerful, the Sovereign Lord, the Maker, Creator, Chief, Appointer and Ruler, Father of All That Have Been and Shall Be.'

"A third time, the monk said to the Great Brahma, 'Friend, I didn't ask you if you were Brahma, the Great Brahma, the Conqueror, the Unconquered, the All-Seeing, All-Powerful, the Sovereign Lord, the Maker, Creator, Chief, Appointer and Ruler, Father of All That Have Been and Shall Be. I asked you where these four great elements — the earth property, the liquid property, the fire property, and the wind property — cease without remainder.'

"Then the Great Brahma, taking the monk by the arm and leading him off to one side, said to him, 'These gods of the retinue of Brahma believe, "There is nothing that the Great Brahma does not know. There is nothing that the Great Brahma does not see. There is nothing of which the Great Brahma is unaware. There is nothing that the Great Brahma has not realized." That is why I did not say in their presence that I, too, don't know where the four great elements... cease without remainder. So you have acted wrongly, acted incorrectly, in bypassing the Blessed One in search of an answer to this question elsewhere. Go right back to the Blessed One and, on arrival, ask him this question. However he answers it, you should take it to heart.'

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.11.0.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:51 AM

Title: Re: 'What are you saying'?

Content:

Wayfarer said:

A Zen story about the importance of holy books.

The Zen master Mu-nan had only one successor. His name was Shoju. After Shoju had completed his study of Zen, Mu-nan called him into his room. "I am getting old," he said, "and as far as I know, Shoju, you are the only one who will carry on this teaching. Here is a book. It has been passed down from master to master for seven generations. I also have added many points according to my understanding. The book is very valuable, and I am giving it to you to represent your successorship."

"If the book is such an important thing, you had better keep it," Shoju replied. "I received your Zen without writing and am satisfied with it as it is."

"I know that," said Mu-nan. "Even so, this work has been carried from master to master for seven generations, so you may keep it as a symbol of having received the teaching. Here."

The two happened to be talking before a brazier. The instant Shoju felt the book in his hands he thrust it into the flaming coals. He had no lust for possessions.

Mu-nan, who never had been angry before, yelled: "What are you doing!"

Shoju shouted back: "What are you saying!"

Malcolm wrote:

What an idiot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:49 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I would venture to say yes..but I also don't think everyone who is a practicing Muslim has the same set of beliefs at all, so it is not possible to say what "Muslims" as a whole believe or are doing, and unless you are now omniscient, you don't know that either.

Malcolm wrote:

The five pillars of Islam are pretty universal for Muslims.

Johnny Dangerous said:

On the larger subject, it looks like you have backed yourself into a corner with your earlier words and now are getting defensive...

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't back myself into any corner at all. I stand by what I said earlier.

Johnny Dangerous said:

the fact that this is a Buddhist forum in no way gives you the right to determine the content or direction of a talk like this, nor to toss your accusations of 'non Buddhistness' out there simply because you are catching flack, IMO that's bad form.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, did I actually say that someone was being "Non-Buddhist"? No. Flack? This is nothing. Try E-Sangha, that was flack.

Johnny Dangerous said:

please let me know so I can vacate my membership.

Up to you, I respect and you and like having you around, but times like this you get quite defensive when being put on the spot about controversial positions and freak out when others don't agree.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not me on the spot. This is me enjoying a lively discussion.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Perhaps it's for YOU to examine you membership if that's the case, unless you think your status in the Tibetan Buddhist community should confer some special right of not being criticized.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh please — I am the single MOST CRITICIZED DHARMA PERSON ON THE WEB!!! This is nothing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

Palliative? Is virtue palliative? Are other paths entirely lacking in wisdom? I don't think it is me who is misunderstanding or propagating PC bullshit, rather it is you who once again is stuck defending an unnecessarily extreme position.

Malcolm wrote:

Virtue does not lead to liberation. Nor does compassion. So yes, without correct view, these things, even wisdom, are palliatives, not cures.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I agree with this, but I don't understand how it's relevant to the earlier statements about all Abrahamic practitioners being reducible to gyalpo worshipers. How did that shift? Even palliatives can be treated with some degree of respect, without needing to be confused with liberating paths.

Malcolm wrote:

Are there any Muslims here? Please stand up if you are Muslim.

The last I checked this was a board that was devoted to Buddhadharma and exploring issues in Buddhadharma. If this has changed, please let me know so I can vacate my membership.

I think Allah is a Gyalpo [translation: mundane, impermanent, formless samsaric entity], based on my understanding of how such entities are described in Dharma texts. Do you agree or do you disagree?

If you agree, why? If you disagree, why?

This is my point of view. It is really fine with me if you have a different point of view. But what I experience here is a lot of people trying to condition others into some really bland "everyone is groovy" perspective [unless of course, it concerns America, the Great Satan].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:34 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

Palliative? Is virtue palliative? Are other paths entirely lacking in wisdom? I don't think it is me who is misunderstanding or propagating PC bullshit, rather it is you who once again is stuck defending an unnecessarily extreme position.

Malcolm wrote:

Virtue does not lead to liberation. Nor does compassion. So yes, without correct view, these things, even wisdom, are palliatives, not cures.

Dan74 said:

They are not sufficient for liberation but they lead towards it rather than away from it.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily. This is why samsara is likened to a pot of boiling water. Bubbles reach the top, but as soon as they do, they are sucked down again into the roiling water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:33 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

And if we say that it is only palliative, does palliative not have value? Is it not likely to lead to better rebirths than paths lacking in virtue, the 'non-palliative' ones?

Malcolm wrote:

The practice of virtue leads to higher rebirths, indeed. But higher rebirths are still in samsara. When one's merit is exhausted in heaven, to hell one will inexorably fall.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:29 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

Palliative? Is virtue palliative? Are other paths entirely lacking in wisdom? I don't think it is me who is misunderstanding or propagating PC bullshit, rather it is you who once again is stuck defending an unnecessarily extreme position.

Malcolm wrote:

Virtue does not lead to liberation. Nor does compassion. So yes, without correct view, these things, even wisdom, are palliatives, not cures.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Nonsense. You were quite clear in indicating that the entire Abrahamic path amounted to gyalpo worship and that gyalpo worship was the cause of nothing but a spectrum of spiritual faults. If you had said what you just said days ago, none of us would be calling you out.

Malcolm wrote:

Even my Sangoma friends can cultivate the four Brahmaviharas and the ten virtues, to a point [the killing thing is a bit of an issue], but their practice causes all kinds of problems for themselves and for others.

And it is true that, in my opinion, the massive amounts of yearly ritual slaughter in Islam causes very big problems for Islamic regions and indeed for the rest of the world. The fact that there is a tiny minority of dissenting vegetarian Muslims amounts to very little in the face of the 3.5 billion spent on animals in Pakistan last year, for example, for the festival of sacrifice.

And the entire Abrahamic path is worldly, samsaric, not conducive to liberation. Even Buddha would have said so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

I was saying nothing of the sort. I was asking how you can be sure that a person's nonBuddhist practice is not aiding liberation and how can you know that another person's Buddhist practice is. How can you really know what is best for one, given their karma, let alone what's actually going them good and what is a waste of their human birth?

Maybe better expressed by HH the Dalai Lama:

Dalai Lama: I always say that people should not rush to change religions. There is real value in finding the spiritual resources you need in your home religion. Even secular humanism has great spiritual resources; it is almost like a religion to me. All religions try to benefit people, with the same basic message of the need for love and compassion, for justice and honesty, for contentment. So merely changing formal religious affiliations will often not help much.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, as I said, you really do not understand what he is saying here. He is not talking about the liberative value of this and that path, he is talking about the palliative value of this and that path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:21 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

This is what I have been calling you out on, as I know plenty of Buddhists who have turned their pressure human births and their streams of blessings into a cause to become miserable human beings, and I know plenty of these gyalpo worshippers who are outstanding people.

Malcolm wrote:

Still, the former have precious human births, and the rest do not. You know, it is part of the teaching on the eight freedoms and ten endowments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:16 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Sectarianism is one of the reasons I had stopped posting at this forum.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess you don't like very much what the Buddha said, repeated in many suttas:

"In whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, there is not found the Noble Eightfold Path, neither is there found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, or fourth degree of saintliness. But in whatsoever Dhamma and Discipline there is found the Noble Eightfold Path, there is found a true ascetic of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness.[54] Now in this Dhamma and Discipline, Subhadda, is found the Noble Eightfold Path; and in it alone are also found true ascetics of the first, second, third, and fourth degrees of saintliness. Devoid of true ascetics are the systems of other teachers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:11 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Don't back pedal. You've made it very clear that practitioners in the Abrahamic tradition, as a whole, are... incapable of cultivating spiritual qualities.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said this, this is really your projection.

Anyone can cultivate the ten virtues. This is why it, along with the four bhramaviharas, is called the vehicle of devas and humans. But this is still a worldly path, not a transcendent one. Though honestly, these are not really spiritual qualities [what are those BTW?}, just basic human decency.

Everyone is capable of that, even American Imperialists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

HH the Dalai Lama was saying the same thing, IMO, when he discouraged people from changing religions.

Malcolm wrote:

You don't understand why HHDL was discouraging people from changing religions. It is not because he thinks that being a Christian is a liberative path. It is because Buddhadharma is non-evangelical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:09 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Dan74 said:

It just sounds like you didn't understand what I was saying, Malcolm. There was nothing PC about it.

Malcolm wrote:

I understood perfectly well. Being born in a country where there is no Buddhadharma, or being born without interest in Buddhadharma means that one does not have a precious human birth. Such people are objects of compassion because who knows when they will be free from samsara.

But don't try and snow me with this idea that their karma requires them to be born outside of Buddhadharma in order that they be liberated. This is really nonsensical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 9:04 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

and come up with that they are gyalpo worshippers and have no qualities.

Malcolm wrote:

I never said that, this is your projection. Everyone has the same state. Even the most pathetic hell being has the same qualities as Samantabhadra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:59 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The late Brother Wayne Teasdale once warned a friend of mine, a nephew of Thomas Keating, that I was not a spiritual person. I am quite sure he was right, I don't have much use for spirituality.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wayne_Teasdale

Wayfarer said:

I think a broad distinction can be drawn between 'exclusive' and 'inclusive' attitudes towards this question. And I think it's especially important in the context of the 'global village' that we now inhabit that we understand it accordingly.

I have sympathy with the idea of 'perennial philosophy' - that there is a broad current or stream of wisdom which finds expression in different traditions and different times and places throughout history. But I have noticed that this view gets pretty short shrift on Dharma Wheel. That's fair enough, it is a forum that is dedicated to Buddhist dharma, and it's certainly not a place to proselytize other religions (as it says in the ToS). On the other hand the kind of attitude, that there is only one 'true way', or even that there is only one type of view within Buddhism itself, which is the 'one true way', , and the deprecation of other faiths, is a mirror-image of what you would read on a Christian forum about Buddhism. 'Our way is better than their's', is what they would be saying there. And so on.

I went to a Catholic funeral for a respected family friend who was a devout Catholic some years back. I find that through my Buddhist practice I actually have a much better and more sympathetic insight for the spiritual meaning of the Catholic liturgy and ritual and I also sympathize with a good many Catholic writers and teachers. I don't feel I need to join up; I don't think that 'converting' to their religion is necessary. But I can feel the spirituality of that faith and admire it, without having to either embrace it or push it away.

None of that rationalises animal sacrifice, by the way. I think that ought to be opposed on all counts, but that doesn't apply to Christianity.

Actually I have been reading a bit of Thich Nath Hahn's 'Living Buddha Living Christ' and finding it very moving. I've been read a Franciscan monastic called Father Richard Rohr. I don't think he's worlds apart from the Buddhist attitude.

But the world is global village nowadays, we have to accept a plurality of views - it doesn't mean going along with every one of them, or agreeing with everyone, but I am not very fond of the 'my way or the highway' attitude either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:55 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is not to castigate people who follow those views, the point is to understand that those views exist and that they are not conducive to liberation.

Dan74 said:

How can we be sure that given that person's karma, them earnestly following their religion isn't in fact the best thing they could do in order to be liberated? How can we be sure that given another person's karma, the Dharma is not just going to be misinterpreted and they will not be led astray only to be reborn to practice the first person's religion until many lifetimes later they are ready to really practice the Dharma?

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, this is some PC bullshit, excuse me for being blunt.

Someone whose karma is to be born outside of Buddhadharmā, meaning that they will not meet it, does not have a precious human birth. It does not matter how nice they are, how kind they are, how compassionate they are, how spiritual they are — they do not have a precious human birth.

For them, there is no guarantee of where they will find themselves in the next world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

.

Nagasaki really was a civilian target. In fairness, it wasn't the first choice for the Fat Man bomb; the weather was too poor over Kokura that day. A worthy meditation...

<http://www.newyorker.com/tech/elements/nagasaki-the-last-bomb>

Malcolm wrote:

it is also nice to present all facts:

The day after Nagasaki, Truman issued his first affirmative command regarding the bomb: no more strikes without his express authorization. He never issued the order to drop the bombs, but he did issue the order to stop dropping them.

<http://www.newyorker.com/tech/elements/nagasaki-the-last-bomb>

Folly, yes. Terrorism as an official policy of the US Gvt.? No.

DGA said:

1. Malcolm's position is that the deities propitiated by practitioners of Islam, Santeria, some traditional African and Indian religions, &c are worldly spirits: they are real, and classified as gyalpo.

Malcolm wrote:

Not necessarily gyalpos, can be klu bdud, such as one entity I encountered in South Africa through a young Sangoma couple I met there through my host [who posts here on Dharmawheel].

Really super lovely people, you would never meet any one sweeter.

But they worship this pretty bloody klu bdud entity, very ferocious. Did they kill some chickens in the course of our meeting. Yes. Did they feed those chickens to the river to satisfy this spirit? Yes. Did we try to create a positive connection with the Dharma for everyone there? Yes. Did we succeed? I hope so.

So do they, as Sangoma, regularly sacrifice cows, goats, etc.? Yes. It is all part of their tradition, it is how they do things there. It is, in my opinion, one of the things that makes Africa so screwed up. Not because the people are bad, evil and so on, but because the practice of sacrificing animals feeds very powerful worldly spirits through life force and intention, and those spirits are angry, jealous, competitive, etc.

To their credit, the Sangoma couple were super interested in learning Song of the Vajra. I think eventually they got a hold of a CD. I don't know anything more than that. I hope someday we have something like a Sounds of Soweto version — that would be awesome.

We were the first white people they ever met who took them seriously as people. They were completely thrilled to host us, and we took everything in stride. I really liked them. They are fantastic people.

A footnote, when it came time for them to sacrifice the chickens, the lead Sangoma, dressed in his finest, tried to show me respect by offering to have me kill the first chicken. I politely refused, saying, this is not part of my tradition. He did not mind, and dispatched those chickens efficiently, tossing them into the river. They were a little sad we could not hang around and cook them and eat them, that is why they tossed the chickens in the river. Some people might say, "How horrible! How come you did not try to save the chickens?" Those chickens were destined to die, if not that day, the next, or the next. Nothing we could do would have saved them.

So you folks have the wrong idea about my point of view. I have seen first hand experience with these kinds of traditions. I don't judge the people who engage in them, I judge the practices themselves.

For example, when I first met ChNN in 1992, he was making fun of people who want to become Shamans, because in reality, to become a Real Shaman™, you have to sacrifice some animals as part of the initiation [in this case, three sheep], based on his experience in Mongolia, visiting Real Shaman™. He was pointing out that if you want to become a shaman, this is what you have to do, and that this contradicted the principles of Dzogchen teachings.

DGA said:

He sees hypocrisy in those Buddhists who denounce gyalpo worship among some other Buddhists, but tend not to do so with regard to those who are, from his perspective, gyalpo worshippers--Muslims particularly but not exclusively.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are going to criticize Shugden people for the reasons HH Dalai Lama gives, you should be consistent and extend that criticism universally. You should not castigate them for mistaking a worldly entity for a Buddha, but in the next breath, defend worldly religions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

This is something my own Tibetan Buddhist teachers have articulated as well. While they would not suggest that Abrahamic practitioners were on dharma paths, they have also said not to disparage them. As one of my teachers said, and this is a quote, "some of them are on a path close to yours, closer than you know." This may sound strange, but the term for "buddhist", nangpa, simply means "insider", one directed towards inner process, inner spirituality, as opposed to outer forms-- such as worshipping gods and the like. We're not the only one's turned inwards. We may not be turned to the same place, and thus not all on dharma paths, but others are turned inwards as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Pointing out that the deities of other religions are samsaric is not disparaging them. It is stating simply that those paths do not lead to nirvana [cessation of afflictions]. They have a different goal in mind, if they even have a goal [there are plenty of religious expressions, such as Purva Mimamsa, that do not even believe in the concept of liberation, mukti.]

People who are not fortunate, those who have not met the teachings, are objects of compassion. This does not prevent us, however, from analyzing and understanding their mistakes and how the views they espouse shroud them in darkness.

For example, the Rig pa rang shar tantra runs through 60 incorrect views. The Brahmajala sutta runs through a different set of 62 incorrect views.

The point is not to castigate people who follow those views, the point is to understand that those views exist and that they are not conducive to liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

Thanks for the clarifications of your points. It's not clear what people's intentions are sometimes in the "fog of the internet forum", especially when people are debating multiple points asynchronously.

Points where I agree with you...

I would agree that there is much about the Abrahamic religions that would lead to the provocation of gyalpos, such as the murder of Christ and Ali ibn Abi Talib and various martyred saints. I would agree that these gyalpo uprisings lead to any number of problems for these cultural areas over time. History seems to illustrate that. And seeing ChNNR as one of my own teachers, though by webcast only, I respect thoughts on relating gyalpo uprisings to problems in the middle east. I would agree that it is problematic that we're not engaged in practices to pacify these influences. I would also agree that any number of practices in the Abrahamic traditions would lead to various disturbances, such as animal sacrifices. I would agree that these are scourges to our world and that there is no way Buddhists should engage in them, encourage them, or defend them. And I would agree that none of these Abrahamic religions are dharma paths, and should not be defended as such as by Buddhists.

Points where I disagree with you...

While I would disagree that none of these Abrahamic religions are dharma paths, I do not accept that they are necessarily "worldly religions". As I have been taught uniformly by my teachers, the non-Buddhist paths include "non-worldly" and "worldly" paths. The "worldly paths" are those that are not based on love and compassion for beings, which rationalize harming beings as virtue, and which rejoice in negative qualities. I would assert that the Abrahamic religions have produced both worldly and non-worldly non-dharma paths. Note: I am not sure that you and I are using the terms "worldly" and "non-worldly" the same way. You seem to use it in the context of any path that is non-Buddhist. For a lack of other terms, I am following my teachers (or their translators rather) and using the terms as I have indicated here.

I would disagree that we can make broad generalizations about the theology and worldview of the Abrahamic traditions. Given the geographical and historical context of the Abrahamic religions, there are too many spiritual and intellectual influences, too many local ideosyncratic expressions, and too many radical changes in theory and practice to summarize them as you have. I would agree that there are people in the Abrahamic tradition who are certainly propitiating a gyalpo as they slit animals throats or kill and/or mutilate people. I disagree that can be generalized. Several examples such as Kabbalah, Druze, Sufism, etc. can be made, and while we can argue that these traditions actually have their roots in Buddhism or Neoplatonism-- these people certainly identify as being part of the Abrahamic tradition. There are people who embrace a "theology" that is hardly theological at all. In those cases deity is more an ethical impulse than something of a master or lord.

So...

To reiterate my own position... I don't consider people who embrace a "worldly path" (as I've defined above) as practitioners of any religion. So when I "defend Islam" what I'm defending are people who are on a non-worldly path. I defend and support anyone on a non-worldly path. I don't think there's anything in the dharma that prohibits associating with and supporting people on positive non-worldly non-Buddhist paths-- though there are certainly prohibitions against associating with and supporting those who follow worldly paths.

I guess the question is how do you know? That is the question, and I don't think it's answered by gross generalizations, but by experience. We know by people's qualities and actions. It's madness to me to attempt to equate the spirituality of a snake handling church pastor in the Appalachians with Julian of Norwich, just as it is to equate a Talibani ordering a woman stoned with Ra'abia.

Yes. That narrows the pool down. But I'd much rather associate with Christian contemplatives and Sufis who have really amazing qualities that really unkind and self-absorbed Buddhists and similarly narcissistic materialists.

Malcolm wrote:
It is very simple.

There are basically two paths: samsaric and nirvanic.

Samsaric paths have a number different kinds of paths: eternalist, annihilationist, incorrect conduct [like impaling yourself with weapons], wrong paths and so on.

Nirvanic paths refer to the nine yānas beginning with the śravakayāna.

When I say worldly, I mean samsaric.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 4:09 AM
Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Thanks Malcolm, but I can parse my own posts. I did not label the US government a "terrorist organization". I said it has committed terrorist acts with examples which satisfy the commonly accepted definition of terrorism:

Violent acts (or the threat of violent acts) intended to create fear (terror), perpetrated for an economic, religious, political, or ideological goal, and which deliberately target or disregard the safety of non-combatants (e.g., neutral military personnel or civilians).

Malcolm wrote:

Then the US Government military actions in general do not correspond with this. The whole point of US Military policy since Vietnam has been to avoid as much as possible harming noncombatants. Successfully? No. But US Military has very strict rules of engagement, and the consequences of breaking them as landed many soldiers in jail for murder.

Are those rules always effective? Hell no, just look at that video of those poor journalists who were shot in Iraq, the video that landed Manning in jail. Do people get hurt unnecessarily in war? Always. War is hell and should always be avoided. But that is not the world we are living in.

As for Dresden, it was a legitimate target. The Dresden bombing as to serve two main purposes: to eliminate the very many factories in that city supporting the German war effort, including a chemical weapons plant, and to show the Russians the full power of the Allied forces.

The problem with Dresden is that they bombed the city center, rather than the suburbs [more than half of the bombers sent bombed other cities by mistake, including Prague], where most of the targeted factories were located. A journalist labelled it a terror bombing, and then the political spin began...

A tragedy, yes, a deliberate act of terror on the part of the Allies? No.

Hiroshima and Nagasaki, again tragic, but not terrorism. Folly, yes. Terrorism, no.

Karma Dorje said:

It's not hyperbolic to those of us who weren't indoctrinated by American exceptionalism from kindergarten on up. It's simply factual.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

I am not someone who is convinced of the exceptionalism of any nation, including Tibet. But hyperbole is hyperbole and it is easily recognized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I said Muslim terrorists are small-time compared to professionals like American imperialists...

Malcolm wrote:

Say what you like about Americans, but we are not terrorists.

We do not [presently] use terror on civilian populations as a matter of course or policy.

Our military forces may be large and clumsy, our military policies often idiotic and short sighted, our military methods reprehensible [drones, cluster bombs, etc.], but we are not terrorists. We do not deliberately target civilians in order to instill fear.

DGA said:

OK, couple of points here.

The KKK is/was a terrorist organization. So was Posse Comitatus. So were the thugs who killed Mulugeta Seraw on the streets of my hometown: "East Side White Pride." There's a longstanding tradition of terrorism in the US--terrorism specifically against blacks and Native Americans, but not exclusively. Lynchings are terrorist acts, and were at one time a regular spectacle across much of the country (and not only in the South...). So while it's true that the federal government does not endorse or mobilize terrorism against any US population, it's still in the repertoire, so to speak. And that's not even counting terrorists of the Tim McVeigh variety.

Some Americans now are sympathetic to acts of terror against other Americans. You can take my word for it, or you can go spend a minute at Stormfront, if you can last that long before puking on your machine. Some Americans act on those sympathies and impulses. I present Dylann Roof, terrorist, as an example here.

I don't bring this up because I'm ashamed of American history or culture. I really like living here; there's a lot to love about the United States. There's also a lot to be repelled by and to seek to change and heal. That's the side I prefer to take. But to do that, it's important to face the ugly truth and to view the present moment with a gimlet eye from time to time. Jameson was right: "history is what hurts" it's another word for "samsara"

Malcolm wrote:

Of course there are right wing terrorists in the US, there are also left wing terrorists, and so on.

But what does that have to do with labeling the US Gvt. a terrorist organization? It is nothing of the kind. Geoff labeled the US Gvt. a terrorist organization. It is just political hyperbole and cannot be taken seriously.

Meanwhile, the world sits on its ass as another real terrorist organization sets its sights on Turkey.

Anyway, this thread has spun way off topic, from "Tolerance of other religions" to "Demonizing America as the Great Satan."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

PS KD is correct about Nagasaki and Dresden. There are other examples; the historian Howard Zinn, among others, have done fine work teasing them out, which makes them first-rate patriots in my book.

Malcolm wrote:

Howard Zinn is a great author. But he certainly does not engage in the kind of hyperbole that Geoff does.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I don't have the same Pavlovian reaction to the word "terrorist" that you have south of the 49th parallel. What else do you call the utter destruction of Dresden, Nagasaki and Hiroshima?

Malcolm wrote:

All war is hell. That does not make all war terrorism.

Karma Dorje said:

Or what was done to Vietnam during the war from the bombing of Hanoi to the tons of napalm and agent orange dumped on the civilian population?

Malcolm wrote:

Misguided, bad tactics, but no terrorism.

Karma Dorje said:

Or support for Israel's genocidal policy wrt the Palestinians with billions of dollars of military aid and Security Council vetos?

Malcolm wrote:

The Israelis and the Palestinians are involved in a mutual terror war. We support the Israeli's mainly out of guilt, as well as a very strong Jewish lobby.

Karma Dorje said:

How about the deaths of over 100,000 Iraqis in the past decade?

Malcolm wrote:

Terrible, but not a result of a policy of deliberate terrorism.

Karma Dorje said:

The constant drone attacks in Yemen and Pakistan...

Malcolm wrote:

Drone attacks on proven terrorists...again, probably not the best use of our resources...

Karma Dorje said:

...the list goes on and on. The number of violent deaths as a result of either direct US military action or their proxies dwarf those from so-called terrorism.

Malcolm wrote:

Terrorism has a larger effect because it is violence meant to provoke, well, terror. The US is not used to dealing with terrorists. Europeans are better at it than we are.

Karma Dorje said:

What on earth is "shock and awe" but the very definition of terrifying the population?

Malcolm wrote:

Shock and awe was aimed at the regime.

Karma Dorje said:

It's incomprehensible to me that you think it matters whether the label "terrorist" is applied.

Malcolm wrote:

It matters because intent matters.

Karma Dorje said:

The US has caused tremendous harm on a vast scale, not even counting the cruelty in food production. It's no wonder there is such widespread drought currently. These actions of theirs clearly cut the prosperity of the nation.

Malcolm wrote:

When you compare the US with the big three dictators we were talking about, in reality, the US is pretty minor, at least in the 20th century. From a secular POV, the second Gulf War happened largely because the presidency was hijacked by the same group of folks that presented a plan to Clinton in the late 1990's to invade Iraq [Wolfson, etc.].

Karma Dorje said:

However, when we speak of it at the level of a country it is hard for me to see it as anything but a venal and belligerent rogue nation that can't even provide a modicum of food, housing and healthcare to its most vulnerable citizens.

Malcolm wrote:

That very much depends on what state you live in. If you live in a red state, you are pretty much screwed. If you live in a blue state you will get by just fine. Anyway, yes, the US is the modern Rome, and like Rome, it is constantly being derided by its detractors. No doubt eventually the Visigoths will be at the gate, but who knows when and how.

Karma Dorje said:

That's why you will probably get...

Malcolm wrote:

There is zero chance that Trump will win.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: RuShi ?

Content:

heart said:

What I say might sound strange but only if you think it is such a fantastic thing to be a Dzogchen master. But, is it really such a fantastic thing? Very qualified disciples might prefer to attain a rainbow body rather than listen to students and others' endless doubts and problems.

Malcolm wrote:

Recently, ChNN said that being over focused on attaining rainbow body was a bit egoistic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

I said Muslim terrorists are small-time compared to professionals like American imperialists...

Malcolm wrote:

Say what you like about Americans, but we are not terrorists.

We do not [presently] use terror on civilian populations as a matter of course or policy.

Our military forces may be large and clumsy, our military policies often idiotic and short sighted, our military methods reprehensible [drones, cluster bombs, etc.], but we are not terrorists. We do not deliberately target civilians in order to instill fear.

I don't have the same aversion to my birth country that you do. I think Americans are mostly pretty good people. Our Gvt. on the other hand...that's why I am voting for...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...and unicorns appearing in the sky over Oslo caused gay marriage to be legalized in the U.S.A. Obviously.

It is not incumbent upon you to believe Chogyal Namkhai Norbu's assessment of the second Gulf war, but that is his assessment.

Karma Dorje said:

It's not a question of what I believe. It's a question of making unfalsifiable claims on a public forum that depend solely on your devotion to a guru. Whatever the instrumental cause of the Iraq War, the efficient cause was the greed and aggression of the American people. If the American people were not habituated to afflictive emotions, they could not be provoked. Provocation does not somehow imply that the responsibility for the actions lies with provoking entity. The responsibility lies with the agents of those actions.

Malcolm wrote:

Most Americans I know, such as myself, were against the second Gulf War from the beginning. From a more secular point of view, if the Bush family had not successfully suborned the Supreme Court into installing Bush, it never would have happened, 9/11 or not.

If the greed and aggression of the Iraqi Regime, and before it, the Kuwaiti oil thefts had not happened, there would have been no first Gulf War. If the Russians had not invaded Afghanistan, provoking Shiite resentment against the West, and leading to the Iranian Revolution, etc., etc., etc., we can trace the sequence of external causes endlessly.

Nevertheless, for those people who are willing to understand, much of what happens in the world happens because people's minds are influenced and taken over by gdon.

Karma Dorje said:

It is risible that a bunch of animal sacrifices are somehow worse than the constant appetite for cruelty of American agriculture, America's destabilization of countries around the world, constant warfare, torture, etc.

Malcolm wrote:

But, in fact it is, for the reasons I have already outlined.

Karma Dorje said:

...but what there indicates this particular time now that one couldn't equally apply to the 1300s?

Malcolm wrote:

No one could climb the Himalayas until the 20th century. FYI, the dKon mchog spyi 'dus, the source of this prediction, was revealed by Rigzin Jatson Nyingpo in the 17th century.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 20th, 2015 at 12:00 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

This provoked some Mamos. In turn, they provoked... who exactly?

In 2002-03, the Bush junta in the US was dead set on invading Iraq for their own reasons. They needed an international ally. Tony B. Liar was that guy. Blair could have stopped the invasion, stopped the war, but he did not. Rather, he enabled it. Some number of Britons were behind this. Is this the provocation in question according to the idea advanced above, or am I thinking this through too literally?

Malcolm wrote:

The minds of humans in the world became inflamed with hatred, incited by angered Mamos, leading to the second Gulf war.

For example, angered Nagas punish us with cancers and skin diseases. Angered Nyan punish us with jungle illnesses like HIV, Ebola, and so on. Gyalpos infect our minds and encourage people to break commitments and to lust for power. Devas possess humans and cause them to start cults, the list goes on and on.

Like UD pointed out, this is why we do Serkhyem, Sang, practice deities like Drollo, Dragphur, Vajrapani, etc., because we need bring the eight classes under control.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 11:14 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

I find your approach to this a little confusing, and I suspect it reflects more of a personal bias on your part, than your methodology.

For example, over in the Forbidden Archaeology thread, you're asserting that we can't approach texts in a materialistic context, while ignoring the living tradition. As such, the academic's assertion that the abhidharmic cosmology is flawed and represents a flawed world-view really does not apply, as there are many meanings to those texts and many meanings of cosmology itself. And thus, if we approach these texts through the living tradition, we understand that there is cosmology re locations of mountains and oceans and cosmology re representations of merit.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not asserting that. I am asserting that Indrajala's method is materialistic in nature. I have not made any claims at all there apart from pointing out that there are several Buddhist cosmologies and that therefore, they are not definitive.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Yet, when it comes to these Abrahamic traditions, your approach is just that materialistic and structuralist approach.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all.

Urgyen Dorje said:

The whole lot of them are just gyalpo worshippers because the texts say that.

Malcolm wrote:

The Old Testament/Torah etc., nowhere says that the God of the old Testament is a gyal po spirit. This is my analysis.

Urgyen Dorje said:

And when people like myself try to bring in counter examples to show that it's really not as clear cut as that, we're defending gyalpo worshiping and enabling everything that goes along with that.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I am merely pointing out that you are very quick to defend Muslims, etc., but you are not so quick to defend Tibetan Gyalpo worshippers.

Urgyen Dorje said:

It seems if we're going to use post-structuralist approaches to Buddhist texts to appreciate their polyvalency and pliancy in the context of their cultural and historical expressions, along with the living traditions that go along with them-- then we need to afford the Abrahamic texts the same method.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not using post or pre anything. That is your trip. I am a Tibetan doctor, and a someone who studies Tibetan texts. I don't have any particular western methodology that I use to analyze texts. When I look at Hindu texts, I consider them "outsider" texts, their gods, worldly, period. When I look at Christian texts, Jewish texts, Muslim texts, they are outsider eternalist texts, their god, such as it is, worldly.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Quite honestly, I appreciate that your methodological error comes from your strong feelings on this.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't have a methodological error, unless you want to consider assigning all non-Buddhist religions to the categories of the vehicle of gods and humans an error.

Urgyen Dorje said:

If you want to say that a bunch of dark shit associated with the Abrahamic tradition was either caused by gyalpos or evoked gyalpos-- I'm with you. I mean, really, we do these practices like Riwo Sang Cho to mitigate these problems, right? Ritual animal slaughter. Female genital mutilation. Burrying people and throwing rocks at their heads. ISIS. Strapping a vest of C4 on your body and blowing yourself up in a market. Flying planes into buildings. Witch trials. Killing gay people. I'm on board. Some dark shit. I say this because I've been places where these types of bad things have happened, and the dark vibe is palpable. I've had lamas say this as well.

Malcolm wrote:

Then?

Urgyen Dorje said:

My personal relationships with people of these traditions aside, I find it laughable to suggest an apophatic Christian worships a gyalpo, or that a sufi or Kabalistic mystic does the same.

Malcolm wrote:

Why? Gyalpos don't have a form.

Not only that, I already addressed this issue by pointing out that Kabbalah is basically neo-Platonism, etc. There is a strong tradition of Hellenistic philosophy that runs through all Western and Near-Eastern Philosophy and mysticism. As far as Sufism goes, there are arguments on both sides of the issues — some scholars contend that due to the rise of Sufism in the Persian world, there is a strong element of Buddhist undercurrent within it; others reject this and site the rise of Sufism in the Islamic experience itself. But these things do not matter very much. They are not germane to the main point I am making. Every religion has its Pālas, its protectors. In Tibet for example, bTsan, Gyalpos, and the like, such as Thang lha, Ma chen Pomra, etc. were moved from the position of being the object of worship to being bound into oath as protectors.

The central god of the Abrahamic tradition, by definition a worldly being, has never been bound to an oath. He is part of the eight classes, one of the dregs pa sde bgyad.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Personally, I think we can avoid all the confusion that comes from having these conversations without minding methodological nuances by just looking at what "religion" and is not. For me personally, I don't consider people who harm beings or justify, magnify, or rejoice in their negative qualities as "religious practitioners". If we want to suggest these are the people who are under the sway of gyalpos or mamos or who propitiate them-- go for it. But they're not religious practitioners.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure they are "religious practitioners", every bit as much as followers of Shiva or Santeria who engage in animal sacrifice are religious practitioners. Their religion may be a Mithyadharma, a false Dharma, from our point of view, but it is nevertheless a Dharma.

Gyalpos, etc., cause people to behave in ways contrary to their basic human decency. The vast atrocities of Cortez, Genghis Khan, etc., the unknown millions who died in the An Lushan Rebellion in the mid 8th century, all of these things can be laid at the feet of human beings whose minds are deranged by provocations.

Most people do not give the eight classes the kind of credit they deserve for causing havoc among humans.

Urgyen Dorje said:

So let's apply our analysis and methods uniformly, and let's be clear what are and are not religious paths.

Malcolm wrote:

There are three kinds of religious paths: Saddharma, Lokadharma and Mithyadharma. Buddha's Dharma is Saddharma. Everything else is either a Lokadharma or a Mithyadharma, and is usually a mixture of both.

For example, you might ask, well, what about Jesus? Jesus was a human being, a man. He was not a spirit, or some kind of provocation. But in reality, it is exactly the kind of death he suffered that gives rise to Gyalpos. Gyalpos arise when people with powerful spiritual charisma, etc. are murdered.

The Christian pantheon is filled with martyrs who also can have exactly that kind of rebirth, as powerful avenging spirits. Then there are more benevolent protectors, we like to call them "saints."

Gyalpos, etc. function best when they are not recognized as such.

Since no one believes in them any more, very little is done to quell their actions, and as a result we live in the kind of world we do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: "V"s in Sanskrit

Content:

mañjughoṣamaṇi said:

Khams is also quite diverse. Some linguists are arguing the different khampa dialects aren't necessarily any more closely related to each other than they are to other dialect groups.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, When ChNN was traveling to Lhasa when he was a teenager, he and his band managed get papers from Nangchen, because Derge was already under Chinese control, but they were always worried that if there was a translator among any Chinese soldiers they encountered, that person might recognize their deception because Nangchen skad and Derge skad are different not only in terms of accent, but also actual language.

Hence the old Tibetan adage, "Every valley has its own language, every Lama has his own Dharma."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for example, Mamos were the cause of the war in Iraq, believe it or not. That arose from effects of burning millions of cows in the mad cow epidemic in Britain. That in turn was a result of those Tibetan gyalpo fanatics having a stronghold in northern England.

Karma Dorje said:

Yes, and unicorns appearing in the sky over Oslo caused gay marriage to be legalized in the U.S.A. Obviously.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not incumbent upon you to believe Chogyal Namkhai Norbu's assessment of the second Gulf war, but that is his assessment.

Karma Dorje said:

I am pretty sure that Hitler, Stalin and Mao weren't Muslim.

Malcolm wrote:

I am just putting into perspective your claim to the evils of the Great American Satan.

Samsara has been a mess since forever. It's not all or even mostly caused by gyalpos. The beings that are born into areas of strife quite obviously are habituated strongly to afflictive emotions.

Yes, and that includes being born into areas of strife where that strife is largely a result of non-human provocation. For example, Padmasambava explains our times perfectly to Nyang Tingzing Zangpo:

Taking life, deceptive trade practices, are each poisonous supports. Competing in skill at theft and plunder, teachers who take the life of virtue are made into one's mother. "Father" is not heard by children, "master" is not heard by servants, "lord" is not heard by subjects. The wicked are in full bloom. Ornaments are made into weapons. Dharma activities shorten one's life, but misdeeds raise one's spirits. The temples fall into disrepair. Since the negative local spirits spread, there is much frost and hail. Mamos and dākinīs spread contagious diseases among children, adult diseases for adults, cattle diseases for cattle, and blights on harvests, etc., will appear suddenly like dust devils. Tree wither above the roots, generations are destroyed by famine. Rats invade the land.

At that time, there are no Dharma activities, and since misdeeds increase, cause and result is ignored. Because of the power of the ten misdeeds, etc., the merit of Tibet sinks lower and lower.

Pehar possess monks, only a few men possess vows. Since demons and spirits possess mantra practitioners, commitments do not exist and illness increase. Since Gyalpos possess men, they start civil wars. Since Srinmo possess women, they commit adultery, administer poisons and are deceptive. Since The'u rang possess children, they steal, have fevers, and are badly behaved. There are many madmen and rabid dogs. Since the food portions of sentient beings diminish, the essence of their elements is harmed. Efforts will be made to reach the top of the Himalayas and there will be farming on the mountains.

This is a description of our era.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Buddha taught that all problems come from delusions, not from spirits. IMHO it's unhealthy to be overly concerned about these things. The only thing we need to do is to destroy our own delusions through practising Dharma. We don't need to judge other people's spiritual paths or blame spirits for everything that goes wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

Spirits, gdon, come from delusion, just like everything else. Spirits, rgyalpos, etc., are not ultimate, they are something relative. They don't affect anything directly, but they rule diseases, they affect people's minds and so on. If they were ultimate, we could not have various oracles, such as Nechung, Tseringma, Setrab, Shugden and so on. The reason we have these oracles is because these are worldly entities that are able to take control of trained mediums [sku brten] and communicate with us directly.

But conventionally, spirits, non-humans beings, like nāgas, devas, pretas [this is actually what "spirits" are], gandharvas, yakṣas, dakas, dakinīs, unmadas, apasmaras, kumbhadhas etc., all exist. Some of them are on our side, some are not, as this sutta points out:

"If any monk or nun, layman or laywoman learns by heart this Atanata protection, and be word-perfect in repeating it, and if any non-human male or female Yakkha, youth or maiden Yakkha, Yakkha Minister or any Yakkha, or Yakkha attendant; male or female Gandhabba... (as before); male or female Kumbhanda... male or female Naga... were to walk with him or her, or stand or sit or lie down with him or her with malevolent intent, such a non-human, Happy One, will not obtain hospitality from any town or township, will not obtain a place to dwell, nor could live in the Kingdom of Alakamanda. He will not be able to attend the meetings of the Yakkhas. Further he would not be accepted or given in marriage, he would be reproached (by casting remarks on his deformed teeth or eyes or any part of the body), and the non-humans would put an empty bowl over his head and split it (head) in seven pieces.

"Happy One, there are non-humans who are fierce, violent, given to retaliation; those non-humans heed neither the (four) great kings, nor their ministers nor their attendants. They are called rebels against the (four) great kings. Even as in the kingdom of Magadha, the thieves heed neither the king of Magadha, nor the ministers, nor their attendants, and are called rebels against the king of Magadha, so there are non-humans who are fierce... (as before). They are called rebels against the (four) great kings.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/dn/dn.32.0.piya.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 1:50 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

The one thing that concerns me that is causing huge provocations and destruction in the world that we live in today is the American empire.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for example, Mamos were the cause of the war in Iraq, believe it or not. That arose from effects of burning millions of cows in the mad cow epidemic in Britain. That in turn was a result of those Tibetan gyalpo fanatics having a stronghold in northern England.

Karma Dorje said:

The Muslims are bush league compared to them.

Malcolm wrote:

Really? I am pretty sure that Hitler, Stalin and Mao make American atrocities, such as they are, rather tepid in comparison.

Karma Dorje said:

...it {the US} has had a profoundly negative impact on the world compared to relatively little good.

Malcolm wrote:

We are not in agreement on this point.

Karma Dorje said:

The Middle East would not have been such a mess were it not for American and British meddling. Don't blame a gyalpo for what is adequately explained by human spite and stupidity.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote]

The Middle East has been a mess for millennia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 12:58 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I understand exactly what you are saying, and believe it or not, I partially agree. There are some people practicing Abrahamic religions that seem to be doing something quite dark, however, there are plenty that are not. Do they worship the "same guy"...I have no idea, all I know is that the fruit of their practice is visibly different from what comes from the people you are talking about.

Malcolm wrote:

Some day you should play the Game of Liberation by Chogyal Namkhai Norbu.

It's very instructive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 12:56 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

What is the point of slagging other religions other than to feel smug? Everybody loves to think they have exclusive access to the truth. Everybody loves to say the other guy is wrong, particularly when the other guy isn't around to argue the point. This conversation here convinces none of the people who are actually performing these sacrifices. It's just picking a fight for the sake of entertainment.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we are all pretty sure that Allah/Jehovah/Brahma/Vishu etc. did not create the universe, nor anything in it.

We are all pretty sure that we think that animal sacrifice is wrong.

The only thing we are squabbling about now is that I think that the god worshipped by Muslims and so on, causes huge provocations in the world and has done for the better part of three millennia. By comparison, that Tibetan gyalpo is a pipsqueak.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 12:42 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Not to start anything, but I think that Shaivism has more in common with Buddhism than Advaita.

Malcolm wrote:

Trika? How so? They believe everything is real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 12:40 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

of Eid al-Adha are really cool. I think they deserve to be recognized and not folded into a generalization of being gyalpo worshippers.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, you completely misunderstand. I am not saying that the god of the old Testament and the Koran is a gyalpo because there is animal sacrifice in Islam, etc.

I am saying he is a gyalpo based on his described actions in the old Testament and in the Koran.

There are some people, for example, who think that a certain Tibetan Gyalpo is a Buddha. They do not, as far as I know, engage in any kind of animal sacrifice. But they are still venerate a gyalpo as an awakened being. Are you going to defend them on the principle that what their texts say may not be representative of the finest exponents of their tradition?

There are all kinds of worldly spirits out there with different characteristics and different kinds of actions.

Some are readily identifiable in Indian and Tibetan terms as this or that kind of entity, some are not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 5:51 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

But animal sacrifice is not integral to such practices as Christianity, Judaism, Hinduism, or Islam. It can't be said to be integral as there are those who abhor it. And thus, I tolerate those paths and those contexts where there is no animal sacrifice. It was a Muslim who introduced me to vegetarianism.

Malcolm wrote:

It does not exist in Christianity. In Judaism, well, it is undergoing a small revival. To say it is not essential in Islam is to wear blinders. In Hinduism, it is widespread, but not universal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 5:31 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Honestly, it is amazing that we, who are so intolerant of the Gyalpo, make excuses for Muslims, etc.

I'm not making excuses for anything, I personally think it's abhorrent for people calling themselves 'religious' to believe that killing beings can confer blessings, rather than the opposite.

Malcolm wrote:

And yet, so many of them do...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It is the same with Kosher, to me Kashrut practices are pretty much morally no worse than other forms of food production, since they do not involve an expectation of receiving blessings for killing - which to me is abhorrent part.

Malcolm wrote:

In this case a blessing is recited, seeking sanction for the correct procedure of the acts of a Kosher butcher. It is not 100 percent necessary to begin with a blessing, but it is normal to do so. Halal killing on the other hand is done in the name of Allah, and it is a requirement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 5:15 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

For somebody who is taking exception to "practices", you certainly make huge generalizations about "people".

Native American practices are even more diverse than those of Muslims and Jews, simply because of the diversity of the population.

Malcolm wrote:

I was speaking to JD's assertion that NA hunting practices involved a grey area. He was not specific, so neither was I.

Any way, if you wish to "respect" those religions which actively encourage animal sacrifice, please be my guest.

Honestly, it is amazing that we, who are so intolerant of the Gyalpo, make excuses for Muslims, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Dude, save the paternalistic tone.

Malcolm wrote:

My tone is not smarmy. Factual, but not smarmy.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I don't have any romantic ideas,

Malcolm wrote:

I never said you did.

Johnny Dangerous said:

...but as an example of the grey area of what constitutes "ritual killing" versus simply food acquisition and preparation in the context of a certain culture.

Malcolm wrote:

A common theme among NA myths is the idea of key food animals agreeing to offer themselves as food if the people act correctly. This part of a myth structure, a just so story.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Also comparing something like the culture of the Aztecs to say, Anasazi-derived culture of the Pueblo indians, or that of the plains tribes are pretending they are greatly similar is silly.

Malcolm wrote:

I wasn't — I was merely pointing out that part of the reason why Mexico is so screwed has to do with this history. Don't ge me wrong, I like Mexico. I think it is a great place. But there is a kind of ingrained bloody mindedness in that country that comes from its history.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

It's not clear to me whether you're talking about people or practices. Just saying. You have to sort of try to be accurate in your target...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about people. I am talking about practices. Until these practices are ended in these places, the people living there will experience no real prosperity and so on.

Practices, just so you are clear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:53 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And I was talking about the general practice of religious killing in all religions.

Johnny Dangerous said:

The issue here as I see it is that the line gets quite grey.

Native Americans for instance have plenty of "ritual killing" under this definition, but it is also simply a part (or was, still is for some who choose) a part of obtaining food. It is the same with Kosher laws, unless you believe everyone would be vegetarian (and actually, it is easy to argue that Kosher laws actually encourage vegetarianism) without following kosher laws, then there is little difference between eating Kosher foods or non-Kosher..since it is not something done to obtain a favorable result.

Malcolm wrote:

Many people have this romantic idea that Native Americans give thanks to their prey, and "respect" their prey. They may, but this ignores the fact that Native Americans were the leading cause of the extinction of large animals in North America such as Woolly Mammoths and so on.

Also such Native Americans as Aztecs, Mayans and so on, had really brutal cultures where blood spilled in oceans. Mexico is still screwed up because of it. Mexico needs to build 108 Stupas, all together, then many of its problems will be reversed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Actually it's you pointing to exceptions and painting them as the rule.

Malcolm wrote:

Animal sacrifice is the rule in Islam, not the exception. It is a duty, actually, one many Muslims may find distasteful, but a duty nevertheless.

Johnny Dangerous said:

I wasn't talking about Muslims, I was talking specifically about the attempt to put Jews and Muslims in the same boat with animal sacrifice, which is impossible if you know even a small bit about modern Judaism, and the Talmudic debates surrounding animal sacrifice.

Malcolm wrote:

And I was talking about the general practice of religious killing in all religions.

it is not even an issue about tolerance. There is nothing we can do about other people's religious ideas except voice our disapproval of them, if warranted. Here it is fine, it is not like I would wander into some Muslim community and tell them they are all worshipping a gyal po, even though that is basically what I think.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Actually it's you pointing to exceptions and painting them as the rule.

Malcolm wrote:

Animal sacrifice is the rule in Islam, not the exception. It is a duty, actually, one many Muslims may find distasteful, but a duty nevertheless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

You have to sort of try to be accurate in your target...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about people. I am talking about practices. Until these practices are ended in these places, the people living there will experience no real prosperity and so on.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Right, and then you posted a couple links, one not even about Jews, another about fringe groups in Israel, as if it indicates that Animal sacrifice is some widespread thing in Judaism. The original thing that got us on this was sacrifice in Abrahamic religions...not just the practice itself. AFAIK there really ain't many Christians or Jews doing animal sacrifice beyond some very fringe-y groups.

I imagine India has to be up there in terms of numbers.

Malcolm wrote:

When a Kosher butcher slaughters an animal, he generally does so in the context of reciting a blessing. This makes it a ritual activity. When a Halal butcher slaughters an animal, he does so in the name of Allah. And quite frankly, I really do not see any difference between the God of the Torah and the God of the Koran.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:23 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Man, apparently the critical thinking used when evaluating Tantra, Sutra, and Dialectics goes out the window entirely when having a realistic view of other religions comes into play, or even being able to properly read a wikipedia entry.

Malcolm wrote:

You can point out all the exceptions and nuances you want. They don't matter. What matters is that in these places that I mentioned, millions of animals a year are ritually sacrificed or killed according to religious rules, and the karmic results are exponentially worse than Tysons and Hormel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

You have to sort of try to be accurate in your target...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not talking about people. I am talking about practices. Until these practices are ended in these places, the people living there will experience no real prosperity and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

It isn't, and only someone who knows no Jews could ever make the mistake of thinking that animal sacrifice is a common thing within Judaism, it's nearly unheard of, and these are very rare. Again, there are writings from prominent Jewish thinker before the modern age who argued against it IIRC, such as Rambam.

Also Kosher slaughter is by definition a religious act. Sorry, but that is also a fact.

Oh yeah, it is, but it has nothing to do with any kind of sacrifice at all.

Malcolm wrote:

My overall criteria was religious killing, killing done in accordance with religious rules or out of obligation, or to seek favors from gods or demons. In those places where this kind of activity is regularly carried out, we see the results — Africa, India, Mexico and South America, the Middle East etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this is what we would call a ransom rite, or as it is known in the west, a scapegoat.

Norwegian said:

Random trivia:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kapparot>

"[...] Jewish atonement ritual practiced by some Jews on the eve of Yom Kippur. "

" On the afternoon before Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement of the world, one prepares an item to be donated to the poor for consumption at the pre-Yom Kippur meal.,[2] recites the two biblical passages of Psalms 107:17-20 and Job 33:23-24, and then swings the prepared charitable donation over one's head three times while reciting a short prayer three times.

the prayer recited translates as:

This is my exchange, this is my substitute, this is my atonement. This rooster (hen) will go to its death, while I will enter and proceed to a good long life and to peace. "

" The ritual appealed especially to Kabbalists "

In the United States, the Kapparot ritual would seem to be constitutionally protected as an exercise of freedom of religion, based upon a 1993 U.S. Supreme Court decision in the case of Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah. In that case, the court upheld the right of Santeria adherents to practice ritual animal sacrifice, with Justice Anthony Kennedy stating in the decision, "religious beliefs need not be acceptable, logical, consistent or comprehensible to others in order to merit First Amendment protection". (quoted by Justice Kennedy from the opinion by Justice Warren E. Burger in Thomas v. Review Board of the Indiana Employment Security Division 450 U.S. 707 (1981))

The mass-slaughter of chickens on the day of high demand by a Shochet (licensed and trained "butcher"), repeatedly results in a certain percentage of chicken not slaughtered according to shechita due to haste, fatigue, imperfection and non-reviewed uncertainty. Furthermore, chicken of kapparot may not be accepted even by the poor, because they are commonly perceived as being quasi-accursed (cursed) after the ritual. Sad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:09 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

Some of this kind of reminds me of arguments in favor of meat eating I've read among Buddhists on boards like this one.

Malcolm wrote:

No one "favors" eating meat. But as long as animals are going to be killed in food production, you need a method to make a positive connection for them, otherwise you are remaining indifferent.

Also Kosher slaughter is by definition a religious act. Sorry, but that is also a fact.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:07 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Samaritans actually are not Jews, dude.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.ynetnews.com/articles/0,7340,L-4643453,00.html>

<http://destination-yisrael.biblesearchers.com/destination-yisrael/2010/04/orthodox-jewish-patriots-prevented-from-sacrificing-sheep-or-goats-near-the-temple-mount-at->

pesach.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Really, are you quite sure? You might want to check on that.

Johnny Dangerous said:

How about you point out an example instead, so I can see it, since you seem sure of it.

I could certainly be wrong, but animal sacrifice has not been part of mainstream Judaism for a very long time (second temple AFAIK), and finds argument against it even in Babylonian talmud I believe.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3066352/Members-Samaritan-sect-Israel-skewer-sheep-traditional-Passover-ceremony-West-Bank-city-Nablus.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

So some practitioners might be worshipping a big 'ol war god..but others aren't doing anything like that at all.

Malcolm wrote:

When they sacrifice sheep and goats, they are worshipping a big old war god, whatever else they may be doing.

What are you talking about? Jews haven't done ritual sacrifice for a long time.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Really, are you quite sure? You might want to check on that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
This is just Buddhist chauvinism.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is just a fact that Muslim ritual sacrifices every year in the billions of dollars is gyalpo worship, plain and simple. Jewish ritual sacrifices also amount to a very large income for Australian sheep farmers. I am not making this stuff up folks.

I could care less, in this instance, about the finer points of Muslim/Jewish/Hindu mysticism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 3:48 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

So some practitioners might be worshipping a big 'ol war god..but others aren't doing anything like that at all.

Malcolm wrote:

When they sacrifice sheep and goats, they are worshipping a big old war god, whatever else they may be doing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Can you substantiate that please?

Malcolm wrote:

Just read the Old Testament. Just read the Koran.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Reading the works of Kabbalists and Sufis often bears more resemblance to any form of mysticism than they do to their parent religions.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and I qualified my remarks above. Kabbala is heavily influenced by Neo-platonism, for example. The philosophical revolution in Islam happened after Muslims converted Central Asia and came into contact with the [Hellenized] Central Asian Civilizations. All the greatest Islamic scholars and philosophers are from Central Asia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 3:19 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Since Judaism, Islam, and Christianity stem from the same source, Abraham.

They worship the same being dominated by anger and jealousy.

We can see the fruit of this.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Really? So Kabbalists were doing the same thing as modern Ultra-Orthodox? Rumi was basically the same as The Taliban? Please, nonsense in the extreme, Abrahamic religions have nearly as wide a spectrum of practices as Dharmic ones.

Malcolm wrote:

The core of it, however, is Gyalpo worship, no matter to what extent Hellenism influenced some thinkers in the Abrahamic faiths to more profound philosophical thinking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 19th, 2015 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

Let's assume for the sake of argument that Malcolm's correct, and that I have a hypothetical neighbor who participates in rites involving animal sacrifices to a spirit or spirits. So what? Does that spirit grow more powerful from the energy of this person's devotion, say, or from the life force of the poor animals bleeding on the altar? At what point does that become a problem for anyone other than the dead chickens and those propitiating this spirit or spirits?

Malcolm wrote:

These spirits are feeding on the life force of the animals, represented by blood.

These kinds of entities can create many problems for us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Pure Land & Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

My favorite Amitabha statue at Eikando in Kyoto.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

At this point I think it worth noting that Malcolm considers Shentong to be a "Universal Atman" in drag. And, quite frankly, I'm not entirely sure he's wrong about that.

Bakmoon said:

I don't know if Malcom would say that about all forms of Shentong. Shentong comes in many different flavors, and personally I, a Theravadin, find some of the more qualified interpretations to be rather nice.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said many times, my main problem with gzhan stong is the way gzhan stong deforms the three natures theory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Djang Chub Dorje and Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

kashmir said:

Who was the teacher of Rigdzin Chanchub Dorje?

Malcolm wrote:

Pema Dudul, Rangrig Dorje, Adzom Drugpa, mainly. He took teachings from Shardza, but I am not sure to what extent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Dan74 said:

At the end of the day, True Self or no true self, are all skillful means, the way I see it.

/|

Malcolm wrote:

"True self" is not a skillful means in the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Malcolm, so is it your perspective that outright animal sacrifice like in Santeria or Abrahamic religions feeds negative spirits more than just killing animals?

It is interesting that these sacrifices seem to mainly involve draining the animal of its blood.

Malcolm wrote:

Absolutely.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is necessarily materialistic.

Indrajala said:

So I suppose you believe the earth is flat because scripture says so despite materialist science proposing otherwise? How about evolution? One might easily imagine you deny this too because it stems from a materialist tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

I have never made any kind of claim that resembles this. You are tilting windmills. I have only referred to different cosmologies in order to point out that they are not fixed frames of reference in pan-Buddhist doctrine. The cosmology of the Avatamsaka or the Realms and Transformations of Sound Tantra [sgra thal gyur] in no way resembles the cosmology of the Kosha.

One of the key features of the Carvaka school is that they reject all authorities other than direct perception.

The consequence of the methodology advocated by you is largely the same. Ergo, whether you intend it to be or not, your methodology is rooted in the western tradition of logical positivism, it is therefore materialist, even if you are not in terms of your personal beliefs a materialist or a physicalist.

"Evidence-based" is a nice catch phrase, for example, it is used in medicine quite a bit these days too, given that medicine is the origin of the term. To give you an example of the problem:

Evidence-based medicine is controversial not because people disagree about whether medical decisions ought to incorporate the best available evidence, but because they disagree about how narrowly evidence should be defined.¹⁴ Neither advocates nor opponents of evidence-based medicine consistently differentiate between the everyday meaning of evidence and the evidence of evidence-based medicine that refers only to the results of particular types of research.^{12,15} This persistent confusion makes the label evidence-based medicine divisive, and authors on both sides of the debate have suggested that it be discarded or replaced.

http://journals.lww.com/academicmedicine/Fulltext/2007/03000/Viewpoint__Moving_Beyond_Evidence_Based_Medicine.15.aspx

It is much the same when you used the term "evidence-based" approach to Buddhist studies, or any historical inquiry. How wide or narrow is the evidence? This is where bias comes in, yours, mine, everyones.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 10:14 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Indrajala said:

The evidence based approach is not necessarily materialistic.

Malcolm wrote:

It is necessarily materialistic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:55 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

tingdzin said:

In Tibet, schools that were the most concerned with doctrinal orthodoxy (and political power) tended to frown upon it more strongly while those schools which tended rely more on spiritually accomplished masters didn't seem to have had too much of a problem with it. .

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, this does not make any sense considering the role of oracles in the Ganden Phodrang.

And show me one Tibetan school that does not rely on "spiritually accomplished masters", at least in theory.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:54 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

tingdzin said:

Everybody trying to push their own beliefs on others is FAR more a cause of suffering in the modern world than animal sacrifice, which by the way, is not only a traditional part of currently unpopular religions like Islam and Santeria, but also Judaism.

.

Malcolm wrote:

Notice that all those places in the world where animal sacrifice is practiced as a religious custom have a great deal more strife, violence, and problems. Coincidence? I think not.

There is no difference between Halal and Kosher. And yes, animal sacrifice in Judaism is horrible and widespread also.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 9:48 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

DGA said:

Malcolm, is it your position that the spirits propitiated by these persons are real--more specifically, that they are real in the way that their advocates say they are?

Malcolm wrote:

Sure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Witnessing. Not allowing it to be swept under the rug.

Luke said:

A few years ago, you seemed totally hopeless about Tibet and basically said that nothing could be done.

What gave you a change of heart and renewed your optimism?

Malcolm wrote:

I never said anything could be done. But I never said we should remain indifferent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

Luke said:

Yes, indeed Tibetan lives matter! It's terrible that the Tibetans are still so harshly repressed by the PRC government.

But, Malcolm, what do you think should be done about this? What is a possible way to resolve these on-going problems in Tibet?

Malcolm wrote:

Witnessing. Not allowing it to be swept under the rug.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: the psychedelic community: pros and cons

Content:

Luke said:

^Those are some cool paintings, Malcolm! Could you tell us the names of the artists who did them, please?

Malcolm wrote:

just run a search on google, modern tibetan painting

Luke said:

I searched "modern tibetan painting" on Google Images, but none of the paintings you posted came up.

It would be nice if you could type the artists' names since you posted their paintings.

Malcolm wrote:

https://www.google.com/search?q=modern+tibetan+painting&client=safari&rls=en&source=lnms&tbn=isch&sa=X&ved=0CAgQ_AUoAmoVChMIlabWqtuwxwIVSY8-Ch1SmQUB&biw=1373&bih=791

I did not notice the names. But you can find them from this search.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: the psychedelic community: pros and cons

Content:

Luke said:

^Those are some cool paintings, Malcolm! Could you tell us the names of the artists who did them, please?

Malcolm wrote:

just run a search on google, modern tibetan painting

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Question Zilnon Namkha Dorje & Terma

Content:

Nosta said:

I am reading a book where they mention the name of Zilnon Namkha Dorje, saying that it was a tertön with termas regarding the future. I wonder about such prophecies and the time they are about to happen. While searching on google I don't find information about that. Anyone here could give me some help?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.rigpawiki.org/index.php?title=Chime_Soktik

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 18th, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: the psychedelic community: pros and cons

Content:

Luke said:

Another "pro" of the psychedelic community is the quality of art that it produces.

Are any modern Buddhist painters as skilled or as interesting as Alex Grey?

Malcolm wrote:

Etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, the Meru cosmology is fundamentally a moral cosmology.

Indrajala said:

No, it isn't. It was clearly believed by Buddhist writers in India to be a physical world atop which the sun and moon as discs circuited around. Did you read my blog post?

Malcolm wrote:

That does not matter.

It is clearly a moral cosmology in so far as lower births are below the surface, humans [along with some animals] live on the surface of the four continents, whilst devas live above the surface in various palaces on the slopes of Meru.

Indrajala said:

As you are probably aware, E. Henning disputes the notion for example, that the authors of the Kalacakra root tantra could have believed in a flat earth cosmology, because their calculations alone contradict this notion — thus the modified Meru cosmology found in the Kalacakra is there for symbolic purposes, but is not taken literally.

I haven't looked at the Kalacakra in any great detail, but I've read his work on the matter.

I think the simplest explanation is that mathematical astronomy or something based on it, all originally meant for a spherical earth, had to be accounted for given its universal applicability and accuracy, in a flat earth Mt. Meru cosmology. By the 11th century presumably such knowledge was readily accessible and thus anyone with an interest in astrology and astronomy would have been aware of the requisite math involved.

Malcolm wrote:

And that math would have been known where and by whom? Nalanda scholars among others. If you read Henning carefully, he points out that two cosmological accounts are given.

Indrajala said:

The Meru cosmology presents an Indo-centric view of the ancient world, embellished with Indian aesthetics. While some, like Vasubandhu, may have taken it literally, there is sufficient evidence to suggest that not everyone in ancient India did.

Plenty of non-Buddhist astronomers in India were quite clear that the earth is in fact spherical, but as far as I can tell, Buddhist writers did not display much awareness of a spherical earth.

Malcolm wrote:

Textual myopia once again. If it is not in a text, it does not exist for you.

Indrajala said:

To suggest otherwise is just wishful thinking. Few Buddhists want to admit their Buddhist predecessors in India were somewhat scientifically handicapped.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is an inference. But the problem with your method, once again, is that it is essential Carvaka in its point of view, you only accept direct perception as an authority.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Top 5 Dzogchen books

Content:

ngodrup said:

Cho Ying Dzod

Rigpai Chertong

Nang Jang

What else do you need?

Malcolm wrote:

Original Dzogchen texts, like kun byed rgyal po, sgra thal 'gyur, rig pa rang shar, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 10:37 PM

Title: Re: Djang Chub Dorje and Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek DW members,

Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche assisted in Tibet some time ago Djang Chub Dorje, who was a direct disciple of Shardza Tashi Gyaltzen Rinpoche (Rainbow Body in 1936)

Djang Chub Dorje received from Shardza Rinpoche New Bon or Bon gsar teachings. In Bon gsar are many Vajrayana deities venerated and Guru Rinpoche is here welcomed.

- Is there something known about the time from Namkha Norbu Rinpoche and Djang Chub Dorje ? Interesting to know if Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche got some teachings from Djang Chub Dorje or in what way he did assist Djang Chub Dorje.

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN received most of Chanchub Dorje's termas from Chanchub Dorje's son. What he received directly from Chanchub Dorje was the empowerment of Zhitro, as well as direct introduction. This story is pretty famous.

IN terms of assisting Chanchub Dorje, Norbu Rinpoche helped in Chanchub Dorje's clinic for roughly six months.

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek N,

Thanks for the replies.

The world of Dzogchen is small, despite the teachings are great.
It is amazing how Bon and Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche are connected.
He is a Tibetan, who has a positive opinion about Bon.

_ Can you mention some more terma's which Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche did receive ?

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

I am pretty sure that Norbu Rinpoche received all of Changchub Dorje's termas from Changchub Dorje's son. I don't know if any Bon termas are included there, I am not sure, but I don't think so.

However, there is no real difference between Dzogchen in Bon and Chos apart from lineage. Meaning is the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Djang Chub Dorje and Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek DW members,

Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche assisted in Tibet some time ago Djang Chub Dorje, who was a direct disciple of Shardza Tashi Gyaltzen Rinpoche (Rainbow Body in 1936)
Djang Chub Dorje received from Shardza Rinpoche New Bon or Bon gsar teachings. In Bon gsar are many Vajrayana deities venerated and Guru Rinpoche is here welcomed.

- Is there something known about the time from Namkha Norbu Rinpoche and Djang Chub Dorje ? Interesting to know if Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche got some teachings from Djang Chub Dorje or in what way he did assist Djang Chub Dorje.

Mutsug Marro
KY

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN received most of Chanchub Dorje's termas from Chanchub Dorje's son. What he received directly from Chanchub Dorje was the empowerment of Zhitro, as well as direct introduction. This story is pretty famous.

IN terms of assisting Chanchub Dorje, Norbu Rinpoche helped in Chanchub Dorje's clinic for roughly six months.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Indrajala said:

Having logical proofs and evidence (satellite photos) of a spherical earth disproves Buddhism's flat earth cosmology.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a straw man. First of all, the Meru cosmology is fundamentally a moral cosmology. Second, it is not the only cosmology in Buddhist texts, merely the most referenced because of its axial nature.

As you are probably aware, E. Henning disputes the notion for example, that the authors of the Kalacakra root tantra could have believed in a flat earth cosmology, because their calculations alone contradict this notion — thus the modified Meru cosmology found in the Kalacakra is there for symbolic purposes, but is not taken literally.

The Meru cosmology presents an Indo-centric view of the ancient world, embellished with Indian aesthetics. While some, like Vasubandhu, may have taken it literally, there is sufficient evidence to suggest that not everyone in ancient India did.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Manjushrimitra and Garab Dorje

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- Is this debate noted somewhere?

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is recounted in the lo rgyus chen mo, the Great Chronicle of the Vima Nything and elsewhere.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Indrajala said:

It is much simpler to just make a distinction between the emic and etic.

Malcolm wrote:

It's a biased distinction, and also misplaced. The so-called "etic" approach arrogates to itself a scientific veneer when in fact it is nothing of the kind. It merely replaces the biases of the researcher/research community for the lore and traditions of the person/group under study.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Unknown said:

tol·er·ance

'tāl(ə)rəns/Submit noun

1.

the ability or willingness to tolerate something, in particular the existence of opinions or behavior that one does not necessarily agree with.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: 4 Buddhaactivities

Content:

cck123 said:

Hi,

how can you perform buddha activities to help others? Can only a realized master do this? Or do the protectors perform activities for you until you can do this yourself? Should we only make wishes or mantras or should we train in the activities as best as we can?

I would be glad for your answers...

Best wishes
Chris

Malcolm wrote:

When your practice bears fruit, the four activities will be taken care of automatically. No need for a specific rite or ritual.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: what was first?

Content:

amanitamusc said:

Has the Lilavajra version been translated into Tibetan, English or other?

How long of text is it?

Do you believe all other versions were influenced by it?

Malcolm wrote:

It is very short, and I don't think it has been translated, and it is very much a mahayoga approach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 3:59 AM

Title: Re: what was first?

Content:

amanitamusc said:

What arrived in Tibet first Mahayoga or. Ati Yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

They arrived at the same time.

amanitamusc said:

OK thanks, now what version of Guhyagarbha commentary came first? Did the Zur Mahayoga influence the Ati versions or vice versa or not.

Malcolm wrote:

The one by the Indian Lilavajra [its very short].

Ati, BTW, was already in Tibet via Zhang Zhung sNyan rGyud. You could argue that other Bon cycles analogous to Mahayoga also existed in Tibet prior to the arrival of Chos.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Caodemarte said:

There are at least 108 trillion dharma doors.

Malcolm wrote:

Santeria is not a Dharma gate at all, unless you consider rebirth in the three lower realms an ideal place to go.

Caodemarte said:

I don't necessarily believe that Tibetan oracles or Evangelicals or Santeria priestesses are, in fact, possessed by outside spirits (If that is, in fact, what is claimed) so I don't worry too much about the dangers, especially as I am unaware of any threat or ill will directed to me.

Malcolm wrote:

By definition, oracles are possessed by mundane spirits, for example, Gyalpo Pehar in the case of the Nechung oracle, or Tseringma in the case of the Tseringma oracle, etc.

It is height of ignorance to believe that mundane spirits are satisfied with blood, as described here:

The orishas or ancestors eat the blood, and the people eat the meat. It is an act of communion with the spirits.

<http://santeriachurch.org/our-services/ritual-and-sacrifice/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 3:37 AM

Title: Re: RuShi ?

Content:

heart said:

Keeping the lineage in Vajrayana means to first have the realization and then by your teacher being forced to expound the teachings through empowerment's, commentaries and instructions .

/magnus[/quote/]

Oh dear magnus. A true teacher would never force a student to do anything.

I remember specifically being on retreat with Chnn in 1986 and he specifically teaching his students to not force themselves to do anything. With utmost respect, I disagree with this.

Malcolm wrote:

He is talking about the teacher being forced, not the students.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Caodemarte said:

I find that kind of neat!

Malcolm wrote:

You find the possession of people by powerful worldly spirits "neat"?

I would say it is very dangerous.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 3:06 AM

Title: Re: what was first?

Content:

amanitamusc said:

What arrived in Tibet first Mahyoga or. Ati Yoga?

Malcolm wrote:

They arrived at the same time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 2:02 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

As a science educator and a Buddhist, I think there's a fork in the road and we have to make a choice. What MiphamFan says is exactly what Ganden Tri Rinpoche told us when he taught us mandala offerings and the abhidharmic cosmology that goes along with that-- these are all just representations of reality, so there is no contradiction. Kongtrul's Myriad World presents that perspective as well. No need to reconcile scientific cosmology with abhidharmic, or abhidharmic with Kalachakra, and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

The Meru Cosmology we use in Mandala offerings, for example, is not the universe developed from the shared karma of sentient beings, it is instead a representation of merit. This is not a modern explanation.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I think it's important to bring this up here, as I think our compulsion to locate things in history is a reflection of this same materialist confusion. Malcolm has done a great job pointing this out. There is no absolute representation of history, but rather, a space full of possible representations of history from different perspectives.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, for example, we have the official Buddhist history of Tibet [as favored by Bob Thurman], where Tibetans were ignorant savages prior to the 7th century, with no knowledge of writing and so on. But we can clearly see that this official Tibetan history was constructed to obliterate Tibetan cultural debts to Zhang Zhung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm pretty sure there are no variants of Santeria that don't rely on animal sacrifice...
]

Malcolm wrote:

Nope, none. It's chickens all the way down...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

steveb1 said:

We now know that the earth and the star systems are ancient and vast in a way incomprehensible to the pre-scientific cultures...

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? Have you read the Mahābharata, or even the Pali Canon?

14 billion years is nothing compared to an Asamkhya kalpa.

To give you a picture, just check this wikipedia entry on kalpas:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kalpa_%28aeon%29

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 17th, 2015 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Tolerance for other religions

Content:

steveb1 said:

We now know that the earth and the star systems are ancient and vast in a way incomprehensible to the pre-scientific cultures...

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? Have you read the Mahābharata, or even the Pali Canon?

14 billion years is nothing compared to an Asamkhya kalpa.

To give you a picture, just check this wikipedia entry on kalpas:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kalpa_%28aeon%29

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I find it interesting to see Buddhists do the same.

Malcolm wrote:

Whose writhing?

This idea takes the base line that plastic artifacts are the defining feature of determining the past. However, there is an old adage in Anthropology, "pots are not people."

The paucity of the text critical approach is that it cannot perceive anything outside its horizon of texts. Everything beyond the text is cognitively closed to the text critical method.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

Malcolm wrote:

It was a joke...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Bodhichitta - What Is It?

Content:

Khalil Bodhi said:
Namo Buddhaya!

As a result of my renewed interest in tonglen practice and lojong I find myself puzzling again over the ideas of absolute and relative bodhicitta. Am I wrong to see bodhicitta as more or less karuna paramita? When I read the lojong commentaries it really isn't made any clearer which makes sense as they seem to be explaining it on its own terms without reference to the Pali Canon. Thanks in advance. Sukhita hontu!

Mettaya,

KB

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, bodhicitta is not karuna pāramitā.

Relative bodhicitta is first, the motivation to attain buddhahood based on love and compassion for all sentient beings, and then engaging in the perfections to achieve that buddhahood, practicing the six pāramitās: generosity, discipline, patience and diligence, concentration (of which tonglen is the core), and prajñāpāramita. Prajñāpāramita is ultimate bodhicitta.

Ultimate bodhicitta is Mahāyāna emptiness free from all proliferation and the means to realize it, śamatha and vipaśyāna.

M

Tonglen is strictly part of relative bodhicitta and is a means to rouse the courage to

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm throwing myself in the fire here... but here it goes...

The reality of the situation is that new forms of Tibetan Buddhism are forming within PRC from a combination of Beijing's policies against traditional Tibetan Buddhism and the rise of a Chinese middle class with an interest and need for spiritual things, and money to spend on it, not to mention Tibetans floating in cultural and religious limbo as China destroys their culture. Of course these "new forms" aren't related to the "old forms" that traditional Tibetan Buddhists would relate to and consider legitimate, but from an anthropological vantage point, they're every bit as legitimate as the old forms that have unbroken lineages.

From my side, this is sort of important to keep in mind. Of course China identifying and promoting a fake Panchen Lama is a political stunt and a tactic to destabilize the seat of the Dalai Lama, and thus Tibetan Buddhism as a whole. And of course people are intimidated into recognizing this fake Panchen Lama. And of course it is an illegitimate lineage. At the same time, there are certainly people who relate to him in a way that they would consider genuine.

This goes for a whole spectrum of other nontraditional forms of Buddhism created by opportunists, some of them more spiritually genuine than others, some more predatory than others.

The only reason I bring this up is that it's a difficult set of fault lines. As one directly attacks Beijing's fake Panchen lama, one is fighting for the legitimacy of his lineage and indirectly of that of the Dalai Lama, and thus for all of traditional Tibetan Buddhism. At the same time, one is fighting against what at least some people consider to be legitimate.

This might seem like a moot point, but look at all the fake lamas that people have legitimized in the West. NKT. Geshe Michael Roach. People are willing to go down with the ship for these things, and I suspect that's the case in China as well. At least that's what I'm told by people who did Buddhist ethnography over there. Out the destruction of '59 a lot of very strange things have been created.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We know quite well that Buddhist monks are forbidden from engaging in prognostic disciplines (which are not confined to astrology), but for what reason can we believe that the laity would refrain from their exercise? Doesn't make sense.

Indrajala said:

Evidence suggests they did, which is why it is prohibited in early Buddhist literature, but the extent of it among laity is ambiguous and can only be guessed at.

Malcolm wrote:

Every prohibition points to popular engagement, for example, drinking alcohol in its various forms. Prohibitions point to criticism of existing practices.

Indrajala said:

The problem with your text critical approach is that it ignores subaltern culture and tradition. It is myopic in so far that it declares that, without a contemporary artifact, third country report and so on, this or that thing did not happen.

No, it doesn't work like this. It simply says if there is no evidence, then you cannot make anything more than speculative claims. Even if evidence is available, one has to ask how credible and reliable it is. If you took Taranatha's history at face value you would be led to believe that thousands of arhats once went flying through the sky literally. This doesn't sound like real life to me, but then other historical details can be discerned from these narratives, like names and events.

Malcolm wrote:

Even if you read the Pali Canon you can get this idea. "This doesn't sound like real life to me..." is merely an expression of your positivist bias.

Indrajala said:

It is an approach very much in line with logical positivism, which is why I constantly criticize it as materialist.

I once met an older monk in Bodhgaya who said he was meditating out in the mountains one day and encountered goddesses who had been present when the Buddha walked the earth. I'm quite willing to accept he had this experience (meeting spirits or gods in the wilderness is a common experience around the world), but if he reported details of what the Buddha said based on the testimonies of these goddesses he encountered, how would I be able to gauge or evaluate these new accounts? I couldn't reasonably do this, nor attempt to enter it into the objective historical record. This is not how the study of history works. It is evidence based and all evidence must be evaluated through various means.

Malcolm wrote:

He could have written down what these deities said, and then they would become part of our tradition. That is very much how the treasure tradition works.

Indrajala said:

But if we accept your methodology, we can say nothing of this culture prior to its being noticed by Tang Chinese bureaucrats and Arab generals. But obviously there was a culture there, and a people, and so on.

At best we can say that such and such was believed about pre-Buddhist Tibet by Tibetans in the X century and perhaps some of the details are in fact correct, but we cannot definitively say so.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, exactly, this is about as interesting as a wet rag. This is one approach to history. Thankfully, it is not the only one.

Indrajala said:

It isn't so black and white like you paint it. I'm sure you understand this and instead you're just playing your role as a religious teacher, but like I said you change your opinions every few years so maybe in five or six years this discussion will look very different from your side.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not playing religious teacher. I just finally came to see how crippled the western narrative about Buddhist history really is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Indrajala said:

However, natal predictions and electional astrology is another matter which early Buddhists rejected.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist laity in the 4th -- 1st century BCE? Why would they?

We know quite well that Buddhist monks are forbidden from engaging in prognostic disciplines (which are not confined to astrology), but for what reason can we believe that the laity would refrain from their exercise? Doesn't make sense.

The problem with your text critical approach is that it ignores subaltern culture and tradition. It is myopic in so far that it declares that, without a contemporary artifact, third country report and so on, this or that thing did not happen. It is an approach very much in line with logical positivism, which is why I constantly criticize it as materialist. This is why I criticized Daverupa's approach to the Pali canon.

For example, the problem we have in studying pre-Buddhist Tibet is that the reliable textual record can go no further back than 7th century CE, based on criteria with your methodology will accept.

Our attempts to understand the pre-7th century culture of Tibet and Zhang Zhung can only be mined from Bon and Buddhist sources that are quite late, and pretty much everyone agrees that we can only make broad conjectures based on systematic themes found [mainly] in Bon literature [which is very understudied and poorly understood in the West] which clearly differentiates native Tibetan cultural patterns and practices from imported Indian, as well as Chinese, patterns.

But if we accept your methodology, we can say nothing of this culture prior to its being noticed by Tang Chinese bureaucrats and Arab generals. But obviously there was a culture there, and a people, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land Buddhism and the Pali Canon

Content:

PorkChop said:

There is no proof that the Agamas are any later than the Pali. The oldest existing copies of Pali suttas are actually quite late.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no proof that the Hinayana canon is earlier than Mahāyāna sutras at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land Buddhism and the Pali Canon

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Walpola Rahula demonstrated that the Pali scriptures, rather than being of a lesser vehicle, contain the Bodhisattva path:

PorkChop said:

No, he didn't. There is no bodhicitta in the Pali scriptures. The Theravadan idea of the bodhisattva path is almost completely undeveloped. In modern times, these articles from Rahula are not used in the sense of ecumenicism, they are mostly used as an attempt to show how unnecessary Mahayana sutras are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: Pure Land Buddhism and the Pali Canon

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Walpola Rahula demonstrated that the Pali scriptures, rather than being of a lesser vehicle, contain the Bodhisattva path:

Malcolm wrote:

No, he did not demonstrate this. The Hinayāna canon does not contain the bodhisattva path by any stretch of the imagination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 16th, 2015 at 12:54 AM

Title: Re: Q re Mind Transmission of Nyingma Kama

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

That's sort of what I figured. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I see the problem you are having — this should understood in terms of sound, lights and rays. The speech manifestation is sound manifesting as rays.

The principle of sound, light and rays is more clearly explained in Bon Dzogchen like ZZNG, it but it is an important principle in all Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 11:17 PM

Title: Re: Q re Mind Transmission of Nyingma Kama

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Treasury of Precious Qualities v2 appendix 1

So, I'm reading about the mind transmission of the Nyingma Kama, and the text is discussing the three manifestations of the mind transmission of the Buddhas.

Regarding the "manifestation appearing in the matter of speech emanations", the text describes a syllable AH manifesting. I'm trying to get my mind around whether the intention of the text is that a sound appears or an actual symbolic syllable, and if later, why this isn't a symbolic transmission as opposed to a mind transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

What book are you reading.

Oh, I see the problem you are having — this should understood in terms of sound, lights and rays. The speech manifestation is sound manifesting as rays.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 11:15 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Dan74 said:

That's always been the sticking point for me - what use are the secular academic findings (regarding Buddhism) to my practice? Maybe Jeff and other people who are interested in the academic studies of Buddhism can share their perspectives.

Indrajala said:

If your goal is liberation from saṃsāra, then maybe not so much, but then you might have to ask the question what did saṃsāra originally mean and how did it change over time, and what did it come to mean to different Buddhist thinkers?

As one example, what is the relationship of saṃsāra to astrology? Originally Buddhists rejected astrology and said it was basically inappropriate nonsense, but that changed over time (a parallel development can be traced in India), and by the sixth century you see the suggestion that astrology is in fact quite important and knowledge of it is necessary for liberation. This is even more evident in Tantric traditions in which rites have to be performed according to an astrological schedule.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhist monks may have rejected astrology as a way of making a living, but Buddhist lay people never did — why would they? It's too important scheduling rituals, calendars and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: Q re Mind Transmission of Nyingma Kama

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

So, I'm reading about the mind transmission of the Nyingma Kama, and the text is discussing the three manifestations of the mind transmission of the Buddhas.

Regarding the "manifestation appearing in the matter of speech emanations", the text describes a syllable AH manifesting. I'm trying to get my mind around whether the intention of the text is that a sound appears or an actual symbolic syllable, and if later, why this isn't a symbolic transmission as opposed to a mind transmission?

Malcolm wrote:

What book are you reading.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Jeff. Conventional reality is fuzzy, shaped by deluded perceptions and definitions constructed on the basis of those deluded perceptions.

Those conventional realities are by definition rooted in subjective delusions. You are making the basic error of assuming that conventional = real.

Indrajala said:

Where did I say anything of the sort? Conventional reality is how ordinary beings perceive it, which by definition means a biased and distorted perspective, but nevertheless that's why we call it conventional and not absolute or ultimate. Most people do not have access to any other perspective and hence we work within a perspective useful to most people, not a select few.

Malcolm wrote:

My point, simply, is that there are multiple conventional perspectives, even among human beings.

Indrajala said:

It wasn't so long ago you were expounding a secular line on the historicity of Buddhist scriptures. You might change your opinions yet again in a few years or sooner!

Malcolm wrote:

I came to the conclusion that such lines of thinking were useless for practitioners.

As for my opinions, maybe, in this case, I doubt it.

Indrajala said:

My own view is one of "it depends on what perspective you take". I'm not a materialist as I believe in the causal efficacy of immaterial forces like language, logic and spiritual experiences. However, these points have little bearing on an evidence-based analysis of history run through the gauntlet of precise philology. Buddhist history can be charted out according to a chronology that corresponds well with other parallel developments in the world, like rise and fall of the Mauryas and Kushanas, or the introduction of Hellenistic elements into Indian civilization. That means linear time and cause followed by effect. This analysis has its limits, but it works and yields good results.

Malcolm wrote:

All of this is just chasing shadows...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 9:49 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, "a conventional reality shared by a certain segment of western educated men and women who agree to a certain number of facts [which often shift or are revised]."

All you did was restate my basic statement.

Indrajala said:

No, Malcolm, the conventional reality as we understand it is generally shared with people from other cultures as well.

I'm not sympathetic to people who want to believe the world really is flat because scripture says it is and want to find a way to rationalize that despite their experience and knowledge showing otherwise, or that all the miracles attributed to certain holy figures really must have happened because it is in a book. Such literalism is silly.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, Jeff. Conventional reality is fuzzy, shaped by deluded perceptions and definitions constructed on the basis of those deluded perceptions.

Those conventional realities are by definition rooted in subjective delusions. You are making the basic error of assuming that conventional = real.

It would be better for you to just make a western materialist claim than trying to predicate your argument on Madhyamaka truth claim categories. You are making truth claims about events in time and space from a western physicalist perspective because that is what you believe.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

That said, it's never been clear to me why the study of Buddhist texts is limited to approaches that seem primarily historical and linguistic.

Malcolm wrote:

Whose history? Certainly not mine.

There are gaping holes in this approach to Buddhadharma, oh wait, it has nothing to do with Buddhadharma...

There is of course no problem with people who wish to spend their time engaged in such activities, but it really does have very little to do with Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 8:31 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What you really mean is the conventional reality shared by a certain segment of western educated men and women who agree to a certain number of facts and proceed to offer analysis of past events based on those agreed upon facts [which often shift or are revised].

Indrajala said:

No, it is actually a lot more definite and reasoned than that. It is the evidence based approach to history and philology which assumes a chronology or linear historical development. This sort of perspective allows for the study of multiple religions without accepting their epistemologies and ontologies. The evidence based approach demands criticism and revision when new evidence or good conclusions are presented.

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, "a conventional reality shared by a certain segment of western educated men and women who agree to a certain number of facts [which often shift or are revised]."

All you did was restate my basic statement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 6:35 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, the mere fact that a sutra or a tantra starts with evam maya śrutam ekasmin is sufficient for us to know that we are now in Buddhatime. We don't have worry about anything else.

Indrajala said:

Okay, but let's just be clear that the academy works from a secular perspective, which is basically conventional reality, i.e., how ordinary beings perceive time and causality.

Malcolm wrote:

Which ordinary beings? For example, animals and devas, while ordinary beings, have totally different perspectives about time and causality. What you really mean is the conventional reality shared by a certain segment of western educated men and women who agree to a certain number of facts and proceed to offer analysis of past events based on those agreed upon facts [which often shift or are revised].

Indrajala said:

I'm aware that there's other perspectives which yield their unique fruits, but the academy has a working model based on conventional perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

A conventional perspective, not THE conventional perspective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 15th, 2015 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

That's certainly the finitive view.

In the seen there is only the seen ; in the heard, there is only the heard ; in the sensed, there is only the sensed ; in the mentally perceived, there is only the mentally perceived.
Buddha Shâkyamuni : Ksudrakâgama (Khuddaka-nikâya), I.10.

However:

Monks, I do not say that final knowledge is achieved all at once. On the contrary, final knowledge is achieved by gradual training, by gradual practice, by gradual progress.
Buddha Shâkyamuni : Madhyamâgama (Kîtâgiri Sûtra, 22).

Malcolm wrote:

Both of these sūtras are Hinayāna and should be understood accordingly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I think the more fundamental question is why attempt to demonstrate the historicity of any dharma? For academics, perhaps, but why for practitioners?

The project of locating things in history of validate them doesn't exist in a vacuum. In modern concepts of history are implicit a whole spectrum of ideas about progress, the nature of man, causality, etc. It's tricky business.

Serenity509 said:

How would a Mahayana Buddhist seeking to demonstrate the historicity of the Mahayana sutras...

Malcolm wrote:

What does historicity mean to you?

Yes, our concept is based on the idea of chronicle [lo rgyus], at this time, when beings live this long, there was this teacher, who had this name, who gave this teachings to this retinue and so on. This is sufficient.

In other words, the mere fact that a sutra or a tantra starts with evam maya śrutam ekasmin is sufficient for us to know that we are now in Buddhathime. We don't have worry about anything else.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Direct introduction. What is it?

Content:

Astus said:

It could be said that in the end various teachings lead to the same realisation of suchness. The difference lies in the method, however. Dzogchen has guru yoga, Zen does not. Zen teaches sudden enlightenment, Dzogchen does not. Dzogchen is based on tantras, Zen is not. Zen has nothing to transmit, Dzogchen does. Etc.

Malcolm wrote:

You are suffering from a misconception about the relationship between texts and Dzogchen. Vairocana writes in The Final Utterly Secret Unsurpassed Mind Tantra of Vairocana:

The Pellucid Transcendent State of Samantabhadra asserts that buddhahood cannot be obtained through gathering accumulations and purifying obscurations caused by samsaric impediments.

If one wishes to attain buddhahood, three recognitions are necessary. Those are: the result does not arise from a cause, buddhahood does not arise from the mind and the intimate instruction does not arise from scripture.

Furthermore, all buddhas do not attain buddhahood gradually, but attain buddhahood instantly. If recognized in the morning, there is buddhahood in the morning. If recognized in the evening, there is buddhahood in the evening. Vajrasattva said:

Buddhahood is not attained through purification [sangs].
Through recognizing the three kinds of self-origination, pristine consciousness expands [rgyas] from vidyā.
Manifest Buddhahood is in three instants.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Serenity509 said:

How would a Mahayana Buddhist seeking to demonstrate the historicity of the Mahayana sutras...

Malcolm wrote:

What does historicity mean to you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 8:47 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Which is why Thinley Norbu differentiates between knowledge that comes from karmic mind knowledge that comes from primordial wisdom.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, but how do you know which knowledge comes from primordial wisdom?

BTW, this is the academic discussion subforum.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, right, which means it must by definition be confined to the materialistic myopia that infects Buddhist studies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 14th, 2015 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: Forbidden Archeology

Content:

Indrajala said:

This is how they were intended to be used.

Malcolm wrote:

This notion of "intent" is very problematical.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Question about Sakya Pandita and Sutra Mahamudra

Content:

Bakmoon said:

...would they be able to attain ordinary Sutric Shamatha and Vipashyana

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Tibetan self immolator Sonam Tobgyal slams Chinese policy of oppression in final letter.

<http://www.rfa.org/english/news/tibet/message-07172015165543.html>

Malcolm wrote:

Worth repeating so that some people who do not understand may understand:

"And Tibetans who petition for the welfare of their people are met with repression and arrest," the document says.

"The Chinese have never shown any consideration of the [Tibetan] people's welfare or wishes by addressing their concerns."

"I had to sacrifice my life to bear testimony to the world, and particularly to the Chinese government and people, that we have no freedom to express our grievances or tell the truth," Topgyal wrote.

“I appeal to my Tibetan brothers and sisters, who have the same lineage and blood, to muster the power of unity and harmony by working toward resolving Tibetan issues in a concerted effort.”

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 7:56 AM

Title: Re: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Chinese forces open fire on Tibetan prayer gathering:
Tibetan monk shot in the head

A Tibetan monk was shot in the head and at least six others received gunshot wounds when Chinese security forces opened fire on a crowd in Tawu county, Eastern Tibet on 6 July.

Several hundred Tibetans, including monks and nuns, were gathered at the sacred Machen Pomra mountain to offer prayers to mark the 78th birthday of the Dalai Lama.

Security forces prevented the Tibetans from reaching the top. A number of them went to another part of the mountain to offer prayers.

<http://freetibet.org/news-media/na/chinese-forces-open-fire-tibetan-prayer-gathering>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 5:53 AM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This ignores that in practice that Mahāyāna practitioners in India often memorized large portions of Mahāyāna sutra.

Indrajala said:

That may have been the case as it often is today, but the scriptures are organized in chapters and read like they were systematized, which indicates editorial revision and organization. Now, granted, the Vedas were and still are memorized in chapters, but they're not prose. They also were formulated at a time before writing. Buddhists rapidly took to writing and encouraged it.

Malcolm wrote:

The two are not necessarily in contradiction with one another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 13th, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Tibetan Lives Matter

Content:

Unknown said:

Authorities in Nangchen County, Yushu Prefecture, ordered 10 Tibetan townships to prepare for a summer cultural show, wearing “traditional expensive costumes” to show economic prosperity.

Police threaten Tibetans

The preparations were to take place between 1 and 3 August.

On the third day four police vehicles arrived with armed police, who threatened the people organising the event.

After the event took place, for unknown reasons police started to violently beat the Tibetans, injuring over 30 people.

Malcolm wrote:

And:

Officials brought the animal pelt costumes with them and forced Tibetans to wear them during their performances on stage.

Many Tibetans stopped wearing animal pelts after an appeal by the Dalai Lama in 2006; Tibetans inside Tibet burnt their furs. Since then there has been a marked decrease in Tibetans wearing animal skins.

<http://freetibet.org/news-media/na/police-beat-tibetans-after-cultural-show#.VctzANbfRcA.facebook>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: The Very Idea of Buddhist History

Content:

Indrajala said:

Mahayana scriptures often speak of copying scriptures, which indicates an awareness and encouragement of writing, not memorization and transmission through oral recitation.

Malcolm wrote:

This ignores that in practice that Mahāyāna practitioners in India often memorized large portions of Mahāyāna sutra. For example, the first version of the large Prajñāpāramitā was translated into Tibetan by a translator who had committed the whole thing to memory. Eventually his translation was superseded, but for a least half a century it was the main text Tibetans used.

People are too quick to dismiss memorization and oral transmission in the presence of writing. Writing in India was used to support oral transmission, not supplant it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 10:25 PM

Title: Re: New forum: Dharma Paths Practice Community

Content:

Khalil Bodhi said:

I see you're not interested in joining Malcolm.

We would be happy to change the name to paramitas and we chose the name Dharma Paths rather than Dhamma Paths in order to be more inclusive.

There is no end to fault finding but consider this: in our own imperfect way we are trying to support the practice of the Dharma. If our mission doesn't speak to you or seems flat out wrong then who are we to deny your opinion? All are welcome if they come in good faith, take refuge in the Triple Gem and try to live their lives according to the five precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

I am point these things out to you because it is very difficult to create a so called "Pan-Buddhist" forum. E-Sangha was such an attempt and it suffered because people who follow various streams of Dharma often have little to share with each other because their views about the path are so radically different.

For example, you are coming at this from a Thervada POV, so naturally you language everything in that manner. Changing the name from Dhamma to Dharma wont change anything, no more than if I change my name from Malcolm to Phuntsok or Ananda Metteya, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 10:10 PM

Title: Re: New forum: Dharma Paths Practice Community

Content:

Khalil Bodhi said:

We have a section devoted to the paramis

Malcolm wrote:

Pāramitās. Mahayānīs practice pāramitās, not paramis. If you want to be inclusive, you have to be inclusive.

Khalil Bodhi said:

The one requirement is that we asknow all members to have taken refuge and try their best to follow the five precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

As defined by whom? What does refuge mean? This is a very loaded term. Does it mean you have a groovy Tibetan or Chinese name? Does it simply mean you are interested in Buddhadharma?

As for the five precepts, whose interpretation?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: New forum: Dharma Paths Practice Community

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

As I was taught, ultimate bodhicitta relates to the higher training of wisdom, and thus the right view of wisdom and intention, and relative bodhicitta relates to all parts of the eight fold path as one is practicing them with a different view and a different motivation.

And as I was taught, empowerment and direct introduction relate to the higher training of wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

Please explain to me where bodhicitta, etc., are explained in texts dealing with the eight-fold path.

You are conflating the three trainings, śīla, samadhi and prajñā, with the eight-fold path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 9:53 PM

Title: Re: New forum: Dharma Paths Practice Community

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Sure. Different paths have different schema, but they can all be understood in the context of the original eight-fold path of the historical Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

Which Historical Buddha? Sikkhī, Vipassī, Kāśyapa?

The eightfold path is a Hinayāna path structure. We don't really practice that way in Mahāyāna, Vajrayāna and Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: New forum: Dharma Paths Practice Community

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I've been a vajrayana practitioner for 25 years, and situating my practice in the context of the three higher trainings (ethics, concentration, wisdom) that span the eight fold path, is a standard part of shedra, and a standard part of Tibetan mahayana and vajrayana exegesis. For me personally, if one doesn't understand this, it's hard to really understand how one is a Buddhist if one's main practice, like mine, is some vajrayana sadhana that was discovered in the wall of a cave as a terma. Every aspect of vajrayana practice is easily understandable in the context of the eightfold path-- though with a vajrayana view.

Malcolm wrote:

The eight-fold path does not have bodhicitta. It does not contain the practice of the perfections. It does not begin with empowerment. It does not have direct introduction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: New forum: Dharma Paths Practice Community

Content:

David N. Snyder said:

The current structure follows the practice related to the 8 fold path. As far as I know, all Buddhist traditions, all schools honor and value the 8 fold path, but as noted in posts previously, the best way to ensure that all schools are represented is for us to have membership from all the schools and the format and structure could still be tweaked as needed.

http://www.dhammadownload.com/index.php?title=9_points_unifying_Theravada_and_Mahayana

Malcolm wrote:

The path of Mahāyāna is not the eight-fold path. The path of the Mahāyāna is the path of the six perfections. The path of Vajrayāna in general is not the eightfold path, it is the path of creation and completion stages. The path of the Dzogchen is none of these.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 6:19 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Without starting World War III, China cannot and will not be forced out of Tibet. One thing we can do, though, is support China's liberalization, which has in recent years included a more positive stance toward Buddhism in general.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't care about Buddhism in general. I care about Tibetans, Tibetan culture and Tibetan Buddhism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 5:18 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The situation is a little more complex than just calling the Chinese Gvt. "enemies of Buddhism." China wishes to control Buddhism within its borders, and it cannot control Tibetans, so it exercises deadly force against Tibetans and Tibetan Buddhist establishments, while making a show of the fake Panchen for decorum and, it seems, to delude themselves into thinking they have a liberal policy towards Tibetan Buddhism, when in fact their policies are anything but liberal.

Serenity509 said:

I am not going to claim that China has always been a blessing for Tibet, but I will give China some credit for improving the living conditions of average Tibetans:

...

I am not going to apologize for bringing these things to our attention. Ideological or partisan thinking that ignores real world facts and the thoughts and feelings of all people involved is not helpful to Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

Fact 1) the Chinese refuse to educate Tibetans in Tibet. This alone undermines Tibetan Buddhism, not to mention the rest of Tibetan culture.

Fact 2) Tibetans have the highest rates of unemployment in China Fact 3) Tibetan women are routinely forcibly sterilized Fact 4) Mortality rates for Tibetans are higher than for average Chinese citizens Fact 5) Nomads are forced into resettlement towns, places they do not want to live.

Fact 6) The infrastructure investments China made in Tibet were not for the purpose of benefitting Tibetans.

I could go on and on.

The fact is that China should get out of Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no point to that. Most of the participants are not Tibetan Buddhist anyway. We know the reason for this.

Serenity509 said:

If the Chinese government is an enemy of Buddhism, then we should please demand that Buddhist leaders from our own traditions not participate in the World Buddhist Forum, which is sponsored by the Chinese government. People call for boycotts all the time over far more trivial matters.

Malcolm wrote:

The situation is a little more complex than just calling the Chinese Gvt. "enemies of Buddhism." China wishes to control Buddhism within its borders, and it cannot control Tibetans, so it exercises deadly force against Tibetans and Tibetan Buddhist establishments, while making a show of the fake Panchen for decorum and, it seems, to delude themselves into thinking they have a liberal policy towards Tibetan Buddhism, when in fact their policies are anything but liberal.

Serenity509 said:

It would seem a little naive to insist that the government of India has no political motives whatsoever in providing refuge for the Dalai Lama and the Tibetans in exile

Malcolm wrote:

India and its relationship to the tiny Tibetan exile community is not on the table for discussion right now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 4:31 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Serenity509 said:

I think we should take the thoughts and feelings of these Tibetans into account.

Malcolm wrote:

These Tibetans are just ordinary folks doing what they are told, putting on a show for western reporters at the behest of the Gvt.

Really, S509, you have no idea what you are talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Serenity509 said:

What I recommend doing, then, is staging a boycott of the next World Buddhist Forum, and calling out any Buddhist leaders outside China who participate in it. I'm sorry if I'm wrong for making this suggestion.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no point to that. Most of the participants are not Tibetan Buddhist anyway. We know the reason for this.

Serenity509 said:

Is the China of today the China of Chairman Mao? Should it be supported in its liberalization or should it be feared? In recent years, the Chinese government has taken a supportive stance on Buddhism, and I think that should be encouraged.

Malcolm wrote:

China is suppressing Tibetan Buddhism along with Tibetans very harshly. In fact, virtually all Tibetans have all had their passports rescinded and are not allowed to travel out the PRC bloc, or even from province to province. Also China is interfering with the traditional nomadic culture of Tibet through resettlements. Lhasa is being dismantled house by house., etc.

Serenity509 said:

The United Nations is set to receive evidence that Chinese People's Armed Police troops have repeatedly opened fire on unarmed Tibetan protesters calling for religious freedom over the past seven years.

Evidence of deadly attacks by the Chinese paramilitary on Buddhist demonstrators across the Tibetan Plateau – provided by witnesses, whistleblowers, and a secret government document smuggled out of Tibet – will be presented to the UN's Committee against Torture later this year.

"The usage of live ammunition against peaceful Tibetan protestors does exist and it is also disproportionate," Prime Minister Lobsang Sangay, the head of Tibet's government-in-exile, told The Diplomat. "This is clearly in violation of international law," said the prime minister, a former research fellow at prestigious Harvard Law School who wrote his graduate thesis on Buddhism and Human Rights.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://thediplomat.com/2015/04/chinas-crackdowns-in-tibet/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I can tell you for a fact that no Tibetans inside the PRC have any faith in the Panchen puppet, not matter what photos you may see.

Serenity509 said:

How can one be certain of this, without conducting some sort of survey or poll?

Malcolm wrote:

Because I know Tibetans and have travelled to Tibet and China. I bear no ill towards China or the Chinese, but I think the attempt of the Chinese Gvt. to manipulate Tibetans through Dharma is as pathetic as it is transparent. No one takes this Panchen Lama seriously. Add this to the fact that he has been associated by his PRC handlers with the Shugden Cult, and you can really understand why no one pays him any heed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This not the issue.

Serenity509 said:

Unless the Tibetan Buddhists who come to the disputed Panchen Lama for blessings are just paid actors of the CPC, and unless the Tibetan Buddhist teachers and leaders living in Tibet who express support for him are paid actors of the CPC, then I think their perspective matters.

Malcolm wrote:

I can tell you for a fact that no Tibetans inside the PRC have any faith in the Panchen puppet, not matter what photos you may see.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: More Propaganda - China's Panchen Lama gets high profile

Content:

Serenity509 said:

I'm not going to further comment on the average living conditions of Tibet before the Chinese invasion,

Malcolm wrote:
They were much happier.

Serenity509 said:
When it comes to the disputed Panchen Lama, I know about the circumstances that led to his ordination. All I'm trying to do is look at him as a fellow human being, and see whether or not he honestly tries to fulfill his role, a role he did not choose, in a way that is helpful to others.

Malcolm wrote:
He is a puppet, a tool.

Serenity509 said:
Buddhism teaches that it's unfair to judge people without taking into consideration their causes and conditions, if you even judge others at all.

Malcolm wrote:
I am not judging him personally. I am judging his role and how he is being used.

Serenity509 said:
Who is going to show sympathy, though, for Chinese Buddhists and for Tibetan Buddhists who choose to stay in Tibet?

Malcolm wrote:
This not the issue.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 1:09 AM
Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi
Content:
joy&peace said:
the 1 idea of trying to constantly fight - is that it makes people stronger very inferior to the understanding that when we work together we get much more done.

Malcolm wrote:
Everybody on this planet needs to understand the real situation. The real situation is dire.

If, internationally, everyone insists on their "right" to drive their economies on fossil fuels to reach an imagined prosperity enjoyed in the US, for example, this dire situation will get much worse.

Cooperation is nice, but people can only cooperate if they share common values and goals. If people insist on their own country first rather than this planet first, your much valued cooperation is never going to happen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

joy&peace said:

Disparaging others never helps.

True story.

And smiles - do a lot of good. Disparaging others leads to a quicksand of disparagement; it is very true.

You and I may be very strong, non-attached to self - unable to be injured ; but others may be injured, so it is not good to say things like this, ' we can't do it, ' etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Coddling others doesn't help either.

Smiles are fine when they are appropriate. It is not a time to be smiling about the state of the planet.

And we wont be able to do it if people continue to make excuses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 12th, 2015 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

joy&peace said:

Yet it is never of any use to say ' it is too late for them, ' and makes no sense, not to me at least.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it will be too late for many of the creatures and plants that are going to become and are becoming extinct in Tibet and Western China if China continues its present course.

It is going to be too late for creatures and plants in the sea if we do not get our collective global shit together and stop our present course.

It is going to be too late for any cultural diversity if we do not halt the juggernaut of global consumerist expansion.

Nice emoticons and lovely sentiments will not adequately address the present crisis we are facing as a globe.

It is a question of priorities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 11:56 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

joy&peace said:

' Eliminating fossil fuels is putting the needs of third world peoples first. Why should they wish to repeat the errors of the first world? Doesn't make sense. ' - Malcolm

The issue, dear friend, that I have is not that you are wrong - we have learned better, so to speak, you are correct.

Malcolm wrote:

The issue is that people in the third world should be educating themselves so as not to take the disastrous turn second world countries like China and the former Soviet bloc have taken, polluting themselves into oblivion. It is too late for China, they have already moved down that road. Their economy is in shambles from the bursting of the housing bubble, the credit bubble is going to collapse soon, all because of a mad rush to "expand" their economy. They have wantonly destroyed not only their own environment, but they are destroying the environment of Tibetans and so on, all in the name of providing a western lifestyle to their elites.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Virupa's Mahamudra Doha

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since this is my translation, I will answer. Until you are realized, you are deluded.

Astus said:

The poem seems to advocate entering Mahamudra directly and not through various stages, so the question if this is interpreted in a different way.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not about that, it is about being attached to methods.

It also says:

"Mahamudra" is a mental imputation of the childish.

It also clarifies that a guru is indispensable:

Having been connected with a sublime Guru,

The main verse cited from this by Sakyapas is the following:

All sentient beings are emanations of mahamudra, the essence of those emanations is the forever non-arising dharmadhatu, also all characteristics of dualistic appearances, happiness, suffering and so on, are the play of mahamudra, the original dharmata.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Virupa's Mahamudra Doha

Content:

Astus said:

Is <https://awakeningtoreality.blogspot.com/2014/02/virupa-treasury-of-doha.html> known among Sakyapas? If so, how do they explain it, especially the following stanza:

"Some are completely tortured with empowerment rites, some always count their rosary saying hum phat!
some consume shit, piss, blood, semen and meat, some meditate the yoga of nadi and vayu, but all are deluded."

Malcolm wrote:

Since this is my translation, I will answer. Until you are realized, you are deluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Before rejecting the above sources as somehow right-wing or corporately controlled, please consider the actual poverty reduction that's taken place in China, and how it could have been accomplished without fossil fuels.

Malcolm wrote:

China is horribly polluted, and there is still widespread poverty, poverty with toys.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 11th, 2015 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Could you please explain how forcing third world countries to cease the use of fossil fuels and nuclear energy would not disrupt their economic well-being?

Malcolm wrote:

Can you please explain to me how rapidly increased global warming caused by third world development is not going to destroy their economic well being?

Serenity509 said:

My point is that we should put the needs of third world peoples first, and we should listen to their leaders before making demands on them.

Malcolm wrote:

Eliminating fossil fuels is putting the needs of third world peoples first. Why should they wish to repeat the errors of the first world? Doesn't make sense.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 10th, 2015 at 9:59 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Serenity509 said:

It just seems to me very unsettling that the proposals made by people who support the idea of anthropogenic climate change would so negatively impact third world peoples. I wish that global warming advocates didn't have any ulterior motives that could potentially harm others.

Malcolm wrote:

If climate change is not halted and we do not globally change our patterns of consumption of energy and means of producing it, there won't be any world worth living in at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 10th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Serenity509 said:

Patrick Moore, one of the original founders of Green Peace:

Malcolm wrote:

This man was never one of the original founders of Greenpeace and he is a shill for the Nuke Industry.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 10th, 2015 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: The Point of No Return: Climate Change Nightmares Are Al

Content:

WeiHan said:

Keynesian theory failed also because it failed to recognise this and also its failed attempted.

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding? The US Economy has proven the validity of Keynesian Economics through the vast wealth disparity that has appeared in the US as a result of abandoning Keynesian policies.

WeiHan said:

Governments have never prove to do right thing. Mostly is done for self interest. The proof is in the way they manage economy. Hoping that they will manage climate change is like handling them another excuse to manipulate society for self interest again. So, even if global warming is true, this is not the solution.

Malcolm wrote:

What sort of libertarian koolaid are you drinking?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Lamdre how many participant each session?

Content:

tobias said:

Hello,

in a text on lamde I read that you practice in groups of maximum 25 participants. It was said that even Verupa was not able to transmit lamde to more than 25 participants at the same time, Thats why the maste has to repeat teachings several times to teach all the participant.

Now I found a picture that shows lots of people receiving Lamdre in Malaysia. The article says that there are 600 participants.

<http://www.sakya.com.au/news/lamdre-malaysia>

How does that fit together?

Greetings
tobias

Malcolm wrote:
Refers to the empowerments, not the instructions.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, August 9th, 2015 at 3:33 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

Śakyamuni Buddha demonstrated control over the elements many times, for example, levitating to the height of 14 palm trees. If we assume an average height of 30 feet, this is roughly 500 feet in the air, roughly the equivalent of a 50 story building.

zenman said:
Is levitation always considered a sign of full realisation?

Malcolm wrote:
No, of course not, but control over the elements is a good place to start indicating one's realization.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 11:49 PM
Title: Re: Natural State and Nature
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Rig pa self originates from the basis because rig pa is just the recognition of the basis as one's own state itself.

Paul said:
Fantastic post.

Stupid question time, though. The term 'state' is used often in English language Dzogchen literature, especially in the DC. However there seems to me to be several meanings and interpretations of the word (same with 'condition') that have divergent consequences as to how the sentence should be understood. So how, precisely, are you using it here?

Bumping my question - answering it will be a massive help for me. This has always confused me...

Malcolm wrote:

In Tibetan, the word generally translated as "state" is ngang. This in turn has three interrelated meanings: 1) continuum [rgyud] or native place [gshis ka]; 2) nature [rang bzhin] or modality [rnam tshul]; 3) intrinsic power or effortless natural perfection ['bad med lhun sgrub].

Here I mean nature or modality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 10:26 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

I have also read him carefully. He is familiar with madhyamaka view but he hasn't realised it. There is no question about this because he keeps on saying very immature things. I am not talking about his persona here, only what he teaches.

Malcolm wrote:

Someone who has realized Madhyamaka view is a first stage bodhisattva.

zenman said:

What is your point?

Malcolm wrote:

That such a person is by every definition an awakened person. Someone who has not realized Madhyamaka view is by every definition not an awakened person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

I have also read him carefully. He is familiar with madhyamaka view but he hasn't realised it. There is no question about this because he keeps on saying very immature things. I am not talking about his persona here, only what he teaches.

Malcolm wrote:

Someone who has realized Madhyamaka view is a first stage bodhisattva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 4:05 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I have read of two kinds of rainbow bodies: the one where the body shrinks and the second where the body disappears entirely.

The first is partial rainbow body.

tomamundsen said:

Is partial rainbow body the 16th bhumi, buddhahood without remainder?

Malcolm wrote:

No. It is Buddhahood with signs.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 4:03 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

Awareness, primordial state, consciousness, rigpa, wakefulness... There is no fixed common system for translating these words is there...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, every translator tends to have a fixed jargon, though, they do evolve. The reason there is no fixed system is that earlier translations [1995 and before], whether by Tibetans or Westerners, tend to be pretty inaccurate. Things are getting more accurate simply because there is more commentarial literature available than there was prior to this time.

zenman said:

Tulku Urgyen's quote btw wonderfully has lead us back to the original topic! I bet that doesn't happen very often after over 120 messages He says that when thoughtfree wakefulness grows longer and longer and all the way up to 24/7 then one has attained great perfection.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, when one's increases one's ability to remain in nonconceptual wisdom [aka thoughtfree wakefulness, mi rtog pa'i ye she s], then one is Buddha. One's state is already "the great perfection." But one's ability to be in that knowledge [rig pa] or not is the difference between a sentient being who wanders the six realms [never], a practitioner on the path [sometimes] or a Buddha [always].

zenman said:

That is precisely Jackson Peterson's message as well, though he is not an authorised dzogchen teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

Being a parrot is relatively easy. Living that knowledge is not so easy. There are a lot of Dzogchen parrots, not so many Dzogchen garudas. The difference is this:

And this:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Chime Sog Thig Teachings from Shenphen Dawa Rinpoche

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I always seem to get into trouble when I post something from SDR.

Malcolm wrote:

Revise to...

dzogchungpa said:

I always seem to get into trouble when I post something.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you study a little bit?

zenman said:

Perhaps I should yes. There are so many books on Dozgchen though that I don't know where to begin with. And even if I did I am en extremely lousy reader...

dzogchungpa said:

I'm not a scholar, but here's a quote from Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche's "As It Is, Vol. I": By training thoroughly in this way, discursive thinking will gradually grow less and less, and moments of thoughtfree wakefulness will grow longer and longer. When this nonconceptual wakefulness lasts one hour, you have attained the level of an arhat. When it lasts throughout the day, you have attained the level of a bodhisattva. When it is uninterrupted day and night, you have become a fully enlightened buddha. There is nothing more precious than this.

zenman said:

Interesting quote, especially because it mentions the requirement of an arhat which is hinayana directly compared to mahayana- and vajrayana-attainments. I understand Tulku Urgyen was a great master but I wonder if this is actually so. This is in fact what I was after with my former question reg. 24/7 awareness vs. fully enlightened buddhahood. I have come across a few people who say that their awareness is uninterrupted day and night and has been for many years. And it seemed to me that it might actually be so without any "specialty" or egoism to them. I thought 24/7 was what arhats are in. I think this is a wonderful degree of attainment but surely anyone I have met saying this can't stick their hand into fire without getting hurt. That's why I was asking Malcolm for the quote, to get a reliable source or sources on this exact issue.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone's awareness is 24/7/365 for eons and eons. But not everyone's knowledge of their primordial state is 24/7/365. Those whose knowledge of their primordial state is 24/7/365 are Buddhas.

Wakefulness, btw is Eric Pema Kunzangs translation du jour for wisdom, primordial wisdom, pristine awareness aka ye shes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

Is not total realisation and 24/7 rigpa two different things?

Malcolm wrote:

No.

zenman said:

Can you come up with a quote to back this up?

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you study a little bit?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 12:25 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts
Content:

zenman said:
Is not total realisation and 24/7 rigpa two different things?

Malcolm wrote:
No.

zenman said:
I have read of two kinds of rainbow bodies: the one where the body shrinks and the second where the body disappears entirely.

Malcolm wrote:
The first is partial rainbow body.

zenman said:
Didn't know that about Shakyamuni. What is the source of this levitation story?

Malcolm wrote:
Pali Canon, forget exactly which sutta. But there are also many examples in Mahāyāna sūtras.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, August 8th, 2015 at 12:12 AM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts
Content:

paël said:
In some sutras Arhats dissolve their body by fire. Is this rainbow body?

Malcolm wrote:
No, this is not rainbow body.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 11:57 PM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts
Content:

Malcolm wrote:

NN says he is not there. This is why when students come to him and tell him that they are in a state of rigpa 24/7, he suggests that in order to prove it, they put their hand in the fire. So far as I know, there have been no takers.

If you are totally realized, you have total control over the elements.

zenman said:

Okey. This is a bit confusing for me. I thought 24/7 rigpa concerns mind (exhaustion of karmic winds) and awareness only. Is this not so? Why? Did Shakyamuni ever demonstrate control over the five elements in any physically astounding manner?

Malcolm wrote:

Total realization in Dzogchen means exhausting all mental and physical karma in this life — this is what is meant by achieving the body of great transference, like Garab Dorje, Vimalamitra and Padmasambhava. Some people say that Khenpo Ngawang Palzang had this realization too.

Even if you do not have total realization in this life, you can still manifest what is called rainbow body, where your body shrinks and disappears in seven days.

Śakyamuni Buddha demonstrated control over the elements many times, for example, levitating to the height of 14 palm trees. If we assume an average height of 30 feet, this is roughly 500 feet in the air, roughly the equivalent of a 50 story building.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 9:31 PM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

The Practice of Dzogchen, by Longchenpa, translator: Tulku Thondup, editor: Harold Talbott. "The main emphasis of Dzogpa Chenpo is to attain and perfect the realization of the true nature of mind, Intrinsic Awareness (Rigpa), which is the Buddha Mind or Buddha-Essence."

Malcolm wrote:

Is this Tulku Thundup's point of view, or someone else's?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

Okey. Egoistic claiming is surely delusional. By sitting in fire I meant being exposed to fire.

Malcolm wrote:

He means sitting in a fire, like Padmasambhava.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

Well, I doubt if he did. I think statements like this that you are enlightened only when you sit in fire can be very misleading and discouraging, although I assume this is not all what NN has said on this. How many of those who hear this statement made by an authority such as NN actually get there? Zip, like one in a billion, if even that many.

Malcolm wrote:

NN says he is not there. This is why when students come to him and tell him that they are in a state of rigpa 24/7, he suggests that in order to prove it, they put their hand in the fire. So far as I know, there have been no takers.

If you are totally realized, you have total control over the elements.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot achieve rainbow body by practicing according to the Kun byed rGyal po or the five sems sde lungs. Kun byed rgyal po does not provide a path, because it is a teaching on the basis [gzhi], called byang chub sems in Tibetan.

alpha said:

Volume 6 of the commentaries on Kunjed Gyalpo is on meditation. Prajna through meditation.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, of course, Kun byed rgyal po talks about view, meditation, behavior and the result. But in general, there is no practice of sems sde independent from mahā and anuyoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

The text of "The Supreme Source" cuts through all provisional teachings and what remains is "Pure and Total Consciousness" only. It cuts through every practice and belief dearly held.

Malcolm wrote:

Kun byed rgyal po is a sems sde text. It is principally concerned with the first statement of Garab Dorje, "Direct Introduction." It does not address the second two statements, "Remain without doubt" and "Continue in that state." [The three statements of Garab Dorje may actually be found in the ultimate root tantra of all Dzogchen, the origin of all Dharma teachings and specifically, all Dzogchen teachings, the sGra thal 'gyur Tantra.]

You cannot achieve rainbow body by practicing according to the Kun byed rGyal po or the five sems sde lungs. Kun byed rgyal po does not provide a path, because it is a teaching on the basis [gzhi], called byang chub sems in Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, August 7th, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Hint: maybe you don't understand the "context" being referred to and therefore you can't understand how they could be identical.

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa and the gzhi are not identical. Why? Because if they were, the gzhi would never mistaken for an external object. It is because one is ignorant [ma rig pa] of the gzhi that samsara happens.

When you read my forthcoming book, you will then understand how it is that rig pa neither the nature of the mind, nor the gzhi.

steve_bakr said:

Keep us posted on your forthcoming book. I hope it is available in Kindle format.

Malcolm wrote:

At this point, we are not doing an electronic edition.

The very short explanation is, according to the upadesha class tantras such as the root tantra of Dzogchen, sgra thal gyur, that there is a neutral awareness [shes pa] that arises out of the basis because of a stirring of vāyu [rlung], sometimes mistranslated as prāṇa (prāṇa is a vāyu). Because there is a movement, accompanied by sound [sgra], lights ['od] and rays [zer]*, there are appearances that arise out of the basis. When these appearances are recognized as one's own state, this recognition is what is called "rig pa", it is also given the name "shes rab" or prājñā. When these appearances are not recognized as one's own state, this is called "ma rig pa", avidyā.

It is for this reason, for example, that the famous Aspiration of Buddha Samantabhadra begins:

All of the universe and beings, samsara and nirvana have one basis. The two paths and two results are the enchantments of knowledge [rig pa] and ignorance [ma rig pa].

The two paths are the path to buddhahood, which is based on rig pa; and the path of the six realms which is based on ma rig pa.

Further, we can see that vidyā, rig pa comes from the basis, but it is not the basis:

Vidyā self-originate from that basis itself without bearing the faults of external and internal reification, free from the tainted darkness of amnesia, therefore, it self-appears unaffected by faults.

Rig pa self originates from the basis because rig pa is just the recognition of the basis as one's own state itself. It self-originate because you did not receive this knowledge from someone else, you must recognize it in a direct perception called the direct perception of dharmitā, your real nature. The so-called "direct introduction" is merely a method to introduce you to "your own face." This is one reason why the metaphor of the mirror is so important in Dzogchen teachings. This rig pa, this true knowledge of one's own state, is therefore unaffected by subject and object dualism; is free from non-recollection, because once you have this unmistakable knowledge, i.e., vidyā, you will never forget it, and therefore, vidyā is unaffected by any faults whatsoever.

However western translators may translate these terms, what they mean in Tibetan is very precise, and between Chos and Bon, have exactly the same meaning.

You can see again in this following passage that shes pa, awareness, and knowledge, rig pa, vidyā, are used in two different ways:

One's vidyā [rig pa, knowledge of the basis] abides in a pristine state, not terrified by the terrors of the three realms, not attached to sensuous qualities.

Physical form and color do not exist in self-originated nonconceptual awareness [shes pa].

One's vidyā, rigpa, knowledge, abides in a pristine state because there are no physical forms and colors in consciousness; rig pa is the knowledge that the appearances of the five lights and so on in one's fundamental unfabricated consciousness are not substantial or real. They are merely the energy of the basis, from which that awareness is inseparable.

When this knowledge does not arise, then as the Aspiration of Samantabhadra states:

First, since vidyā/rig pa did not arise in the basis deluded sentient beings cannot recall anything and are confused.

The cause of that is the delusion of ignorance.

Within that is a sudden unconsciousness in which a fearful awareness stirs without clarity,

Within that self and other are perceived as enemies.

From the gradual buildup of traces,
entry into the process of samsara happens.

If vidyā is the basis, then there is no way anyone could ever be deluded, samsara would never have happened. Indeed, there is popular strand of misconception in Dzogchen that claims that samsara never did happen. While this is true from the point of view of Samantabhadra [and hence the rhetoric of the sems sde literature], this is not true from our point of view, since we are continuing in samsara and gather karma and building up traces. If we are in the state of knowledge that is the state of Samantabhadra, then for us samsara will have never happened. But until we are in that knowledge 24/7/365 and therefore totally beyond time, then we are still in samsara.

Since vidyā is not the basis, by mistaking the nature of the sounds, lights and rays that come from the basis for being dualistic phenomena, one is trapped by avidyā, ma rig pa and one cycles endlessly in the three realms. Dzogchen practice is the means to reverse this error because the basis of knowledge and ignorance is the same, and knowledge and ignorance arise on the basis of an awareness [shes pa] that exists as part of the basis.

My book expends a little energy in explaining these critical points in an introduction, but my explanation is not novel nor is it my own. I merely follow an outline that is common in both Chos and Bon Dzogchen teachings, and I use many citations from untranslated commentaries of Vimalamitra on the 17 Dzogchen tantras to illustrate my points. The only novel thing in my explanation is that I show the link between the initial shes pa, awareness or fundamental consciousness that arises from the basis, how that becomes pristine consciousness [ye shes] when in the presence of rig pa or knowledge of its own state; and how it becomes yid kyi rnam shes or "mental consciousness" and mind [sems] when it does not recognize its own state and engages in the dualistic imputations of because of ignorance [ma rig pa]. But even here, I do so on the basis of citations and reasonings drawn from classic commentaries, and I cannot claim any of these ideas as novel or as being my own.

M

* The principle of sounds, lights and rays is more fully explained in the Zhang Zhung sNyan brGyud of Bon; in Chos, it is mainly confined to describing the experience of the bardo of dharmatā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: The Point of No Return: Climate Change Nightmares Are Ahead

Content:

Unknown said:

Evidence for the above scenario comes in large part from our best understanding of what happened 250 million years ago, during the "Great Dying," when more than 90 percent of all oceanic species perished after a pulse of carbon dioxide and methane from land-based sources began a period of profound climate change. The conditions that triggered "Great Dying" took hundreds of thousands of years to develop. But humans have been emitting carbon dioxide at a much quicker rate, so the current mass extinction only took 100 years or so to kick-start.

With all these stressors working against it, a hypoxic feedback loop could wind up destroying some of the oceans' most species-rich ecosystems within our lifetime. A recent study by Sarah Moffitt of the University of California-Davis said it could take the ocean thousands of years to recover. "Looking forward for my kid, people in the future are not going to have the same ocean that I have today," Moffitt said.

Malcolm wrote:

Read more: <http://www.rollingstone.com/politics/news/the-point-of-no-return-climate-change-nightmares-are-already-here-20150805#ixzz3i314rN8i>

Follow us: @rollingstone on Twitter | RollingStone on Facebook

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

If you can see above, the statement of Lopon Tenzin Namdak Rinpoche regarding Awareness, then i can agree easy with this explanation. Awareness is more "understandable" for me whereas knowledge not so well..... Cant' help it.

KY

Malcolm wrote:

There is no different interpretation. Please consult JLA. Knowledge is the more correct word.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek M,

Please, don't forget that the interpretations of Rigpa can be:

According Lopon Tenzin Namdak Rinpoche: "Awareness". So in Bon it seems to be that we have a different interpretation of Rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:

We have discussed this before, and this state of affairs is mainly due to the influence of western translators on Tibetan Lamas, not the other way around.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 10:13 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Hint: maybe you don't understand the "context" being referred to and therefore you can't understand how they could be identical.

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa and the gzhi are not identical. Why? Because if they were, the gzhi would never mistaken for an external object. It is because one is ignorant [ma rig pa] of the gzhi that samsara happens.

When you read my forthcoming book, you will then understand how it is that rig pa neither the nature of the mind, nor the gzhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 10:02 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I would say that the description of Rigpa as "knowledge" is too narrow and limited as applied to Dzogchen. It might be more accurate to describe Rigpa as "cognizance" but there is much more to it. It is not enough to go with a definition from a Tibetan dictionary. You must draw from original Dzogchen texts to appreciate the depth of Rigpa in Dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you know Tibetan? If not, how can you say you are drawing on original Dzogchen texts?

steve_bakr said:

A translator cannot rely on a dictionary meaning for Rigpa.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, they must able to read actual original Dzogchen texts, there are but a handful of people who can do that, and they do not all do it well.

steve_bakr said:

One must be intimately familiar with original Dzogchen texts and the quintessential masters. I would be very dubious of a teacher who described Rigpa merely as "knowledge," and who did not give to Rigpa its quintessential and pivotal place in his Dzogchen teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

Rig pa fundamentally means "knowledge of the basis." Rig pa is not the nature of the mind. The basis is the nature of the mind. This is a point that Chogyal Namkhai Norbu stresses again and again. Of course, if you are a follower of Jaxchen, well, then...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, August 6th, 2015 at 9:53 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I am correct, by the way, in reporting that Dzogchen masters such as Longchenpa define Rigpa as the nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Citation please?

steve_bakr said:

The description of Rigpa as nature of mind occurs in the works, "Natural Perfection: Longchenpa's Radical Dzogchen," "Original Perfection: Vairotsana's Five Early Transmissions," "Self-Liberation Through Seeing With Naked Awareness" (Padmasambhava), and elsewhere.

Malcolm wrote:

The term rig pa is not used in the five early lungs translated by Vairocana, anywhere.

You have not cited a text, you have merely mentioned some texts. A citation means producing the passage in question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 9:05 PM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

tingdzin said:

Malcolm: The "Old Tibetan Chronicles" is a fairly mythic account of the founding of the Tibetan Empire. What you seem to be referring to are the "Old Tibetan Annals", a year-by-year, fairly bare-bones account of what the court was up to. And, by the way, there is lots of external evidence against which Chinese testimony for the period can be and has been checked. Again, we cannot say that Buddhism was mostly Chinese until 780, and leave it at that, because (among other reasons) much of the remaining temple art from the very earliest temples reflects Central Asian and Kashmiri rather than Chinese styles.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://otdo.aa.tufs.ac.jp/index.cgi?page=History>.

Buddhism went through three phases in Tibet: the earliest period which began in the reign of Srongtsan Gampo. Buddhism was suppressed following his death; and revived again during the reign of Me Agtsom, with largely Chinese influences at the court.

A contingent of Khotanese monks indeed fled to Tibet in 740, but shortly thereafter left for Gandhara following a small pox epidemic.

Later, during the reign of Trisong Detsen, Tibet dominated all of Central Asia, Kashmir, Gilgit and so on. It is not surprising then that Tibetans have art and stylistic influences from Khotan, also they invaded it and controlled it, and we know that the monastic hierarchy of Tibetan monasteries was derived from Central Asia.

Still, epigraphically, there is very little mention of an intellectual presence of Central Asian monks. It seems, when you read Tibetan historical works on the period, the dominant external Buddhist influences were Chinese and Indian, with Indian Buddhism eventually supplanting Chinese Buddhism.

tingdzin said:

IMO, it is also already a major mistaken assumption to believe that whatever Buddhism did exist on the plateau from 600 - 900 was the same as that which arose after the period of fragmentation, although this is a topic too big for chat rooms.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 5:46 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

I think you mean 'Tibetan Buddhism' here?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I mean Tibetans.

Look, the Old Tibetan Chronicles are contemporary court records of the kind of you find in China, with corroboration of the kind you invoked from non-court sources.

Indrajala said:

No, it wasn't so simplistic as this. I'm not really convinced one could argue that Tibetan Buddhism in the Yarlung period was ignored simply because the Chinese were at odds with the Yarlung Empire.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone knows that during the time of Trisong Detsen, there were only 7 ordained Buddhist monks of Tibetan origin in Tibet. But there were Chinese Monks, Khotanese Monks etc., there as well. We also know that the court Buddhism of Tibet was largely Chinese until the 1780's, when, for various reasons, the winds changed and Tibetans decided to throw in their lot with the Indians.

Indrajala said:

Koguryo, you will remember, was an enemy state and conquered by the Chinese-Silla alliance in the 660s, yet they recognized the fact they had a big Buddhist institution there.

Malcolm wrote:

You are forgetting that Buddhism spread into that region by sea, mainly.

There was not much in Tibet that anyone wanted, and what they wanted [gold and salt] was brought down by Tibetans to trade for things in China [tea, silk] and India [spices].

Indrajala said:

As for Tibetan Ministers, well, they were soldiers; and even in the time of the 5th Dalai Lama, there were certain kinds of animal sacrifices done in Lhasa. This does not mean that the population as a whole were not interested in Dharma.

Okay, but it still understandably raises doubts about how deep the Buddhism went in the period in question.

Malcolm wrote:

It apparently went really deep...just look at Tibet today...what more evidence do you need

Indrajala said:

I'd like to look further into this in the future. I want to translate the Tang accounts of Tibet (there's two primary ones) and whatever other relevant texts I can find. I don't know when I'll do this though.

Malcolm wrote:

That would be very helpful.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

Dzogchen is the most direct (24/7) of all paths. It is nonconceptual Intrinsic Awareness. .

Malcolm wrote:

To what is this awareness intrinsic?

The term rang gi rig pa means "own's own vidyā", one's own knowledge."

It is used this way again and again in hundreds of Dzogchen texts written in Tibetan. Some western translators got a hold of the term, and with no justification whatsoever, decided that the "rang gi " meant "intrinsic", and "rig pa " meant "awareness." Now, rig pa can, in certain contexts, be translated as awareness, but not universally, and not in this context.

Rig pa, vidyā, knowledge, is paired against ma rig pa, avidyā, ignorance. Knowledge or ignorance of what? One's own nature, the basis, essence, nature and compassion/energy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 4:21 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I am correct, by the way, in reporting that Dzogchen masters such as Longchenpa define Rigpa as the nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Citation please?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 3:45 AM

Title: Re: Natural State and Nature

Content:

steve_bakr said:

I am a tiny bit uncomfortable here with the word "consciousness" out of the fear of introducing subcategories such as "subconscious" or "unconscious." Honestly, the other poster is correct in preferring "awareness" to "consciousness" because all the Dzogchen literature and texts that I have seen use "awareness," specifically "Intrinsic Awareness." The word "intrinsic" signifies that awareness is intrinsic to mind; that is, awareness is the nature of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

This is because of the allergy people have to the word "consciousness", it is not a justifiable translation based on the term "consciousness" by itself.

There are a range of words in Tibetan that use the particle "shes pa" such as rnam shes, ye shes, shes rab, shes pa itself, and so on. They all refer to modes of consciousness. Rig pa refers to what that consciousness knows. Pristine consciousness [ye shes] is one thing, our ordinary state of consciousness [rnam shes] something else — but they both have the same basis, shes pa.

Dzogchen terminology for these things is a very sophisticated psychology of delusion and liberation, but unfortunately, it has been obscured by translations that are not precise and clear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

Again, so far as I can tell though there's nothing saying the Chinese noticed a significant (or any) Buddhist presence in Tibet in the Yarlung period. Later medieval historians can say what they want about this period, but questions will remain. Compare that with the Chinese accounts of places like Kucha, Khotan, Samarkand, Koguryo, Japan and SE Asian nations where popular devotion to Buddhism is noted.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, China is not the navel of the world.

Your argument runs as follows, "The Chinese did write about it, therefore it did not exist."

Tibet was of interest to China solely because Tibetans threatened their interests on the Silk Road. Other than that, China had no interest in the Tibetans, this, more than anything else, explains the lack of mention of Tibetan in Chinese annals.

This is not the case with "Khotan, Samarkand, Koguryo, Japan and SE Asian nations..." where China had active trade interests.

As for Tibetan Ministers, well, they were soldiers; and even in the time of the 5th Dalai Lama, there were certain kinds of animal sacrifices done in Lhasa. This does not mean that the population as a whole were not interested in Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 3:12 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

If you're going to rely on oral tradition or written records detailing things centuries after they happened, there's ways to read them which usually means not taking them literally.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha forbid that we ever take anything on people's word.

History does not have be such a cynical business, so laden with materialist concerns and a materialist outlook on life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

If he taught meditation practices like trekcho and thogal going straight and keeping to the point, then sure I'd probably tune in too.

Malcolm wrote:

He does not teach techniques. He teaches Dzogchen. If you do not know the state of Dzogchen, you cannot practice either tregchö or thögal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

About a week ago I watched one of his webcasts, annual Padmashambhava transmission, as I have done a few times before. With respect to all concerned, I am not interested in learning Tibetan to read a text for 35 minutes. I also didn't see anything special in him or his teachings before. I also doubt if he gives detailed in-depth advice on these webcasts in public as teachings becoming diluted always happens when there are hundreds of people, big organisation, involved. I don't want to sound an idiot (although I probably can't help it) saying this but please correct me if I am wrong...

Malcolm wrote:

I am not interested... I also didn't see...I also doubt...

Pretty clear Chogyal Namkhai Norbu is not the teacher for you.

Good luck.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, August 5th, 2015 at 1:20 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

I think this is credible, but then what about the rest of Yarlung Tibet? How did they feel about Buddhism?

Malcolm wrote:

Different people had very different feelings, depending on whether they had ties to the old Zhang Zhung aristocracy or not. These feelings are reported in any number of sources, some early, some late. The earliest dating to the late ninth century. Trisong De'utsen's suppression of Bon, for example, is widely recorded in both Bon and Buddhist sources.

Indrajala said:

Also, how dedicated was said king to Buddhism? Did he still practice animal sacrifice? How much was it to build up legitimacy and international image, as was the case in other nations? These are questions to ask.

Malcolm wrote:

One, his mother, a Chinese woman, the wife of Me Agtsom, was very devoted to Buddhadharma.

Second, we have the evidence of the enormous amount of state-backed translations, imperial support of temples, and so on, numerous pandits invited to Tibet. There is an enormous amount of evidence both in terms of bilingual inscriptions in Tibetan and Chinese, and so on, if you care to examine it. It may not be your real area of interest, but there is no reason to slight it due to your lack of interest.

Indrajala said:

This idea that something only valid if there is an external source is a little silly. It means for example, the Spanish are the only arbiters what we may know about Mexican civilization.

No, you compare Spanish claims against archaeology and whatever surviving native accounts that still exist.

Malcolm wrote:

How do you assess pre-Colombian claims? You see the point? You can only go on native accounts. The issues in Tibet are much the same.

Indrajala said:

What are the external checks on the Chinese Civilization? According to your theory, all of Chinese history is suspect since unless there is external corroboration of something in a foreign source.

Ancient Chinese histories are generally reliable after a bit of critical examination. It can often be checked against existing archaeological and art records too. There's also enormous amounts of literature not issued by any court you can read court histories against.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the same goes for Tibetan historical literature...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 4th, 2015 at 11:35 PM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

In the case of Tibet, I've looked at the Tang Chinese account of it in two fascicles (fairly lengthy, which highlights how important Tibet was to the Tang history). It is interesting, for example, that it doesn't seem to mention Buddhism. There were plenty of envoys going to Tibet from China, but there's no real mention of a Buddhist institution in Yarlung Tibet. They mention a lot of blood sacrifices being done to seal oaths. So, how does that fit with the traditional Tibet narratives (especially later on when Yarlung kings are retroactively made Buddhist kings)? The legends have their place in cultural memory, but historians need to be critical and objective.

Malcolm wrote:

What period are you referring to? 600 to 700, 700 to 800, 800 to 842?

There is no doubt that Tri srong De'u bstan [742-797] was a Buddhist king. He built Samye, etc.

This idea that something only valid if there is an external source is a little silly. It means for example, the Spanish are the only arbiters what we may know about Mexican civilization.

What are the external checks on the Chinese Civilization? According to your theory, all of Chinese history is suspect since unless there is external corroboration of something in a foreign source.

I think such an approach is excessively myopic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 4th, 2015 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Vairocana

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- Emanational translator how can this be seen?

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Meaning, that he was the continuum of a realized being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 4th, 2015 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Fires in CA and Rigdzin Ling Dharma Center

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

Conditions at Rigdzin Ling Dharma Center:

<http://chagdudgonpa.org/fires-near-rigdzin-ling/>

They have heavy smoke there in Northern CA from the forest fires, they are asking for prayers.

Malcolm wrote:

They need to intensive Sang and Serkyem, then it will be fine.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 4th, 2015 at 7:13 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

One of the things Jackson has said is that at some point of history, thogal was taught right from the start to students before the presently used systems were developed. Maybe it was before 15th century or something like that. Me not being a specialist of the Tibetan tradition I don't know in detail what these methods refer to but I guess like preliminary practices/ngondro and deity/tantric practices. He also said that there is one lineage of dzogchen, Palyul, who never did this and who still teach thogal first.

Malcolm wrote:

What they teach in Palyul is separation of samsara and nirvana which is the preliminary for thogal; actual thogal is reserved for post tregcho teachings.

zenman said:

I keep hearing this abuse-thing (underline). I have learned about the thogal-practices, space gazing and sky gazing, from texts provided by Jackson, and have tried them out. I never experienced such clarity during many years of zen training with top masters of the world. I suppose these two practices are the most central ones in thogal. Are they? They have been described also in several books, like one by Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche and Lopon Tenzin Namdak. I don't see any reason why gazing could not be taught to anyone and tried, or how this could become a problem or create obstacles. However I think it requires calmness (shamatta).

Malcolm wrote:

All you are doing is blocking your own realization by approaching things in the wrong way. What a pity. Luckily, no one is %100 percent hopeless while they are alive.

I suggest you stop screwing around and find a real Dzogchen master, Buddhist or Bon, it does not matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, August 4th, 2015 at 7:08 AM

Title: Re: Vairocana

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

He would be banished by the ministers because he was practising Buddhism. That means, the court was still a little Bon orientated under the reign of Triten Datsun. I know he got an agreement with the great Bonpo Mahasiddha Gyerpung Nangzher Lodpo. The king promised Gyerpung Nangzher Lodpo, not to destroy the Bon teachings. GNL was famous for the throwing of the magical bombs, from which you explained that this was all illusion somehow. Further did he subdue the sky God Nyingpantse and made him the guardian of the Zhang Zhung Nyengyud Dzogchen cycle of Teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

The Bon histories seem a little confused about the dates of Gyerpung Nangzher Lodpo. When you study all available documents, it becomes clear that Gyerpung Nangzher Lodpo was a contemporary of Srongtsang Gampo in the 7th century, not Trisrong Detsan in the 8th. Srongtsan Gampo assassinated Ligmincha, not Trisrong De'utsan.

kalden yungdrung said:

But the Tib king Triten Detsun banned finally Vairocana. Well then what did he do there (in eastern Tibet)?

Malcolm wrote:

He taught the people of Gyalmo Rong.

kalden yungdrung said:
Know he collected 5 Dzogchen texts in India.

- Do you know from whom he did receive these 5 texts and how these Dzogchen texts are called?

Malcolm wrote:
His teacher was Shri Singha and the five texts are the Dorje Sems pa Namkhai Che, Khyung lding chen po, Rtsal Chen sprug pa, Rig pa'i khyu byug, and the Byang chub sems sgom.

kalden yungdrung said:
This Dzogchen style is also i guess involved in the Nyingma. How can i see the Guru Rinpoche who is somewhere a student from a Dzogchenpa.

Malcolm wrote:
Guru Rinpoche's Dzogchen master was also Shri Singha.

kalden yungdrung said:
There are doubts about if Guru Rinpoche would be a founder of Dzogchen. Tantras that is sure Padmasambhava's speciality. So i only want to say some have doubts.

Malcolm wrote:
The founder of "Buddhist" Dzogchen is Garab Dorje.

All the Dzogchen teachings of Guru Rinpoche are termas.

kalden yungdrung said:
Guess Vairocana did made the translation. But as a fresh "greenhorn" in the Sanskrit language, can his translations, or from other Sanskrit - Tibetan translators, be seen as reliable ?

Malcolm wrote:
[/quote]

Vairocana was an "emanational" translator, meaning his translations are impeccable.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, August 3rd, 2015 at 9:58 PM
Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts
Content:
zenman said:
Okay. I don't either trust him 100% because I know better.

Is Jackson fully realised? Surely not. Has he had some insights? Probably.

Why did you mention about him contacting the translator? Do you think it is suspicious?

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone has some insights, that does not make them qualified to teach Dzogchen or even Vajrayāna.

It is not easy to be a teacher — this means you are responsible for your students progress.

There are still a few really qualified teachers of Dzogchen around such as Chogyal Namkhai Norbu. Why waste your time with anything less? I know Jax's point of view very well — he constantly criticizes Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, he does not like Song of the Vajra, Vajra dance as well as the secondary practices that ChNN communicates, etc. This merely demonstrates something about Jax and nothing at all about ChNN's teachings.

Anyone can write a nice book about Dzogchen — its words are very easy to understand and fun to repeat. But there is a difference between a Dzogchen master like Chogyal Namkhai Norbu and someone like Jax. You can observe this in their conduct and activity. CHNN never expresses anything but respect for his own teachers and others. Jax puts himself on a pedestal and likes to criticize people who he has taken teachings from without cause. This speaks volumes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 3rd, 2015 at 9:39 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

People in this thread alone have said all these things of him and yet no one has come forth with actual and clear testimonial of his credentials, whether he has been authorised or not.

Dear Magnus,

Thanks for your info. I'll inform him that he is going wrong direction.

With many Tashu Delegs NN.

Malcolm wrote:

Magnus is the user heart.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, August 3rd, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Vairocana

Content:
kalden yungdrung said:
Tashi delek DW members,

Vairocana, a well known Dzogchen Master, was one time in India to collect Dzogchen teachings.

He got some teachings from Shri Simha.

But when he returned to the Tibetan court, he was banished to the eastern tib. Provinces.

- What formed the reason for Vairocana's banishment.?
- Is here meant the "converted" Bonpo Vairocana?

Mutsug marro
KY

Malcolm wrote:
He was banished because jealous ministers wanted to execute him, but Kin Trizrong De'utsen would not permit it.

Yes, this refers to Bagor Vairocana, who originally followed Bon, and who some say, converted Bon texts into Buddhist texts in order to save them. There are a number of Bon termas which involve Vairocana.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, August 3rd, 2015 at 9:15 AM
Title: Re: Help with the Mahāyāna Sūtras Please?
Content:

Serenity509 said:
What is the most widely loved and read sutra in Mahayana Buddhism? I would guess it's the Lotus Sutra, but I could be wrong.

Malcolm wrote:
Heart Sutra, actually.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, August 3rd, 2015 at 6:29 AM
Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
According to Tibetans, they count Srong btsan gam po as being the 35th king, and consider that they were a vassal state of Zhang Zhung until Srong btsan gam po assassinated the King of Zhang Zhung

Indrajala said:

That's quite plausible, but what did 'king' mean in the sixth or even fifth century? It might refer to the people who were Tibetans' ancestors and not much else.

The same problem is actually present in the history of Japan: early written sources are clearly written long after the fact and by a centralized government-court needing to legitimize itself and its leadership in the face of a longstanding aristocracy with competing interests. Although there actually lived the emperors specified in the histories, they were effectively local chieftains when they lived and much of what later became recognized as 'Japan' did not have anything to do with them.

Malcolm wrote:

There are a number of sources of early Tibetan history, but as you might expect, they mostly date from the 9th century onward.

Indrajala said:

The idea that the Tibetans descend from Qiang people who fled to Tibet has refuted by a number of Tibetan historians, many inconsistencies with this theory.

Do you have any credible academic sources in English that address this?

Malcolm wrote:

Light of Kailash, vol. 1.

Indrajala said:

There is nothing I'm aware of that refutes the medieval Chinese account that Tibet as a recognizable polity only goes back at best to the late fifth century.

Malcolm wrote:

There are plenty of Tibetan sources that refute this idea.

Then there is the interesting text, the Vimalaprabhakaripṛcchā which refers to Tibetan assaults on Khotan, most scholars think it dates to the 7th century, contemporary with Srong btsan gam po, but I have my doubts about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 2nd, 2015 at 9:34 PM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

This brings to mind a question: when did there appear self-identifying Tibetans?

Malcolm wrote:

According to Tibetans, they count Srong btsan gam po as being the 35th king, and consider that they were a vassal state of Zhang Zhung until Srong btsan gam po assassinated the King of Zhang Zhung

Indrajala said:

The ethnogenesis of Tibet described by the Chinese for consideration:

<https://wenyanwen.blogspot.com/2014/05/tibetan-ethnogenesis-in-tang-history.html>

I'm not saying this is necessarily correct, but the Chinese never heard of Tibetans until the seventh century basically, and they had reliable records going back to the Han dynasty. The peoples in what is now Tibet (especially Amdo it seems) were often known as Qiang 羌.

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that the Tibetans descend from Qiang people who fled to Tibet has refuted by a number of Tibetan historians, many inconsistencies with this theory.

Indrajala said:

He adapted an earlier system based on his exposure to Sanskrit. It is likely therefore that while in general Bhrami must have formed the basis for all scripts in Zhang Zhung and Tibet, it is very hasty to claim that writing did not exist in Tibet prior to the 7th century, especially given the clear accounts of the books of Bonpos being burned by Buddhists during the late eighth century from both sides.

Malcolm wrote:

Are there any foreign accounts that would support this theory?[/quote]

There is nothing to refute it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 2nd, 2015 at 9:46 AM

Title: Re: 6 Realms and Kalpa's

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- Why would it not be that the 6 Realms used in Tib.Buddhism etc. , dissolve into emptiness?

Malcolm wrote:

They do, at the end of every major eon, beginning with the hell realms and continuing up to the third realm. Everything below that is destroyed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 2nd, 2015 at 8:19 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

- In how far is the Tibetan script based on i guess Sanskrit? I have heard Tibetans went to India to get a script.

Yes, the Tibetan script is based on a Sanskrit script. There were many Sanskrit scripts. The earliest two were Kharoshthi and Brahmi:

Malcolm wrote:

The Bonpos assert that Tibetan script is derived from Zhang zhung smar script, from around 100 BCE. Given that Tibetans engaged on one of the most amazing cultural self-immolations during the 9th century, and given considerable evidence that Tibetans were familiar with writing prior the 7th century based on their being a vassal state of Zhang Zhung, disregarding for a moment the origin of Zhang Zhung smar script, the Tibetans certainly knew what writing was at a very early date.

The idea that Thonmi Sambhota "invented" Tibetan writing is an error. He adapted an earlier system based on his exposure to Sanskrit. It is likely therefore that while in general Bhrami must have formed the basis for all scripts in Zhang Zhung and Tibet, it is very hasty to claim that writing did not exist in Tibet prior to the 7th century, especially given the clear accounts of the books of Bonpos being burned by Buddhists during the late eighth century from both sides.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 2nd, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

WeiHan said:

Does it means that nobody practice it for the sole aim of attaining enlightenment as a yidam?

Malcolm wrote:

Ganapati is not a Yidam, he is a lokapala. No one practices Ganapati for awakening.

[Mod note 2022: This topic has been locked due to it's old age.]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, August 2nd, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Envy and rejoicing

Content:

paël said:

Someone has lot of money, nice house&garden. Can you rejoice that? I see that one has lot of suffering of change.

Malcolm wrote:

They have nice enjoyments, that is from their merit, so of course we rejoice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Khyentse Webcast-Is There Buddhism Without Rebi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Fairly simple, mind cannot be reduced to material events, and mind must have a cause which is nonmaterial; excluding then some supernatural cause of the mind stream, the mind stream both transmigrates and is beginningless.

WeiHan said:

That is the Mind Only school assertion that the cause for consciousness is the moment of consciousness preceding it. But does the Madhyamika school necessarily agrees with that?

Malcolm wrote:

Conventionally, yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Ray Rudha said:

Allright, it's time to set things straight around here.

Ganapati is ENLIGHTENED.

Malcolm wrote:

The initiation text connected with the 13 Golden Dharmas states very clearly that Avalokiteshvara bounds Ganapati under samaya, and threatened to split his head open if he disobeyed and did not adopt the three trainings (discipline, samadhi and wisdom). This initiation text explicitly refers to Ganapati as a 'jig rten pa, i.e. a worldly one.

The account of Ganapati in the book, dam can bstan srung gi rnam r thar composed by the 18th century savant, sle lung bshad pa rdo rje, repeats the account in the above text, nearly word for word.

Based on this, we can see that it is generally considered that Ganapati is a worldly protector bound under oaths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Khyentse Webcast-Is There Buddhism Without Rebi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, I found the whole thing rather disappointing. One, he never answered anyone's questions. Two, he merely asserted that we should not reject rebirth since it was valid conventional truth, but when pressed could never produce the many arguments which prove rebirth.

Mostly, I thought it was a very rambling, aimless presentation.

Fortyeightvows said:

For my own education and to share with others what are one or two of the arguments which prove rebirth?

Malcolm wrote:

Fairly simple, mind cannot be reduced to material events, and mind must have a cause which is nonmaterial; excluding then some supernatural cause of the mind stream, the mind stream both transmigrates and is beginningless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Form-skandha

Content:

paël said:

There are five vedana. Pleasure and mental pleasure, pain and mental pain, and neutral sensation.

Does every of 5 senses have these 5 vedanas? Is seeing of ugly things only mental pain or actual pain?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

It can be both. For example, you smell something disgusting and it makes you vomit.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 8:35 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All of these things form based the development of the embryo.

Finney said:

Malcolm, can you recommend an English language book (translation or otherwise) for this? A while back I was thumbing through Garrett's book and iirc there were several different models (medical tantras, kalachakra, Drakpa Gyaltzen's, and so on). They seemed to differ on various points, though I don't know if those differences are significant for our purposes. Maybe Garrett's book is the one to get? It's frightfully expensive and seemed more of a survey of the literature and it's place in Tibetan culture rather than a text intending to teach embryology, but if it's the best that's out there...

Malcolm wrote:

You can find Garret's book on the web if you look hard, it is hte best survey on the subject.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Embryo

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek DW members,

If we have the embryo, then arises for me the question then were the Pathways in the body like the Sushumna, Ida and Nadi etc. first or after the existence of the embryo "developed"?

I guess that it happens with the help of the 5 elements also.....in a following order, as well physical as well mental / consciousness etc.

- Would be the reversal state of dissolving of the elements, at the state of death, be the construction of the embryo maybe ?

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

They develop along with the body as well as assist in the development of the body.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, August 1st, 2015 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Did the Buddha teach about the The Five Skandhas directl

Content:
frank123 said:
Hello,

Did the Buddha teach about the Five Skandhas directly or are did the teaching on them come about at a later time based on the principles of his teachings?

Malcolm wrote:
Directly.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 11:18 PM
Title: Re: Form-skandha
Content:
Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
M-la's response is skillful means. It refers to the first ten of the eleven resultant forms.

Malcolm wrote:
Avijñapti is rejected by Sautrantikas, this is why I did not mention it.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 9:37 PM
Title: Re: Form-skandha
Content:
paël said:
Does form skandha only refer to beings body? Or every material thing/part in universe (sun, moon, atoms,etc.)?
Shortly, does it mean self and its belongings?

Malcolm wrote:
It refers to one's body, one's physical sense organs and their objects.

So for example, anything you are seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting or touching is, for the duration of that sense contact, part of the rupa-skanda or material aggregate [form is an incorrect translation here].

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 9:08 PM
Title: Re: TTM
Content:
kalden yungdrung said:
Tashi delek DW members,

Found this photo somewhere in my one of my albums.
I guess it has something to do with Dzogchen.....

[attachment=0]TTM 00.jpg[/attachment]

- Can someone of you tell me what is here depicted?

Mutsug Marro
KY

Malcolm wrote:

It has nothing to do with Dzogchen it is an illustration of the heart and lungs, and its channels, and the small intestines.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: Pranayama in Dzogchen

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

The Mind is riding on air. If we "manipulate" the prana in the right channel(s), un-knot some heart obstructions, then some Dzogchen experiences would go easier. I guess we can see all these exercises as secondary. But without this Yantra Yoga etc. , what do you think , are then some Dzogchen experiences (visions) also not possible ?

Do you mean here the Yantra Yoga of Vairiocana, like it is practiced in the Sangha of Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche?

alpha said:

Yes . That book.

From what i know visions can arise without the help of yogas and pranayamas.

Malcolm wrote:

This is what is said in the Vima sNying thig on the subject:

If the vāyu is exhausted,
appearances will be exhausted.

However, while appearances are not exhausted,
the embodied will not be liberated.

Therefore, it is important to cultivate the vāyu, one should cultivate this method,
the methods of exhausting and eliminating vāyu.

The point of Dzogchen practice is not merely to have visions. The point of Dzogchen practice is to exhaust them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

zenman said:

What is the best dzogchen book on winds and channels in English?

Derek said:

A bit late to the party, but are these the kind of books you're looking for?

Clear Light of Bliss: Tantric Meditation Manual

The Bliss of Inner Fire: Heart Practice of the Six Yogas of Naropa

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing at all to do with Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 3:47 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

[

But i heard that the channels used for the visions in Dzogchen are not based on the consciousness.

So the knowledge about the Dzogchen channels is different than the Nadis, Bidhu's in Yoga Tantra, i guess so.

Malcolm wrote:

All of these things form based the development of the embryo. You really do need to study some more.

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek N,

Yes that studying is a never ending story until now. Like it.

All of these things form based the development of the embryo.

- That could be many things which develop the embryo, what are your suggestions here?
- Taken in account the Bardo, what do you think influences here the embryo?

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

I am referring to how things work for human beings in this life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

[

But i heard that the channels used for the visions in Dzogchen are not based on the consciousness.

So the knowledge about the Dzogchen channels is different than the Nadis, Bidhu's in Yoga Tantra, i guess so.

Malcolm wrote:

All of these things form based the development of the embryo. You really do need to study some more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 1:02 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek N,

According Lupon Tenzin Namdak:

1. the sounds, rays and lights spontaneously existing within the Base (gzhi) of the natural state;
2. their arising due to secondary causes (rkyen) created within the experience of the natural state;
3. the arising of sounds, rays and lights during the practice of the Path (lam)
4. their arising during the Bardo.

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

That is fine, but there is a way HOW this happens. That involves understanding the anatomy of the body and its channels and winds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 31st, 2015 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Ivo said:

The only practice where some kind of effort comes into play is thogyal.

Malcolm wrote:

And even that effort depends on total relaxation.

WeiHan said:

Like sleeping

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, getting good sleep requires total relaxation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Ivo said:

The only practice where some kind of effort comes into play is thogyal.

Malcolm wrote:

And even that effort depends on total relaxation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 11:09 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, you are really off your rocker here.

Astus said:

How so?

Malcolm wrote:

Science is not an invisible sentient being.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 10:45 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Astus said:

So, if there are any local spirits to be integrated/converted to Buddhism, that spirit is science.

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, you are really off your rocker here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The whole thing is based on one's plumbing. There is one kind of plumbing for the mind; there is another kind of plumbing for rig pa.

One needs to understand this plumbing. But I am not going to discuss it here.

fckw said:

Sorry, just a language question. I'm not a native English speaker, and in my vocabulary plumbing is this:

<http://www.reedsplumbing.com/wp-content/uploads/2012/06/plumbing.jpg>

What do you mean with plumbing in respect to meditation? Is this a Dzogchen technique that simply carries such a name, or is this a figurative way of speaking here? No need to go into any details beyond that.

Malcolm wrote:

Plumbing, meaning pipes and tubes that carry things from one place in the body to another.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 7:46 PM

Title: Re: Tibetan worldview.

Content:

Astus said:

Could it be a Western mentality that wants to force a culturally foreign view on every aspect of one's interpretation of the world?

As Buddhism spread it has adapted to the local beliefs. It's not the same pantheon in different countries that ordinary Buddhists believe in, even if the ancient Indian gods are integrated to some extent.

Should those who follow Japanese Buddhism erect altars not only for Shakyamuni and Amitabha but also for Amaterasu, Hachiman and the current emperor?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhadharma has always recognized the existence of bhumipatis and granted them respect, and occasionally forceful conversion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Namdrol wrote: The discussion of the plumbing of various kinds is discussed in the ZZNG texts on the six lamps and other places.

Tashi delek N,

Well there is spoken in the ZZNG Dzogchen text about 4 Lamps.

- What are then the other 2 Lamps for the application of "plumbing" ?

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

Kalden:

There is a detailed commentary on the six lamps. You should ask your teacher about it. If you are mainly following the presentation of the Chag tri, maybe is not mentioned so much there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

theanarchist said:

If I say, a state of craving is undesirable and instead I do my best to rest my mind in rigpa to end it, that is renunciation. You decide to give it up. It's renouncing the samsaric state of craving.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, you are failing to observe that there is a difference wishing to be free of samsara and paths of the śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha and bodhisattva, i.e., the paths of renunciation.

Vajrayāna practitioners do not follow those paths because in this day and age we are for the most part too heavily afflicted to follow them successfully on the one hand, and on the other hand we are more intelligent and so on, and thus do not need to follow those paths.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

Right. So to rephrase my question in the terms you just used; when the afflictions are not recognized for what they are (wisdoms), and still have the power of poisons to produce karma, is that Vajrayana practice or samsaric activity?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, and you allow yourself to fall under the power of afflictions through lack of awareness, you have broken your samaya. That is even worse than samsaric activity.

smcj said:

Basically that is the point I've been trying to make for quite a few pages now. Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you were making the point that you should avoid as much as possible having such afflictive states.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 4:29 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Ivo said:

Dzogchen is not a path of renunciation, not by any stretch of the imagination.

theanarchist said:

It is.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not. Here "path" means "method." Neither the method of Vajrayāna practice (the two stages) nor the method of Dzogchen use the method of renunciation as the path (taking restrictive vows, eschewing objects of desire and so on).

theanarchist said:

Also, you have to decide that samsara is crap in the first place to decide to take up the path of dzogchen, that in itself is renunciation.

Malcolm wrote:

Having a sense of disgust for continuing in samsara does not equal using renunciation as a path method.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

Right. So to rephrase my question in the terms you just used; when the afflictions are not recognized for what they are (wisdoms), and still have the power of poisons to produce karma, is that Vajrayana practice or samsaric activity?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, and you allow yourself to fall under the power of afflictions through lack of awareness, you have broken your samaya. That is even worse than samsaric activity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 4:12 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Yes i know the wind element plays a role as fuel for the "Mind".

Malcolm wrote:

The whole thing is based on one's plumbing. There is one kind of plumbing for the mind; there is another kind of plumbing for rig pa.

One needs to understand this plumbing. But I am not going to discuss it here.

kalden yungdrung said:

Tashi delek N,

Thanks for your replies.

Well this plumbing is new for me, maybe i will get in the nearby future a teaching of this. Don't know if we apply this technique in Zhang Zhung Nyen Gyud Dzogchen.

Mutsug Marro

KY

Malcolm wrote:

The discussion of the plumbing of various kinds is discussed in the ZZNG texts on the six lamps and other places.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Yes i know the wind element plays a role as fuel for the "Mind".

Malcolm wrote:

The whole things is based on one's plumbing. There is one kind of plumbing for the mind; there is another kind of plumbing for rig pa.

One needs to understand this plumbing. But I am not going to discuss it here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

WeiHan said:

Which Vajrayana schools teach only tantras methods without teaching sutra foundation such as refuge, bodhicitta etc...prior as a basis..

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen.

WeiHan said:

I am not sure which Dzogchen lineage does that nowadays .

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen Community of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

WeiHan said:

Which Vajrayana schools teach only tantras methods without teaching sutra foundation such as refuge, bodhicitta etc...prior as a basis..

Malcolm wrote:

Dzogchen.

Garab Dorje never said:

"Get a Tibetan name, then start out with the four immeasurables, etc."

He said, "Have the encounter of self-recognition." aka, "direct introduction."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

You very carefully did not answer my question. So let's try this again.

So are you saying that an affliction, such as anger, can be indulged/acted upon on the level of affliction and call it Vajrayana?

It has to be experienced in order to be addressed. It has to be allowed to arise, be seen and recognized.

Right. And if at that point it is not transmuted into enlightened wisdom, and remains an affliction, is that Vajrayana practice or is that samsaric activity?

Malcolm wrote:

You are really missing the point. When you observe anger arise in your mind, as a Vajrayāna practitioner, this is understood to be wisdom. It is not "turned" into wisdom, it always was. Such afflictions are poison because they are not recognized — when they are recognized, they have no power, and therefore, one does not act in ways that produce karma. This Vajrayāna method is very indirect, because it requires a lot of conceptual effort, but in principle it is the same as the the idea of liberation through recognition in Dzogchen.

For example, you become angry, but if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, you cannot be angry at your own mandala, so when you apply the practice "all appearances are the deity" this cuts the force of anger.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

The only yoga to develop the visions (Thogal), i know , are the 5 or 6 postures.

Malcolm wrote:

And what do they do? They control the wind in the body, among other things.

Since the main problem that interferes with developing one's practice in Dzogchen is the mind, and the mind rides on the winds, by controlling the latter one controls the former.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 2:40 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

So are you saying that an affliction, such as anger, can be indulged/acted upon on the level of affliction and call it Vajrayana?

Malcolm wrote:

It has to be experienced in order to be addressed. It has to be allowed to arise, be seen and recognized.

So yes, one should not suppress one's afflictive states in Vajrayāna practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

But in Tantra, how would you ever transmute an affliction into it's wisdom without even going near the affliction itself?

If you are not capable of transmitting an affliction you shun them and the situations that give rise to them.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Vajrayāna is not a path of giving up sense desires.

smcj said:

If you are an advanced practitioner and are capable of transmuting an affliction into wisdom--which is an extraordinary accomplishment--then you can get near the affliction. Once transmuted it is no longer a poison, but now a medicine, an expression of the enlightened mind. But in either scenario the affliction is never simply indulged in as an affliction per se. That is Vajrayana 101.

Malcolm wrote:

No. All appearances are the deity. All sounds are mantra. All thoughts are wisdom. This is Vajrayana 101.

The path of transformation means that you do not reject things that cause afflictions to arise; you utilize those things and through the practice of creation stage, transform them. For example, the yoga of eating food, the yoga of sleep, washing and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

bryandavis said:

Wouldn't the use of the meditation stick in Longde constitute manipulation or control or prana?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this was already mentioned.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 30th, 2015 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

fckw said:

The A-Khrid also contains such teachings. Besides it also instructions on dream yoga and, in certain versions, on phowa.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as does Zhang Zhung Snyan Rgyud.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Harsh speech

Content:

pael said:

What is harsh speech (6th non-virtue)? How you know which words are harsh?

Malcolm wrote:

Harsh speech means speech intended to hurt others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: How do you answer people who try to convert you?

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Bhakha Tulku, Dorje Drolod at Zuni Mtn. Stupa

Content:

DGA said:

<http://zunimountainstupa.org/events-retreats/>

Please Join Bhakha Tulku Rinpoche, Tulku Orgyen Rinpoche and the Vairotsana Lamas September 4-7, 2015, Labor Day weekend, for the annual Dorje Drollo Retreat at the Zuni Mountain Stupa.

anyone here thinking of attending this? please let me know if so.

Malcolm wrote:

Not going, but Bhakha Tulku is a very cool guy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 11:06 PM

Title: Re: How do you answer people who try to convert you?

Content:

Serenity509 said:

It's a little weird when Christians insist Buddha didn't rise from the dead, therefore Buddhism must be a false religion...

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha never died. Who wants to follow a religion that idolizes a revenant?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is extensive amounts of prāṇayāma in sems sde practice.

alpha said:

Can you give us some examples of translated semde texts which contain prana work and so on ?

Malcolm wrote:

No, I cannot it. It is contained within the oral instructions connected with 18 sems sde rig pa'i rtsal dbangs. In other words, it is an important part of sems sde practice, but it is not contained within texts such as the Kun byed rgyal po etc.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 10:05 PM
Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels
Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You said:

Personally i have never came across a book on ddzogchen praxis where we would have details on how to get to the state of dzogchen by manipulating the winds and working with the channels

???

alpha said:

What i wanted to say was primary, primary practices.Secondary , yes.There are as many as you like.

Malcolm wrote:

There is extensive amounts of prāṇayāma in sems sde practice.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 9:32 PM
Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels
Content:

alpha said:

Yantra yoga as well as Yoga of prana are preparatory secondary practices.

Malcolm wrote:

A preparation for what?

alpha said:

A preparation for entering the state of dzogchen.

Malcolm wrote:

You said:

Personally i have never came across a book on ddzogchen praxis where we would have details on how to get to the state of dzogchen by manipulating the winds and working with the channels

???

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 9:31 PM
Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

alpha said:

Yantra yoga as well as Yoga of prana are preparatory secondary practices.

Malcolm wrote:

A preparation for what?

alpha said:

The longde i know has no pranayama.

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you examine the Longde commentaries.

alpha said:

A preparation for entering the state of dzogchen. There are thousands of this kind of preparatory practices sutra and tantra alike.

The actual longde method does not contain any pranayama. Pranayamas are only done in connection with balancing the elements and at other times when the circulation in the right channel is obstructed.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean to tell me that you do not control [āyama] the prāṇa in Longde at all? Of course you do.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 9:13 PM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

alpha said:

Yantra yoga as well as Yoga of prana are preparatory secondary practices.

Malcolm wrote:

A preparation for what?

alpha said:

The longde i know has no pranayama.

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you examine the Longde commentaries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 8:55 PM

Title: Re: Best dzogchen book on winds and channels

Content:

alpha said:

Personally i have never came across a book on ddzogchen praxis where we would have details on how to get to the state of dzogchen by manipulating the winds and working with the channels. However, with the right instructiion from an authentic teacher you can get to the state of dzogchen using any practice or method.

Malcolm wrote:

Yantra Yoga

Longde (One controls channels and uses pranāyama in this system)

Oral Instructions on the Yoga of Prana for Clarity and Emptiness by ChNN. There is a detailed instruction on pranāyama in the Vima Nyinthig called the rlung gyi phra khrid. The book by ChNN is very similar in many respects.

And of course the practice of thögal is based on understanding the channels and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 4:26 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

Have some difficulties to understand her Pristine Consciousness.

Thought that Wisdom self emanating is and so i don't see a relation with Consciousness.

- Could you maybe translate this Pristine Consciousness in Tibetan / Sanskrit?

Malcolm wrote:

ye shes = pristine [ye] consciousness [shes].

Wisdom, in English, does not really accurately translate ye shes. In English, wisdom means sagacity, intelligence, sense, common sense, shrewdness, astuteness, smartness, judiciousness, judgment, prudence, circumspection; logic, rationale, rationality, soundness, advisability. ANTONYMS folly, stupidity. as well as knowledge, learning, erudition, sophistication, scholarship, philosophy; lore.

Consciousness means the state of being awake and aware of one's surroundings, the awareness or perception of something by a person; the fact of awareness by the mind of itself and the world: consciousness emerges from the operations of the brain.

Now, there is in English no word that genuinely captures the sense of the term ye shes. And the sense of ye shes has gone beyond the Sanskrit term jñāna, at least in Dzogchen texts.

Ye shes is not inert, it is conscious; but it is not a conceptual or dualistic consciousness, it is therefore pristine.

kalden yungdrung said:

- It does not come from other places will that mean that here is spoken of a certain Self ?

_ What do you think about this Self, which would not be a copy, has no beginning ?

Malcolm wrote:

The term rang byung ye shes, self-originated pristine consciousness, is noncontroversial. It is not a self, ala Hinduism.

kalden yungdrung said:

The mind is connected with the flow of winds or vāyu, rlung in the body.

- Do you make use of two Minds in this explanation?

Malcolm wrote:

No, there is sems and ye shes.

kalden yungdrung said:

Yeshe, wisdom, pristine consciousness, is free from such movements.

- So Dzogchen would be obtainable without Tantra (movements , winds, yoga etc.) ?

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on what you mean by tantra, do you mean creation and completion stage?

Then yes. Do you mean without doing anything at all related to channels, winds and so on, then no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

kalden yungdrung said:

- Pristine consciousness self-originates from the beginning.

Could you explain that maybe ?

Malcolm wrote:

It is something you need to discover within you, since it does not come from some other place.

kalden yungdrung said:

_ Free from the Mind.

Could you also explain this ?

Malcolm wrote:

The mind is connected with the flow of winds or vāyu, rlung in the body. Yeshe, wisdom, pristine consciousness, is free from such movements.

kalden yungdrung said:

The result is self-appearing perfect Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhahood cannot be made to appear from causes and conditions, it only arises when one's own real state is understood.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 29th, 2015 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

DGA said:

Thank you for this.

I'd thought zenman had asked a somewhat different question, hence my response.

Malcolm wrote:

One has to very precise, because different Dzogchen texts say different things depending on context.

The problem is that some people attempt to explain Dzogchen without understanding the principle of different texts and series, and so make a sort of stew of things.

Another problem is the modern intellectual fad of considering the bodhicitta texts such as five earlier lungs translated by Vairocana to be the "authentic original" or "radical" Dzogchen.

As you said, it is better to find an authentic master such as ChNN, Loppon Tenzin Namdag, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 10:59 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen & Vipashyana on thoughts

Content:

zenman said:

I wonder how can anyone with a long study of the field, acting as a teacher, whether authentic or not, be so confused about a basic matter such as this...

DGA said:

You've answered your own question. An authentic practitioner isn't confused about this.

Someone who is confused about this, and has been confused about it for a long time, and has trotted his confusion out as though it's a pedigree in the public square, is rather clearly not an authentic teacher.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem here is mostly around definitions.

What is meant by "mind"? What is meant by "awareness?" What is meant by "wisdom."

One can certainly find many Dzogchen texts that assert mind and wisdom are mutually exclusive. For example, one of the texts in the Pellucid Transcendent State of Samantabhadra cycle declares:

The general dharma systems assert buddhahood for the mind. The system of the Pellucid Transcendent State of the Great Perfection does not assert buddhahood in the mind. The mind is the basis of accumulating various traces. Buddhahood is self-originate pristine consciousness [rang byung ye shes] that is free from thought. There is no place for traces to accumulate in the pristine consciousness that is free from thought.

It then cites a text called Molten Silver:

Observe the mind with the mind, there isn't anything to see;

likewise, even though the nature of the mind is understood to be empty, this is not buddhahood;

that removes afflictions, but does not increase wisdom.

Hoping for buddhahood in the mind is like a feather being carried by the wind.

It finally distinguishes that mind and pristine consciousness [ye shes] have different results:

The results are not the same: the mind is mounted on the vāyu, and the mental concepts of the merged vāyu and mind move wildly. An undercurrent of concepts arise, accumulating as an undercurrent of traces. The present cause of birth in samsara is always engaging in the dualism of an apprehended object and an apprehending subject through combining both mind and the breath. Since one possesses a mind of an apprehended object and an apprehending subject, concepts arise in the mind. Since various concepts proliferate, temporary concepts arose. Since the five poisonous afflictions arose in the mind, they increased to eighty-four thousand. Since concepts proliferate in the mind, in every instant of time, one hundred concepts arise and on hundred cease. Therefore, the wheel of suffering is uninterrupted. The result is the ripening of the three lower realms.

Pristine consciousness self-originate from the beginning, is without breath, is pellucid, free from the mind, limpidly clear, non-conceptual and completely blissful. Since it is without arising and ceasing, it does not move. Clear in uniformity, unchanging and uninterrupted, clarity and non-conceptuality, bliss and emptiness are the same. The result is self-appearing perfect buddhahood.

So, one needs to be careful.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Generally these accounts — dating from the 11th through 13th century — portray Buddhism as being under siege by wicked Hindu Kings, with accounts of violence, sorcery and contests.

Indrajala said:

Now that you mention these, I recall reading about them, but I am curious as to whether most Tibetan masters in history were aware of the direct correspondence between the violence described in Vajrayāna texts and the real life violence between Brahmanical and Buddhist societies.

Oh, absolutely, it is major theme in all lineages histories of the siddhas.

The explanation of the symbolic import of abhicarya rites and so on was confined to mundane practitioners who had not achieved siddhi.

So that leads to the question: how many people were aware of the non-symbolic import of abhicāra rites?

Malcolm wrote:

Pretty much everyone in Tibet, including common people. I mean look, just examine the bio of Milarepa — what was he famous for? Rites for summoning hail connected with the planetary god, Rahula. Everyone in Tibet knows this, it is part of the common culture.

Wrathful rituals to dispatch demons as well as enemies are part and parcel of Tibetan religious life. There was a whole class of ritualists called Sogdogpas whose main job was ritually repelling Mongolians.

Rites known as Zor, which translates to something in modern parlance like "magical bomb," but literally means "sickle" or "scythe", are very popular. They are popular because people believe they work.

There is for example in Gelug history, the example of using abhicara rites to kill one of the Karmapas before he had a chance to reach the Chinese emperor. A famed Gelug master was concerned that if the Karmapa as allowed to reach the Qing emperor,, things would be bad for the fortune of the Gelug school.

There is much less erotica in Tibetan Vajrayāna than its Indian forbear, because the Tibetans were rather prudish, but have a rather violent character and are pretty war-like. They have just sublimated most of their aggression into religious and business pursuits, and they are self-consciously aware of this to a high degree.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First bhumi is Mahāyāna stream entry according to the presentation if the Abhisamayālamkāra.

Phenomniverse said:

How can the other path attainments be interpreted from a Mahayana perspective? For example, in a sadhana it says 'the state of a non-returned is attained'. Is non-returning not something to be avoided for a Bodhisattva?

Malcolm wrote:

A non-returned is an eighth stage bodhisattva who is no longer subject to rebirth in the desire realm, since they have attained power over birth.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

Jinzang said:

I was told (though others disputed with me on the point) that once one becomes a stream enterer one is irrevocably bound to become an arhat. You can't change your mind at that point and enter the bodhisattva path.

Malcolm wrote:

This is the Hinayāna point of view. This is not the Mahāyāna view of the matter.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 28th, 2015 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It was understood quite well. Do you think all exercise of abhicarya rites, even in the modern day, are merely symbolic exercises? I can assure you this is not the case.

Indrajala said:

Are there period Tibetan sources which express an understanding of the actual circumstances in India, particularly with regard to violence?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is the rnam thar of Virupa, which while committed to writing in the late 12th century, certainly was communicated orally from the mid 11th. There is the songs of Jetsun Dragpa Gyaltsen which make fun of going to pilgrimage to Bodhgaya since a) it is controlled by Hindus, and b) one is likely to be murdered by hostile hill tribes on the way.

Also the 12th century bio of Padmasambhava reports a great deal of hostility between Hindus and Buddhists, and the stories of the 84 mahāsiddhas are full of magical battles between Hindus and Buddhists. There is even the 13th century confrontation between Harananda and Sakya Pandita. In short, Tibetans knew very well that India was a hostile place for Buddhists, which is why they largely ceased going there for anything other than trade purposes by the 13th century. They also received regular reports of Hindu hostilities from refugee Indian Buddhists who frequently took refuge in Tibet as late as the 15th century.

Generally these accounts — dating from the 11th through 13th century — portray Buddhism as being under siege by wicked Hindu Kings, with accounts of violence, sorcery and contests.

The explanation of the symbolic import of abhicarya rites and so on was confined to mundane practitioners who had not achieved siddhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 27th, 2015 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Issues in the History of Indian Buddhism

Content:

Indrajala said:

Verardi's argument is that the symbolism of violence in the tantric materials is not strictly symbolic: it actually reflects real life violence as a reaction to centuries of antagonistic and hostile Brahmanism. It seems when the Tibetans inherited these practices, the historical background and context behind them were not really understood, which is also why modern teachers likewise would interpret things as being entirely symbolic.

Malcolm wrote:

It was understood quite well. Do you think all exercise of abhicarya rites, even in the modern day, are merely symbolic exercises? I can assure you this is not the case.

However, the criteria for being able to engage of rites of liberation on more than a symbolic level requires that the practitioner be a siddhi in fact. You should examine the story of Virupa, as his tale has the largest number of hostile and violent interactions with Hindus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 26th, 2015 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: A question about stream entry in Mahayana

Content:

Phenomniverse said:

I'm wondering what place stream-entry and other path attainments (culminating in arahatship) have in Mahayana Buddhism? Are they mentioned, and if so how are they understood in the context of the Bodhisattva ideal of remaining in samsara for the benefit of all beings? If you attain stream entry does that lead inevitably and irrevocably to the abandoning of samsara as Theravada suggests?

Malcolm wrote:

First bhumi is Mahāyāna stream entry according to the presentation if the Abhisamayālamkara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 25th, 2015 at 8:21 AM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

smcj said:

This is the problem. It is either a translation issue (my guess), or GR was not speaking in a precise way (possible, but unlikely).

Since he is discussing Phowa, there is also the possibility that he is euphemistically talking about... :jaw drop:

...but that's just more speculation.

Malcolm wrote:

euphemistic = imprecise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 25th, 2015 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

If you understand then what difference does it make how a wisdom teacher phrases things, it does not seem imprecise to me. There probably isn't a mistake in translation just possibly a mistake in how it's been interpreted.

Therefore, they are able to destroy the self-grasping in the minds of others. This is the supreme Phowa

Malcolm wrote:

This is the problem. It is either a translation issue (my guess), or GR was not speaking in a precise way (possible, but unlikely).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 25th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

Perhaps the way it is worded makes it so you can't understand it, but anything Garchen Rinpoche says to his students as an instruction can be taken seriously, his students understand him.

Malcolm wrote:

I understand what it says. The way it is worded is not consistent with the Buddha's teachings. So it is either a mistake in translation, or GR was speaking imprecisely.

It would be awesome if my self-grasping could be destroyed by a Buddha without my having to do anything. Sign me up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

smcj said:

From another thread. Garchin R. weighs in on the definition of "non-dual".

Garchin R. said:

Those who understand the view of non-duality, that self and others are not separate, can practice the Dharmakaya Phowa. The Dharmakaya Phowa is very powerful. Those who do not understand the non-duality of self and others should practice the Phowa of compassion - the Samboghakaya and Nirmanakaya Phowa. So those who perceive a duality of self and others, who think that we are separate from each other, should practice the Samboghakaya or Nirmanakaya Phowa - the Phowa of compassion. Those who understand that a duality of self and others does not exist within the mind, can practice the Dharmakaya Phowa. Because they have given rise to compassion, they have love; and because they have realized emptiness, they know that a duality of self and others does not exist. Therefore, they are able to destroy the self-grasping in the minds of others. This is the supreme Phowa

smcj said:

(formatting mine)

How does that square with Madhyamaka?

Malcolm wrote:

In Madhyamaka, ultimately there is no duality because neither existence nor nonexistence, self and other, etc. is established in the ultimate.

However, the final statement, "they are able to destroy the self-grasping in the minds of others" is not consistent with the premise, "because they have realized emptiness, they know that a duality of self and others does not exist."

Further, there is the added problem — Buddhas have realized everything to realize, and have abandoned everything to abandon, they have perfect compassion which is unlimited. For what reason then have they not destroyed self-grasping that exists in the mind of all sentient beings? Therefore, I don't think that this statement above can be taken seriously. It also contradicts the statement of the Buddha:

Misdeeds cannot be washed away by water, the suffering of living beings cannot be removed with the hand,
my realization cannot transferred to another, but by showing the true nature of things, there will be liberation.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Neti Pots and you

Content:

Ayu said:

What kind of water do you recommend?

Malcolm wrote:

You should use only a distilled water saline solution in your nostrils.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Neti Pots and you

Content:

Ayu said:

I did not know before what is a neti pot. For me such a pot looks strange. I do it just with my hand under a tap.

Malcolm wrote:

One should never use tap water to clean sinuses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 7:53 PM

Title: Re: Neti Pots and you

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

So, I have used one of these for years for chronic sinusitis, doctor ordered years ago, before the post themselves were a thing, and they made you use a big syringe and saline cup. I've heard different things from different health professionals on how often to use them. Many of them have told me (ENT's in particular) basically to use it every day, I stopped doing this a while back because using it everyday seemed to make my sinuses feel permanently inflamed. Now I use it when I start to feel stuffy, feel a cold etc. coming on, or oddly..when my vision seems kind of dull. For some reason, I could swear it has always made my vision a little clearer after doing in terms of vividness of colors etc.

Anyone have detailed experiences with neti pots?

Malcolm wrote:

You should use some oil after doing neti because it dries out your sinuses.

<http://www.banyanbotanicals.com/nasya-oil-7/>

Use only neti only when needed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

My point isn't that one year of data is sufficient to proof that there is no global warming in the last 50 years so I am not guilty of cherry picking data.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm., no.

WeiHan said:

"These people are not making any claim that we're going to have some big recovery [in sea ice]," says Mark Serreze, director of the National Snow and Ice Data Center (who was not involved with the paper), adding that decreasing trends in the sea ice mean we're still eventually heading toward a seasonally ice-free Arctic ocean. "But it's going to occur in fits and starts because the sea ice is highly variable — we're going to go up some years, down in others."

Serreze does have some criticism for the paper. This study shows that "sea ice thickness, like extent, is highly variable," he says. "Now, we've already known that it's highly variable ... So it's really not saying anything new there." He also has some concerns about the basic methods the researchers used to compute changes in sea ice volume, arguing that they made some "suspect assumptions" about certain important factors that could affect their calculations, like the thickness of snow cover on the ice.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/news/energy-environment/wp/2015/07/20/no-arctic-sea-ice-is-not-going-to-be-okay/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 8:39 AM

Title: Re: Purchasing things made by slave labor

Content:

Boomerang said:

If you know that a popular commercial product comes from slave labor, is there a negative karmic consequence to purchasing it?

Malcolm wrote:

It cuts both ways.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 2:43 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

They should go talk to this guy, King Indrabhuti:

kirtu said:

Not everyone can or should be King Indrabhuti. Some people even within Tibetan Buddhism are inclined to a more ascetic life.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, totally valid choice.

kirtu said:

However your comments on the Chinese freaking out are dead on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 24th, 2015 at 2:26 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Jikan said:

I'm going to have to go back and figure out how a discussion on anti-Tibetan propaganda turned into a discussion about sexuality.

Malcolm wrote:

Easy, sex is the main thing that freaks Chinese people out, and there is a lot of sex in Tibetan Buddhism, "sacred" and "otherwise." That is why some Chinese Buddhists and others hate Tibetan Buddhists. We get laid [when we can], work it into our path, and don't apologize for it.

Some people have this insane idea that you cannot be awakened and sexual. They should go talk to this guy, King Indrabhuti:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

A mandala image, no matter how many deities in it there are, is a single figure. It is not two things. When there is a yabyum, it means the principle of bliss is being emphasized. Right. Let us start with that understanding as a common basis for further discussion. So now what is it that we are disagreeing on?

Malcolm wrote:

I am just clarifying a point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

EDIT 2 - No, I think my original understanding was correct, and my comment re: your view of the yab-yum still stands. Therefore this is the correct view:

Urgyen Dorje said:

... the yab yum has the same symbolism. It has to ... It's not pointing to a particular skillfull means.

smcj said:

Exactly so. As you've said, a visualized single figure will still have an implement to symbolize the inclusion of the method/wisdom dichotomy as an integrated whole. That is a symbolic description of the enlightened mind, right? And, as your own posts have explained, that inclusion is no different than a yab/yum visualization with two figures, right? Therefore the two figure visualization is a symbolic depiction of the enlightened mind, right? A two figure visualization has the same symbolism as a single figure only with the dichotomy more fully expressed in the symbolism. And all this various visualizations are done with the figures on lotus flower to demonstrate that they are unstained by samsara, right?

Malcolm wrote:

A mandala image, no matter how many deities in it there are, is a single figure. It is not two things. When there is a yabyum, it means the principle of bliss is being emphasized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 11:03 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

Other sects could easily have different presentations.

Indeed, you but were over generalizing from the specific point of view of your experience.

Au contraire. I was not generalizing, and I was not speaking from my own experience. I was reiterating what has been said by two authentic Dharma sources, and all along I have been very specific about the context. And I have left the door open for presentation from other sects about the subject, as long as they are backed up by authentic Dharma sources. Given that the tantras need commentary by living masters I think that a cut and paste from a tantra about this subject is not enough, and that people should be willing to back up what they opine with quotes from their teacher on the subject.

Malcolm wrote:

Just go read the Lamdre version of the Hevajra sadhana. For that matter, just take Lamdre. Everyone who takes Lamdre receives complete instructions in all completion stage practices including Karmamudra practice.

Karmamudra is not that important for Dzogchen practitioners, because it is not their path, nevertheless there are literally hundreds of instructions for using sex in the path found in various cycles of Dzogchen teachings.

smcj said:

Given that the Gelugpas as a sect were initiated as a reform movement motivated largely by Tsongkhapa's reaction/criticism of what he saw as the abuse of Vajrayana ideas into the lax morality of his day, with this practice specifically at the very top of his list,

Malcolm wrote:

This is unsubstantiated, though you repeat it often enough as if it were true. Tsongkhapa never envisioned that he was even starting a movement, much less a movement that was in reaction to lax morality. This is a western fantasy that has no historical basis in reality.

smcj said:

Tsongkhapa's criticism/reaction to the Nyingma approach to this practice was also basically a sectarian criticism.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, and what criticism is that? If it exists, you should say what it is, in what text, in which volume of his collected works.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Gotama/Shakyamuni

Content:

pema yeshe said:

AND samantabhadra/bhadrhi is YOU!!!

have fun everyone!

Simon E. said:

So I am the Dharmakaya ?

alpha said:

You are all three. Dharmakaya Sambogakaya Nirmanakaya

Malcolm wrote:

We have all three as potentials, we still have to recognize them in direct perception.

That is what practice is for.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

It still bewilders me why we presume karmamudra is the only method to take sexuality onto the path.

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't. there is also the yoga of passion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Gotama/Shakyamuni

Content:

smcj said:

...the claim was made that all forms of Buddhism are derived 'directly' from 'Gotama, The Buddha'.

My understanding is that Vajradhara is understood to be the enlightenment of Sakyamuni as seen from the Vajrayana perspective. So that's why at the very top of the Kagyu Refuge tree is a small Vajradhara, representing Sakyamuni. Then you also visualize your own teacher as Vajradhara, not because he is in any sense the same personage as Sakyamuni, but the enlightenment presented to you by him is still the enlightenment of Sakyamuni as has been passed down through the lineage(s).

Malcolm wrote:

This is not how things are presented in Dzogchen, or for that matter in Sakya or Nyingma. In both Sakya and Nyingma for example, the nirmanakāya is not considered to be the "Teacher". There is only one teacher, Buddha Samantabhadhra/Vajradhara. This single teacher, the dharmakāya, called Samantabhadra, emanates the Samabhogakāya, in this case Vajradhara, who in turn emanates the nirmanakāyas such as Śākyamuni. I am fairly certain the Kagyus also present things in this way.

The Gelugpas understand it the way you present it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

Well duh, of course. That's the point. For one thing I self-identify as a dilettante. The teaching I received, and have regurgitated here, was directed towards me, a non-yogi. That's what makes it appropriate to repeat in a public forum such as this. If I was discussing the specifics of the practice that would be completely inappropriate.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, you should not be commenting about it all in my opinion.

smcj said:

Like I said, JKhedrup's geshe confirmed these ideas independently here at DW on another thread.

Malcolm wrote:

And as I said, what the hell do monks know about it? Nothing, it is not something they practice.

smcj said:

Other sects could easily have different presentations.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, you but were over generalizing from the specific point of view of your experience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

Tathagatagarbha is totally unacceptable to them because it too much seems to assert an essence.

Malcolm wrote:

They simple do not understand that tathāgatagarbha simply refers to the innate luminosity of the mind, or in other words, its purity.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Jikan said:

I think we're straying into the weeds with the discussion around Jambudvipa.

I suppose it's better to ask what remains relevant to the needs of ordinary people in Japanese Buddhist traditions. I'll argue that they offer a means to liberation from the suffering and struggle of everyday life on ordinary terms. How this interfaces with contemporary Japanese social life and institutions, the substrate upon which these traditions depend for their continued existence, is a separate matter and I don't know how to address it.

Malcolm wrote:

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is not whether the description is literally precise in all its details, however, the fact is that it describes an Indo-centric view of the world where Jambudvipa is the southern most continent relative to the landmass of the Himalayas.

BTW, the four continents and the eight minor continents are all described in the Abhidharmakosha.

Queequeg said:

I'm more or less taking what your arguing implicitly to suggest, there are myriads of people whose understanding of the world around them do not coincide with the "Indo-centric" views, or more expansively, the ideas of the substance of matter (being composed of 4 or 5 elements), for example, or the construction of people as 5 aggregates, and yet, I don't accept that they are precluded from Buddhist attainment because they don't adopt these subjective views.

Malcolm wrote:

If you don't understand the five aggregates, you will never attain buddhahood. Why? Because you will never understand what absence of self really means in any concrete way.

The four or five elements are phenomenological descriptions of matter (hardness, liquidity, heat, motility and absence of obstruction), they are not considered things in themselves, at least, not in Yogacara on up.

If you do not understand the five elements, you will not understand the meaning of rūpaskandha.

Myriads of people do not attain buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: Tricycle: Anne Klein on the transmission of Tibetan Budd

Content:

drodul said:

What about the idea that tulkus can reincarnate in multiple bodies as the body, speech, mind, quality & activity incarnations? Does this accord with the Buddha's teachings on reincarnation, or is it a political expedient?

Malcolm wrote:

Those are not reincarnations, those are emanations. This comes from the idea that someone achieved buddhahood, like Khyentse Wangpo, and thus, their activities can manifest in this way.

But these are not "yang srid."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All four continents as well as their minor continents are held to be inhabited by human beings. Where did you ever get the idea that only Jambudvīpa was inhabited by human beings?

Queequeg said:

I must have read a different myth than you.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is not whether the description is literally precise in all its details, however, the fact is that it describes an Indo-centric view of the world where Jambudvīpa is the southern most continent relative to the landmass of the Himalayas.

BTW, the four continents and the eight minor continents are all described in the Abhidharmakośha.

Not only this, it is pretty clear that in India at any rate, cosmologies like the Kośha were not taken literally in India, since the Indians knew the world was round and "suspended" in space.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 4:30 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

There are some ideas that are very clearly wrong.

Jikan said:

Is this true across all Japanese traditions? Some more than others, or some not at all?

Queequeg said:

I referred to Jambudvīpa, but more generally, Buddhist cosmology supposes the world is a disc, floating on an ocean of cream, or whatever the myth proposes. If someone insists this is essential to Buddhist understanding, I have to bow out of that project. I don't think it is essential.

Malcolm wrote:

There are several Buddhist cosmological descriptions, not merely one. There is a Hinayāna description, which people are fond of making fun of (despite that fact Ptolemy concurs with Abhidharma cosmology by naming the people of the Northern steps of central Asia "Ottarakurus", and describing that place as a vast grassland, etc.)

There is also a Mahāyāna description, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 4:27 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

There are some ideas that are very clearly wrong. A literal conception of Jambudvipa doesn't coincide with what we know this world to look like, for one/

Malcolm wrote:

It coincides with the shape of India very well, for that is what Jambudvipa is, the subcontinent of India.

Queequeg said:

Where Jambudvipa is the only continent inhabited by humans? OK.

Malcolm wrote:

All four continents as well as their minor continents are held to be inhabited by human beings. Where did you ever get the idea that only Jambudvipa was inhabited by human beings?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 3:14 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

Well, in that case, no disrespect intended, but you really do not know what you are talking about.

If I were trying to teach this practice that would be a fair criticism. However that is not what I am doing. What I have repeated here is what is appropriate for Dharma students that are not advanced yogis to hear. Since this is a public internet forum I believe this presentation is the one that should be put forward regarding this topic.

Malcolm wrote:

And I think you are merely furthering misinformation and phobia.

smcj said:

I have faithfully repeated what my teacher explained to me in regards to this practice, which was independently confirmed by JKhedrup's geshe here on another thread at DW.

Malcolm wrote:

What the hell do monks know about these things? Nothing, that's what.

smcj said:

I do find it amusing to be taking a more conservative position on this than you obviously are doing. That's not easy to do. I'm actually somewhat proud of it.

Malcolm wrote:

Your approach is not more conservative in any respect at all. It is the opposite, actually. It is Vajrayāna lite™

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 3:04 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

generally though, if something can't be supported by evidence, its going to fall into the "indeterminate" category at best.

Malcolm wrote:

For example, Buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

Malcolm, what you assert has to be assumed from the start to bear out. You're familiar enough with how this argument plays out. There's no need to continue.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, even when you start from an agnostic position, you will discover, upon investigation, that so called "empirical reality" is no more real than last night's dream.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

There are some ideas that are very clearly wrong. A literal conception of Jambudvipa doesn't coincide with what we know this world to look like, for one/

Malcolm wrote:

It coincides with the shape of India very well, for that is what Jambudvipa is, the subcontinent of India.

Queequeg said:

To catalog all the ideas woven into Buddhist discourse that are quite clearly wrong should not be that controversial. I honestly can't spend the time to compile a list, but there are very clearly many ideas that we'd consider magic or alchemy treated in Buddhist texts as literal truths.

Malcolm wrote:

For example?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: Tricycle: Anne Klein on the transmission of Tibetan Budd

Content:

fckw said:

1. It is not clear at all whether reincarnation - if it exists - actually follows linear time. Maybe our previous reincarnation was in the future. Ever thought about that?

Malcolm wrote:

Not possible by definition.

fckw said:

2. It is not clear at all whether an individual does reincarnate as a single other individual.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is very clear in the teaching of the Buddha that transmigration is serial and unique.

For example, the Buddha says:

I am the owner of my actions,[1] heir to my actions, born of my actions, related through my actions, and have my actions as my arbitrator. Whatever I do, for good or for evil, to that will I fall heir.'

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/an/an05/an05.057.than.html>

fckw said:

Assume, for example, it is reborn in the formless realms. Where is its individuality then? Or why shouldn't one be reborn as several people?

Malcolm wrote:

Every sentient being in the formless realm has a unique jivendriya, an organ of vitality, as well as a mind.

fckw said:

3. Reincarnation - if it exists - does not give rebirth to the "same" individual. According to Buddhist dharma, it's the karmic impulse that continues, not the personality. Since the karmic impulse has no personality it's simply nonsensical to talk of someone's previous life in the way it is done here.

Malcolm wrote:

Rebirth is not a karmic impulse that continues. The Buddha never taught this. Rebirth is the serial appropriation of addictive aggregates because of afflictions in a mind stream.

fckw said:

4. Assuming that the victims - all of them - indeed were the previous oppressors and their oppressors - all of them - the previous victims. Then what about the pre-previous incarnations? Where is the beginning? As we all know, there is none. Therefore, arguing with a random previous life (the one before this one) if in fact there are incountable ones is silly.

Malcolm wrote:

All we need to know is that sentient beings are born conditioned by affliction and action and if they do not awaken, they will continue to cultivate affliction and action with no end in sight.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Time to sell the beach house:

The study—written by James Hansen, NASA's former lead climate scientist, and 16 co-authors, many of whom are considered among the top in their fields—concludes that glaciers in Greenland and Antarctica will melt 10 times faster than previous consensus estimates, resulting in sea level rise of at least 10 feet in as little as 50 years. The study, which has not yet been peer-reviewed, brings new importance to a feedback loop in the ocean near Antarctica that results in cooler freshwater from melting glaciers forcing warmer, saltier water underneath the ice sheets, speeding up the melting rate. Hansen, who is known for being alarmist and also right, acknowledges that his study implies change far beyond previous consensus estimates. In a conference call with reporters, he said he hoped the new findings would be "substantially more persuasive than anything previously published." I certainly find them to be.

http://www.slate.com/blogs/the_slatest/2015/07/20/sea_level_study_james_hansen_is_sues_dire_climate_warning.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 23rd, 2015 at 1:04 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Unknown said:

"Collapse can be avoided and population can reach equilibrium if the per capita rate of depletion of nature is reduced to a sustainable level, and if resources are distributed in a reasonably equitable fashion."

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.theguardian.com/environment/earth-insight/2014/mar/14/nasa-civilisation-irreversible-collapse-study-scientists>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Jikan said:

To give an example: Some Japanese traditions (Tendai and the Nichiren schools) uphold the view of Chih-i that the Buddha taught the Dharma in five periods, and these five periods correspond to certain texts as benchmarks, with the Avatamsaka coming first and the Lotus and Parinirvana sutras coming last. Suppose one were to apply the methods of contemporary science and reason* to this schema, which is upheld as a historical truth by many in the Hokke schools. How long would this doctrine last--or how might it change? And how might those changes, including the total implosion of this doctrine upon itself, impact the central practices of those schools?

Malcolm wrote:

Or, how are they going to negotiate the collision with other Buddhist traditions that have wildly different notions about the transmission of Dharma?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Including other practices before dedication in Short Tun

Content:

haak0n said:

I think its a little too much. Wrathful practice + mandarava or oser chenma doesnt sound like a good combination.

My suggestion is to break up your sessions accordingly, but this is only my opinion.

Finney said:

Actually, it's quite common to do both in a thun. When discussing practice with different lamas (who are not part of the DC) I've heard various peaceful/wrathful combinations: yamantaka and tara, vajrakilaya and chenrezig, etc. If you're not confident in your lha'i nga rgyal (divine pride), though, I could see not wanting to do both kinds in one sitting.

haak0n said:

I think its the opposite. When I first started in the DC I always wanted to do a little of many different practices every day for their relative benefits.

Now I more feel like 'one practice covers all'. Thats more confidence no?

Malcolm wrote:

We have different conditions, so we work with circumstances.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

Thanks for the clarification. I'm on the same page in that sense. My intent was to address the idea that a scientific, empirical, and rational approach should not be at odds with the fundamental truths of Buddhism

Malcolm wrote:

The fundamental truths of Buddhism are predicated on the abhijñā of the Buddha, which involved recalling myriad past lives. This is a fundamental truth of Buddhism that is at odds with a "scientific, empirical, and rational" approach to reality, which is predicated on the ordinary, contaminated, deluded consciousness of sentient beings.

Queequeg said:

Buddhism if it will be useful to people now and in the future will need to be reconciled with and expressed through scientific ideas, even if it ultimately leads to Buddhism transforming and leaving a mark on science...

Malcolm wrote:

Modern science is in no position to evaluate Buddhist doctrines of mind, nor the nature of the mind.

Queequeg said:

But retreating into medieval or ancient beliefs just to preserve dharma as its been handed down is an unwise plan that I think will have very limited appeal...

Malcolm wrote:

It is amazing to see how people think that their limited, conventional, "empirical", consciousness is the benchmark for truth. This limited, conventional, "empirical", consciousness is precisely the reason we sentient beings transmigrate in samsara. The "empirical" world we experience is just a kind of karmic vision. It is no more true than a dream.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Loss of Japanese traditions

Content:

Queequeg said:

Nobody is going to give up atmospheric science to go back to the idea that dragons cause rain...

Malcolm wrote:

Nāga pujas to generate rain are indeed very effective.

Queequeg said:

when I'm diagnosed with cancer, I'd like my chemo rather than the suggestion of a pilgrimage to see the Medicine Buddha statue.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on whether you have a one lifetime view or a view that includes rebirth. The merit of the latter certainly exceeds the merit of the former.

Queequeg said:

If the heart of the Buddhist teachings is true, then its true in the most immediate viral meme and there is something of dharma in it that will resonate with people - you don't need to insist on an ancient Indian pantheon and geography; there is some expression of it that will connect with people now. If we haven't found it yet, then that's our failure as Buddhists who live now.

Malcolm wrote:

Hence, the corporate mindfulness movement...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

As I've said all along, consort practice is not sex.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you really have never received instructions for this practice. If you had, you would have understood that it is also called "taking desire into the path."

smcj said:

Have I had detailed instructions, as in how to actually do it? No.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, in that case, no disrespect intended, but you really do not know what you are talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

As I've said all along, consort practice is not sex.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you really have never received instructions for this practice. If you had, you would have understood that it is also called "taking desire into the path."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: Gotama/Shakyamuni

Content:

Kunga Lhadzom said:

What's the difference between Gotama Shakyamuni and Samantabhadra (Ultimately)

Malcolm wrote:

Samantabhadra is the dharmakāya, of whom Śākyamuni is an emanation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 12:37 AM

Title: Re: Gotama/Shakyamuni

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, they have it wrong. All forms of Buddhism derive from Samantabhadra.

dzogchungpa said:

I wonder what Samantabhadra derives from?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 22nd, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Gotama/Shakyamuni

Content:

Simon E. said:

In a thread now locked the claim was made that all forms of Buddhism are derived 'directly ' from ' Gotama, The Buddha '.

What say you ?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they have it wrong. All forms of Buddhism derive from Samantabhadra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 10:22 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, an in mexico, they marry alligators:

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3145964/Mexican-mayor-marries-ALLIGATOR->

believed-princess-traditional-ceremony-hundreds-not-reptile-baptized.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

One of the skillful means that is a remedy to such disturbance of the elements is the practice of sang. This is something we either believe or don't believe as the understanding of such things come from primordial wisdom, not conceptual mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, some idiot is likely to claim that by burning juniper and rhododendron one is contributing to warming...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So I guess what it boils down to is this: traditionally the institution of marriage is between one man and one woman, one man and one tree, one women and one fruit, several brothers and one women, several women and one man and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

kirtu said:

The way you have written this is a strawman (as I have already pointed out). So nothing says exactly that or anything close to those semantics.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a strawman — there is no support at all in sūtra or tantra for the tulku system in Tibetan Buddhism.

This is a different issue than the general teaching that variegated nirmanakāyas will appear for the benefit of sentient beings. No method for recognizing these is provided in the sūtras and tantras. Why? Because nirmanakāyas know they are nimanakāyas. They do not need a process of confirmation.

Then there of course my post on the subject.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 5:13 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

DKR just indicted the tulku system for giving a wrong view of reincarnation, at around 38 minutes into the first session

dzogchungpa said:

I almost got up to ask a question about what exactly he meant by this remark but, sadly, I was too timid.

What do you think he might have been getting at?

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that an integral person incarnates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 21st, 2015 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Or it is Mahāmudra view, or it is Prajñāpāramita view, and so on. It is the final view the Buddha taught in all sūtra and tantras.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I offer respect again.

Well, "ati" is indeed "utmost", or "final".

Would it be fair to say your rejection of the reincarnate kun rdzob sprul sku is more or less part and parcel of your rejection of the necessity of the purification/transformation yanas?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't reject reincarnations, I reject the system of recognizing them. I think the system of recognizing tulkus hugely liable to eight worldly dharmas and actually provides a breeding ground for them within the bosom of Tibetan Buddhist institutions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

"Everyone is a tulku", " ... rinpoches all the way down" and "sacred outlook [already] comes from having discovered your real nature" are statements of ati view. This view states that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

Or it is Mahāmudra view, or it is Prajñāpāramita view, and so on. It is the final view the Buddha taught in all sūtra and tantras.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

The view of the paths of purification and transformation states that the path must still clarify confusion. Thus even in that view, "sacred outlook" is still a path, and not yet a complete wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

The basis of delusion is vidyā. Confusion is already clear. The world is already sacred. We don't need a view to make it so. If you need a "view" or an "outlook" to make the world sacred, then something is wrong with your view and outlook.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Even in the view which regards the path of self-liberation as a complete path in and of itself, the blessings of the kundzop guru are required, particularly for the secondary practices, which are numerous.

Malcolm wrote:

The blessings of the relative guru is just knowledge of our primordial state. That is the only blessing we need, it does not matter what other paths we think we are following. One can fill an ocean the size of the billion-fold universe with tears of devotion and never be one step closer to recognizing one's real state. We don't need that kind of blessing. We only need the blessing of direct introduction.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

This is because even in ati view, only a realized master can abide constantly in naturally arising primordial wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

We all abide constantly in self-originated pristine consciousness [rang byung ye shes] and always have. The only difference between oneself and a master is the degree to which one has integrated with that understanding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

In my view this will result in the further irrelevance of sacred outlook, which is already a myth, hence a joke, in our so called post enlightenment culture.

Malcolm wrote:

"Sacred outlook" is just a contrivance unless it comes from having discovered your real nature.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

My teacher is a vajra guru, and a tulku. Because my guru has taught this view, I adopt this view. Therefore it is not a matter of opinion.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone is a tulku. From my blog:

The purpose of this post is to settle a controversy [and perhaps create another] and remove a misunderstanding about so called "sprul skus" or reincarnations, that venerable institution that causes so much controversy in Tibetan Buddhism.

In the teaching of the Great Perfection there are two kinds of so called nirmanakāyas or tulkus. First, there are impure forward-progression [ma dag pa lugs 'byung] nirmanakāyas i.e. all sentient beings. These arise because of ignorance.

The second are pure reverse-progression [dag pa lugs ldog] nirmanakāyas: among these there are also two, those that come from the dharmakāya and sambhogakāya, nirmanakāyas of compassion if you will. The second are called nirmanakāyas of the attained result, these are sentient beings of pure karma, blessed by being seen by the buddhas, who make more and more progress, attaining higher and higher states of yogic understanding.

Thus we sentient beings are all nirmanakāyas -- differentiated only by our level of relative attainment and relative level of pure and impure karma.

The so-called "tulkus" of institutional Tibetan Buddhism are also sentient beings; some with higher yogic attainments, some with none, and others with some. Because they are sentient beings, some remember their rebirths well, and others not at all. Some achieve high levels of yogic understanding, some are great teachers, some are panditas, poets and artists. Some tulkus are mere politicians, some are gangsters, some are thieves. But they are all sentient beings. Not one of them was not born from the womb of a human mother.

Most tulkus are never "recognized" because anyone who practices Dharma sincerely is a tulku, no matter what level of "realization" they are reputed to have, whether or not they have been recognized. In this sense, a tulku is defined as someone who acts to help sentient beings inspired by the compassion of the buddhas for sentient beings.

We are all rinpoches, precious ones. Sentient beings are precious because their plight is the cause of the compassion of the buddhas. Buddhas are precious because they exist solely to aid sentient beings from suffering. I guess you could say it is rinpoches all the way down.

Some people crave recognition, wanting others to acknowledge their status -- consider yourselves acknowledged but don't expect a title. If you want people to consider you a tulku, act like one. If you must, fake it. Faking it may even lead to developing some real compassion which exceeds your petty narrow-minded grasping to titles and position. Being a pure reverse-progression tulku means cherishing all sentient beings. Nothing is holding you back but your own selfishness.

The Dzogchen teachings acknowledge that all sentient beings are tulkus. But whether that is meaningful is not up to the buddhas, it is up to each one of us and our dedication to the path of awakening and benefitting our fellow tulkus.

In reality, tulkthood is defined not by robes, titles, race, position, gender, education, or creed but by how we are able to apply wisdom and compassion in our efforts to aid sentient beings and alleviate their suffering.

<http://www.atikosha.org/2011/01/we-are-all-rinpoches-nirmanakayas-and.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

kirtu said:

Yes, of course it did. People make excuses but prior to creation of the Internet it was not possible to provide universal education to the vast majority of humanity, and certainly not on demand. Prior to the popularity of MOOC's it was unlikely but possible. The real date for universal education for humanity is really about 2004. we still have a way to go before we can really claim that any Dharma practitioner that wants to can receive quality Dharma education but that is clearly coming fast (for example critical commentaries across traditions are still not available, etc.)

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

You said:

we have now passed the point in history where we can no longer provide a basic Dharma education to everyone desiring one.

I said:

That point in history never existed.

In other words, there never was a point in history where we could provide a basic Dharma education to everyone desiring one. You apparently meant the opposite of what you wrote.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

I don't want to create controversies by answering this question, because my opinion based on Mahayana Buddhism..therefore, I think sex cannot be part of enlightenment path, as Buddha has said in Pali Tripitaka as well as Taisho tripitaka, The Tibetan tantras have additional scriptures, which believe in transferring the negative energy into positive one which is enlightenment..however, according to other sources, Buddha has cut everything to reach enlightenment, he won't engage in sex, or any other sexual form, including tantric one, to avoid attachment as well as negative Karma that might be the result

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha taught three paths: the path of renunciation which is common to Hinayāna and Mahāyāna; the path of transformation which is general Vajrayāna and the path of self-liberation, which is also termed Atiyoga.

The principles of the higher paths often seem to contradict the principles of the lower paths, but in reality, they are all aiming at the same point, buddhahood. If someone does not have faith in a path, for example, karmamudra, they should leave it aside and not criticize it, because many masters in India and Tibet have attained complete buddhahood through practicing this path. One should be careful not to criticize Vajrayāna teachings, because one will abandon the Dharma if one does so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 7:41 AM

Title: Re: Dzongsar Khyentse Webcast-Is There Buddhism Without Rebi

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, I found the whole thing rather disappointing. One, he never answered anyone's questions. Two, he merely asserted that we should not reject rebirth since it was valid conventional truth, but when pressed could never produce the many arguments which prove rebirth.

Mostly, I thought it was a very rambling, aimless presentation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Can anyone point me to a reference in either sūtra or tantra, Nyingma or Sarma, that says, "In the last 500 years of the Dharma, the only way the Dharma will be preserved is through recognizing small children as the reincarnations of dead masters"?

kirtu said:

You know for a fact that the claims supporting tulku recognition are selective readings of sutras and hagiographic material usually related to purported prophecies originating with Padmasambhava (or Shakyamuni in the case of sutric sources) down to visions and declarations of teachers that other find authoritative.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the same citations reused for all kinds of different people.

kirtu said:

So from Incarnation, Chapter 2 In the ninth century, Guru Padmasambhava gave a prophecy to the king (King Trisong Detsen) about the king's future tulkus:

Lord, you will serve beings in India for (the next) thirteen lives,
After that, in the region of Lungmar of Lhotrag,
You will take birth as Nima Ozer, a master of kama and terma teachings
And you will serve beings through esoteric activities,
After that, in Pangje of Lhotrag,
You will manifest as Chokyi Wangchuk

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, no one doubts that are predictions of rebirths in sūtra as well as tantra; but the question I asked was very pointed, "Can anyone point me to a reference in either sūtra or tantra, Nyingma or Sarma, that says, "In the last 500 years of the Dharma, the only way the Dharma will be preserved is through recognizing small children as the reincarnations of dead masters"?"

And the answer is: no where.

kirtu said:

The funny thing too is that people somehow believe tulkus get better training than ordinary people. Really, this is a fantasy. The fact is that young tulkus are often put to work at a very young age raising money for their monasteries, and as a result, they often have very inferior training compared with normal scholars in shedras.

Well this has to be fixed. And of course we have now passed the point in history where we can no longer provide a basic Dharma education to everyone desiring one. So with a little work everyone can raise their level of scholarship and practice.

Malcolm wrote:

That point in history never existed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 4:01 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

It hardly makes sense as there's 500M Buddhists on the planet, about 7-8% of the population. Buddhists have certainly been getting it on for the last 2500 years. You'd think we'd be able to talk about it and, as you say, integrate it into practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, Buddhism /= Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Guru trapur

Content:

kashmir said:

Is it ok to use the long and short guru trapper mantras interchangeably even though CNN gives usually the shorter one?

Malcolm wrote:

You only need the short one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

If someone that hasn't taken a vow of celibacy wants to have sex, let them have sex. But using an advanced Vajrayana practice as a pretext for normal sex is sacrilege imo.

Malcolm wrote:

I see, so we are supposed to use eating yoga, sleeping yogas, waking yogas and so on, but when it comes to sex, we are just supposed not integrate this into our practice because it is sex?

That hardly makes any sense at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 2:21 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

theanarchist said:

There are plant species that have male and female individuals. For example the Ginko

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is common knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm down with that. Dendrophelia.

But... Gasp... the cold flush of fear... Is it a FEMALE tree she married???

Malcolm wrote:

Transgendered, I think...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

This is actually one of the most interesting things I've seen on DW.

We better make sure the trees can't get married. The horror, the horror.

A tree is currently getting more action than a lot of men out there.

According to news.com.au, Emma McCabe, 31, told Closer magazine she has found the most satisfying sexual relationship she's ever had in a tall poplar tree she has named Tim.

McCabe intends to marry the tree because all of her relationships with humans have failed miserably.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://elitedaily.com/news/world/woman-marrying-tree-best-sex/977768/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

DKR just indicted the tulku system for giving a wrong view of reincarnation, at around 38 minutes into the first session

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Identification of rGya-mThso'i lBu-ba

Content:

pemachophel said:

Thanks Loppon-la. One of my Dharma friends is trying to make Naga incense here in the U.S. She loves to offer Naga sang on every lu-theb day. She ran out of commercial Naga sang; so she's trying to create her own. She's done a great job of tracking down and sourcing ingredients. I'll tell her what you've said.

Malcolm wrote:

I think generally, what ChNN recommends is to just use juniper and other aromatic smelling plants like sage, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 20th, 2015 at 12:24 AM

Title: Re: Identification of rGya-mThso Bu-wa

Content:

pemachophel said:

Can anyone help me with the identification of rgya.mtsho.bu.ba? One on-line source I've found says cuttlefish bone. A friend suggests it might be meershaum based on a translation of the Tibetan name (sea bubbles or foam). I had thought it is cuttlefish bone, but then I found out it's an ingredient in a Naga sang recipe and I know you're not supposed to offer animal products to the Nagas.

Any clarification of this would be greatly appreciated.

Thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

rgya mtsho bu ba is defined in Tibetan materia medica as an earth and stone medicine. However, it is indeed cuttlefish bone that is wild crafted from beaches.

The main problem with offering incense to Nagas is that most Tibetan incense contains musk, and other animal products. But since this is a sea product, I don't think there is an issue, especially if you get it from a traditional source where it is beach harvested, rather than a fishing byproduct. It is used for kidney heat and illnesses of the brain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 11:43 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Trees too (are roots legs?).

Malcolm wrote:

No, roots are the brains of a tree.

Urgyen Dorje said:

This year celebrates the 200th anniversary of the birth of Charles Darwin, best known for his theory of evolution summarized in On the Origin of Species. Less well known is that, in the second half of his life, Darwin's major scientific focus turned towards plants. He wrote several books on plants, the next-to-last of which, The Power of Movement of Plants, published together with his son Francis, opened plants to a new view. Here we amplify the final sentence of this book in which the Darwins proposed that: "It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the tip of the radicle thus endowed [with sensitivity] and having the power of directing the movements of the adjoining parts, acts like the brain of one of the lower animals; the brain being seated within the anterior end of the body, receiving impressions from the sense-organs, and directing the several movements." This sentence conveys two important messages: first, that the root apex may be considered to be a 'brain-like' organ endowed with a sensitivity which controls its navigation through soil; second, that the root apex represents the anterior end of the plant body. In this article, we discuss both these statements.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2819436/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

theanarchist said:

And by the way, the partner has to have the same qualification, so I imagine it's not easy to find a suitable consort anyway.

Malcolm wrote:

They just have to be at the same level do realization or absence thereof. Anyway, with regards to this topic, most people have not received instruction, and really, don't know what they are talking about.

theanarchist said:

Exactly. But there is the myth that an old lama f--ing some random young girl equals consort practice.

Malcolm wrote:

That is not a myth. Sometimes, in the past, if an older lama had an obstacle to their longevity, they would take a young consort, generally between 16-18 years of age.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

theanarchist said:

And by the way, the partner has to have the same qualification, so I imagine it's not easy to find a suitable consort anyway.

Malcolm wrote:

They just have to be at the same level do realization or absence thereof. Anyway, with regards to this topic, most people have not received instruction, and really, don't know what they are talking about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 9:00 PM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

I have just stating my opinion regarding the topic which is some group protesting Tibetan Buddhism...not meant to be provocative

I wasn't aware also until now that the consort practice has been admitted to be exist...so just stating my opinion...thats it

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, there is eating yoga, sleeping yoga, yogas for defecating and urinating too, so naturally there is a sexual yoga as well. If you are monk, you do not practice the last one.

ShineeSeoul said:

what i have learn here from member response, is that, even vajrayana monk can still have sex with consort if they are high practitioner? or so called qualified enough?

Malcolm wrote:

That is a difficult point, and your answer will vary depending on who you ask.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

It wouldn't break my heart if it was formally and officially discontinued..

Malcolm wrote:

It never will be, and it should not be.

smcj said:

As is with the issue of tulkus, the question is one of cost/benefit.

I've got no dog in this fight. WAY above my pay grade. I'm just pointing out that it has a huge downside to it, as is evidenced in this thread. Plus I'm never going to do that practice.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no downside. There is however the fact that some people do not understand what we are doing. Do we get rid of wrathful rituals merely because someone freaks out through their misconception that Buddhadharma is purely pacifist? Of course not. It is the same with the whole range of Vajrayāna practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

smcj said:

It wouldn't break my heart if it was formally and officially discontinued..

Malcolm wrote:

It never will be, and it should not be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: Anti-Tibetan Buddhism Signs

Content:

ShineeSeoul said:

I have just stating my opinion regarding the topic which is some group protesting Tibetan Buddhism...not meant to be provocative

I wasn't aware also until now that the consort practice has been admitted to be exist...so just stating my opinion...thats it

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, there is eating yoga, sleeping yoga, yogas for defecating and urinating too, so naturally there is a sexual yoga as well. If you are monk, you do not practice the last one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

Put that way, it would seem each court case is something to be regretted. Is that the response you've seen?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 8:05 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

I think I've been pretty consistent in wanting to discuss the underlying issues Malcolm. If UD says he values compassion, and that is not consistent with his presentation, then I question that, just as I am curious about the values of American society which seem to produce similarly conflicting views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 8:01 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Meanwhile, in real world where there is little knowledge of and less interest in such traditions, worldly people lead worldly lives which means they need worldly remedies for their worldly problems.

maybay said:

Worldly people don't lead, they follow, blindly, and their worldly problems continue.

What they need is Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

So are you out there standing on a street corner? No, you are pontificating to the choir, only the difference is, you seem to think that choir has not anticipated your lecture.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

For someone who puts love and compassion in front Urgyen, I'm sorry to say your writing sounds almost nothing like how the Dalai Lama writes. How do you explain this disparity? Is your's a different flavor of compassion? I'm trying to place your head-bashing rhetoric in the context of our discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 5:45 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

rory said:

Here is the clan, the warlike virile males of the past, remaking the present devoid of corrupting reason:
ISIS throwing 4 gay men off a roof.

I look to ancient Greece and Rome; the birth of ideas of democracy and equality under the law

maybay said:

Islam is like the shadow of the west and everything it represents. The more one pushes toward reason, the more the other pulls away from it. Only non-dual spiritual traditions offer any meaningful alternative.

Malcolm wrote:

Meanwhile, in real world where there is little knowledge of and less interest in such traditions, worldly people lead worldly lives which means they need worldly remedies for their worldly problems.

Philosopher kings are terrible rulers, and worse leaders. And Utopias are hells...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 3:56 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:
Possibly of interest...

<http://tulkus1880to2018.net/exhibition/>

<http://about.tbrc.org/tibetan-tulku-lines-and-networks/>

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, July 19th, 2015 at 1:59 AM
Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..
Content:

maybay said:
Seems like these days people don't need a reason to murder.

Malcolm wrote:
They never did.

maybay said:
Then your sentence "Countless fools have murdered and caused the murder of others in the name of honor, chivalry and valor" is meaningless.

Malcolm wrote:
People have always used pretenses (such as honor, chivalry, valor, glory, etc.) for acts that fundamentally are devoid of reason, reasoning and reasons.

maybay said:
Dr. Freya Reeves Lambides, Editor
Avalon to Camelot Dear Dr. Lambides,
My previous letter [Vol. 1 No. 4, p. 2] was hastily written, without the thought that it would be published. Of course my use of the term "fascism" was imprecise. The lesson, I suppose, is that one should not write anything one would not care to see in print.

However, I will stand on and even expand my indictment of chivalric literature, in which I have such illustrious predecessors as Petrarch and Cervantes. Chivalric literature has been predominantly deceptive; that is, it has attempted to mislead readers or listeners about historical truth. It has encouraged bloodshed for the sake of principle, and discouraged learning and study. It also promoted an immature concept of the relations between the sexes, and was, if not openly anti-Semitic (there is a famous example of the latter in the Cid), at least quite in harmony with the birth of modern anti-Semitism in the late Middle Ages.

Of course there are works which are exempt from some or all of the charges. Obviously the literature would not have been written or read if some desire for it were not there; however, to exonerate the literature on these grounds is the same as exonerating handguns with the argument “guns don’t kill people, people kill people.” Of our postwar presidents it was the most aggressive, who laid the foundation for the Vietnam War, with whom chivalry is most closely associated. The role of southern chivalry, derived from the neo-Arthurianism of Sir Walter Scott, in setting the scene for the Civil War was pointed out a century ago; nothing in southern chivalry was found incompatible with slavery. According to its constitution, the Ku Klux Klan embodies in its principles “all that is chivalric in conduct” (Stanley Frost, The Challenge of the Klan [1924; rpt. New York: AMS, 1969], p. 68).

I do, then, object to the glamorization and popularization of chivalric literature, and to the eager interest in those seemingly central questions, the existence of a historical Arthur and the origin of the grail legend. It is not that the investigation is wrong in itself (though it says something about us that chivalry is today the most popular aspect of the medieval world), but the motivation behind it is, on the whole, misguided. Chivalric literature, like all myths, should be studied, but not taught.

You have said you are not certain that Return to Camelot makes the case I imply. I will quote only one sentence from the opening paragraph of the final chapter, “The Great War”: “ One conclusion is undeniable: the ideals of chivalry worked with one accord in favor of war ” (p. 276).

Just as you found part of my letter hard to understand, one sentence in your answer is unclear to me. Who are the “beings like Merlin who transcend our known realities”? If you maintain that there are unknown realities, then you have left scholarship, and me, behind.

Sincerely,

Daniel Eisenberg

(Published in Avalon to Camelot, 2, No. 2 (1986 [1987], p. 2.)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 11:53 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm with you.

See what I've put in bold below. I think where we differ is that I'm asserting we're the ones idealizing Tibetan cultural institutions, even more so than most Tibetans.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, we are just naive, as a whole, making unwarranted assumptions based in a Shangri-la attitude.

But we are learning...

We do not need to imagine to accept the Dharma, we have to accept everything Tibetan. That will not work at all. We need to practice a Dharma that functions within our culture.

Urgyen Dorje said:

But the truth is that for a Westerner to practice a teaching that comes from Tibet there is no need for that person to become like a Tibetan. On the contrary, it is of fundamental importance for him to know how to integrate that teaching with his own culture in order to be able to communicate it, in its essential form, to other Westerners. But often, when people approach an Eastern teaching, they believe that their own culture is of no value. This attitude is very mistaken, because every culture has its value, related to the environment and circumstances in which it arose. No culture can be said to be better than another; rather it depends on the human individual whether he or she will derive greater or lesser advantage from it in terms of inner development. For this reason it is useless to transport rules and customs into a cultural environment different from the one in which they arose.

Malcolm wrote:

Chogyal Namkhai Norbu. Dzogchen: The Self-Perfected State (Kindle Locations 149-155). Kindle Edition.

We can respect the Dharma, yet be doubtful of the tulku system's long term value in the modern world, and still be very good practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

ngodrup said:

B analogy, you rarely hear people say the American constitutional democracy system is corrupt and should be disposed of.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, we often hear that here from some of the more so called "conservative" voices on this forum (I guess they want a monarchical restoration or some such silliness).

More seriously, American Democracy has become corrupted by money and power. This will be the major theme of the next election:

ngodrup said:

On a tangential topic of Ch NNR, I have heard at least one very prominent Geshe-- a candidate for Ganden Tri-- speak very highly of him, citing specifically his service to the Tibetan people by publishing on Tibetan History and Culture. The same Geshe openly criticizes pervasive nepotism in Tibetan society.

Malcolm wrote:

That's cool.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Truthfully, the only reincarnation that I have any confidence in is Chogyal Namkhai Norbu because he was recognized by someone who attained rainbow body, his uncle. The rest of them I really don't believe in.

theanarchist said:

This here is completely anonymous so I can say this much.

Almost two decades ago I met a Tibetan lama and I had a nagging suspicion that I had to have known that man from before. I don't know what made me do it, but we were alone in that room, I pointed at a photo that someone had put on the shrine that showed his supposed previous incarnation and I asked him, what's your connection to that one. He said, in a very strange voice, "that's me", and we both knew, it was the truth.

That man absolutely hates to be put on a throne or be praised as a teacher, or dragged in front of a crowd.

Some say that he is Manjushri incarnate, I just say, he is the most intelligent person I have ever had the pleasure having conversation with.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, the point is not that there are no reincarnations; the point is that the tulku system basically corrupt, meaning that it is too easily manipulated for financial, personal and political gain. It does not mean that every tulku is false, though it is my conviction that the vast majority of so called tulkus [95%+] are absolutely not the reincarnations of the masters they whose names they bear, in other words, no more than 5 in every 100.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 10:43 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The funny thing too is that people somehow believe tulkus get better training than ordinary people. Really, this is a fantasy. The fact is that young tulkus are often put to work at a very young age raising money for their monasteries, and as a result, they often have very inferior training compared with normal scholars in shedras.

theanarchist said:

In the Nyingma lineages a lot of the tulkus come from a family background of lamas, so those get a very good dharma education for certain. Just look as the family of Tulku Orgyen

Malcolm wrote:

It's a mixed bag, actually. Some tulkus get great educations. Some just learn some rituals, and mainly go around giving blessings to raise money. I have met both kinds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

in my seats it's good to get off the wagon of Americans for Tibetan cultural reform. We don't have dogs in that fight, nor should we. Being a Buddhist doesn't give us papers to disassemble Tibetan religious culture. Heard of cultural imperialism?

That comment isn't an encouragement to give it all a pass. We're creating an American vajrayana culture every time we host lamas and put on teachings, even though we have few realized western teachers. We can make the choice to be indifferent to these aspects of Tibetan culture by cultivating our own attitudes.

Malcolm wrote:

I have no interest in Tibetan cultural reform. We are in agreement that any modifications of Tibetan culture should come from Tibetans, not Americans, Europeans or Chinese people. This however does not prevent us from observing that some Tibetan cultural institutions maybe are not all that they are cracked up to be.

It is important to recognize however that there are Tibetan cultural practices, like recognizing tulkus, that are not actually part of the Dharma. Can anyone point me to a reference in either sūtra or tantra, Nyingma or Sarma, that says, "In the last 500 years of the Dharma, the only way the Dharma will be preserved is through recognizing small children as the reincarnations of dead masters"?

The funny thing too is that people somehow believe tulkus get better training than ordinary people. Really, this is a fantasy. The fact is that young tulkus are often put to work at a very young age raising money for their monasteries, and as a result, they often have very inferior training compared with normal scholars in shedras.

Of course we have to understand that the practice of recognizing tulkus began with the second and third Karmapa, and these masters were fantastic. Then it became a big fashion, and within 200 hundred years, tulkus were being recognized everywhere.

We also should understand that the 5th Dalai Lama's recognition, by his own account, was completely fraudulent. He was also a fantastic master, but he certainly was not the reincarnation of the fourth Dalai Lama.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

MiphamFan said:

No, they were former Chan Buddhists.

Malcolm wrote:

And a number of Bonpos, like Bagor Vairocana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 9:14 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

theanarchist said:

Then how is it, that so few western practitioners qualify to teach vajrayana or dzogchen, even after decades following that path?

Malcolm wrote:

Who says this is so?

theanarchist said:

When Padmasambhava introduced tantric buddhism in a wider fashion in Tibet, the first generation of disciples produced a ton of realized teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

Tons? You mean 25, don't you?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:52 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

Seems like these days people don't need a reason to murder.

Malcolm wrote:

They never did.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:49 PM
Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh news and health care cost
Content:

Kim O'Hara said:
In a word, the US spends a lot more but doesn't get a lot more for the money.

Kim

theanarchist said:
Yep.

Artificial hip joint surgery in the USA cost five times as much as in Germany. And in Germany everyone who gets one automatically gets three weeks of full time rehabilitation along with the surgery, paid in full by health insurance and if you are still working, with sick pay.

Malcolm wrote:
Again, quite irrelevant to the program TNH has entered.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:49 PM
Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh news and health care cost
Content:

Kim O'Hara said:
In a word, the US spends a lot more but doesn't get a lot more for the money.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:
That has no bearing on the merits of the program TNH entered.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:41 PM
Title: Re: Wake up call
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Even then we have travesties such as Steven Segal and so on.

theanarchist said:

Yeah. No idea how that came to pass.

I mean, it was Penor Rinpoche who "recognized" him.

Malcolm wrote:

I know how it happened, and it was not really Penor Rinpoche's fault. I am not going to say anymore on the subject.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There have also been many more great masters who were not tulkus (thank goodness), such as Ngala Changchub Dorje, Thangton Gyalpo, etc., the list is very long.

theanarchist said:

Nyoshul Khenpo.

But I guess in times where it costs thousands and thousands of dollars to do long term retreat, I doubt that we will get many realized practitioners from the pool of people more seriously interested in Tibetan buddhism. Because people interested in it can't afford the retreat time and most people these days are no longer hardy enough to live in a cave off nettles (and a lifestyle like that is forbidden in a lot of places anyway, try that in the Alps and you get arrested)

Malcolm wrote:

The idea that you have to live this hardcore ascetic lifestyle to become a realized person is a myth. You do not need to spend years and years in retreat. I know many people who have spend years and years in retreat and they are just as screwed up now as when they went into retreat, and just as ordinary. I also have done long term intensive retreat (3+ years), and while it was an awesome experience, I certainly did not come out of it a realized person. At least according to my master, there is no need for this. As long as one applies the the teachings in a consistent way to one's life, integrating view, meditation and conduct, then one will eventually attain realization. Anyway, most of us will attain realization in the bardo, not in this life.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It can't be fixed. It has been broken for centuries,

theanarchist said:

Erm, until recent times the tulku system also produced seriously great, realized teachers.

So certain problems within the tulku system have been present for centuries, but there have been a lot of cases where it worked just fine. Teachers like Dzongsar Khyentse are proof for that.

Malcolm wrote:

Apparently you did not read my posts carefully. In any event, the true recognition of tulkus depends on realized masters. Even then we have travesties such as Steven Segal and so on.

The system is broken, irreparably. This does not mean that there are no realized masters recognizing proper candidates, but in general, most people recognized as tulkus, even by this or that high lama, are not really reincarnations.

There is a story told about Khyentse Wangpo. Some monks were seeking the reincarnation of their lama, and they went to him, he recognized this boy as a reincarnation, but the boy proved to be rather ordinary. They went back to Khentse Wangpo to express their doubt. He became a little annoyed, and said, "Do you want to find the real incarnation of your master."

The monks all very eagerly agreed. Khyentse told them, "Go out behind the barn and call your master's name."

They did so, and young bull calf broke away from his mother to come and greet them.

Part of the reason why the tulku system is broken is because of the expectations of average Tibetans who won't donate to monasteries that have no reincarnations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

pemachophel said:

Why am I saying this? To say the whole system is bogus is, in my experience, incorrect. If ChNN and His Son are both genuine Tulkus, They Themselves prove the system is not bogus.

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN was recognized by his uncle as a reincarnation of Adzom Drugpa, it is true. But all this proves is that some people with abhijñā can recognize the mindstreams of others. It does not prove that the system of transferring properties and titles through the tulku system is not fraught with corruption from top to bottom. It does not explain why, as ChNN quips, that tulkus seem in general to get worse with every passing generation, and not better.

pemachophel said:

To say the system is broken is also probably not incorrect.

Malcolm wrote:

It can't be fixed. It has been broken for centuries, and as I pointed out, many of the major internal conflicts we see in Tibetan history since the 17th century, one way or another, is a result of tulku politics. Just look at the mess caused by the Karmapa controversy, the Panchen Lama, etc. There was even a lot of bad blood, since calmed, over the Dudjom recognitions. Adzom Drugpa's life was constantly in danger when he was a boy because of his recognition, and ChNN was poisoned as a young age because he was recognized as Zhabdrung Ngagwang Namgyal's incarnation.

No one denies that there have been exemplary reincarnations who have been great masters. There have also been many more great masters who were not tulkus (thank goodness), such as Ngala Changchub Dorje, Thangton Gyalpo, etc., the list is very long.

pemachophel said:

Sorry if I'm rambling but I don't think the system is bogus top to bottom. I think the system requires change, possibly even radical change, but I don't think it should be scrapped entirely. In my experience, by identifying beings who actually are Tulkus and then training them correctly, you can produce Teachers who can do really amazing things for both the Dharma and sentient beings, Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche Himself being a case in point.

Malcolm wrote:

I honestly don't think you will find much of a difference between training people recognized as tulkus and those who are not. Why? Because the vast majority of tulkus are not recognized by realized masters such as Togden Urgyen Tenzin.

Thus, I do not see any indication that people recognized as tulkus necessarily demonstrate better qualities than other people, and indeed, it is often the reverse.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 6:30 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Isn't Dzongsar Khyentse himself one of these who criticize ChNN?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know, is he?

MiphamFan said:

I remember reading somewhere that he criticized ChNN for writing his books on Tibetan history before.

Actually it seems to me that that is the main reason why exile Nyingmapas have a strange attitude towards him, because he regards some of the Bonpo teachings as valid. There is that story of the Khenpos coming to him for example.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the Bonpos don't like his histories very much either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 6:21 PM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Isn't Dzongsar Khyentse himself one of these who criticize ChNN?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know, is he?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 9:06 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Reincarnations are one thing, the tulku system is quite another. Let's not conflate them. The latter is, in my opinion, bogus.

pemachophel said:

In my personal experience, there definitely are Tulkus. I am not saying I'm one, but I have known a number very closely, including my son. I have known some when they were very young and still remembered their past life. I have known others who have lost those memories. I have known Tibetan Tulkus and American Tulkus. One of these American Tulkus is one of the best examples I know of a real Tulku with the knowledge and ability to back up His "pedigree." I have been involved in the search for my own Root Guru's reincarnation, and I can tell you that, up to the point I was involved, it was far from frivolous and was completely apolitical. It was also guided by two very highly practiced and developed Teachers Whose siddhi and sincerity I trust implicitly. I feel quite confident that some highly realized Lamas can identify Tulkus, know where They have been born and Who They currently are. I also am quite sure there are false Tulkus recognized only for political/financial reasons. I've known Tulkus Who were brought up inside the monastic institutions and Tulkus Whose parents chose not to go that route. I've known good and not so good Tulkus.

Why am I saying this? To say the whole system is bogus is, in my experience, incorrect. If ChNN and His Son are both genuine Tulkus, They Themselves prove the system is not bogus. To say the system is broken is also probably not incorrect. To say that the whole system should be abandoned A) is not gonna happen any time soon, and B) I think it is throwing out the baby with the bathwater. Young Tulkus Who are actually Tulkus and are either not trained or improperly trained are a great loss to themselves, the Dharma, and sentient beings. I say this having chosen not to allow my son to be trained in the traditional way. Should many of the young Tulkus be undergoing stricter, better training? Yes. Should I be undergoing stricter, better training? Also yes.

This is the Kaliyuga, the Dharma-ending age. Peoples' kleshas are getting stronger and stronger, thicker and thicker. We are all in this downward spiral of degeneration, and it takes more and more merit and wisdom to escape, let alone reverse, this trend. Do many young Tulkus today need a wake-up call? Yes, from my experience, I think so. Will all of Them heed that wake-up call? No. Will some? Yes -- some. Are there some really good young Tulkus out there? Yes, in my experience there are. Check out Khedrup Jigme Kundrol in Bhutan. Check out Guru Khyentse Ozer in Bhutan. Check out Kathog Situ Rinpoche in Bhutan. Check out Gyalwai Nyugu Rinpoche. All four of these young Tulkus appear, at least to me and my clouded perception, to exhibit real renunciation. And isn't that the real problem with those Tulkus Who are not living up to our expectations? Lack of renunciation.

Sorry if I'm rambling but I don't think the system is bogus top to bottom. I think the system requires change, possibly even radical change, but I don't think it should be scrapped entirely. In my experience, by identifying beings Who actually are Tulkus and then training them correctly, you can produce Teachers Who can do really amazing things for both the Dharma and sentient beings, Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche Himself being a case in point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

Ok Malcolm. You think honour, chivalry, valour, is not important now. Money money. Consume consume.

Malcolm wrote:

I dont think they were important then, and I dont think that they are important now. Most of this honor, chivalry and valour claptrap was invented for romance novels.

Basic human decency does not require these romantic fantasies in which you indulge. It merely requires caring for others more than oneself. Countless fools have murdered and caused the murder of others in the name of honor, chivalry and valor. Such romantic fools will continue to do so, sadly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

Why would a man rape, beat and imprison his own property?

Malcolm wrote:

It happened all the time.

maybay said:

The type of man who abuses what is his will not prosper, and those who protect and nurture what is theirs will flourish.

Malcolm wrote:

They seem to have gotten along just fine, since women and children were completely replaceable commodities.

maybay said:

This was the age of righteous effort and reward. Men, their clans, their people, were sovereigns, and lived by ethics.

Malcolm wrote:

What fantasy novels have you been reading? Your romanticism of the past is perhaps appropriate for a thirteen year old child, but not for an educated adult.

maybay said:

In our age, we have no people, only individuals, and no ethics, only rights. We control each other with computers and surveillance. We are still owned, but by the many. When a hurricane hits Louisiana and thieves break into shops, we say, look, that is what the past was like without law and order. Absoluteness nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

You really should read some accounts of "law and order" as it existed in that glorious past you are so on about.

maybay said:
History is not something to be judged lightly.

Malcolm wrote:
Nor is it something for fawning romanticization such as the above.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 5:04 AM
Title: Re: Wake up call
Content:
Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
It's a pretty radical thing to say.

Malcolm wrote:
It is a necessary thing to say. Chogyal Namkhai Norbu has been pointing out the faults of the tulku system for many years, for example, pointing out that the qualities of reincarnations are usually progressively worse with each generation, rather than progressively better. Of course, ChNN is an outlier, and Tibetans really don't pay any attention to him. Despite his fame in the West, exile Tibetans in general regard him with suspicion and disdain. If they only had a clue, all of these young Tibetan tulkus in India interested in Dzogchen would study with him.

T. Chokyi said:
I have a good feeling about Yeshe Namkhai CHNN's son, I think CHNN probably isn't referring to Yeshe Namkhai when he points out the faults of the "tulku system", after all YN wasn't really a part of that system in the sense that he was sought out or "discovered" at a young age etc.. I sometimes wonder if YN is going to be seen a little more by webcast. The movie on his life and relationship with his father was great, and so were the activities accompanying the release of the movie (My Reincarnation), but since that time I have not heard much about YN's role within Dzogchen Community (present/future). I tuned in to the webcast he gave, but I don't know of any other webcasts besides the one he gave which was already several years ago.

Do you know what his activities are or will be?

Malcolm wrote:
ChNN in this case is really convinced his son is the reincarnation of his other uncle, the least known Khyentse incarnation. [people should read The Lamp That Enlightens Narrow Minds]. For a while. Yeshe was listed with his father as a teacher in the Community. Then he apparently decided he did not want to be in that role anymore, so he had his name removed. This was after My Reincarnation was aired all over the world.

Characteristically, ChNN. while confident of his son's "pedigree", chose not to subject him to a monastic education.

AFAIK, CHNN's son and daughter will inherit the responsibility of continuing their father's legacy. Who knows what it will look like. I have no idea, myself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:57 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

He is free, he can walk away.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Until he has samaya with some students ...

Malcolm wrote:

He or she does not need to subject their students to all this craziness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:46 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

the tulku system may have worked in a certain historical and cultural context.

Malcolm wrote:

Did it? I am really not sure of this at all.

Urgyen Dorje said:

in the american dharma scene with tibetan buddhism in diaspora it is a disaster.

Malcolm wrote:

Definitely.

Urgyen Dorje said:

you have teachers with the title tulku but no qualities working the system to have a career,

Malcolm wrote:

Check.

Urgyen Dorje said:

and you have american buddhists who either fall headfirst for anyone called tulku

Malcolm wrote:

Check.

Urgyen Dorje said:
or they react violently against the political and social institution of tulkus.

Malcolm wrote:
Understandable, since it is basically just an exercise in the eight worldly Dharmas.

Urgyen Dorje said:
this is why this young tulku i know hates the system. he's young and he's in training and he's on the ropes no matter what he does.

Malcolm wrote:
He is free, he can walk away.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:35 AM
Title: Re: Wake up call
Content:
Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
EDIT: By radical I just meant the back-biting thing.

EDIT 2
Malcolm wrote:
... exile Tibetans in general regard him with suspicion and disdain ...

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:
?!

Really. I did not know that.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure, when I tell most educated exile Tibetans (Nyingma Lamas especially) that my root guru is Chogyal Namkhai Norbu, it is usually met with uncomfortable silence and a rapid change of subject. In Tibet, however, it is the opposite. Actually, the best lamas are still in Tibet (with certain exceptions in exile).

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:20 AM
Title: Re: Wake up call
Content:
theanarchist said:
They are suffering from the "modern lifestyle" dilemma just like us normal people unfortunately.

Lamas like Mingyur Rinpoche, who spend considerable time in retreat in their younger years seem to have become rather rare....

But is the environment of those young Rinpoches, where they grow up, really encouraging the lifestyle of a yogi? Don't they prefer to have them as a representative figurehead for their predecessors monastic institutions?

Wouldn't it be good to let them experience the more shitty sides of today's samsara life for a few years, to motivate them to develop some amount of renunciation and a motivation to do something about the suffering present in the world?

philji said:

I think this more than the Tulku system is to blame. Young tulkus are treated like superstars, go on tour like rock stars and fawned over by male and female groupies. Hardly a conducive life for a yogi....

Malcolm wrote:

No point in complaining about the symptoms if one does not address the cause.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

re-shape

Malcolm wrote:

Better to eliminate. Both in exile and in occupied Tibet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

It's a pretty radical thing to say.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a necessary thing to say. Chogyal Namkhai Norbu has been pointing out the faults of the tulku system for many years, for example, pointing out that the qualities of reincarnations are usually progressively worse with each generation, rather than progressively better. Of course, ChNN is an outlier, and Tibetans really don't pay any attention to him. Despite his fame in the West, exile Tibetans in general regard him with suspicion and disdain. If they only had a clue, all of these young Tibetan tulkus in India interested in Dzogchen would study with him.

Truthfully, there is very little knowledge of Dzogchen teachings these days among the younger generation of Tibetan lamas. It is mostly intellectual dancing on books. These young guys really do not have very much knowledge even of the meaning of the two stages. They are mostly sutrayāna Kadampa style lamrimpas. So it is not wonder that people who follow such lamas have very little understanding of the real essence of the teachings. There are some notable exceptions in Tulku Urgyen's family, but Tulku Urgyen was a real Dzogchen master.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 4:00 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Yea.

I don't know, they may have much bigger problems, even just re: children, monasteries, etc.

I don't know if you can get rid of politics.

To bring this back to topic, the solution may just be for some of the high profilers to behave themselves.

This sounds like throwing baby out w bathwater.

Plus like I say, there's history, what do you do with that?

Malcolm wrote:

History is in the past, it is finished, just writing on a page — is it worthwhile to keep making the same mistakes over and over again because of a tradition that does not even have any support in sūtra or tantra?

Truthfully, the only reincarnation that I have any confidence is in Chogyal Namkhai Norbu because he was recognized by someone who attained rainbow body, his uncle. The rest of them I really don't believe in.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

M-la, you've said this before ...

smcj said:

...and this is not anything like what DJKR said at the start of this thread.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, I am just identifying the real cause of the problem that DKR is talking about. It does not mean that people recognized as tulkus do not have a lot of merit, of course they do — it is like being born into a wealthy family and so on, and other high rebirths in samsara. But tulkus are for the most part ordinary sentient beings who have to train every bit as much as those of us who are not recognized as tulkus.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

M-la, you've said this before ...

If nirmanakaya is unrepeatable, that seems to weaken the role of kundzop guru back into a preceptor or spiritual friend. Who wants to nail themselves to someone who just received blessings in this one life? If I ever get a yidam, my door to the vajra world would become more just yidam only, not guru.

Anyway how would you say that, the tul ku was never valid or at some point they stopped coming back?

Malcolm wrote:

You must a distinction between the actual nirmanakāya, the guru as a representation of the nirmanakāya and the Tibetan religio-political system of consecrating small children as living statues to ensure donations for monasteries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 3:44 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

smcj said:

It is just more proof that tulku system is completely bogus and needs to be phased out. "Completely bogus"?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the tulku system is completely bogus and needs to be phased out.

smcj said:

How many of your teachers are tulkus? Have you run this idea by them?

Malcolm wrote:

A number of my teachers are tulkus. They are not naive. They are also trapped in the system.

smcj said:

Personally I think Gesar Mukpo did an adequate job of dispelling any fantasies about what being a tulku guarantees with his documentary. The whole issue with labrang is a completely different matter.

Malcolm wrote:

The tulku system is just a money and power game, it always has been. My point of view on the tulku system is no secret. Every single major nasty political issue in Tibetan Buddhism today stems from the politics surrounding tulkus, from the Karmapa to the Gyalpo cult.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Unknown said:

It's the season when wildfires rage, and this year they're raging particularly hard: In June alone, Alaska saw 1.1 million acres go up in flames. In California, firefighters had responded to 3,381 wildfires by July 11, "1,000 more than the average over the previous five years," The New York Times reports in a big feature on wildfires in the state.

And that's likely not a coincidence. A study published this week in Nature Communications connects worsening wildfire seasons to climate change, and suggests the trend will continue in the years ahead as climate change rolls forward. "Wildfires occur at the intersection of dry weather, available fuel and ignition sources," the study's authors write. Of those factors, "weather is the most variable."

The study also suggests that wildfires will themselves play a role in driving climate change, creating a nasty feedback loop.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://grist.org/news/climate-change-is-making-wildfires-worse-and-wildfires-are-making-climate-change-worse>

http://www.nature.com/ncomms/2015/150714/ncomms8537/fig_tab/ncomms8537_F3.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 3:21 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I wonder if this was an oblique reference to money rather than expertise. Current troubles for certain lineages, etc.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, if I recall correctly, he said that he had criticized the Tulkus in question to their faces, but he felt that "backbiting" might be more effective...

Malcolm wrote:

It is just more proof that tulku system is completely bogus and needs to be phased out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Unknown said:

Humans will either go extinct or be forced to return to hunter-gatherer lifestyles if we continue to destroy Earth's plant life, a study has found.

John Schramski, from the University of Georgia, has said our planet will become less and less hospitable as a result of plant loss, and if we do not go extinct, our lifestyles will revert to those of our ancestors 12,000 years ago.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.ibtimes.co.uk/humans-face-extinction-if-plant-destruction-continues-laws-thermodynamics-have-no-mercy-1511026>

<http://www.pnas.org/content/early/2015/07/14/1508353112.abstract>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 18th, 2015 at 1:08 AM

Title: Re: Wake up call

Content:

ngodrup said:

Ok so a vajra sibling posted this elsewhere. And the request was made by Rinpoche himself, to quote him on it, so out goes this little note.

Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche said today in front of a large group of about 800 practitioners, that he thinks the young Tibetan lineage holders coming up in general are quite unimpressive.

They're lazy and spoiled, and they need to do a lot better.

His goal of telling us was to a) shame them via back biting (he said this, not me.) by circulating what he said on the internet. b) exceed the "lineage holders" by becoming great practitioners and with a lot of knowledge ourselves, thereby shaming them into improving themselves.

He explicitly said that some Lamas even give empowerments for practices they haven't themselves received. So we must basically become better than them, and thereby insisting on qualified, experienced teachers that actually meet our needs as serious practitioners. So maybe they will step up to the plate, as it were.

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing I have not been saying for years, especially with regard to Dzogchen teachings, of which there are very few qualified teachers.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: Thich Nhat Hanh news and health care cost

Content:

theanarchist said:

Why do they take him in the USA for treatment, when medical treatment and rehabilitation there is more expensive than everywhere else in the world while not better than at state of the art institutions in Europe?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, it's obvious — the program he is in the US is the best in the world for this kind of problem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2015 at 9:55 PM

Title: Re: Including other practices before dedication in Short Tun

Content:

Hansei said:

Does anybody know if it is okay to include other practices before the dedication of merits in the Short Tun?

For instance; after Dopa, doing the short version of Mandarava (starting from Guruyoga), then Odzer Chenma, and then the dedication of merits.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, you are free and there is no problem with this at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 17th, 2015 at 6:22 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And if it really is so simple for lay people to make a good connection dead animals, why do some Tibetan Buddhists act like these methods don't exist? Is it a sectarian thing? Lack of confidence in themselves as well as the teachings.

Boomerang said:

But aren't there high ranking teachers who discourage meat eating and never mention these dharanis and mantras? Why do they prefer not to inform people?

Malcolm wrote:

I can only tell you what my teacher says. Frankly, I don't much care about what other teachers says, whether high ranking or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 16th, 2015 at 12:09 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Kings are not parents and subjects are not children, so your analogy fails.

Zhen Li said:

While every subject is a child, not every king is a parent.

The point was about giving consent however.

Malcolm wrote:

The kind of King Aryadeva is referring to is the one who thinks he has power by dint of his own virtues and entitlement, the kind of kings who sold the bill of goods of "divine right" of kingship (which of course was met with the god given rights of the people in response).

Zhen Li said:

While kings are kings by accident, and thus shouldn't be blamed for their position, there may in fact be virtuous and able kings. There may also be mediocre kings. But there are also mediocre presidents and doges. That's just the nature of things. Divine right is essentially saying, I'm here because nature put me here (i.e. I was born here), I am here by right of the fact that s happens and I'm the owner, not because of virtue or ability. Actually, merit is completely irrelevant to the question of divine right.

It would be nice to see your sources for Aryadeva's claims, since I doubt he's thinking about "divine right" as per Jean Bodin or the Basilikon Doron.

Malcolm wrote:

Read the whole of chapter four of the Catuḥśatikā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Kings are indeed the most dependent, and constantly under the sword of Damocles. But "the ruled" is an abstraction, and such a matter isn't relevant until it becomes so, people do not constantly bestow consent by virtue of doing nothing, it's a natural tendency towards respect for order and the rule of law, just a child can't be said to be under the guardianship of parents because they constantly grant consent, they simply do what is in their interest by dependent and conditioned nature, not by constant free choice -- which is why as I always say, a decent governmental structure is meaningless without a virtuous (and rational) populace.

Kings may or may not be fools however, and I would resist generalisations about people simply based upon how they were born. Such a natural aversion towards a group of people regardless of deeds done or undone cannot be, in my opinion, very equanimous or compassionate, and seems to reflect only knee-jerk reaction. I'd resist judgement until proven deserving of it.

Malcolm wrote:

Kings are not parents and subjects are not children, so your analogy fails.

The kind of King Aryadeva is referring to is the one who thinks he has power by dint of his own virtues and entitlement, the kind of kings who sold the bill of goods of "divine right" of kingship (which of course was met with the god given rights of the people in response).

A king who is elected on the other hand, clearly understands he rules with consent of the ruled.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2015 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Kings rule merely by consent of the ruled. .

theanarchist said:

Erm, where is the consent when the non consentees are threatened with life in horrible prisons, torture, social marginalisation, bullying, even death?

Malcolm wrote:

Even so, such rulers rule by the consent of those who choose not to depose them, for example, Hitler.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2015 at 8:16 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Well of course they're in treasonous rebellion. What strikes one most blatantly about the Declaration is how almost none of what it claims is true. But sovereignty rests on more than legalities. To be a formalist about things, a right can simply be a legal acceptance of the way things are, as how a right by conquest works. The rebels defeated the crown's forces, with the support of Britain's rivals. Therefore the USA is theirs.

Malcolm wrote:

Kings rule merely by consent of the ruled. This is very clearly spelled out by Āryadeva who considers kings the worst of fools, and the most dependent of all people.

George III was such an embarrassment, the House of Hanover changed its name to Windsor.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2015 at 5:54 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

maybay said:

Declarationism philosophy, therefore, insists that if the United States rejects the natural rights philosophy of the Declaration of Independence upon which it was founded, it of necessity becomes, retro-actively, an illegitimate government in treasonous rebellion against its rightful government of Crown and Parliament in London; and therefore, the Declaration and Constitution must be held as legally inseparable throughout the entire United States of America (both Federal and State) and its territories.

Malcolm wrote:

Legal theology, and nonsense to boot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2015 at 2:44 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Unknown said:

Since climate change deniers have a particular fascination with sunspot cycles, this story has predictably been picked up by all manner of conservative news media, with a post in the Telegraph quickly gathering up tens of thousands of shares. The only problem is, it's a wildly inaccurate reading of the research.

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.slate.com/blogs/future_tense/2015/07/13/sunspot_cycles_won_t_cause_a_mini_ice_age_by_2030.html

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 15th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Enlightened yet fat

Content:

lostitude said:

But again, I may have let my sufi background influence my judgement too much. In sufism the two major sources of attachment and cravings are sex and food, and it is believed that all desires derive from these two basic drives. Which makes food consumption a major indicator of how much progress a sufi student is making. Apparently this tool is not used in buddhism, which seems to make sense since I have never heard of fasting exercises in buddhism (or do they exist?).

Malcolm wrote:

In Tibetan Medicine as well as Ayurveda being slim is ideal from a health standpoint; however in Buddhadharma weight is not used as an indicator of spiritual progress.

We have enough issues in the West with poor body image, there is no point in confusing weight with spiritual progress. The two are unrelated.

That said, one should endeavor to reduce attachment to food, clothes, and so on., and in Tibetan Buddhism at any rate, there are any number of ways to go about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 3:01 AM

Title: Re: Upcoming titles

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

Wallace, the translator addresses this on pp xxix-xxx, saying (as does his lama) that the read 'should' etc, but the 'texts themselves do not require' even the preliminaries. If the danger were that severe, neither Wallace, nor his lama, nor Wisdom pubs. would put the books out in this unrestricted fashion. Besides I do have some of the attitudes his lama wanted a reader to have.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, Dzogchen is not something one can understand from a book. I am not saying this to put you down, I am saying this so you don't leave your knowledge in a state of intellectual sterility, since I want everyone to be able to wake up through direct knowledge of Dzogchen and Vajrayāna teachings. Anyway, who said anything about preliminaries? But in order to understand Dzogchen you must receive direct introduction.

Nicholas Weeks said:

Granted and understood, but many Dzogchen lamas have written texts, I would expect they should be read. Direct introduction coming later rather than before the reading is better, but I am not free to leave my sick wife. Kapish?

Malcolm wrote:

You can easily receive direct introduction from Chogyal Namkhai Norbu via webcast. It is sufficient.

All those lamas who wrote books could not have imagined that they would be flying around the world in pdfs or even printed electronically. Anyway, I am glad you have devotion for the books, I am merely suggesting that you make an effort to receive transmission.

I am sorry to hear about your wife.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: No, the external world is an illusion, right?

Content:

MalaBeads said:

I have a question though for you. Is there a translation of the ninth chapter of this work available in english that you can recommend?

Thanks in advance.

Malcolm wrote:

There are quite a few, the one by Kunpal is probably the best from a Nyingma POV.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Upcoming titles

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

Wallace, the translator addresses this on pp xxix-xxx, saying (as does his lama) that the read 'should' etc, but the 'texts themselves do not require' even the preliminaries. If the danger were that severe, neither Wallace, nor his lama, nor Wisdom pubs. would put the books out in this unrestricted fashion. Beside I do have some of the attitudes his lama wanted a reader to have.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, Dzogchen is not something one can understand from a book. I am not saying this to put you down, I am saying this so you don't leave your knowledge in a state of intellectual sterility, since I want everyone to be able to wake up through direct knowledge of Dzogchen and Vajrayāna teachings. Anyway, who said anything about preliminaries? But in order to understand Dzogchen you must receive direct introduction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 2:10 AM

Title: Re: Upcoming titles

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

Another great set of teachings from Dudjom Lingpa, coming in July 2015:

<http://www.wisdompubs.org/book/special-offer-dudjom-lingpas-visions-great-perfection>

Magnificent work, just beginning to study it.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, before you set out to read these Dzogchen texts, it is better you receive Dzogchen transmission from someone qualified. Also, you really do need the lung for these texts, it is best to have that before proceeding.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 1:22 AM

Title: Re: Sexual and physical abuse in religious institutions

Content:

daelm said:

Secondly, whether you think well of Tibetans in India or not, they have taken a principled stance in favor of real autonomy. They're been trying to maintain a discrete cultural core, rather than accept becoming third-rate indigenous people in the Chinese hierarchy, whereas Tibetans in the TAR are at real risk of occupying the same status in China as Native Americans do in the US. You may not like that cultural core, and there are components of it that urgently need modernising, but for Tibetans in the TAR, the cultural core that is held intact in India is a vital touchstone, as their status and quality of life is eroded on all other fronts.

Malcolm wrote:

I think the more apt cultural metaphor is the British and the Highlands Scots in the 18th century, apart from the nomads, in which case the Native Americans and US Gvt is perfectly apt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 14th, 2015 at 1:19 AM

Title: Re: No, the external world is an illusion, right?

Content:

muni said:

"When the notions of real and unreal
Are absent from before the mind,
Then, there is no other possibility,
But to rest in total peace, beyond concepts." Khenpo Shenga.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

This verse is actually from the wisdom chapter of the Bodhicaryāvatāra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Overview on Sakya-Teachings?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Malcolm, which of the Sakya ngondro were you commissioned to translate? Will that be published in the near future?

Malcolm wrote:

Khenchen Ngalo's text. The translation is finished, it will be released sometime, but at this point it is not easy to say when.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Overview on Sakya-Teachings?

Content:

Karma Dorje said:

Malcolm, which of the Sakya ngondro were you commissioned to translate? Will that be published in the near future?

Malcolm wrote:

Khenchen Ngalo's text. The translation is finished, it will be released sometime, but at this point it is not easy to say when.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2015 at 9:44 PM

Title: Re: future role of Sakya Trizin what do you think about it?

Content:

WeiHan said:

This arrangement has a modern parallel since most CEOs in MNCs have a 3-years tenure contract to show their results these days.

Malcolm wrote:

It is actually based on the term of the Ngor Khenpos. Ngor had four palaces, and in order to make sure qualified teachers from the four palaces would have their turn, a Ngor Khenpo would serve for three years and then give up his place to the next in line.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2015 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Overview on Sakya-Teachings?

Content:

Ivo said:

I won't answer in full the OP question, as the answer could be really extensive and difficult, but I want to correct something which is not entirely true here. Tantric ngondro as is practiced in Kagyu and Nyingma has never existed in Sakya until a couple of decades ago, so to say that it is important in Sakya is a gross overstatement. The only existing Sakya ngondro was composed by the late Deshung Rinpoche on the request of some students who wanted to have in Sakya the equivalent of the ngondro practiced in the other traditions. That's it. A couple of other Sakya lamas started teaching it afterwards but it is by no means required, or seen as very important and it is not really connected to any cycle per se, although it ends with a Sapan Guru Yoga, which is considered very precious in the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Ngondro in Sakya is connected with one's sadhana practice and done within that context, adding mandala and guru yoga in their appropriate places.

For example, the lengthy Ngondro commentary by twentieth century Nalendra master, Ngalo Khechen, does not present an independent ngondro text, but rather, frames the ngondro recitations within the context of the Hevajra sadhanas, and also includes the manner of doing Ngondro for Naro Khachod, Yamantaka and Tsembupa Chenrezi. According to him, for example, prostrations are better done with the guru yoga accumulation, not refuge.

Nevertheless, in Sakya, the idea of counting accumulations is a rather modern innovations. In the past, when embarking on a long retreat, one would devote some weeks or months to ngondro.

Deshung Tulku's ngondro is indeed a modern composition, and is influenced by Kongtrul's ngondro, but it is not the classical way Ngondro in Sakya has been done.

Ngalo Khenchen's text is highly influenced by Paltrul Rinpoche, containing long passages quoted from kun bzang bla ma'i zhal lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2015 at 9:36 PM

Title: Re: Overview on Sakya-Teachings?

Content:

Ivo said:

I won't answer in full the OP question, as the answer could be really extensive and difficult, but I want to correct something which is not entirely true here. Tantric ngondro as is practiced in Kagyu and Nyingma has never existed in Sakya until a couple of decades ago, so to say that it is important in Sakya is a gross overstatement. The only existing Sakya ngondro was composed by the late Deshung Rinpoche on the request of some students who wanted to have in Sakya the equivalent of the ngondro practiced in the other traditions. That's it. A couple of other Sakya lamas started teaching it afterwards but it is by no means required, or seen as very important and it is not really connected to any cycle per se, although it ends with a Sapan Guru Yoga, which is considered very precious in the tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Ngondro in Sakya is connected with one's sadhana practice and done within that context, adding mandala and guru yoga in their appropriate places.

For example, the lengthy Ngondro commentary by twentieth century Nalendra master, Ngalo Khechen, does not present an independent ngondro text, but rather, frames the ngondro recitations within the context of the Hevajra sadhanas, and also includes the manner of doing Ngondro for Naro Khachod, Yamantaka and Tsembupa Chenrezi. According to him, for example, prostrations are better done with the guru yoga accumulation, not refuge.

Nevertheless, in Sakya, the idea of counting accumulations is a rather modern innovations. In the past, when embarking on a long retreat, one would devote some weeks or months to ngondro.

Deshung Tulku's ngondro is indeed a modern composition, and is influenced by Kongtrul's ngondro, but it is not the classical way Ngondro in Sakya has been done.

Ngalo Khenchen's text is highly influenced by Paltrul Rinpoche, containing long passages quoted from kun bzang bla ma'i zhal lung.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 13th, 2015 at 9:25 AM

Title: Re: Trecho, togal and kati in sanskrit?

Content:

tingdzin said:

OK, Malcolm, but does this Sampatti nama exist in Sanskrit?

Malcolm wrote:

The Samapatti nāma purports to be a lung, a citation of the ati bkod pa chen po rgyud.

The point is that the text khregs chod bdun pa is given the sanskrit title " Samapatti nāma," meaning that whoever titled it clearly understood khregs chod as a synonym for snyoms par 'jug pa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

MiphamFan said:

In the Dzogchen intimate instructions, for example, the Khandro Nyinthig, this distinction is fully articulated, and there are techniques for conserving the latter while releasing the former.

Has ChNN taught any of these before?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't know. But as I said, you can look at what he says about these issues in Birth, Life and Death.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This is why it makes far more sense simply to stop state recognition of marriage. It's fine and good to think "poor couples," but what about the poor singles who have little other choice but to suffer alone in hospital?

Malcolm wrote:

As long as marriage has something to do with avoidance of tax on inheritance for spouses and so on, for that long the gvt. will be involved in marriages.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Trecho, togal and kati in sanskrit?

Content:

tingdzin said:

Stewart:

Are these words from a Sanskrit source? A lot of people, including some Tibetans, are so eager to find Indian equivalents for everything in Tibetan Buddhism that they back-translate to Sanskrit, sometimes even inventing terminology for which there is no existing Sanskrit or Indian proof.

Malcolm wrote:

One of the 119 intimate instructions is the khregs chod bdun pa. Its sanskrit title is Samapatti nāma. This text exists in the Bairo rgyud 'bum as well.

Vyutkrāntaka is a well known term, a type of samapatti, and is translated into Tibetan as thod rgal. It means something like skipping stages. Khyentse Wangpo explains the term thod rgal in just that way in one of his notes on Dzogchen in his collected works.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

Not only are we not heading into global warming, we are most likely into a mini ice age as new study on Sun's activity cycle predicts a "maunder minimum" in the 2030s. The last time we have maunder minimum effect in the 17th century, London's River Thames freezed.

Is a mini ICE AGE on the way? Scientists warn the sun will 'go to sleep' in 2030 and could cause temperatures to plummet

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/sciencetech/article-3156594/Is-mini-ICE-AGE-way-Scientists-warn-sun-sleep-2020-cause-temperatures-plummet.html>

A new grand solar minimum would not trigger another LIA; in fact, the maximum 0.3°C cooling would barely make a dent in the human-caused global warming over the next century. While it would be enough to offset to about a decade's worth of human-caused warming, it's also important to bear in mind that any solar cooling would only be temporary, until the end of the solar minimum.

Malcolm wrote:

<https://www.theguardian.com/environment/climate-consensus-97-per-cent/2013/aug/14/global-warming-solar-minimum-barely-dent>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

tingdzin said:

Well, without going too much into restricted areas, of course seminal continence is also valued in Vajrayana. One treads a line here in discussing it at all, but to say that it is not a factor in Buddhist practice needs some qualification.

Malcolm wrote:

In general the tantras of secret mantra do not distinguish between sukra and ojas. However, the principle reason for seminal continence in Vajrayāna practice is that for men, semen is the basis of experiencing a blissful sensation.

In reality, what one needs to conserve is ojas. ChNN's Birth, Life and Death discusses the issue of the difference between semen [khu ba] and ojas [mdangs] in some detail and recommends releasing the former while conserving the latter.

In the Dzogchen intimate instructions, for example, the Khandro Nyinthig, this distinction is fully articulated, and there are techniques for conserving the latter while releasing the former.

In general, practitioners of Dzogchen do not have to worry about the issue of seminal retention unless they are suffering from ojas depletion [ojas is mainly depleted by stress]. They are more concerned with other kinds of bindus, the "ultimate" ones; not the the ones that come about from eating food.

In Tibetan medicine it is stated that forcefully trying to suppress ejaculation leads to stones and even impotence. So, guys, if you feel it move, it is better to let it go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 12th, 2015 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Basic questions about Nichiren

Content:

rory said:

namely the eternity of the Buddha and that all people have a permanent buddhanature.y

theanarchist said:

Mmh, claiming that something is permanent contradicts buddhadharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmakāya is permanent, liberation is permanent and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 9:38 PM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Modus.Ponens said:

It seems to me (perhaps unfairly), that the theravada focuses a lot more on the extinction aspect, than the flourishing aspect. So I would ask what is the tibetan view about how to make the extinction of suffering to flourish into what you regard as full buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, sangs pa here [སངས་པ་] means to wake up, ལྷན་ means fully. Sangs in more ordinary language means to purify. You see it etymologized both ways in Tibetan texts.

In the second case, where it means remove, it means having removed [sangs] the the two obscurations, wisdom increases [rgyas].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 8:20 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Whoever said anything about being realized?.

theanarchist said:

The application of the vajrayana methods to your negative emotion must be successful.

So for example you are angry, you apply the vajrayana practice and the anger is liberated into, I think with anger it's discerning wisdom. Case closed.

But if you are angry, apply the vajrayana practice, and afterwards despite giving your best you are still angry, then you might better switch to loving kindness practice, chopping wood, psychotherapy, whatever gets the job done and you out of that state of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Anger is mirror-like wisdom. When anger is recognized as anger, that is mirror-like wisdom, then it is liberated. You don't need to apply some antidote to anger to "liberate" it into mirror-like wisdom, anger has always been mirror-like wisdom from the very beginning. Likewise, the five aggregates have always been the five buddhas and so on. This is why applying methods of contemplating the impurity of the body and so on are not proper for Vajrayāna practitioners.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 5:35 AM
Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
That kind of antidote is inappropriate in Vajrayāna.

theanarchist said:

It is, when you are not yet able to dissolve your delusions in the view of emptiness nature. Of course if you are able to do it, applying conceptual antidotes would be inappropriate. But a practitioner should be realistic about his or her abilities.

Failing to apply a conceptual antidote to negative emotion while fooling oneself about being a realized practitioner can end up in vajra hell.

You remember the story of Rudra?

Malcolm wrote:
Whoever said anything about being realized? Such antidotes are inconsistent with pure vision, which is a practice.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 5:27 AM
Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Med check time?

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Hi, yes? Tashi Rinpoche here. You said you wanted to speak to me. What's that? You're unhappy? Why is that? Oh. Well, I'm sure a doctor can prescribe some lotion you can spread on it ...

What's that? Something a bit more radical? Ok, well, tell you what, I'll sell you a jewel. A magic jewel. Yes. Yes. That's right. It's very powerful. It's the wish granting jewel of wrathful spaghetti tentacles, who is the protector of all 90s hair music everywhere. Success is guaranteed. No not right away, you'll get it halfway down the interstate. When? Oh, four days from now it all goes clear. As it were. That's right. Hehe. Don't you trust me?

Huh? You have no money? Well, ok, tell you what no worries, I'll give it to you for free. Yes, out of the goodness of my heart. Well, because I'm a nice guy that's why. So ... I assume you're around, I'll meet you on the corner of Duane and Reade in 5 minutes ... ?

What's that. You live where? SWEDEN? Well what the hell man how do you expect me to give you this jewel when you live thousands of miles away?

Sigh, ok, ok, stop ... whining like that. Oh, stop sobbing, Jesus. You're making your rash spread. I'll let you in on a little secret, I told a kind of fib. It's not really an actual, physical jewel, you see, it's more like a phrase. What? Phrase. PHRASE. No not phase, PHRASE ... sigh, yes, ok if you like, magic spell. Yes, fine, whatever floats your boat. Yes, you speak it. Over and over again. Right. Just say the words. Yes ... sigh ... like a spell.

So anyway, we need a few things, I'm gonna hit you over the head with my beer bottle and then throw this gum wrapper into this circle I'm drawing on the ground with some chalk ... Why? Because the phrase ... sorry, spell, doesn't work unless we do this stuff. Them's the rules. Why? I dunno why man, why do you have to rub the lamp to get the genie to come out instead of just tell him you want to chat, that's just how it works with this kind of ... spell. You want another kind of spell, go see some other guy. No, no it's ok you're not actually here. Just try to imagine what I'm doing as best you can, then I'll just let you know what it is. Mokay?

Ok, so that's done. So put your ear close to the phone, I'll whisper it to you. What? You're not using a phone? An online video? Like a whatumacallit, a webcast? Cool man! Whoa, that's like so techno. Far out. What's that? You want to invite some of your buddies so they can hear it too? Sure! Invite the whole neighborhood let's make this a party! The more the merrier! (Sheesh I didn't know they had the internet in Sweden).

OK, here we go I'm going to whisper it to you guys right now ... Huh? Something else you think you should mention ok ... Right you already said you're watching me on a video, on the internet. A webcast, right?

... What do you mean, "not live"? What do you mean? ... You're watching me ... on a server? What's that? ... Um, ok. You mean, like ... from a video tape or something like that ... ?

Wait ... how can I whisper this to you ... if I'm ... not really talking to you ... ? Wait. Who ... are you actually? I mean ... how can I really be talking to you ... if you're not really here right now ... Ok, wait I'm starting to really get freaked out ... Who am I really talking to? How can a ... guy on TV talk to some one who's watching TV ... Who the f*ck are you anyway? What do you mean you have a rash you're not really here, how can you have a rash when you're not really even here - who are you and who am I talking to?! Jesus F*g Christ, who are you just some kind of voice in my head or what?!? Tell me right now who are you and who am I talking to and how can I be really talking to you right now if I'm on TV and your'e watching TV and WTF!!! Guard! Guard! This is the fifth time I told you today I'm not allowing any more calls! Stop talking about your rash! And stop speaking Swedish! I don't even speak Swedish! Waitamminute how can I be understanding you if I don't speak Swedish, guard! Guard! These restraints are coming loose and there's a bug over by the corner where the pads are coming off the wall and NO I DON'T CARE ABOUT YOUR RASH ANYMORE! Get out of my head whoever you are! Guard! Guard! Tell this voice in my head to get out of my head! You WHAT! You just clicked on a link and found this groovy vid and you're going to watch it and then go order a BURGER? How can you eat a burger when you have a rash all over your OH GOD OH GOD THE RASH IS SPREADING IT'S SPREADING IT'S COMING OUT OF THE WALLS IT'S CRAWLING LIKE A BUG ALL OVER THE GUARD GUARD GUARD GUARD

GGGGGGGGAAAAAAARRRRRRRRRRRRRR

```
if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e = document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 5:26 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You might want to tell Shantideva then, he has practically a whole chapter on how to become thoroughly disgusted with the bodies of the opposite sex as an antidote to desire.

theanarchist said:

As an antidote, of course..

Malcolm wrote:

That kind of antidote is inappropriate in Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 4:58 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This is why the sutras teach meditation on the foulness of the body...

.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a common Mahāyāna practitioner, this is fine. This is not acceptable in Vajrayāna.

theanarchist said:

It's not acceptable in Mahayana either, as in emptiness nature, there is no such thing as pure or impure, so this idea is conceptual thinking and has to be overcome.

Malcolm wrote:

You might want to tell Shantideva then, he has practically a whole chapter on how to become thoroughly disgusted with the bodies of the opposite sex as an antidote to desire.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Prophecy of Padmasambhava in the Nirvana Sutra

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Hi,

I have read somewhere that this quote comes from the Nirvana Sutra:
Eight years after my parinirvana, a remarkable being with the name Padmasambhava will appear in the center of a lotus and reveal the highest teaching concerning the ultimate state of the true nature, bringing great benefit to all sentient beings.
However, I can't find it in there. Which version of the Nirvana Sutra contains this?

Malcolm wrote:

It does not appear to be extant in the Nirvana Sutra versions that we have.

The actual citation is:

Twelve years
after my nirvana,
a person better than all will arise on Dhanakośa Island.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 2:57 AM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

MalaBeads said:

It seems as if people are using the word "theravada" here as if it represented all 18 schools of buddhism that developed after the Buddha died. It doesnt. Theravada is only one of the 18 schools that developed at that time. There were 18 schools in the "hinayana". We usually only know one of them in the west. But they are not synonymous.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, it is bunch of PC bullshit. Some Tibetan teachers, trying to avoid the term Hināyāna, have begun substituting the term Theravada for it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: About enlightenment in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Ayu said:

This assertion is illogical. An arahat has no conceptual hindrances anymore.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they do, Vasubandhu writes in his commentary on Abhidharma that arhats and pratyekabuddhas both possess non-afflictive ignorance; as others have noted, this is a the obscuration of knowledge.

If arhats had no knowledge obscurations, they would be omniscient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This is why the sutras teach meditation on the foulness of the body...

.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a common Mahāyāna practitioner, this is fine. This is not acceptable in Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 11th, 2015 at 12:19 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Do you wanna be a cowboy or a Buddhist? Does Dharma matter more to you, or culture?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 11:50 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

In order to truly be disciplined and have a tamed mind.

theanarchist said:

Having a tamed mind and discipline in a dharma sense has nothing to do with what we here in the west usually consider to be discipline.

Because the definition of discipline in buddhism is totally different to how the word is defined in western languages.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, but you have to understand, Chinese Buddhists are obsessed with moral conduct...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 7:57 PM

Title: Re: Re Tibetan Disease Names

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

I don't know any tibetan but for what it's worth:

'g.yan pa' is given as "a skin disease, some kind of itch" in the book I had mentioned in this thread: <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=81&t=19973>

Malcolm wrote:

It is a skin disease where there is itching and weeping of lymph, probably psoriasis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Maybe it's time to ban discussion about anything...

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We all know what to do:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 5:14 AM

Title: Re: Re Tibetan Disease Names

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

srang rdo means weight use to measure srang of gold, must be a misspelling, or usage has been forgotten.

phol mig -- more a description of symptoms, many small round pimples in a round area on the skin that are very itchy

'brum bu -- pox of all kinds.

gcong -- general term for chronic illnesses dal rgol (dal rgal) ?

gzhang 'brum — hemorrhoids khong mdze -- internal leprosy (but it is not really leprosy, it is instead an internal lymphatic disease) me dbal -- no translation, it is a kind of painful red rash.

gyen pa ??

sems rgyu ba -- labile emotion/unstable mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I was with you until you jumped the shark.

smcj said:

It's ok, I got what was being said (I think). Most Tibetans don't grok that we are not able to believe in anything greater than ourselves. It's so fundamental to their worldview that they just can't understand our limitation. So they skip that part, and then things go wrong.

Malcolm wrote:

Ahem...as Chogyal Namkhai Norbu says:

The very meaning of the Tibetan term Dzogchen, "Great Perfection," refers to the true primordial state of every individual and not to any transcendent reality.

My analysis of the problem is precisely the reverses of yours: Most Tibetans cannot grok that we are obsessed with finding something greater or outside ourselves. It is so fundamental to their view, they even call themselves "nang pa", insiders, because they are convinced that the sole cause of all problems in the world come from inside, not from outside. The difficulty they have with westerners is that we are very good and looking through glasses, telescopes, microscopes and so on, and terrible at really looking in mirrors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 10th, 2015 at 4:39 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Does Tibetan medicine say anything about it?

theanarchist said:

I did a quick research on the internet and Chinese medicine seems to be against it.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the Chinese culture seems a bit superstitious regarding semen retention.

According to Tibetan Medicine and Ayurveda, semen is a waste product.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 10:27 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Malcolm, what about the harms of masturbation and porn from a health perspective though?

Does Tibetan medicine say anything about it?

Surely, the widespread availability of porn is not a positive thing even psychologically? Do you not think it distorts how people relate to sex?

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan medicine says nothing at all about masturbation.

Porn is a different issue altogether. The main danger with porn for the individual, is that might cause them to become a specific kind of paṇḍaka, only able to be aroused by watching others have sex.

Beyond that, there are many social issues to consider with porn. That being said, it is something that should be legal, since making it illegal marginalizes sex workers even more than they are now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 8:08 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Actually, I mentioned how they begin, the root, or mula. This is greed.

Malcolm wrote:

I think you mean craving, but whatever. No, in reality, the cause of all of these things is the knowledge obscuration of ignorance; rather than the afflictive ignorance of the "first" nidāna of dependent origination.

theanarchist said:

So what negative karma does masturbating create?

Negative karma is negative karma, or dark/black karma.

Malcolm wrote:

You did not answer her question.

theanarchist said:

Also, have you ever done a monastic retreat?

Malcolm wrote:

I know you did not ask her — however, I did a three year+ solitary retreat. I think I have a bit of a better idea of the value of solitude, silence and so on than most.

theanarchist said:

Again, this is really similar to what I said to theanarchist. If you're on an intensive meditation retreat with 20 other folks, and you're the only one slipping out the back to take a swig from your flask, your mind simply isn't going to be as supple as the other participants.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh bullshit. And quite honestly, a retreat with 20 people is no retreat at all. It's a quiet riot.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 6:16 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

theanarchist said:

So what negative karma does masturbating create?

At maximum it perpetuates the attachment to sexual pleasure that already exists in your mindstream, just like having consensual sex with a partner does.

The advantage of masturbation to sex with a partner is that no attachment to another person is involved. For example it can not become the cause for being jealous and all the possible negative consequences this might develop (like insulting, harming or killing another person in a fit of jealous rage)

Malcolm wrote:

If masturbating is bad, I can't imagine the consequences of Dharmabating, it must be much worse. I think they would have to invent a hell for that, oh wait, we are in it, Dharmawheel.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 6:14 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Sorry, but the sutras do not mention the notion of harming others as being the criterion for wholesome and unwholesome, wholesome and unwholesome are classified based upon the root (mula) and whether they have good or bad results for the person engaging in the actions.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but one has to understand why actions are defined as positive and negative. So far all you have done is discuss symptoms, by you have not actually understood the cause. Until you understand the cause, you cannot remove the disease.

Do you think for example, we practice avihimsa just for ourselves? Why is avihimsa, hri, and so on associated with positive minds?

The positive and negative nature of actions is clearly defined by virtue of their object. So for example, harming a Buddha or killing an Arhat is a much worse transgression than killing a normal human being. The weight of an action is defined by our intent, satisfaction and so on.

What you are not perceiving, or don't care about, is why these nonvirtues are considered nonvirtues to begin with. Certainly, they are nonvirtuous for all sentient beings — so why?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I am not disputing this. But greed, lust, desire. These aren't necessarily the best ways to get to the heavenly realms.

Malcolm wrote:

My point still stands — when one masturbates, one is not harming anyone else, no more than eating food harmful to anyone else.

The criteria of why the ten nonvirtues are nonvirtuous has to do mainly with how the seven physical nonvirtues impact others around us.

Masturbation is a transgression only for monastics, while it may be included in sexual misconduct from a preceptual point of view, it has to be considered primarily a transgression of disobedience. Sexual misconduct is a natural transgression because it harms others. Since masturbation does not fulfill this requirement, it is therefore not part of sexual misconduct. These days it is a little hard to justify oral sex and anal sex as sexual misconduct as well, from the natural nonvirtue point of view. I think in general this is why there is just not much heat about it. One does not hear Buddhist teachers railing against fellatio and cunnalingus, etc., in the same way they trip out against eating meat and drinking alcohol...speaking of which it is time for me to go have dinner...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 5:00 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Sex is mentally and physically damaging, it's an incredibly filthy and disease prone activity, some of which can cause death. It also gives rise to birth, which is suffering. It also is a major source of desire and attachment and hence perpetuates dependent origination. This is not to say that there are not cleaner or safer ways of doing it.

.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 4:55 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Jurisprudence can only exist with respect to rights bearing individuals.

maybay said:

All the more puzzling why anyone would be taking issue with the Dalai Lama, a refugee.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

maybay said:

The sort of fuzzy thinking expressed by Deleuze above is why the Anglo-American ethicists don't really take Continental philosophers very seriously on such issues. Anglo-American ethicists. Is that some funny joke?

Malcolm wrote:

As I said, fuzzy thinking. Something you won't find among analytical philosophers, but is very prevalent on the continent. Groovy French guys like Deleuze have mistaken Litcrit for philosophy, and it shows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

theanarchist said:

...no no fasion precept for lay people.

Malcolm wrote:

But there really should be...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

That has nothing to do with inherency. Such things are dependently originated and thus empty of inherent existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Uhuh, and why is it "bad" when an animal kills another animal for food? Because their minds are filled with negative mental factors. Why are those mental factors negative? What is it that makes them negative?

While I will certainly agree with you that there is no inherently existing negative mental factors, nevertheless mental factors can be considered inherently bad if they invariably produce negative effects.

But really, we do not have to be allergic to the word "inherent." Indian Buddhist scholars use it all the time in a positive fashion, even Nāgārjuna.

The main point of course is that the ten nonvirtues are nonvirtues naturally, and do not depend on a social context to make them "bad." If you indulge in them, you will take rebirth in lower realms; if you practice their opposite, you will take rebirth in higher realms — no precepts needed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 4:41 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

harm for others.

You are not properly making a distinction between precepts and the ten nonvirtues. You must learn to make this distinction, otherwise you will never understand the principle of Hināyāna teachings.

The ten nonvirtues are nonvirtues because they cause disruption to others. The ten virtues are virtues because observing them creates harmony with others. This has nothing to do with vows, trainings and so on.

Malice, greed and ignorance are nonvirtues inherently because they motivate acts which disturb others. Their opposite, love, generosity and wisdom are inherently virtuous because they motivate acts that benefit others. This is what makes virtuous conduct socially valuable and laudable.

This is the first I've heard of such inherency, and is exactly the kind of thing that the anarchist is arguing against. Source?

Malcolm wrote:

You do not need a source. Do the action of animals cause them to fall into lower realms, yes or no? Animals cannot take precepts, nor train in them, nevertheless their virtuous and nonvirtuous actions have karmic consequences. Therefore all actions are either virtuous, nonvirtuous or neutral, inherently so.

However, you can understand this from Vasubandhu's discussion of alcohol with regard to lay persons where he makes a distinction between transgressions by nature and transgressions through disobedience.

We can understand then that the precepts concerning killing, stealing, lying and sexual misconduct are all vows linked with natural nonvirtues, the breaking of which are transgressions by nature — the rest of Hinayāna Buddhist vows are transgressions through disobedience.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

rory said:

I don't care, I want to be in a position where I don't have to care; I don't want to depend on the kindness of others

maybay said:

What kind of Buddhist are you anyway? I mean, I don't mean to get personal, but your posts seem centered on nothing more than getting your way. The world is full of problems and that's just samsara for you. Any progress you might make resolving one set of problems will be lost to another. And even if you do manage to rise to higher states of being, that ultimately isn't going to help your Dharma practice. We need to learn how to live with problems. Consider this quote:

Deleuze recommends jurisprudence to address specific user groups that negotiate how to live with a problem. Instead of a general and transcendent rights-bearing subject, we have life and the problems of life that proceed only case-by-case, something for jurisprudence to unravel and honor. Jurisprudence addresses the situation to make it livable, it resists coding it with transcendent evaluations of abuse. Justice and Rights do not exist. Only jurisprudence exists and it alone is capable of creating law [droit].

Is your situation livable? Ask yourself that.

Malcolm wrote:

Jurisprudence can only exist with respect to rights bearing individuals. The sort of fuzzy thinking expressed by Deleuze above is why the Anglo-American ethicists don't really take Continental philosophers very seriously on such issues.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 3:55 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is too monolithic a statement.

Zhen Li said:

Perhaps so, but the same was said by the Dalai Lama. However, in my opinion, I would be surprised if you asked a monk 1500 years ago, and they approved of masturbation.

Malcolm wrote:

Monks disapprove of a lot of things — a rather uptight bunch, for the most part. And are not the Sangha Mahāyānists take refuge in...so I really could care less what most monks think of these kinds of issues.

Concerning the sūtra text, without a Sanskrit original or a Tibetan translation to compare the Dharmakṣema translation to, it is uncertain.

You have already stated this. But your view of canon from the historical perspective, as I understand from other threads, is fairly literalist.

I think that most "academic scholarship" in Buddhism is primarily self-serving bullshit written by people trying to feed their families. I think the search for the origins of Mahāyāna is entirely speculative and am completely comfortable with traditional narratives — legends, if you will — around its rise in India. I don't mistake those for history — but I also think the Academic Buddhist historiography is largely a crock of shit. I know you do not hold a high opinion of academic scholarship on the topic, and your abrasive comments to that effect are the reason why Ven. Huifeng no longer visits this site...

If Huifeng does not visit this site, I am not to blame — he is a grown up, he does not need to remain in a place of reactivity.

Tsongkhapa mistakenly attributes the passage from Daśākuśalakarmapathanirdeśa to Atisha. Please see foot note 386 in the Snow Lion Edition of volume one of Lam Rim Chen mo.

Which is not to say that Atisha did not also say that. This may also not be indicating a quote of the "Great Elder," but rather simply stating that he agrees with the quote prior, which is what it says. It also says the same after another quote - which would make sense: "The Great Elder also taught this."

But in fact there is no evidence that masturbation is what is being referred to. The comment is really rather non-specific.

Tsongkhapa himself does not mention it.

He says "Inappropriate body parts are body parts other than the vagina."

Again, this is not very specific. yes, mouth, anus, etc.

In short, it is extremely silly to make broad declarations for the Tibetan tradition on the basis of one text by an Indian author which is not supported, AFAICT, in sūtras found in the Tibetan Canon.

Sexual misconduct should be defined on the basis of conduct that is harmful to others. We can see in the instance of minors, those under the protection of others, the spouses of others, in places where public offense will be taken and so on, that there is clear harm to others. But we cannot see this in the case of masturbation. Frankly, it is a little difficult to see how oral sex is harmful to others as long as it is consensual. I would suggest that morays around nonharmful sexual conduct are strictly cultural and may be adjusted to suit cultural climates. In general the ten nonvirtues all depend on how one relates to other sentient beings. It is very easy to see why malice, greed and ignorance are harmful to others, as motivators for killing, stealing, sexual misconduct in general, as well as lying, harsh speech, calumny and gossip. But is very hard to see where consensual sexual acts can fit here as nonvirtues unless one is a monk or a nun.\

What you fail to understand is that the ten nonvirtues are defined as "natural" in so far as it does not matter if you are ant or an anteater. They have nothing to do with trainings, and everything to do with establishing what creates eudaemonic environment for everyone. Precepts are abstracted out of those, and of course, we can understand that consuming alcohol, for lay people, is the only prohibition which is by command, rather than through observing inherency. When you say that masturbation is sexual misconduct, you are making the claim it is inherently nonvirtuous, like killing, stealing, lying and assaulting minors.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 2:59 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

I am simply stating what is fact. Buddhist scriptural tradition holds that masturbation is sexual misconduct.

Malcolm wrote:

No, that is too monolithic a statement. The Buddhist tradition holds masturbation is sexual misconduct for monks — on that we can all agree. The issue is whether it is to be considered the same for lay people, and that is a contested issue, it is not settled at all.

Concerning the sūtra text, without a Sanskrit original or a Tibetan translation to compare the Dharmakṣema translation to, it is uncertain.

Atisha, BTW, says no such thing.

Tsongkhapa mistaken attributes the passage from Daśākuśalakarmapathanirdeśa to Atisha. Please see foot note 386 in the Snow Lion Edition of volume one of Lam Rim Chen mo.

Tsongkhapa himself does not mention it.

So you are down to two actual texts that say anything about the issue. Only one in the Tibetan tradition, a late short text on the ten nonvirtues and an Chinese translation by a translator of dubious repute.

Considering the paucity of sources, I would say your claim is slim at best.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 2:20 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You have yet to demonstrate that avoiding masturbation, for lay people, is a) a rule for training b) akusala c) not conducive to awakening and conducive to bad rebirth.

Sexual misconduct is abstained from by the 3rd precept - s.m. is both akusala and conducive to a bad rebirth. The only difficulty is you choose not to accept any texts which claim that it is sexual misconduct.

One is a sūtra we do not read, the other is an Indian text in which is late and inconsistent with earlier texts of the same genre.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 2:00 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Precepts are not of themselves conducive to awakening.

Zhen Li said:

The Buddhist path is holistic.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. For example, Mahāyāna monks may handle gold, but are forbidden to eat meat; Hinayāna monks are barred from handling gold, but may eat meat, and so on it goes.

Mahayanists may even violate monastic vows without actually losing them, if situations call for it.

If someone is a Vajrayāna practitioner, then all sense pleasures are acceptable conduct.

There is no such thing as a universal training which applies to all practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 1:56 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You seem to fail to understand that these things are not absolutes. The principle of Hinayāna conduct in general is not harming others.

Zhen Li said:

These sutras are Mahayana sutras. But no, I don't misunderstand that it is a skilful means, I have reiterated this every few posts.

Malcolm wrote:

You will fail to convince me that masturbation harms others [or oneself for that matter, unless it is a symptom of a pathology]. In this case then, we can really discard the idea that masturbation is sexual misconduct unless of course one does it in public, in front of a Buddharūpa, and so on.

Zhen Li said:

The point isn't not harming others, may I please see your scriptural source?

The point of the precepts, as far as the Buddhist texts are concerned, is training (as in the Pali, sikkhāpadaṃ, rule for training) and avoiding actions that are unwholesome (akusala) and not conducive to awakening and which conduce to a bad rebirth.

Malcolm wrote:

You have yet to demonstrate that avoiding masturbation, for lay people, is a) a rule for training b) akusala c) not conducive to awakening and conducive to bad rebirth.

In which hell or preta realm does one take rebirth for masturbating? Why is there complete silence on the issue in Abhidharma?

Why is there complete silence in the issue in sūtra, apart from the one Chinese sūtra you can produce? Maybe it is really not so important.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

theanarchist said:

The wording you use shows how wrong your attitude towards this is.

Nothing is PROHIBITED in buddhism. In buddhism there is no entity handing out rulebooks what you are not allowed to do, like in the theistic revelation based religions.

Zhen Li said:

We can get hung up on words, but I think you know what I mean. The precepts are voluntary. You choose to prohibit yourself from doing that which isn't conducive to awakening.

Malcolm wrote:

Precepts are not of themselves conducive to awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 1:42 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Well, the sutra refers to the disciple being referred to as potentially having a wife. Also, it really doesn't make sense to say that only vaginal intercourse is not sexual misconduct if the person being referred to is a monk, in which case, it is sexual misconduct.

Malcolm wrote:

You seem to fail to understand that these things are not absolutes. The principle of Hinayāna conduct in general is not harming others. You will fail to convince me that masturbation harms others [or oneself for that matter, unless it is a symptom of a pathology]. In this case then, we can really discard the idea that masturbation is sexual misconduct unless of course one does it in public, in front of a Buddhārūpa, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

if you want to convince people

Malcolm wrote:

I have zero interest in convincing anyone of anything.

Zhen Li said:

Again, I am not fully convinced that masturbation is not prohibited for lay people in any text found in Tibetan. Now, I cannot confirm this, since I couldn't find the material in the primary text, but according to Alexander Berzin in "Explanation of Buddhist Sexual Ethics: An Historical Perspective," masturbation is considered sexual misconduct for a layperson in the Lam-rim chen-mo, along with Asvaghosa and Atisa.

Malcolm wrote:

This indeed really quite late. There is no sutra that mentions it, and in Vinaya it applies strictly to monastics. Also the Daśākuśalakarmapathanirdeśa of Aśvaghoṣa is not clear that this refers to lay people — it is like it was included with general sexual misconduct because it is misconduct for monastics. The text is very short, less than a folio. I don't generally given much importance to sūtras in the Chinese canon if there is no corresponding Tibetan translation. In fact, I tend to ignore them altogether. And how about Newar Sanskrit sutras without Tibetan translation? Where is the line drawn, and upon what grounds?[/quote]

Which sūtras did you have in mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

This one is common Mahāyāna and provisional.

But can you explain how these criteria address the matter of application of a sutra to oneself? In what cases, and why, does a sutra become applicable to oneself? Also, where does Tibetan canon vs. non-Tibetan canon influence this?

As far as I have read Buddhist texts, I never once came across the notion of applicability or inapplicability of a sutra to oneself.

Malcolm wrote:

As to your first question, it depends on the understanding and maturity of the practitioner. A 13 year old boy needs different teachings than a 70 year old man. Sutras are like medicine — if one has a specific illness, one applies an appropriate diet, conduct, medicine and therapy. If one has a specific problem, one applies to Buddha's teachings to that problem. But there is no such thing as one teaching that suits every person.

Your next question can be answered for example, by looking in the Abhidharmakośabhaṣyaṃ. Theravadins for example, do not accept the antarabhāva because they reject the sūtra in which it is taught since it is absent from their own canon. Vasubandhu points that many sūtras have been lost, and then proceeds to argue the point for the antarabhāva on logical grounds.

I don't generally given much importance to sūtras in the Chinese canon if there is no corresponding Tibetan translation. In fact, I tend to ignore them altogether.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but we don't read this sūtra, it is not in the Tibetan Canon, as far as I know it is not mentioned anywhere, and so therefore it does not apply to us.

Zhen Li said:

What exactly does it mean for a sutra to apply to you?

Malcolm wrote:

There are a number of criteria: Is it Hinayāna or Mahāyāna? Is it common Mahāyāna or uncommon Mahāyāna Secret Mantra? Is it provisional or definitive? Is it explicit or intentional? Etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 9th, 2015 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

We are only claiming that this is what is advocated as a skilful path, which has its benefits. Nothing metaphysical.

Malcolm wrote:

There are many skillful paths for many different people. There is not only one path for everyone. For example, if someone is a practitioner of Buddha's Great Perfection teachings, then there really are no set rules at all. One applies conduct to one's life according to what is beneficial at that time without making up strict rules or thinking that one needs to follow precepts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2015 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is no precept against masturbation for lay people.

Zhen Li said:

It is sexual misconduct according to the Sūtra of the Upāsaka Precepts. But it seems people like to pick and choose which version of sexual misconduct they want to practice by, fair enough.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but we don't read this sūtra, it is not in the Tibetan Canon, as far as I know it is not mentioned anywhere, and so therefore it does not apply to us.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

Besides the obvious fact that one is saving money and having more free time by being single, and avoiding the possibility that one might get married and all of the trappings that brings, not exposing oneself to carnal pleasures makes one's mind cool and calm, free and more aware.:

Malcolm wrote:

If you need to "not expose" yourself to carnal pleasures [meaning in fact "pleasant physical sensations"], this is a sign that your mind is becoming frozen, rigid, bound and more confused.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2015 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you have a catechistic attitude towards precepts, it is unlikely you will understand that they are only necessary for people who have a problem refraining from killing, lying, sexual misconduct and so on.

Zhen Li said:

Skilful means. You adjust what you say according to who you're talking to.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no precept against masturbation for lay people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2015 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

Zhen Li said:

A lot of this comes down to basic Buddhist knowledge: six-sense bases -> contact -> feeling -> craving -> attachment -> becoming -> birth -> entire mass of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no causal link between sensation and craving. Why? Because sensation is strictly a result; however, in some people sensation is a condition for further craving, but it is not the cause of craving. Affliction causes affliction and action; action causes suffering. Suffering is a result. It does not cause anything, it can however act as a condition in some people for further affliction.

Zhen Li said:

If you only post on a Buddhist internet forum, but don't uphold the precepts...

Malcolm wrote:

If you have a catechistic attitude towards precepts, it is unlikely you will understand that they are only necessary for people who have a problem refraining from killing, lying, sexual misconduct and so on. Those of us who do not have these issues do not need precepts at all. We also do not need to call ourselves "Buddhists" to be practitioners of Buddhadharma, of which there are many kinds.

Zhen Li said:

and have a consistent meditation practice, then it's unlikely that you are going to have the same perspective as practicing Buddhists who can see both what suffering constitutes and is caused by, and see its gradual lessening through practice.

Malcolm wrote:

Precepts and meditation do not reduce suffering. If they did, also Hindus would have less suffering.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 8th, 2015 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: The harms of Masturbation and Porn

Content:

SeeLion said:

Actually, there is some similarity: in both cases, desire arises, and that's the whole problem - in the Buddhist view.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on which Buddhist view you are talking about.

SeeLion said:

Research shows that as little as few servings of alcohol per week increase the cancer risk by some margin.

Malcolm wrote:

Hearsay.

SeeLion said:

As a strictly personal experience, I am able to see the clouding of the mind which comes from 1 spoon of wine.

Malcolm wrote:

Your mind must be pretty susceptible to your body's metabolic rate, hate to see what sugar does to you.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Jikan said:

But if you sympathize with this position in some way, you can't just say it outright, especially if some of "them" might hear you. You have to dogwhistle it, or talk around it. You can't name it, or specify it. It has to be left implied or unsaid.

Malcolm wrote:

It is obvious who the bigots are, the so called "social conservatives" who are neither social nor conservative at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 7:29 PM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

LARP martyrdom

THAT is a keeper.

I feel like the thread is perhaps beginning to exhaust itself, does anyone have anything else to say, would people like the discussion to continue, or have we finished for now?

Malcolm wrote:

I think we are done here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

conebeckham said:

In any case, those who expended great effort to achieve legal equal standing surely feel great benefit from the results. This should be obvious.

maybay said:

Well its not.

Malcolm wrote:

To those who are feebleminded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 7:32 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

The motivation behind writing a constitution that separates powers is distrust of human nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? The establishment clause has the very opposite effect what you state here.

maybay said:

The motivation behind, i.e. the cause.

Malcolm wrote:

The cause, i.e., motivation, of the Establishment clause was prevention of a state religion — much to the chagrin of fundamentalists in this country who pedal the mistaken notion that America was founded as a Christian nation.

As the government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian Religion...

http://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/bar1796t.asp

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I don't want to see them disappear or get marginalized any more than I want that for other groups, but it is simply the ways the cards have fallen that they have to deal with living in a society that has experienced a demographic shift in views regarding homosexuality. That is their problem, and I hope their own internal structures can deal with that and move on.

maybay said:

They are not masters of their own internal structures, as this case proves. It is your problem, and everybody else in the country.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually, it is not our problem. If people's "internal structure" can't deal with racial, gender and marriage equality, that is their problem. Why? Because there are only two kinds of problems in the world "My problem" and "Not my problem."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

Nevermind what it is.

Malcolm wrote:

What it is is what really matters.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 6:12 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Surely the best thing for all is a legal arrangement where they can live their consciences, and adhere to their beliefs while not being free to enforce their notions of sanctity on those who do not share them. If you think the SCOTUS ruling does not do that, explain why.

maybay said:

Law is just one thread in the fabric of forceful notions. You don't seem to recognize that.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, what he recognizes is that most of this is merely a bunch of sour grapes from people who tried to turn their religious convictions into law in defiance of both the 1st and 14th amendments to the US Constitution. The law is settled, the rest of the noise from the batshit crazy right is the pathetic whinging of those who are on the wrong side of justice, morals and law.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 6:06 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Uh huh, so slavery was traditional in the US, denying black people civil rights was traditional in the South — we were to just let that "die out quietly?"

maybay said:

Consider the United States as a marriage of states. Now why not allow divorce? You misbehave, we separate. Why does that never happen?

Malcolm wrote:

The USA is not a polygamous marriage. It is a Union. Completely different beasts, not even in the same kingdom, taxonomically speaking.

Anyway, the South tried to secede, started a war over slavery, and lost. End of story.

There is as much hope of the US allowing a state to secede as there is hope that China will somehow grow a real conscience and liberate Tibet. In the case of China, however, the parallel between US treatment of Native Americans and their treatment Tibetans is precise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 6:00 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

No one is bombing, or otherwise oppressing fundamentalist Christians in this country, at all.

maybay said:

Clint just rubbished their values. Why did he do that? He doesn't believe in sanctity. He's an actor after all.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a non-sequitor. He is an actor so therefore he does not value the sanctity of marriage? Well, given the divorce rates amongst some of the most vocal opponents of gay marriage, I'd say they don't either.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 5:56 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

The motivation behind writing a constitution that separates powers is distrust of human nature.

Malcolm wrote:

Huh? The establishment clause has the very opposite effect what you state here.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof...

People who work for the state therefore are not permitted to impose their religious prejudice in the course of their normal duties, and if they are found to do so, are likely to be prosecuted for violating the civil rights of others. Somehow, the tea party people have forgotten all about the first amendment.

However, the basis of the SCOTUS decision regarding marriage is founded on the due process clause of the 14th amendment:

"[w]ithout doubt...denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.

You see, here, there is no restriction placed around who can marry, establish a home and raise children. Anyone may marry anyone else, and unless they are proven to be unfit, may raise children.

You can argue all you like that when this was written individuals meant individual men and women, nevertheless, societies change, and since gender is not specified in the Constitution, and since DOMA has been thrown out as entirely unconstitutional (rightly so), marriage equality was recognized. It is a done deal, and the rest of the modern world will follow suit, leaving Fundamentalists to deal with the issue as best they can, whether well nor poorly. We are not responsible for their feelings on any level.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 5:40 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

In their minds all they are doing it upholding tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same with ISIS. It is the same with female circumcision. Do you approve of something merely because it is "traditional?"

maybay said:

No, you give that tradition space to die out quietly.

Malcolm wrote:

Uh huh, so slavery was traditional in the US, denying black people civil rights was traditional in the South — we were to just let that "die out quietly?"

maybay said:

Try some principles of Taoist governance for a change. What have you got to lose.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm, the same Taoist principles of government that relied on massive spy networks, and various other Machiavellian approaches?

Anyway, this is not China.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Masaru said:

[Edit]

Malcolm wrote:

And this is relevant how?

Masaru said:

I know you don't understand. You're too far removed from reality in your bubble echo chambers to see it.

Malcolm wrote:

The reality is that the court ruled, and some conservatives are freaking out, but only some. Others, with more common sense, have the following attitude:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

In their minds all they are doing it upholding tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same with ISIS. It is the same with female circumcision. Do you approve of something merely because it is "traditional?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Purificatory Practices, What're the Differences

Content:

Shemmy said:

I have no idea what its purpose or function is either, so I suppose it is just for curiosity sake at this point.

Malcolm wrote:

It is a purification of six lokas combined with Vajrasattva guru yoga.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, July 7th, 2015 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: We've been doing it wrong....

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

How do you say 'twerk' in Tibetan, anyway?

Malcolm wrote:

It is not translatable into Tibetan.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Luke said:

Doesn't the fact that this ruling has currently put gay people in the media spotlight also put gay people in more danger of violent hate crimes?

Malcolm wrote:

I am quite sure that African Americans would not exchange risk of hate crimes for their civil rights. Would you?

Luke said:

All these gay marriage stories have certainly gotten the attention of the angry ultra-conservative extremists in the US and given them a target.

Malcolm wrote:

This too will pass.

Luke said:

Modern America is so extremely pro-gay that I think it would be a lot more likely that a straight person would lose his or her job because of making a not-totally-sensitive, non-PC comment about gays.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not "pro-gay", I am pro-civil rights.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I personally don't get why the official marriage label was important, the people who are so firmly against gay marriage will not, IMO start seeing them as equal regardless of what it's called. But then, I am not gay, and I do not face those circumstances, which i'm sure colors my opinion.

Malcolm wrote:

Married people have rights unmarried people do not — it is as simple as that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 3:35 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Masaru said:

Well, God forbid that people who are against all forms of homosexuality are ever able to rouse enough support to thoroughly suppress it after this oddly aggressive move on the part of gays, marked with a bit of intolerance. I don't understand the need to keep up with the Joneses. Marriage is about kids, period. [

Malcolm wrote:

A lot of gay people have children.

Masaru said:

And for some reason, the religious and conservative seem to be better at making and rearing them, and passing on their values.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, you have some proof of this?

Masaru said:

I hope that, in the long run, the fears of the Christian conservatives and the conservatives of other faiths are baseless...

Malcolm wrote:

They are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 3:02 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

SCOTUS has decided what the law is

maybay said:

We share a law Malcolm, but not the law of SCOTUS. You should try to accept that.

Malcolm wrote:

SCOTUS interprets laws, it does not make them. In this case, SCOTUS has interpreted the constitution to find that same gender marriage cannot be banned in any of the the fifty States. It is very simple.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 2:55 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

and from Indrajala the only real argument..regarding how we interpret or internalize Buddhist commentary on sexual misconduct.

Malcolm wrote:

Needless to say, the issues covers orifices and who a given person can pursue as a partner with no mention of gender.

The only place where the issue of gender preference and gender identity is really brought up is Vinaya, where certain kinds of paṇḍakas (which would include straight men who can only be turned on by watching other people have intercourse) are barred from ordaining.

There are at least two place in Mahāyāna sutra where the issue of gender identity is basically found to be a delusion: the episode concerning the Goddess of the Ganges in the Vimalakirti Sutra and the Nāgā Princess in the Lotus. I am sure there are more.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

in the absence if a better argument, I know where I stand.

maybay said:

Well I'm more doubtful of where I stand, and I don't see why I should even have an opinion on something like this.

Malcolm wrote:

You have an awful lot of posts one the subject for someone who does not see why they should have an opinion on the subject

maybay said:

The problem is that a constitutional democracy relies on an engaged citizenry otherwise it falls apart.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, indeed. It was engaged citizenry that brought this issue to the courts, and SOCTUS decided. The US has three branches of government (Legislative, Executive and Judicial], not just two. People somehow think that the judicial branch has not active role in government, but in fact they do, and that is to interpret the law where necessary the legislative and executive branches cannot act appropriately or where there is some doubt.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, July 6th, 2015 at 2:32 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Can you point out where someone has insisted (in the thread) that any opposition makes one a bigot?

maybay said:

Start with posts 10 and 11.

Malcolm wrote:

Posts ten and eleven pointed out that there was indeed bigoted opposition (from neo-nazis along with a suggestion of relocation), not that disagreement with SCOTUS itself constituted bigotry. One can disagree all one likes with SCOTUS's decision in this matter, but it is irrelevant. SCOTUS has decided what the law is, and that settles it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Luke said:

There are many Christian, Muslim, and Orthodox Jewish married couples who are against gay marriage.

Malcolm wrote:

So what? There were many white couples against mixed race marriage, not so long ago.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 7:08 PM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Masaru said:

I've read advice given to laypeople about finances and family life. The fact that he even gives advice on how husband should treat wives and which kinds of women to seek out or avoid is an endorsement of heterosexuality in itself.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is a recognition of a certain state of affairs.

[/quote]...whether, getting back to homosexuality, it's psychologically healthy for children be raised by gay couples is another issue.[/quote]

I know many children raised by gay couples, and I can assure you that they are all fine, healthy young people with no problems, top of their classes, generally heterosexual in gender orientation and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Indrajala said:

When you go to the National Museum of India you see figures like this:

It should be no surprise therefore that most Buddhists in Asia and their leadership do not endorse same sex marriage and find it rather alien.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 9:27 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Masaru said:

When it's explained that between the Buddhist canon and the context from which it arose, homosexual practices were frowned upon...

Malcolm wrote:

Citation please. Otherwise, your comments can be dismissed as worthless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Indrajala said:

but nevertheless I've never seen homosexuality endorsed, encouraged or portrayed positively in any classical Buddhist literature...

Malcolm wrote:

Nor have you seen heterosexuality endorsed, encouraged or portrayed positively in any classical Buddhist literature.

Classical Buddhist literature [i.e. pre-7th century] is generally rather negative about sexual activity in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, July 5th, 2015 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Masaru said:

We have to be honest about what Buddhism actually says about homosexuality...

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and the Buddha says nothing about it at all...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 5:02 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Indrajala said:

hierarchy, social roles and gender roles...

Malcolm wrote:

...have all proven to be rather fluid in human history and in societies around the world.

maybay said:

And for good reason, except that in USA they like to turn everything into immutable law.

Malcolm wrote:

Really, you mean unlike other countries?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 5:01 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

Law courts are not in a position to launch extended investigations into the psychological motivations of plaintiffs just to determine if they have a case.

Malcolm wrote:

Neither are internet forums.

It is plain and simple: SCOTUS decided there was reason to hear the case, they heard it, they decided.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not at present, but really, don't you think this whole patriarchal/matriarchal thing is a bit dated?

Zhen Li said:

I don't think it's dated. I am willing to be flexible though, queens can often do a lot of good if they have a male heart, like Queen Elizabeth,

"I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman; but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too, and think foul scorn that Parma or Spain, or any prince of Europe, should dare to invade the borders of my realm; to which rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms, I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field."

Malcolm wrote:

You guys are living in a fantasy world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Zhen Li said:

While there are matrilineal societies, there are no matriarchal societies.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at present, but really, don't you think this whole patriarchal/matriarchal thing is a bit dated?

Zhen Li said:

Humans are just apes after all, and we have a division of labour and sexual dimorphism like any other mammal. For efficiency and structure, men do one thing, women do another. It's fair, even if it is not perfect equality.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, if your criteria is simply biology.

Zhen Li said:

Also, Indrajala is right about hierarchy. All societies have and will hierarchy. It is not a question of fluidity - there is no flow from not having a hierarchy to having a non-hierarchy.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote][/quote]

I did not say there was a flow from "having a hierarchy to having a non-hierarchy." I said that such things were fluid.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 3:25 AM

Title: Re: Supreme Court: Same-Sex Marriage a Right Nationwid

Content:

rory said:

I agree with you entirely Urgyen Dorje; people should be allowed to make freely the relationships individuals desire and it's wrong for the state to intervene. Those poor elderly ladies, it's just wrong. As for polyandry, polyamory, polygamy; again free people; freedom to choose.

gassho

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

In this case, you should be glad SCOTUS intervened, it was a favorable intervention.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 3:23 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Indrajala said:

hierarchy, social roles and gender roles...

Malcolm wrote:

...have all proven to be rather fluid in human history and in societies around the world.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Zhen Li said:

If polyamorous marriages will eventually be allowed, why not just forget the whole marriage law thing and stop the state discrimination against single people! We are the same flesh and blood as those who have lovers, so why should we be treated any differently!

Malcolm wrote:

Huh?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 3:17 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

What is it about marriage that makes it a basic human right? Why do we need legislation in the first place?

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite simply really, married people are afforded certain rights and privileges denied to unmarried people. Those rights and privileges are granted by law surrounding property transference and so on. In the end, it really all has to do with the disposition of property and inheritance. That is why the State is involved with this issue.

maybay said:

There are civil unions for that.

Malcolm wrote:

Not any more.

maybay said:

We will cross the bridge of polyamorous marriages when we come to that. In principle, I see no valid reason however to ban polyamorous marriage either.

Well the supreme court did, so maybe you should have a look at the history.

Malcolm wrote:

That was then, this is now.

maybay said:

That does not work in cases where people are being denied basic justice [fairness] in all kinds of ways.

This case is not about justice. It has been a desperate attempt at achieving social acceptance through the legislature, and if it hasn't already been done, through the dictionary.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course it is about justice, otherwise SCOTUS would never have agreed to hear the case.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Now my question is, what other values are they compromising for what other laws?
Irrelevant question.

maybay said:

The supreme court doesn't need you to defend its decisions with sanitary responses to foreign nationals. At least I hope it doesn't.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a foreign national, than what do you care what SCOTUS decides?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, July 4th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: The practice of Green Tara and Ganapuja

Content:

Sukhamrita said:

Hi everyone, I hope you do fine.

I have a question, maybe it was answered before, I've done a short research before posting, but didn't find an answer so I'm gonna ask you by this way.

This is addressed specifically for members of Dzogchen Community. I wanna know how to integrate the Yoga of Arya Tara and Ganapuja, because Rinpoche have not given a specific transmission for a practice of Ganapuja with Green Tara, but I have received the lung transmission of the original terma practice of Anuyoga Green Tara of Adzom Drukpa, by webcast from Lama Tsultrim Allione.

By the way the original practice is different than Rinpoche's one, so I'd wanna focus on the practice of Green Tara and integrate also Ganapuja, to make it more complete.

Has Rinpoche said something on this? Is this possible? How should I proceed if possible?

Well that's it. I hope you can help me with this.

Tashi Delek!

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you write ChNN directly.

Sukhamrita said:

Hi Malcolm. I decided to ask by this way, if anyone knew about it, because I don't wanna bother Rinpoche with this questions. He is a very busy person, so if there is a possibility to solve this kind of doubts or questions by more experienced practitioners, better not to make him waste his precious time. He is always doing lot of things.

Well, thanks anyway ^_^

Malcolm wrote:

It is never wrong to ask your teacher a focused practice question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Understanding why ISIL beheads

Content:

Caodemarte said:

Buddhism has historically been used as an excuse for the most appalling violence.

Buddhist societies have at least the same level of violence as non-Buddhist states,]

Malcolm wrote:

For example?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 7:19 PM

Title: Re: The practice of Green Tara and Ganapuja

Content:

haak0n said:

Green Tara practice with meat and alcohol doesnt seem quite right

Malcolm wrote:

It can be just fine with Tārā in the three inner tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 7:18 PM

Title: Re: The practice of Green Tara and Ganapuja

Content:

Sukhamrita said:

Hi everyone, I hope you do fine.

I have a question, maybe it was answered before, I've done a short research before posting, but didn't find an answer so I'm gonna ask you by this way.

This is addressed specifically for members of Dzogchen Community. I wanna know how to integrate the Yoga of Arya Tara and Ganapuja, because Rinpoche have not given a specific transmission for a practice of Ganapuja with Green Tara, but I have received the lung transmission of the original terma practice of Anuyoga Green Tara of Adzom Drukpa, by webcast from Lama Tsultrim Allione.

By the way the original practice is different than Rinpoche's one, so I'd wanna focus on the practice of Green Tara and integrate also Ganapuja, to make it more complete.

Has Rinpoche said something on this? Is this possible? How should I proceed if possible?

Well that's it. I hope you can help me with this.

Tashi Delek!

Malcolm wrote:

I suggest you write ChNN directly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 8:46 AM

Title: Re: Supreme Court: Same-Sex Marriage a Right Nationwide

Content:

tingdzin said:

It's fine that gay people can now be married. On the other hand, is there any logical reason that gay marriage should be acceptable while polygamy or polyandry are not?

Malcolm wrote:

It is mainly a property issue, really. But I am sure we will face this issue in the courts soon enough. As far as I am concerned Polyamorous marriage is fine. Tibetans have had both polyandry and polygamy for centuries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: Supreme Court: Same-Sex Marriage a Right Nationwide

Content:

dreambow said:

I would like to think happy thoughts about what happens to small children adopted by two men, maybe they will have a joyful and a safe upbringing? On the other hand who will monitor what happens to these children?

Malcolm wrote:

What utter rubbish.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 8:43 AM

Title: Re: May be its time to ban discussion about Homosexuality..

Content:

Shadok said:

for the same reason discussion about Shugden was banned. The debate is getting very heated. It will only contribute to creation of bad karma, to fellow sanghas. It will not help educate anyone, people have made up their mind. It is only causing disharmony among Sanghas. Otherwise this forum will become nothing more than place to promote political/government propaganda.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see how. People are capable of having reasoned discussions about this issue. I don't really see much public disagreement on this issue apart from a couple of "conservatives" who are voicing their opinion, a day late and a dollar short.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 8:41 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Masaru said:

And even if that doesn't occur, it doesn't mean that the implications of the technologies we have been developing for a while won't lead to very, very old human objectives finally being completed. What happens when foot-binding becomes engineered and congenital? When social norms are no longer needed to achieve certain standards of beauty through class and breeding? When genetic homogeneity is finally achieved through an engineered process? When the emperor no longer needs a tribute of wives, nor any clothes? When the state is truly your parent?

Will we really transcend ourselves, or simply cement our ignorance into the blood of humanity?

maybay said:

Well I guess it won't matter, as long as the human remains are fed back into the living in perfectly equal measure. As long as everything is fair, who cares where we're going. The earth could be encircled in darkness, so long as the shadows fall equally on us all.

Malcolm wrote:

Equal opportunity and fairness is a basic set of conditions. That basic set of conditions does not guarantee anyone certain outcomes in life, it merely guarantees that everyone has, from a secular, legal point of view, the same chances to succeed. In the past, heterosexual people who chose to be married were unfairly advantaged. The basic lack of justice in the marriage issue has now been resolved.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

What is it about marriage that makes it a basic human right? Why do we need legislation in the first place?

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite simply really, married people are afforded certain rights and privileges denied to unmarried people. Those rights and privileges are granted by law surrounding property transference and so on. In the end, it really all has to do with the disposition of property and inheritance. That is why the State is involved with this issue.

maybay said:

The tacit suggestion is that marriage is "normal" and that homosexuals are now normal because they can marry.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the suggestion is that homosexuals are normal, and because they are normal they should not be barred from enjoying the same rights and privileges that other normal people enjoy.

maybay said:

Where does that leave people who don't marry?

Malcolm wrote:

People who are in committed relationships who choose not to marry now suffer from a lack of rights and privileges regardless of their gender orientation. In the past, heterosexual people were unfairly granted rights and privileges denied homosexual people merely based on gender orientation. This lack of fairness in the law has been remedied.

maybay said:

What about polygamy?

Malcolm wrote:

We will cross the bridge of polyamorous marriages when we come to that. In principle, I see no valid reason however to ban polyamorous marriage either.

maybay said:

Now my question is, what other values are they compromising for what other laws?

Malcolm wrote:

Irrelevant question.

maybay said:

That wasn't my point. I'm suggesting that the one-sided rhetoric against a group of people and the unwillingness to see things from their perspective doesn't help you or them in the long run.

Malcolm wrote:

Some Christians may need some pastoral counseling to help them deal with this issue, other than that, they do not need help. They are not being discriminated against.

maybay said:

The fairest ruling is not to judge at all.

Malcolm wrote:

That does not work in cases where people are being denied basic justice [fairness] in all kinds of ways.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

maybay said:

Every time the supreme court overrules a law of the state, the state loses some small sense of autonomy.

Malcolm wrote:

State's Rights was used an excuse to go to war over slavery.

We live in a federal republic. This means that federal law trumps state law every time. SCOTUS has decided that the states are not allowed to pass laws forbidding people of the same gender to be married. This is a good thing.

Some things, like marriage equality, simply boil down to questions of fairness. Fairness, as we know, is the essence of justice. As Rawls notes:

The two principles of justice (noted above) are as follows:

a. Each person has an equal claim to a fully adequate scheme of equal basic rights and liberties, which scheme is compatible with the same scheme for all; and in this scheme the equal political liberties, and only those liberties, are to be guaranteed their fair value.

b. Social and economic inequalities are to satisfy two conditions: first, they are to be attached to positions and offices open to all under conditions of fair equality of opportunity; and second, they are to be to the greatest benefit of the least advantaged members of society.

Rawls, John (2011-02-10). Political Liberalism: Expanded Edition (Columbia Classics in Philosophy) (pp. 5-6). Columbia University Press. Kindle Edition.

Further:

This priority of the right over the good in justice as fairness turns out to be a central feature of the conception. It imposes certain criteria on the design of the basic structure as a whole; these arrangements must not tend to generate propensities and attitudes contrary to the two principles of justice (that is, to certain principles which are given from the first a definite content) and they must insure that just institutions are stable.

RAWLS, John (2009-06-30). A THEORY OF JUSTICE (ORIG EDN) (Oxford Paperbacks 301 301) (pp. 31-32). Harvard University Press. Kindle Edition.

The fact is that allowing different states to have different standards for marriage compromised principle a.

maybay said:

Now consider the losers in this decision. Do they sound like the kind of people who can afford to lose ground? Do you believe them when they say its important to them?

Malcolm wrote:

They have not lost anything apart from their face. The idea that marriage equality = discrimination against Christians is absolutely ludicrous.

maybay said:

This is not a simple matter of individual rights.

Malcolm wrote:

It is, as stated above, a matter of fairness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, July 3rd, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Khenpo Jigphun Manjusri terma

Content:

narraboth said:

I think it is actually a Mipham guruyoga terma... I might be able to translate

Malcolm wrote:

Depends, could be the Mañjuśrījñānasattva teachings KJP revealed at Five Peaked Mountain, along with his related concise Dzogchen cycle, Sanggye Lagchang.

This was translated by Barron and is available from Padma Publishing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I am a bit at a loss to understand how Buddhists are supposed to stand on the sidelines and applaud these events when they are blatantly sensualistic.

Malcolm wrote:

I was not aware that Buddhists were supposed to anti-sensualistic...seems to me those folks are just having fun. I think a bit if sensualism would do most Buddhists some good, actually. Especially in terms of removing wooden members from posterior regions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Forum-Community-Sangha

Content:

Indrajala said:

...and actually appreciate it when others online are equally forthcoming about who they are.

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 8:16 PM
Title: Re: Forum-Community-Sangha
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Only when you posted outrageous and inflammatory nonsense.

Indrajala said:
Then there were the subsequent accusations I was being paid off by the PRC.

At the time, ironically, I wished that were so because I was broke as hell!

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, well, people say ridiculous things in response to other ridiculous things all the time.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 7:59 AM
Title: Re: Forum-Community-Sangha
Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
Now that I've spit my teacher's names out, I feel I've earned the right to ask what the backstory is here-- why is this such an issue?

.

Malcolm wrote:
Because of the amount of harassment anonymous users have subjected other users to in the past, and it is actually enormous and pervasive.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 1:51 AM
Title: Re: Forum-Community-Sangha
Content:
Indrajala said:
Again, I can point to cases of great concern and assistance I've received from people online, but conversely I've been on the receiving end of venom more than once (in particular from Tibetan Buddhists).

Malcolm wrote:

Only when you posted outrageous and inflammatory nonsense.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, July 2nd, 2015 at 12:45 AM

Title: Re: Forum-Community-Sangha

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Scholastic discussion is valued more than personal experience. Not just from recent threads, but there are some issues relating to community member identity/anonymity, outing one's teachers, and so on.

Malcolm wrote:

Personal experience is subjective, and cannot be quantified. For example, "Today I experienced that Lama X is Vajradhara!" Nice, but so what?

As far as anonymity goes, people whose actual identity is not secret tend to be taken more seriously in discussions; at least, I take them more seriously. I tend to regard the posts of the anonymous as being more frivolous, less worthy of attention, and their opinions of less consequence.

I personally think it is disingenuous to conceal one's teachers, but hey, that's just me. I frankly think that Buddhist boards should have non-anonymity policies. Tried that at Vajracakra, and people were too freaked out to sign up. So we gave it up — market forces prevailed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community - membership question

Content:

Jikan said:

on the topic of the new membership website... I've not found a way to get the system to acknowledge that I'm a member, nor can I find someone to contact about the site. I haven't contacted the gar yet, because I think this is a website issue until proven otherwise. Advice?

Malcolm wrote:

You have to register, then it assigns you a number, and then you can pay your dues.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, July 1st, 2015 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community - membership question

Content:

daelm said:

hi all

I have a quick question - mailed the IDC but no reply. So I thought to ask here.

I live in South Africa and for a few years paid membership to Tsegelgar East, for convenience. I let that lapse a little while ago. Is there now a membership option for people in my position, who'd belong to the IDC, but not to a particular gar?

Regards

d

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is. Since prices have been made uniform, you just pick the gar you want to affiliate with (in your case Dzambu Ling) at the new membership website.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2015 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: No Anonymity.

Content:

Simon E. said:

My first response to that Indrajala is to suggest that the person who made those allegations felt able to do so because of their forum anonymity.

I suspect that the absence of anonymity would cut through such shenanigans like a knife through butter.

Indrajala said:

The forum is publicly visible, so it wouldn't matter that much.

I just wish whoever sent the e-mail had the guts to present themselves rather than hiding behind an anonymous e-mail address.

Malcolm wrote:

If it's any consolation, it wasn't me.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2015 at 8:45 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

rory said:

Sorry I'd meant to post my reply (to a similar thread) in the Mahayana forum. But now i'm quite interested where did the Buddha forbid eating human flesh, and I believe I understand enough from my knowledge of Indian tantra and panchamakara, that human flesh would be fine. So technically then wouldn't it be more compassionate to eat a dead human than various animals?

gassho

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

The Buddha forbade eating human meat as well as the meat of predators in the Vinaya.

For what reason would eating the meat of a dead human be more compassionate than that of an animal?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2015 at 8:38 AM

Title: Re: Fivefold Mahamudra

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

i guess, what i was wondering, was back in the day of phagmodrugpa and jigten sumgon, long before the sadhanas we're familiar with were written, were there people who did their fivefold mahamudra practice with another yidam? such as hevajra, which his holiness is working to preserve and revive currently...

Malcolm wrote:

AFAIK, no. However, I can tell you that Norje Repa in his treatment of 5FMM does not specify a specific Yidam. Rigzin Chokyi Dragpa however, in his commentary on the former text treats it as if Heruka is the deity of 5FMM.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2015 at 8:36 AM

Title: Re: Fivefold Mahamudra

Content:

bryandavis said:

What part of the country or world are you in or what Drikung Lamas do you take teachings from? Just curious.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm sorry, but I don't feel safe saying anything that would identify me or my lamas. For the sake of my lamas, I wouldn't want my negative qualities revealed here to be reflected on them-- and there have been many pointed out.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh come on...this is just arrogant.

Not only that, you already have said plenty that places you in the Southeast, north of Cuba, south of Atlanta, Drikung, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 30th, 2015 at 12:31 AM

Title: Re: Is karma fair?

Content:

Boomerang said:

In other words, do beings deserve the consequences of their karma? My understanding is that buddhadharma is not about things being fair and unfair, because there is no judgment; karma is only a description of reality, not a prescription of how it should be. The only thing Shakyamuni thought beings deserved was to be enlightened, but sadly their karma prevented that from happening.

However, I've heard other Buddhists say that karma is fair and that people deserve the higher realms, lower realms, et cetera, kind of like, "What goes around comes around." It seems lacking in compassion to me. Mahasi Sayadaw used the word "deserve" in this essay on karma, or at least that's how it was translated.

Malcolm wrote:

Karma is not fair or unfair. It is merely the consequences of our intentional actions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: How do you get reborn as a deva/animal in Mahayana?

Content:

Boomerang said:

The word they are translation as "emotion" is klesha. Klesha is best translated as affliction.

Cultivating love and compassion results in birth in the higher realms; once there however, pride overtakes one's mind.

Does this mean most non-Buddhist humans will be reborn as animals, and that everyone who is currently human was previously a stream enterer, made aspiration prayers with bodhicitta, or held right views while being afflicted by desire?

Malcolm wrote:

We cannot say, since we do not know what anyone's karma is, however, there are more beings in lower realms than in higher realms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2015 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activity

Content:

Unknown said:

The study from Mora and the University of Hawaii, Manoa, shifts the way in which climate scientists have been examining the implications of greenhouse emissions. While most have focused on the rapidly warming climate in the Arctic and the effects on wildlife such as polar bears and also sea levels, Mora's team are concerned with the effects on people - specifically the tropics - where the majority of the world's population lives and whose citizens have contributed the least to global warming.

It is in the already warm tropics that an increase of only a couple of degrees can alter the balance of life, crippling crops, spreading disease and leading to mass migration away to cooler climates.

'The warming in the tropics is not as much but we are rather more quickly going to go outside that recent experience of temperature and that is going to be devastating to species and it is probably going to be devastating to people,' said Stuart Pimm, a conservation biologist at Duke University, to

NBC News.

Mora and his colleagues collated global climate models and built an index of estimates on when a given spot on the globe will change beyond temperatures experienced on Earth over the past 150 years between 1860 and 2005.

Malcolm wrote:

Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2451604/Apocalypse-Now-Unstoppable-man-climate-change-reality-end-decade-make-New-York-London-Paris-uninhabitable-45-years-says-new-study.html#ixzz3eStEokkZ>

Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

<http://www.nature.com/articles/nature12540.epdf>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Namkhair Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

mirrormind said:

Just for the record, 1 package of ground meat at the supermarket contains the meat of approximately 150 pigs and 60 cows. This means you can be super efficient as a dzogchen practitioner if you have the intention of creating a good cause for suffering animals by eating their meat.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and ChNN often mentions this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: How do you get reborn as a deva/animal in Mahayana?

Content:

Boomerang said:

The Theravada sources I read tend to say that cultivating a mind of generosity, kindness, and practicing virtue results in rebirth as a deva, while Mahayana sources tersely mention that the minds of devas are dominated by pride. Which is it, and what exactly are people so proud of that results in rebirth as a deva?

They say that rebirth as an animal is due to the emotion of ignorance or confusion. Ignorance isn't an emotion in English, so this confuses me. Does it mean naively holding wrong views? Well technically, doesn't everyone who is not Buddhist hold wrong views? What sort of mind state would result in you being reborn as an animal and not a human?

Malcolm wrote:

The word they are translation as "emotion" is klesha. Klesha is best translated as affliction.

Cultivating love and compassion results in birth in the higher realms; once there however, pride overtakes one's mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 29th, 2015 at 1:50 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I have a Y chromosome and a penis.

Malcolm wrote:

Given gender politics these days, this is far too limiting a definition of what it means to be male.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2015 at 4:06 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Sure. I have karma here though. I have commitments to others. I teach. I help run a dharma center. I have service that I do.

Malcolm wrote:

All the activities of this life are meaningless in every way, like good and bad dreams in one period of sleep.

-- Chetsun Senge Wangchug.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

That's my area of the south.

Malcolm wrote:

Ever think about moving?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 28th, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: SCOTUS Decision

Content:

Tenso said:

I wonder how the southern states are going to react to all of this? I don't really see them taking this sitting down.

Malcolm wrote:

What are they going to do, try again to secede?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: future role of Sakya Trizin what do you think about it?

Content:

ngodrup said:

"Trizin Emeritus."

Malcolm wrote:

Trisur...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 8:07 PM

Title: Re: question on proof

Content:

charles said:

Can one personally prove to oneself that a permanent cessation of suffering is possible?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. Just give up one addiction. When you do, you have proven to your self that a permanent cessation of suffering is possible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Hair empowerment

Content:
ngodrup said:
My teacher definitively allowed for exceptions, saying
"it's not the length of the hair that matters."

Malcolm wrote:
Unless it does.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 7:56 PM
Title: Re: Hair empowerment
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

When I received the Troma Wang from Ngapa Yeshe Dorje, when he came to the hair wang, he said those who could not take the commitment were allowed to apologize.

When I received requested Ngapga vows from KDL, he made it very clear to those of us present that we were not to cut our hair for any reason. However, the hair empowerment connected with the KDL's Krodhakali cycle is much different than the one found in Dudjom Tersar.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 12:14 PM
Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism
Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
ok. above rory asked what the difference was between eating pig meat and human meat at ganacakra and you said human meat was forbidden.

i guess my own understanding was correct then... hmm... i missed something.
i'm curious why human meat is forbidden for ganapuja...

Malcolm wrote:
It isn't. It is one of the meats Buddha forbid in general, along the meat of predators and so on.
Rory is not a vajrayana person, she was not asking about ganapujas.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 11:16 AM
Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism
Content:
Urgyen Dorje said:
i'm curious why human meat is forbidden for ganapuja...

Malcolm wrote:

It isn't. It is one of the meats Buddha forbade in general, along the meat of predators and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is because they are man eaters. Rakṣasa in fact refer to the australio-asians who plagued the sea routes between Indonesia and Madagascar and all islands in-between.

Also cannibal tribes living the Himalayas were referred to by this name.

Mother's Lap said:

What are the differences in character between rakshasas and yakshas in general?

Malcolm wrote:

Different class of being. The latter are spirits, the former are human cannibals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 7:13 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

rory said:

if you belong to some kind of lineage where those with samaya are told to eat meat, that is what I meant. Simply that.

what is the difference between dead pigmeat and dead humanmeat?

gassho

Rory

Malcolm wrote:

The former is not forbidden, the latter is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

pemachophel said:

Flesh from [someone] born a Brahmin seven times, anyone?

Malcolm wrote:

I know a guy...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Boomerang said:

Are devas food for other devas?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are not, just as humans are not food for other humans.

Mother's Lap said:

When they say rakshasas are cannibals, does it mean they eat each other or just because they're man-eaters?

Malcolm wrote:

It is because they are man eaters. Rakṣasa in fact refer to the australio-asians who plagued the sea routes between Indonesia and Madagascar and all islands in-between.

Also cannibal tribes living the Himalayas were referred to by this name.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 4:52 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Boomerang said:

Are devas food for other devas?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are not, just as humans are not food for other humans.

kirtu said:

Well historically and even today, humans are food for some other humans.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, cannibals don't eat other humans for nutrition, but for power.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 27th, 2015 at 2:31 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Norwegian said:

And Urgyen Dorje, Malcolm didn't say people were hassled and pushed out of the Dzogchen Community. He said some people have left ChNN and the community due to their putting more importance on their dietary preferences, rather than the precious instructions of their own guru.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I don't doubt that there's some grasping at dietary preferences.

But I've been at this for 25 years, I'll be there's some self-appointed samaya cops in the sangha giving people crap. I've yet to find a sangha that didn't have such guardians....

Malcolm wrote:

Not about eating meat...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

What is true is that people have gotten the idea that Garchen Rinpoche was called out here.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, that is their problem for listening to hearsay.

What is true is that many Lams do not accept to idea of internet transmissions at all, and so they do not do them. Many of these same Lamas might not accept these transmissions given by ChNN, Garchen Rinpoche and so on as valid.

But what no one accepts is that one may receive an empowerment from a recording.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Garchen Rinpoche never said one should go to video archived empowerments and get the wang that way.

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, some of Garchen Rinpoche's students have been claiming that Garchen Rinpoche asserts that empowerments can be obtained this way.

You will note that no one has ever slighted, belittled or accused Garchen Rinpoche of doing anything negative at all. All focus has been on the misconceptions promulgated (no doubt with a sincere motivation) by people other than him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What Norbu Rinpoche says is that Dzogchen practitioners who choose not to eat meat "out of compassion", when there are methods available, are practicing miserable compassion. He is not talking about Chinese Mahāyānists and so on.

srivijaya said:

Is it a requirement for his disciples to eat meat? Just wondering how that would work if a vegetarian joined the ranks of his followers. Would the person be instructed to start eating meat in order to practice greater compassion?

Malcolm wrote:

Much to the discomfort some of them, yes. There are some people who have left the community over the issue. Their loss.

ChNN does not tell people individually, "You must eat meat." He does however bring up the issue with great frequency and much vehemence. This vehemence made the OP uncomfortable. He is not telling people merely that they should not refuse meat during ganapujas. He is critiquing in general the idea that Dzogchen practitioners should refrain from eating meat and presents the opposite point of view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 10:06 PM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Boomerang said:

Are devas food for other devas?

Malcolm wrote:

No, they are not, just as humans are not food for other humans.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 3:43 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

If empowerment by live webcast is not a problem, then how did Garchen Rinpoche even get evoked in this matter?

Malcolm wrote:

Because some people have the crazy idea that Garchen Rinpoche endorses the idea that people can receive empowerments from recordings of empowerments posted on Youtube.

They promoted this idea, and continue to do so, and were very angry that I negated this idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lhasa said:

Malcolm.... Shaming doesn't work on me.

Malcolm wrote:

I never shamed you. I did say that your statement was ridiculous (which it is).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

It's easier to just go out somewhere and let everyone deal with their own needs.

I know I've had friends over and I've had to juggle the fact that Sue is vegetarian, except for wild caught salmon, but she's gluten free, and can't eat nightshades... while Billy is paleo, and only eats free range beef and leafy greens... and Betty is macrobiotic... and then...

Malcolm wrote:

Maybe, but it is easier to feed Billy than Sue or Betty.

Indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

It seems to have spilled over into the dharma.

I know I've had friends over and I've had to juggle the fact that Sue is vegetarian, except for wild caught salmon, but she's gluten free, and can't eat nightshades... while Billy is paleo, and only eats free range beef and leafy greens... and Betty is macrobiotic... and then...

Malcolm wrote:

This a peculiarly American madness.

Maybe, but it is easier to feed Billy than Sue or Betty.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I know I've had friends over and I've had to juggle the fact that Sue is vegetarian, except for wild caught salmon, but she's gluten free, and can't eat nightshades... while Billy is paleo, and only eats free range beef and leafy greens... and Betty is macrobiotic... and then...

Malcolm wrote:

This a peculiarly American madness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 26th, 2015 at 12:38 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So you accept your involvement in the wholesale killing of sentient beings to bring plant-based food to your table?

I don't think you got the point I was making.

srivijaya said:

Ditto.

...that those who choose not to are practicing "miserable compassion".

Malcolm wrote:

What Norbu Rinpoche says is that Dzogchen practitioners who choose not to eat meat "out of compassion", when there are methods available, are practicing miserable compassion. He is not talking about Chinese Mahāyānists and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 10:16 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

This has caused a lot of people a lot of suffering.

Malcolm wrote:

Suffering of their own making.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

... but I do know that many people have understood threads on Dharma Wheel to be calling Garchen Rinpoche out for corrupting the vajrayana, leading students astray, and so on, by offering live webcast empowerments.

Malcolm wrote:

That has never been an issue, not even once. How things become corrupted by gossip, that no one can control.

The issue was that some people had the mistaken idea that they could watch a video recording of an empowerment that had already happened in the past (i.e. one that they had missed) and receive empowerment from it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 9:04 PM

Title: Re: The Mahayana idea of karma and vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm not calling you out, Malcolm, but I too would like clarification about your comment that Chatral Rinpoche is speaking to non-practitioners.

This is somewhat relevant for me, as some close dharma friends follow the tradition of Chatral-la, Shabkar, Patrul and so on, and they're pretty serious about the vegetarian thing, and they too point to Chatral Rinpoche and his family. I also have close dharma friends who follow the tradition held by your teacher, Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche, whom I also consider a teacher from webcast transmissions, who follows the traditional view that eating animals benefits them.

-- UD

Malcolm wrote:

Norbu Rinpoche insists that the point of view on meat-eating expressed by Shabkar, Nyal Pema Duddul and so on are aimed at non-practitioners. This is where I derive my opinion. This is why he says again and again, if you are a common Mahāyāna practitioner, you should not eat meat. But if you are a Dzogchen practitioner, you should eat (some) meat. You also should drink (some) alcohol.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 9:02 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

pemachophel said:

"Chatral Rinpoche is speaking to non-practitioners."

Loppon-la, where are you getting this idea about Kyabje Chatral Rinpoche? If this teaching is only for non-practitioners, why is He so personally insistent on not eating meat? When I used to prescribe Chinese medicines for Him, even these had to be free of any animal ingredients. His whole family are vegetarians, His entire retinue. These people are some pretty heavy-hitting practitioners. Are you saying Seymo Saraswati Rinpoche is not a practitioner, Khandro Kamala is not a practitioner?

I've eaten in His house with Him and His family a number of times. No one is eating meat.

Malcolm wrote:

I understand that Chatral Rinpoche is himself a strict vegetarian and teetotaler since the time he was 48, I believe.

But here, Chatral Rinpoche is setting an example for people who are not really practitioners (and I am excluding his family, close entourage). It is understandable. Most Tibetans are not really Dzogchen practitioners. That is the context in which you need to understand both mine and ChNN's statements.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 8:53 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lhasa said:

I've been given practice instructions for a personal retreat, permissions for practice texts and how to use mantras etc., affirmation that I did receive an empowerment over a live webcast, directly from him. So he responds to requests for help.

Malcolm wrote:

No one ever said empowerments over live webcast were invalid, did they? The key word here is "live." What has been under question is the notion that one can receive transmissions and empowerments from recordings.

Lhasa said:

One last comment, people who have had in-person contact with their Teachers, cannot give valid information on the internet-only relationship between Lamas and their students.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry, but this is statement is just as ridiculous as it is untrue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

srivijaya said:

If one eats the flesh of sentient beings, then fine but at least concede some minuscule involvement in the process which involves the rearing, slaughter and sale of their flesh (it's called supply and demand).

Malcolm wrote:

So you accept your involvement in the wholesale killing of sentient beings to bring plant-based food to your table?

srivijaya said:

Sure being a vegetarian isn't the magic wand to end suffering that its more stridently irritating advocates would have us believe. This is samsara after all and there are limits to what is achievable. But in the end, we are Buddhists and in possession of some oddly unique "facts" (if we accept them as such). Facts like all sentient beings have been our mothers (or other relatives) in past lives. This puts a different perspective on eating their flesh - one which we can perhaps ignore if it gets in the way of our enjoyment.

Malcolm wrote:

All sentient beings certainly have been our mothers, so think of that when you blithely fork that broccoli into your mouth, feeling all smug about being a vegetarian, because it is a certainty that countless sentient beings have been killed in the process of providing you with that morsel.

srivijaya said:

I choose not to use my stomach as a digestive unit for the cadavers of slain mother beings. Does that qualify as "miserable compassion" in someone's opinion? No idea and why should anyone care? It's the volitional opt-out I'm comfortable to live by.

Malcolm wrote:

No, you simply choose to leave the cadavers unthought of in the fields and factories after they have been poisoned, crushed, maimed and so on, without giving them a second thought because your food, so you believe, is free from the taint of the death of millions upon millions of creatures.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 7:20 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

It's all triggered by bringing cold cuts and wine to a ganapuja.

I have no respect for Buddhist culture. I have no respect for Asian culture. I wouldn't understand because I'm an American. Americans don't have any morals, any ethics. I've broken my vows. I need to confess. I've created obstacles for the lama. Blah blah blah blah.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is complete bullshit, why bother to associate with such children?

Dharma centers are just places which foster delusion. I avoid them. Dharmawheel is quite bad enough already...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 7:07 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

KeithBC said:

Thank you all for illustrating my point so effectively: that people get defensive when they encounter something that calls their values into question. That is the source of most of the denial on the climate change issue.

Om mani padme hum

Keith

Malcolm wrote:

I am not defensive — people without or not faith in methods should not eat meat.

Dan74 said:

It appears that even within the tradition, there are different views (cf Norbu Rinpoche and Chatral Rinpoche), so is it more the faith in one's root teacher then?

Malcolm wrote:

I already explained this, it is audience. Chatral Rinpoche is speaking to non-practitioners.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 7:05 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

See, dig, Malcolm is a loppon.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, I don't wear a badge, and most people have no idea. I just don't take shit from anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 6:33 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I out myself and declare my mongrel pedigree in advance.

I spoke as an inji convert in this thread because I've been stopped at the door of a ganapuja by Asian Buddhists more than once and lectured about my lack of respect for "Buddhist culture" for bringing meat or alcohol, only to have the lama or choppon wave me in. Only to have some matronly old lady lecture me every time i see her about Buddhist values.

Malcolm wrote:

No one would dare lecture me about anything because they know they will get a mouthful in return.

"Damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead!"

-- Admiral David Farragut.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 5:48 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I will abstain from using "inji convert" in a more general context. I'll need to find a better way to describe "non-Tibetan non-Asian Euro-Americans who picked this thing up not from their families".

Malcolm wrote:

"Buddhist" works quite nicely. As I said, no one emerges from their mother's womb recite the Refuge to the Triple Gem. Everyone who is a Dharma practitioner has to receive refuge somehow in some way from someone.

Either no one is a Buddhist convert, or everyone is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

KeithBC said:

Thank you all for illustrating my point so effectively: that people get defensive when they encounter something that calls their values into question. That is the source of most of the denial on the climate change issue.

Om mani padme hum

Keith

Malcolm wrote:

I am not defensive — people without or not faith in methods should not eat meat.

Tenso said:

Hinayanists don't have any so called "methods." Are they wrong to eat meat?

Malcolm wrote:

They may eat meat that is pure in three ways. But they are not helping anyone.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 4:47 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

So if a Tibetan friend says, yo, inji, you want to help me paint these tormas, I should be calling him or her out as being a racist, like a person of color being called a ni@@er?

Malcolm wrote:

"Inji convert" = "less than an authentic, red-blooded Tibetan."

You can just tell them you don't like that word. If they persist, you can tell them it is racist.

Tibetans have a word for Americans, Aripa. They use it when they are talking about Americans, etc. For example, KDL did not call me an Inji Loppon, he called me an Ari Loppon.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 4:41 AM
Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism
Content:
Urgyen Dorje said:
I
So educate away.

Malcolm wrote:
"Inji convert" = "less than an authentic, red-blooded Tibetan."

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 4:37 AM
Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")
Content:
haha said:
]
I heard CNNR said that he was given all the empowerments before he arrived to his root master and that was in his master dream; he did not believe that and asked for the empowerment. It is really difficult to believe because one cannot verify it through sutra or tantra.

Malcolm wrote:
Not all the empowerments. One empowerment.

In any case, before ChNN arrived at Rigzin Chanchub Dorje's, he had received thousands of empowerments.

This is an interesting case. It is an example of how what might be true in the dimension of an awakened person will not match the impure vision of those of us who are not awake. And this is why we work with methods in a proper way according to how they are taught in the tantras.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 3:48 AM
Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism
Content:
Fortyeightvows said:
Take it easy.
Is the other thread on vegetarianism this nuts?
Every language has its slurs and it is generally considered low class to use them. In my experience this is at least true in some Asian cultures as well as in America where I live. Remember that this forum is not just used by 'convert Buddhists'.
Also I don't know what type of 'Asian sanghas' you've been to. You can always remind them that the Buddha wasn't Chinese!

I actually say very often that a lot of people can't correctly separate between chinese culture and buddhism, can't tell where one ends and the other begins. It's a shame really.

And I don't know about 'most asians' either.... but then, I don't know about 'most americans' either so....

Malcolm wrote:

There is no question most Americans do not know jack shit about Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 3:32 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Dude. I don't know why you're hammering on me calling me narrow-minded, xenophobic, and racist.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not calling you out, I am pointing that, rather bizarrely, you are catering to Tibetan racist, xenophobic exceptionalism.

I simply pointed out the term inji was racist, and that I take exception to it. You on the other hand have proclaimed your willingness to embrace the term, belittling though it is in fact.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I actually reported that I have encountered people of Asian descent who claimed the uniqueness of Asian Buddhist culture and that as such I'm an outsider. If you want to call anything xenophobic and racist, call THAT out, not ME.

Malcolm wrote:

I am calling that out, and not you. However by calling yourself a dharma mutt, a convert and so on, you cater to their misperceptions. Most Asians you have met do not know jack shit about Dharma even though they are born in "Buddhist" families.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 3:16 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Don't tell me what my experience is and is not.

On e-sangha and in meat space I've been called out quite a few times, primarily by Asian Buddhists, by generalizing my experience and not specifying that I'm a mutt American convert.

Malcolm wrote:

Asians don't own Buddhadharma. I won't cater to their narrow-mindedness, xenophobia and racism where it exists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

How do you come off calling me a racist?

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say you were a racist, but you are making excuses for Tibetan racism.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 2:13 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

tomamundsen said:

Is this the best mantra to use with live animals as well? Say you are hiking in the woods and there are all kinds of animals around. Is it best to keep reciting these six syllables? Or would some other practice be more effective?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is the BEST mantra in every respect since it is also the condensed version of song of the vajra. Plus, at least in the DC, it has a very nice melody.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The best mantra to use is the six syllables of Samantabhadra.

Boomerang said:

A A Ha Sha Sa Ma? A Ah Sha Sa Ma Ha? Is that for Dzogchen practitioners or for everybody? Are you supposed to say it 3, 7, 21 times, or just once?

Malcolm wrote:

Both versions are correct. You can say it once or as many times as you like.

When you say it to animals, also it creates a good cause.

It is in fact the Buddhas of the six realms in the form of syllables.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 25th, 2015 at 12:50 AM

Title: Re: Meat Eating Mantras

Content:

Boomerang said:

I've seen Buddhist organizations post various mantras online that allow you to bless meat before eating it so that your negative karma is diminished and you benefit the animal. The way the mantras are put out in the open gives me the impression that anyone can use them without transmission. Even Sravasti Abbey, which is a vegetarian institution, posted a meat eating mantra on their website.

Am I correct in thinking that these mantras are okay for any person to compassionately use while eating meat? The mani mantra is one of them. Can a person use any old mantra to bless the meat of dead animals?

And if it really is so simple for lay people to make a good connection dead animals, why do some Tibetan Buddhists act like these methods don't exist? Is it a sectarian thing?

<http://thubtenchodron.org/2010/04/recitations-morning/>

<http://www.drukpachoegon.info/rinpoche-teachings/audios/mantra-to-bless-meat-before-eating.aspx> https://fpmt.org/wp-content/uploads/education/teachings/texts/mantras/various_mantras_everyday_dharmaC5.pdf?4e84cd

Malcolm wrote:

The best mantra to use is the six syllables of Samantabhadra.

Some of these "mantras" are dharanis, which come from sūtra and thus require no transmission.

Boomerang said:

And if it really is so simple for lay people to make a good connection dead animals, why do some Tibetan Buddhists act like these methods don't exist? Is it a sectarian thing?

Malcolm wrote:

Lack of confidence in themselves as well as the teachings.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 11:58 PM
Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism
Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
If I don't qualify what I say about dharma with being a mutt, I'm stepping on somebody.

Malcolm wrote:
Bullshit.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 11:56 PM
Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")
Content:

pael said:
Is it om benza sato hung? Just that. Without any other prayers, visualizations, etc?
With four powers?
So I can do short mantra without lung?

Malcolm wrote:
Yes. It is included in lung for long mantra. With four powers.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 11:51 PM
Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism
Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
They have a culture I'm an outsider to. And I'm good with that. I respect that.

Malcolm wrote:
Buddhadharma is not a "culture."

Urgyen Dorje said:
Political correctness can go to heck.

Malcolm wrote:
The term "inji" is racist, just like the term "nigger", "kike", "hebe", "wetback", "chink", "dago", "ofay", "casper", "pollock", "jap", "kraut", "jerry", and so on. You sound like an African American who says, "Oh, it's ok that my white friend calls me "nigger" since he is real nice to me."

The term "inji" is very offensive, and I make sure Tibetans I know understand this.

Urgyen Dorje said:

As for "revert" and "convert" and all that, I wasn't trying to make a rigorous philosophical point. I'm just trying to find a word that distinguishes me from somebody who was born into a Buddhist cultural and religious life form one that has not.

Malcolm wrote:

As I pointed out, you were born into it. There is no other way it can be.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

paël said:

I try follow.

I thought if there is some shorter/simpler method to purify samaya? Like om mani peme hung.

I fear long recitation is threat to my health. I have genetic disease.

It wasn't my original intention to start daily recitation practice when I took initiation. But I heard it included samaya. Without regular practice commitment.

Malcolm wrote:

Do short Vajrasattva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Hair empowerment

Content:

Lingpupa said:

Some Nyingma empowerments have a large number of subsidiary parts: the dorje empowerment, the bell empowerment, the shawl empowerment, the earring empowerment and so on. There can be dozens of them. One possibility is the "hair" empowerment in which the disciple is "empowered" and committed to never cut their hair again. Just like monks and nuns shave their heads as a sign of renunciation, so the long hair of the dzogchen yogi is worn as a sign of the disciple's commitment to leaving their mind in its natural state.

My tip would be to avoid it unless you are very sure, as you may find, perhaps some years down the line, that you want or need to look more conventional again.

Malcolm wrote:

Seconded. You have to be very sure you can follow this samaya before you take it.

However, it is not so much about looks. Long hair can be conventional, but here you are not allowed to trim your hair or cut it, so if you get knots in your hair that you cannot comb out, well, you have to leave them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 10:53 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

paël said:

But I have not heard entire Longchen Nyingthig Vajrasattva sadhana. They e-mailed me I should do it.

I am not sure may I do it. It has six syllable Vajrasattva also. I have not heard it.

If I recite 100,000 times 100-syllables samaya gets purified? Are there other methods (sutra methods or others) to purify broken samayas?

Malcolm wrote:

You can do it. Or if you have some doubt, go get the lung for any ngondro you think you like, and do that one.

In the meantime, you can just follow instructions in Words of my Perfect teacher. Ok?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Given that it's a corruption of "english" it's hard to see how it's racist.

Malcolm wrote:

It's racist because it is applied to all foreigners.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Not to bust chops, but you could make the case that it is xenophobic, but not racist.

Malcolm wrote:

Its racist. I don't know if you have ever been subjected to Tibetan racism. I have. It's like calling all people of African heritage "niggers." Tibetans have another word for that, and it is equally racist.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Yes. There is similar language used in Islam. People who adopt the faith use the term "revert" instead of "convert" to mean returning to a former condition of belief. I guess I could say I'm a Buddhist revert based on your reasoning.

Malcolm wrote:

No, also that is not the same thing. We have a precious human birth. This means we created causes in the past to meet the Dharma in this life. It matters not one wit whether one is born into a nominally Buddhist family or not. There are plenty of people born to Buddhist parents who do not pursue the path, even nominally.

Urgyen Dorje said:

In common discussion, to distinguish Buddhists who adopted the faith (in this life) versus those who were born into it (in this life), what is the accepted terminology for communicative ease?

Malcolm wrote:

There is none. By your reasoning, everyone is a convert to Buddhism. No one is born with refuge in the Triple Gem.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 10:21 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

paël said:

I have taken Amitayus initiation from Konchog Chidu. I think I have broken many samayas. They didn't gave any daily commitment. I have got from them Shakyamuni sadhana and Vajrasattva sadhana. I have been in Shakyamuni sadhana recitation session and heard 100-syllable mantra at Dharma lecture, not entire sadhana. Is these accounted as lung?

How then I purify other samaya breakages? I have not done any preliminaries. Not outer, not inner.

I am confused.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. These count as lung.

So you have the lung for Vajrasattva. Normally, you should accumulate 100,000.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 10:15 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Given that it's a corruption of "english" it's hard to see how it's racist.

Malcolm wrote:

It's racist because it is applied to all foreigners of white skin. It is also used disparagingly by Tibetans.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Given that I've only heard it used with friends, it's hard to see it as disparaging. Given that a "convert" is somebody who has undergone "conversion"-- the decisive adoption of a religion, as opposed to being born into it-- it's hard to see how using that term is nonsense.

Malcolm wrote:

Do you believe in rebirth? In that case, it is impossible to be a convert to Dharma. We followers of Buddhadharma were all born into the Dharma based on past life causes and conditions.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Let me know the accepted way to refer to "Euro-American people who took up Buddhism but weren't born into it" then...

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I call myself an "inji convert" because that's Tibetans and Tibetan lamas have referred to people like myself.

Malcolm wrote:

Its a racist term. The idea that we are "converts" is also nonsense.

I am not an "inji", I am an American. I am also not a convert.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I think it's useful to appreciate that there are subtexts woven through this subject. It's clear to me that inji converts to vajrayana are responding to a variety of issues, as are contemporary lamas, all of which stand outside the skillful means of the vajrayana. Quite bluntly, at least in America, we've gone insane when it comes to food, in particular animal products. It's the only time in human history that people intentionally drive animals into various disease states only to eat them. It's a far cry from hunting-gathering, and it's a far cry from culling herd-stocks from a local microecology. It's really a form of madness. It's also an American thing to feel that we're malnourished unless our whole alimentary canal is full of red meat, which is another form of madness, and simultaneously a health and environmental crisis. Whether the response of vegetarian ganapuja's is the proper response is really up to individuals and their lamas IMHO, but I think it's best to be realistic and honest that people are responding to this issue of meat eating along multiple axes...

Malcolm wrote:

First of all, why are you using the racist, belittling term, inji?

Secondly, there are no "converts" to Buddhism.

Of course people are responding to this issue along a variety of axes. I am merely clarifying the principles enunciated by Chogyal Namkhai Norbu and Dzogchen teachings (Do you have any idea of how many kinds of meat are recommended for Chulen in the sgra thal gyur tantra?)

Meat and dairy consumption is rising world wide because, frankly, meat and dairy based diets are more nutritionally dense than solely plant-based diets and people become larger and more powerful when they rely on them. When they enter the middle class, of course they want more meat in their diets. Of course this brings a range of health issues into play.

But here the discussion mainly revolves around a discomfited response to ChNN's teachings. We can discuss side issues, but lets keep it a little focused, ok?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Dzogchen Community of Chogyal Namkhai Norbu

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

1) First you have to know Lam Rim to compare, and I know Lam Rim, there isn't any "Lam Rim" lacking in CHNN's teachings, in other words, all of deepest levels of Lam Rim are fulfilled in the Dzogchen teachings of CHNN, but you have to know what you are looking for. If you want straight up traditional teachers to learn Lam Rim there are many, for example, step by step here: <http://thubtenchodron.org/1991/04/stages-path-enlightenment-intro/> but if you know the teachings, and you hear CHNN year in and out, you will see that Dzogchen path fulfills and explains the essence of all the Lam Rim teachings. Also remember that CHNN is a Dzogchen master, he is coming at those very topics from that view, therefore the answer to your question lies in the path itself. That path is where you will see differences and similarities to a highly traditional approach, but there is nothing on this path that goes contrary to those teachings, rather it fulfills those teachings quite completely. Remember CHNN was trained thoroughly and completely in Lam Rim, he has both an extensive Kagyu background and Sakyapa background and knows the Lam Rim well, he could easily compare back and forth topic by topic point by point how Dzogchen path does not lack the essence of the Lam Rim. Quite frankly many of the teachers in Dzoghchen community and beyond can explain this, an in depth answer could fill many pages.

2) Yes, there are many places like this, both in the USA and all over the world. If you are in the USA toward the East Coast you could visit Conway Ma. this summer when CHNN is there, and meet members of the Dzogchen community and learn some practices in person. <http://tsegyalgar.org/localcenters/tsegyalgareast/>

chimechodra said:

Thank you very much for your answers, it is much appreciated! Regarding the Lam Rim question, that was my sense of it from what I've seen in researching this question. I figured someone as incredibly well trained as ChNN would not miss such vital points, and above all wants to present the teachings in a way that would bring us the most benefit. And regarding the second point, thank you, that's good to know! I'm trying to see if I can request the time off from work to go and experience that retreat, even if it's for one day in order to receive transmission in person. Looking forward to the possibility of that happening!

Malcolm wrote:

His book, the Precious Vase, is an example of a Lam Rim text.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

pael said:

I have seen&read few lines of Guhyagarbha tantra on web. Is it bad karma? How to purify it?

Malcolm wrote:

Seeing a few lines of a tantra here and there will not harm you. But taking a tantra reading it from cover to cover if you do have at least one major empowerment is not a good thing. In general, it is better to have the lung, but at least one must have a wang.

pael said:

Can breakage of samaya be purified with Vajrasattva without lung? If not, how it can be purified?

Malcolm wrote:

You cannot break samaya if you have never received empowerment or Dzogchen transmission because you do not have it.

But you can cause problems between you and the teachings if you try to read things for which you have no authority. In this case, it is sufficient to understand that you have made a mistake. That is purification enough.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No. In my ideal world, animals would not be slaughtered at all. There are many ways to benefit animals through the six liberations while they are alive as well. Unfortunately, it is not likely I can have contact with those who wind up before me on my plate before they are slaughtered/fished, and so therefore I use the methods available to me to help as I can.

anjali said:

Agreed. In an ideal world no animals would be slaughtered. Your answer helps me refine my question.

Sadly, we don't live in an ideal world. Vajrayana practitioners live in a world where so many animals are slaughtered for consumption. Given that fact, would the most compassionate diet possible be one where every bite we take is making a connection with a slaughtered animal?

Yes, I know this is going to an extreme, but I'm not being flippant. Just pushing the envelope to get at the full implication that eating meat with right view benefits the consumed animal. Followed to its logical conclusion, it would seem to imply that the most ethical/compassionate diet for a vajrayana practitioner living in today's world should be an exclusively meat-eating diet?

Malcolm wrote:

Every bite we take is already connected with a slaughtered animal down to every piece of lettuce. Therefore, the most ethical and compassionate diet is to understand that every thing we eat involves the death of some creature somewhere, somehow.

The principle of Buddhadharma is avihimsa, non-harming. But there is very little we can do in the world control the harm of the kind of wide spread agriculture and other related industries do to the world and the living creatures in it, both sentient and non-sentient. We cannot control other human beings, all we can do is control ourselves, refrain from harming others, and try to benefit those who have been harmed by any means possible. When someone who has received Dzogchen teachings refuses to eat meat when it is offered to them, or in a puja, they are effectively deciding not to help some being that has been harmed. In this case, not eating meat harms compassion.

Since we are not Jains nor followers of Devadatta, we do not believe that karma is an automatic non-volitional force that comes from every act that we engage in. Karma only comes from any intentional act in which we engage.

Also we have a responsibility to ourselves. We must eat meat when it is indicated for our health. There are, in both Ayurveda and Tibetan medicine, many forms of meat, many kinds of animal products, that are used regularly. The reason we do not use regular Tibetan incense for Nāgā pujas is because in general Tibetan incense contains musk, which is harmful and offensive to Nāgās. Also we must not eat too much of any one thing, because this will cause our humors to become unbalanced. So the principle of nonharming includes not harming ourselves, and that extends to our diets.

As in everything, there are limits to our capacity. So we do what we can, always wish we could do more and never lose our focus of compassion for all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

naljor said:

I also believe in the necessity of live transmission, but there is something very interesting - http://www.khordong.de/alt/Engl/rand_e.html - recorded lung for text in the book BEING RIGHT THERE by Chimed Rigdzin Rinpoche.

Malcolm wrote:

yes, it is a recording. No possibility of receiving transmission from it. Plus, there are plenty of living people who have the real lung. Get it from them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 4:54 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

kashmir said:

Lets put this to rest now. If one has a tantric initiation and commitments it explains in the fourteen common tantric root downfalls that : "Not relying properly on the subastnces that bond us closely to tantric practice (such as consider as nauseating the consecrated alcohol and meat tasted specifically in periodic offering ceremonies known as tsog pujas, to refuse them on the grounds of being a teetotaler or a vegetarian, or alternatively, to take them in large quantities with gusto and attachment." and who said you were unenlightened?

Malcolm wrote:

The vow actually specifies refusing samaya articles only. You are supposed to enjoy them with gusto, but without attachment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 2:34 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

anjali said:

This is my primary motivation for eating meat, all other things aside.

If we follow this reasoning to it's logical conclusion, would you agree that your ideal diet (not considering health issues) would be exclusively carnivorous, and from as many different animals as possible? The reasoning being that one would want to create good causes for as many animals as possible, and that would entail eating as much meat as possible from as many different animals as possible? I'm not being confrontational here. I'm sincerely curious as to the full implications of this position.

Malcolm wrote:

No. In my ideal world, animals would not be slaughtered at all. There are many ways to benefit animals through the six liberations while they are alive as well. Unfortunately, it is not likely I can have contact with those who wind up before me on my plate before they are slaughtered/fished, and so therefore I use the methods available to me to help as I can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

pael said:

I have seen&read few lines of Guhyagarbha tantra on web. Is it bad karma? How to purify it?

Malcolm wrote:

Seeing a few lines of a tantra here and there will not harm you. But taking a tantra reading it from cover to cover if you do have at least one major empowerment is not a good thing. In general, it is better to have the lung, but at least one must have a wang.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

pael said:

How about tantras translated to english, example Hevajra tantra? May you read it? Without initiation? Someone is selling Hevajra tantra

Malcolm wrote:

In fact, you may not, if you wish to follow the rules.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 24th, 2015 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

KeithBC said:

Thank you all for illustrating my point so effectively: that people get defensive when they encounter something that calls their values into question. That is the source of most of the denial on the climate change issue.

Om mani padme hum
Keith

Malcolm wrote:

I am not defensive — people without or not faith in methods should not eat meat.

As far as industrial agriculture goes, CAFO's and so on, this is pernicious in the extreme.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 11:33 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If faith were sufficient to receive an empowerment, one could just hit oneself on the head with any book one wants to practice and that would be sufficient. But it does not work like that.

smcj said:

The point of my post was basically to reiterate what Garchen R. said, which is that without faith even an in-person initiation is invalid. How much more so over the internet?

Malcolm wrote:

If you had no faith, why would you go?

If a guru gives empowerment to someone who has no faith, they break their own commitments.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 11:24 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

smcj said:

From where I sit the gist of the entire issue comes down to; do I personally have enough confidence in a specific wong I have received to invest myself in a retreat on that practice? Because if the wong was not valid I will be wasting my time, no fruit will come.

As such, the question for me personally is really moot. Up until now I have not done long retreats on any practice, so what does it matter? And if I do decide to go do a retreat somewhere, I've got all the in-person wongs I could ever need. So for me I can happily participate on internet Dharma all day long and presumably it will be only of some benefit. I don't have to actually rely on any of it. I liken it to the idea behind prayer flags, which is that the mantras and prayers on the flags get blown downwind and spread their blessings that way. Only instead of the wind the blessings "blown" all over the planet via the internet. Why not?

For those that are isolated and have to rely on internet Dharma as the basis for their practice, I suggest that they do a little study of how "faith" comes into play for an initiation. The prevailing internet culture, and even the prevailing modern in-person Dharma culture, adamantly insists that faith is not required in Buddhism. In contrast to that, Garchen R. has said that without faith even an in-person wong is ineffective. This needs to be understood and not rationalized or re-defined in such a way as to accommodate our modern preconditions for Dharma.

Malcolm wrote:

Faith is a necessary condition, but not sufficient. There is no need to cite Drikung Kagyu texts which insist on empowerments being given in the proper way, since they just agree with everything said already.

If faith were sufficient to receive an empowerment, one could just hit oneself on the head with any book one wants to practice and that would be sufficient. But it does not work like that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

KeithBC said:

Thoughtful analysis, Ugyen Dorje, and probably correct. One additional bias that contributes to the problem is an avoidance of personal responsibility.

If people want to believe that they are inherently good people, then they will reject any suggestion that their actions can contribute to any harmful outcome. "If I am a good person, then I can't be contributing to a global catastrophe. Therefore any carbon dioxide my actions generate cannot be contributing to global warming. Therefore the scientists must be wrong."

This same avoidance of guilt happens with other topics, too. I see it all the time on the topic of vegetarianism (including on this forum).

Om mani padme hum

Keith

Malcolm wrote:

In the case of climate change, the issue isn't eat meat/don't eat meat, the issue is industrialized food production. For example, why are most tomatoes round? Answer: hamburgers.

In order to farm with organic inputs, animals are a requirement, not an option. Otherwise, we just continue our dependence on petro-chemical based farming.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 10:44 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

All very good advice, unfortunately, it has nothing do with the question at hand. The question at hand is how to properly enter into the training Tulku Orgyen is talking about. So this topic is not mere criticism for criticism's sake.

Lhasa said:

TULKU URGYEN

Extract from a Teaching.

Pure Perception:

"Vajrayana in general is training in pure perception—Dzogchen is even much more so.

How can you call yourself a practitioner of Dzogchen if you spend your time defaming, finding fault with or criticizing others? Maintain the view of pure sight, sound and awareness. This is how samsara and nirvana actually are, pervaded by the three kayas or three vajras. Sentient beings might not be aware of their Buddha Nature, but they are nevertheless endowed with the three kayas.

You need to train in pure perception by accepting and respecting the three kayas in everyone. Great masters do perceive all sights, sound and cognitive activity as infinite purity. Once recognition of awareness is stabilized, there is no more impurity to be perceived.

Train in this by thinking: "As the Buddha Nature pervades all beings, not a single being is unsuitable." The more you respect Buddha Nature in others and train in pure perception, the more your own practice will progress.

Slandering beings is slandering Buddha nature; stop doing that. If due to your own impurity you perceive mistakes in other beings, at least do not voice them.

If your awareness practice is too weak to sustain pure perception naturally, try to develop a rapport within an intellectual understanding of Buddha Nature in others. Know that your impure perception of others only happens either because you have not recognized genuine awareness, or because that recognition is not developed. Criticizing and slandering others puts you out of tune with the enlightened essence.

You mainly harm yourself. The most unrealized so-called practitioner of Dzogchen can at least keep his or her mouth shut, even if he can not actually maintain the view.

A deceitful person sees everybody with suspicion and finds many mistakes in others. A pure person naturally perceives others to be good. How much more so does a perfect yogin or yogini. He or she has the perception of infinite purity. They will actually perceive all forms as the bodies of the deities, all sounds as mantra, and all thoughts and emotions as the display of awareness.

In their perception of pure sight, sound and awareness there is no attachment to friends, or aversion to enemies. Awareness itself being free from concepts of good and bad, proper and improper, they perceive everything as great equanimity. They do not accept or reject friends or foes. They perceive not the tiniest speck of impurity.

As is said, "Arriving at a golden island, one cannot find ordinary earth or stones even if one searches for them." In general, good and bad are your own perception, so you cannot possibly see faults in others when your own are purified."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The six liberations are peaceful methods, and involve creating good causes for sentient beings to meet the teachings in the future through sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and memory using various visual mantras, incenses made according to special recipes, pills, and so on.

Basically, when one uses the methods of creating good causes, all of those animals that one consumes in future lives will take rebirth as one's students when oneself becomes an awakened being. This is why the anarchist's objections are based on a faulty premise.

Tsongkhapa said:

If this was your motivation for eating meat, it couldn't be faulted.

Malcolm wrote:

This is my primary motivation for eating meat, all other things aside.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 8:30 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

MiphamFan said:

So that applies to the other 5 meats too?

Then what about certain statements that they should be consumed in ganapujas? One must be a vidyadhara to consume the 5 meats?

Malcolm wrote:

I said in general. Ganapujas are a special case. Here, the point is consuming the five meats traditionally not consumed by Indians and left in the charnel grounds, i.e., meat of humans, cows, elephants, dogs and horses. Why? Because these meats were regarded by Brahmins as impure. The point in this instance is to overcome attachment to so called "pure and impure" food. And no, one does not have to be a Vidyadhāra to consume these meats in the ganacakra. But I think that most people would not be able to manage this. This is a general principle in niruttarayogatantra.

The principle here in Dzogchen is however a bit different. The point here is to create a positive cause for the cattle, fowl and fish that we humans normally consume in order that sentient being meet with the Dharma, and so on, in future lives.

There is the interesting case of Urgyen Lingpa's body. Urgyen Lingpa was held to be a seven timer, i.e, reborn as a brahmin or in Tibet, a tulku, seven times. It is held that his flesh had the power to create a special cause for those who ate small portions of it. So, his mummified kudung (unfortunately now destroyed) in Tibet was pockmarked from people taking small portions of his flesh for this reason. Once, when Chogyal Namkahi Norbu was giving Medicine Buddha in Tsegylgar, he included a pill containing the flesh of this master in the vase water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The six liberations are peaceful methods, and involve creating good causes for sentient beings to meet the teachings in the future through sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and memory using various visual mantras, incenses made according to special recipes, pills, and so on.

Basically, when one uses the methods of creating good causes, all of those animals that one consumes in future lives will take rebirth as one's students when oneself becomes an awakened being. This is why the anarchist's objections are based on a faulty premise.

Wenzi said:

How about humans who have lived without connection to Dharma despite their precious human births? Can one create this connection by eating their flesh?

Malcolm wrote:

Two things here: first, a human birth is not "precious" unless one has a connection with Dharma.

Second, human meat (as well as the meat of predators) is in general forbidden to people. One cannot create a positive connection by doing something nonvirtuous.

Also human beings can be benefitted by liberation through seeing, hearing, smelling, etc., as well, even if they have no interest in or connection with the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

theanarchist said:

But that's something else entirely than buying that delicious steak because you like the taste. Now if you are a realized practitioner, eat the meat without attachment, only to liberate the being, that's something entirely different too.

Malcolm wrote:

It's no different than buying a pair of leather shoes because you like the look and fit, or a silk shirt because you like the look and feel of silk, or a pashmina shawl because it is stylish and keeps you warm.

One does not need to be a "realized practitioner" to benefit beings through consuming their meat. As I pointed out above, when you consume meat using Vajrayāna methods, those animals will all be reborn as your disciples when you become a buddha yourself.

The same thing applies when wearing leather shoes, wool sweaters, silk shirts and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 10:01 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Thank you. I have heard of these things before but only a little bit. So the difference is both in the method and the result, correct? At least the short term or immediate result in my

If appropriate, would you please elaborate on the criteria?

And

Are these teachings primarily from tantra or can they be found in the canon as well?

Malcolm wrote:

The teachings on "liberation" can be found in both new tantra as well as Nyingma tantras. The six liberations can only be found in Dzogchen tantras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:53 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are conflating the wrathful Vajrayāna practice of "liberation" [sgrol] with the practice of the six liberations (sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and recollection) — they are not the same thing at all.

Fortyeightvows said:

Would you kindly explain this a bit further?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, the practice of sgrol ba, liberation, is the practice of wrathfully separating a sentient being's consciousness from its body through ritual means and delivering it into the dharmadhātu. There are ten criteria through which someone or something might be subject to such a rite. For example, there is a large wasp that lives in Bhutan and Southern Tibet called "rGya nag rgyal po" (Chinese King). It kills many small creatures and drags them into its burrow, paralyzes them, and lays its eggs in them. According to the late Kunzang Dechen Lingpa, this creature is completely wicked, and its sting can be fatal to humans. Using this wasp as an example, he said there are some creatures who should be killed and that one should not naively allow one's Mahāyāna orientation to prevent one from seeing what is the greater good for all beings, just to protect the life of one wicked being. He said that in this case, proper Mahāyāna conduct would be to eliminate Gyanag Gyalpos wherever and whenever one found them because these creatures are pernicious.

The six liberations are peaceful methods, and involve creating good causes for sentient beings to meet the teachings in the future through sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and memory using various visual mantras, incenses made according to special recipes, pills, and so on.

Basically, when one uses the methods of creating good causes, all of those animals that one consumes in future lives will take rebirth as one's students when oneself becomes an awakened being. This is why the anarchist's objections are based on a faulty premise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:34 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Honestly, whenever the subject of Vegetarianism comes up I swear I must be talking to the reincarnations of the followers of Devadatta.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:33 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are conflating the wrathful Vajrayāna practice of "liberation" [sgrol] with the practice of the six liberations (sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and recollection) — they are not the same thing at all.

As I mentioned previously, not only Chogyal Namkhai Norbu teaches such methods that he insists are to be used by all of his students, also the great tertön Kunzang Dechen Lingpa revealed termas detailing these methods as well.

Fortyeightvows said:

Would you kindly explain this a bit further?

Malcolm wrote:

Which part?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:30 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I have already dispensed with this objection. One is only responsible for an animal's suffering if one orders an animal killed for one or kills it oneself.

theanarchist said:

As I wrote, the price for the meat includes the wages of the butcher. So with the money I pay for the meat I pay the work of the butcher who killed the animal. So as an end result, me and the other people who bought the meat of this specific animal paid for the act of the slaughter.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is true. Likewise, when you wear silk shirts, you are paying for the death of silk worms. When you wear leather, you are also paying the butcher. When you wear wool, you are paying for the deaths of countless creatures that inhabit the wool of sheep that are sheared as well as the paying for the cruel suffering endured by the sheep, as well as the lambs who are stolen from their mothers by the sheep herders and butchered for their meat and so on. If you buy glue, you are paying the butcher for the hooves and so on. Do you have pets? If so, again you are paying the butcher. Do you pay taxes, then you are paying for wars, executions, imprisonment and so on.

Are you karmically responsible? No. karma is volition and verbal and physical acts which come from volitions. If you have no volition to kill something, you do not accrue the karma of killing. If you do not ask someone to kill something, again you have no karma related to that act of killing. Buying meat in a shop is no more an act of killing than buying leather shoes in a department store.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, claiming you are not eating meat "out of compassion" is lame and inferior conduct — that is just how it is. And in particular, in the context of Dzogchen teachings (the context here) it is especially lame.

anjali said:

Really? Those are strong words. So, just to be completely clear, you truly consider Chatral Rinpoche's (as well as Shabkar's, and other highly regarded lamas') veggie diet(s) to be especially lame and inferior conduct from a Vajrayana/Dzogchen perspective?

Malcolm wrote:

Why don't you ask ChNN what he thinks? It is he after all who first used the words "miserable compassion" to describe to compassion of those practitioners who eschew eating meat. His point of view is well known. I am merely fleshing out the details for those of little faith.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:20 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

I agree. This sounds like a huge cop-out for people who are attached to eating other living beings bodies and want to continue to do so. Mahayana Sutras are clear that eating meat harms compassion. It's the bodhisattva's way of life to do whatever we can to minimise the suffering of living beings, therefore it's not lame to eat a vegetarian diet.

<http://www.shabkar.org/vegetarianism/>

theanarchist said:

And the day you attain realisation and become a vidyadhara with the ability to liberate an animal through the ingestion of the meat, that day you can still return to eating meat in order to benefit them. I mean, no problem if folk like Do Khyentse eat meat. I doubt that you find so many people who are at this level.

Again, having delusions about one's realisations and spiritual abilities, thinking one can benefit beings with one's vajrayana practice when in reality one can't would break samaya.

Malcolm wrote:

One does not need to have high realizations to benefit such animals who wind up as our food through Vajrayāna methods, this is false equivalence.

The power of the methods of creating good causes, including the consumption of meat, arises from the blessings of Buddha Samantabhadra's words of truth, and not the realization of this or that yogi.

You are conflating the wrathful Vajrayāna practice of "liberation" [sgrol] with the practice of the six liberations (sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and recollection) — they are not the same thing at all.

As I mentioned previously, not only Chogyal Namkhai Norbu teaches such methods that he insists are to be used by all of his students, also the great tertön Kunzang Dechen Lingpa revealed termas detailing these methods as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 9:14 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

...if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, claiming you are not eating meat "out of compassion" is lame and inferior conduct — that is just how it is. And in particular, in the context of Dzogchen teachings (the context here) it is especially lame.

anjali said:

Really? Those are strong words. So, just to be completely clear, you truly consider Chatral Rinpoche's (as well as Shabkar's, and other highly regarded lamas') veggie diet(s) to be especially lame and inferior conduct from a Vajrayana/Dzogchen perspective?

Malcolm wrote:

I have already explained that these words are oriented towards those who are not practitioners of Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 7:29 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality it is impossible for us to remove the suffering of other sentient beings at all,.

theanarchist said:

But do you want to be the agent responsible for the suffering?

That would be like "oh, don't try to prevent a war, doing so won't prevent the suffering of those beings anyway"

This is the slippery slope of excusing other beings suffering with their karma and conveniently not even trying to do something about it.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, for one, I am a doctor of Tibetan Medicine so one can hardly accuse me of being indifferent to the suffering of sentient beings, but I also know the limitations of treatment. In reality all suffering comes about from the three poisons, and the three poisons come from the innate grasping at "I am." Not even a Buddha can remove this, let alone the pain in your little finger when pricked with a thorn.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality it is impossible for us to remove the suffering of other sentient beings at all,.

theanarchist said:

But do you want to be the agent responsible for the suffering?

.

Malcolm wrote:

I have already dispensed with this objection. One is only responsible for an animal's suffering if one orders an animal killed for one or kills it oneself.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 6:31 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, claiming you are not eating meat "out of compassion" is lame and inferior conduct — that is just how it is. And in particular, in the context of Dzogchen teachings (the context here) it is especially lame.

Tsongkhapafan said:

What's lame is contributing to suffering unnecessarily, whatever path you're following.

Malcolm wrote:

Bhavaviveka proves, even while mentioning the Lanka and so on, that eating meat in three ways does not contribute to suffering. If eating meat pure in three ways contributes to suffering, he points out so does wearing wool, leather, silk etc.

So, in fact, as long as the meat one consumes is pure in three ways it does not contribute to the suffering of a given animal at all. I know this is hard for people to understand, but it is the case.

In reality it is impossible for us to remove the suffering of other sentient beings at all, even one tiny bit. Not even Buddhas can remove the suffering of other beings. If we believe that by refusing to eat meat we are reducing some other beings suffering, we are deluding ourselves because we have not understood the nature of suffering at all. As Maitreya points out in samsara there is not so much as an area the size of a needle tip in which happiness may be found. Therefore, what can we do to help? All we can do is make efforts at creating positive causes for sentient beings to meet the Dharma in the future. For example, the Root Tantra of Heruka states that Vajrayāna practitioners themselves are "Liberation through seeing." Any being who sees Vajrayāna practitioner plants a seed for meeting the Buddhas and hearing Dharma teachings. But dead animals cannot see or hear anything. Therefore, we have methods connected with creating a positive cause for those sentient beings whom human beings commonly consume because we have a closer relationship with those types of animals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Tibetan monks love to eat meat. If you are refraining from eating meat for compassionate reasons, no one can fault your decision.

Whatever you do with compassion cannot be faulted. You can also eat meat with compassion but if you can reduce suffering in this world by refraining from endorsing the wholesale slaughter of millions of sentient beings every day, why wouldn't you? The Lankavatara Sutra, among others, also endorses refraining from eating meat.

Malcolm wrote:

As already noted, if you are a common Mahāyāna practitioner without special Vajrayāna methods, then of course, you should refrain from eating meat. But if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, claiming you are not eating meat "out of compassion" is lame and inferior conduct — that is just how it is. And in particular, in the context of Dzogchen teachings (the context here) it is especially lame.

dzogchungpa said:

How do you say "especially lame" in Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

rab tu smad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Tibetan monks love to eat meat. If you are refraining from eating meat for compassionate reasons, no one can fault your decision.

Whatever you do with compassion cannot be faulted. You can also eat meat with compassion but if you can reduce suffering in this world by refraining from endorsing the wholesale slaughter of millions of sentient beings every day, why wouldn't you? The Lankavatara Sutra, among others, also endorses refraining from eating meat.

Malcolm wrote:

As already noted, if you are a common Mahāyāna practitioner without special Vajrayāna methods, then of course, you should refrain from eating meat. But if you are a Vajrayāna practitioner, claiming you are not eating meat "out of compassion" is lame and inferior conduct — that is just how it is. And in particular, in the context of Dzogchen teachings (the context here) it is especially lame.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Paul said:

bumping my post in the hope someone can answer it...

Malcolm wrote:

You can recite the mantra from Jigme Lingpa's short ganapuja, "ram yam....puja hoh!" for example. Or just the three syllables.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

anjali said:

For example, I wonder how many buddhists, of any persuasion, follow the advice in the Puttamansa Sutta: A Son's Flesh:

Malcolm wrote:

This is Hinayāna teaching. It does not apply to Dzogchen and Vajrayāna practitioners. As Dzogchen and Vajrayāna practitioners, we are supposed to enjoy all objects of desire of the five senses as objects of desire. We are not Hinayāna monks refusing to mix the sauce into our rice.

So while there are certainly some Buddhists who apply this method, it is not really the principle of our teaching here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 4:20 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

bryandavis said:

The most attentive service and accurate to menu meal preparation I have experienced was in a high end french gourmet restaurant.

The absolute worst service and lack of attention to detail and meal preparation on numerous occasions by different employees I have ever had by far is in a raw vegan restaurant.

I'm just saying. lol.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh yes, I have had very similar experiences. The vegan restaurants I have been to have been universally awful.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 3:18 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That connection is a debt, a lan chags. It is not a connection for liberation, but a connection from bondage in samsara.

anjali said:

Agreed, but surely it isn't required to consume the flesh of our former mothers in daily diet to make connections for liberation?

Malcolm wrote:

Eating meat to satisfy vows for oneself is also the opposite of compassion concern for others.

anjali said:

Agreed, but one can also reasonably ask, how much flesh does one need to consume to generate compassionate concern for our mothers?

Johnny Dangerous said:

Sure, but one could just as easily ask "how many high-end vegan/vegetarian lifestyle products and services does one need"...in the First World, most vegetarians and vegans I know do almost the opposite of buying or eating based on need. If they bought based on need they would likely be more frugal and less finicky about what they eat, and where they shop. Instead, I would estimate that something like 10% of the vegans/vegetarians I know eat based on need, the rest have something akin to an eating disorder, often possible due to income. Sounds harsh I know, but we have to make a distinction between ways of practicing vegetarianism or veganism to answer some of these questions adequately.

Malcolm wrote:

Orthorexia Nervosa:

<https://www.nationaleatingdisorders.org/orthorexia-nervosa>

Johnny Dangerous said:

Younger realized her new brand had also turned into a new lifestyle and taken over her daily decisions. After becoming upset her local West Village juice bar didn't have a particular green juice, she planned on having that day she made her friend go with her to another juice bar a mile away just to satiate her restrictive diet needs...Younger, who has over 70,000 followers on her Instagram account alone, has decided to begin reintroducing eggs, fish, and organic chicken back into her diet and loosen the reigns of her strict vegan lifestyle and change her account name to "The Blonde Veggie." She's actually received death threats from hardcore vegans through Facebook, email, and Instagram.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.medicaldaily.com/how-veganism-led-blogger-jordan-younger-develop-eating-disorder-orthorexia-3-steps-prevent-obsession>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Namkhair Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

That connection is a debt, a lan chags. It is not a connection for liberation, but a connection from bondage in samsara.

Agreed, but surely it isn't required to consume the flesh of our former mothers in daily diet to make connections for liberation?

Nothing is required.

Eating meat to satisfy vows for oneself is also the opposite of compassion concern for others.

Agreed, but one can also reasonably ask, how much flesh does one need to consume to generate compassionate concern for our mothers?

Question is, "Is it better, out of compassion, to eschew eating meat or not?" ChNN's answer is that question is that it is better not to eschew eating meat out of compassion. If a Dzogchen practitioner is truly compassionate it is better they eat meat.

Naturally, people are also free to do what they feel is right.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Boomerang said:

In any case, there are any number of very highly qualified teachers you can make a connection with out there.

At this point I feel reluctant to make a connection with any more teachers. I thought the third highest ranking teacher in the Drikung Kagyu lineage would be okay, but the next thing I know people are telling me that I cursed myself and he didn't really say the things he said. How do I know who to trust?

Malcolm wrote:

You can trust lineage heads. The Dalai Lama, Sakya Trizin, the Karmapa, Taklung Tsetrul Rinpoche, etc. Then you can trust the lamas which are responsible to them, and so on.

I never said don't trust Garchen Rinpoche, I said go meet him in person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 1:58 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

monktastic said:

Yes, and they must order meat in approximate proportion to the demand. If the demand for a particular meat were to drop fivefold, again, they are smart enough to reduce their purchasing of that particular meat in the long term.

The rest of your post is accurate. We all have complicity in many systems. But it's painful (particularly on a Buddhist forum) to watch people pretend that they have no responsibility in this specific one.

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, supermarkets order far more meat than they will sell, knowingly, in order to keep fresh meat on hand at all times. Their model does not allow for scarcity, and given that the price of meat is kept artificially low in Western Markets, this is no actual connection between consumer demand and supply in this instance.

http://www.meatinfo.co.uk/news/fullstory.php/aid/18294/Farmers_see_drop_in_meat_returns_due_to_oversupply.html

<http://www.reuters.com/article/2015/02/19/usa-ports-meat-idUSL1N0VT23S20150219>

<http://allafrica.com/stories/201504140881.html>

<http://www.irishtimes.com/news/ireland/irish-news/oversupply-is-main-reason-for-fall-in-beef-prices-says-coveney-1.1904916>

Food waste:

<http://www.wri.org/publication/reducing-food-loss-and-waste>

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/wonkblog/wp/2012/08/22/how-food-actually-gets-wasted-in-the-united-states/>

<http://news.nationalgeographic.com/news/2014/10/141013-food-waste-national-security-environment-science-ngfood/>

Interestingly, meat is wasted less than any other food, because it can be stored longer by freezing and so on.

Thus the idea that a meat-inclusive diet is more harmful to creatures than a solely plant-based diet is shown to be a fallacy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 1:14 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Boomerang said:

In that case, what should I do to fix this problem?

Malcolm wrote:

You should go and meet a teacher face to face (best case) or through a live webcast (next best) and receive transmissions in a proper way. If you have faith in Garchen Rinpoche, go meet him.

Boomerang said:

Shouldn't I stay away from Garchen Rinpoche since his statements were what encouraged me to create this negative karma in the first place? How is it okay for him to publicly support empowerment via recording but a downfall for me to believe him? If I went up to him now and requested empowerment, specifically because I doubt his statement on empowerments, wouldn't that be impure vision or something?

Malcolm wrote:

I am not really sure if he does support empowerment via recordings, despite what his students say. And in any case the pure vision of buddhas cannot remove the impure vision of sentient beings. If it could, we would have no need to practice at all.

In any case, there are any number of very highly qualified teachers you can make a connection with out there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Boomerang said:

In that case, what should I do to fix this problem?

Malcolm wrote:

You should go and meet a teacher face to face (best case) or through a live webcast (next best) and receive transmissions in a proper way. If you have faith in Garchen Rinpoche, go meet him.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Boomerang said:

Karma is volition, so since I intended to receive lung and empowerment in an improper way, am I in danger of going to the lower realms? That's the message I get from your posts, for example, this one:

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=16286&hilit=recording+transmission&start=120#p230363>

Therefore, if someone asks me, I will always honestly tell them that it is impossible to receive any kind of Vajrayāna transmission from a recording of a prior event. People are of course free to disagree and that is between them and lower realms.

If I really am going to avici hell I'd rather know now than be paranoid about it for the rest of my life.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no such thing as fixed karma in Buddhadharma. One can purify anything. Including taking teachings in a less than optimal way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Uh no, actually an enormous amount of food (including meat) either goes to waste or gets intentionally destroyed. The idea that an individual person buying a chicken or not is the main factor in food production decisions is simply untrue.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is that also. For example, when Patrul was complaining about monasteries, it was a time when monasteries would contract a certain number of sheep to be slaughtered at a given time. Now, there is no need for anyone to contract with anyone. In the first world under capitalism, the system is that one, with sufficient money, can buy any food one likes more or less at any time of the year without having to special order it from anyone. The cost of food production has been driven artificially low in order that massive surpluses in food are generated so that waste of food does not impact the profitability of grocery markets (thank you, international migrant labor!).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 23rd, 2015 at 12:47 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

i.e. the myth that "less creatures would be killed in a plant-based diet."

monktastic said:

AFAIK this is not a myth. It really does harm/kill many fewer animals to eat one pound of vegetables than one pound of meat (which required many pounds of vegetation to be raised).

Also, I see many spurious arguments here about why buying one chicken at the supermarket does not cause the death of one chicken. It does not cause the death of that one chicken, but the supermarket WILL order one more chicken to fill its spot. You may pretend that second chicken has nothing to do with you... until the next week when you go back to the market and lo and behold, there are more dead chickens waiting for you.

Whether you choose to participate in this or not is surely a very individual matter, and the matter of connecting with dead chickens is far above my pay grade. But it's crazy to take part in a system and then pretend you have precisely zero complicity in it. We all make choices that harm other beings, and though there's no point in being weighed down by guilt over them, it's disingenuous to claim that we're doing all of them for noble reasons. We can simply do what we can, and admit we're not fully compassionate beings yet.

Malcolm wrote:

What follows is a true story — some people when to the present Karmapa, Urgyen Thrinly, asking him if it was better to ransom a cow or not ransom it? The Karmapa replied, well, if you ransom the cow, another cow will just be moved up the line to be slaughtered sooner, whereas, if you do not intercede, the next cow in line be able to live longer. So he declined to give them advice in the matter.

As far as your counterclaim goes, that applies only to feed lot animals, animals raised in CFO's and so on, like most chickens, pigs, turkeys and what not.

As far as your claim about supermarkets go, it is also false. Supermarkets will continue to order meat from meat suppliers for as long as there are people who eat meat (i.e. forever).

Also, even Vegans participate in the trade of flesh by continuing to eat organically grown products which are fertilized with bone meal, blood meal and feather meal, all very standard organic amendments which are substantial cash inputs into the slaughterhouse business.

The point is that there is no one who is not complicit in some manner in "the system".

As for myself, I apply the methods taught by my gurus, knowing that I am making a difference.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 11:48 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Paul said:

I'd love lamas to also do this kind of thing to those with 'gluten intolerances'.

Anders said:

Celiac disease is a measurable medical condition.

Malcolm wrote:

Eating meat will not cause a problem in their case.

People are free. Whether they eat meat or not is not the issue. The issue really that Rinpoche is pointing to is the fallacies in the idea that choosing not to eat meat is more "compassionate". He has pointed in many ways the falsity of this thinking because it does not truly address the suffering of nonhumans in the whole chain of agricultural production.

Quite honestly, the American Philosopher, Robert Nozick provides a much better and more well reasoned argument for not eating animals in his Anarchy, State and Utopia where he discards utilitarian arguments for the eating of animals because animals

"count for something."

Anders said:

If some animals count for something, which animals count, how much do they count, and how can this be determined? Suppose (as I believe the evidence supports) that eating animals is not necessary for health and is not less expensive than alternate equally healthy diets available to people in the United States. The gain, then, from the eating of animals is pleasures of the palate, gustatory delights, varied tastes. I would not claim that these are not truly pleasant, delightful, and interesting. The question is: do they, or rather does the marginal addition in them gained by eating animals rather than only nonanimals, outweigh the moral weight to be given to animals' lives and pain? Given that animals are to count for something, is the extra gain obtained by eating them rather than nonanimal products greater than the moral cost? How might these questions be decided?

Malcolm wrote:

Nozick, Robert (2013-11-12). Anarchy, State, and Utopia (pp. 36-37). Basic Books. Kindle Edition.

Anders said:

What about persons distinguishes them from animals, so that stringent constraints apply to how persons may be treated, yet not to how animals may be treated? 11 Could beings from another galaxy stand to us as it is usually thought we do to animals, and if so, would they be justified in treating us as means à la utilitarianism? Are organisms arranged on some ascending scale, so that any may be sacrificed or caused to suffer to achieve a greater total benefit for those not lower on the scale? Such an elitist hierarchical view would distinguish three moral statuses (forming an interval partition of the scale):

Status 1: The being may not be sacrificed, harmed, and so on, for any other organism's sake.

Status 2: The being may be sacrificed, harmed, and so on, only for the sake of beings higher on the scale, but not for the sake of beings at the same level.

Status 3: The being may be sacrificed, harmed, and so on, for the sake of other beings at the same or higher levels on the scale.

If animals occupy status 3 and we occupy status 1, what occupies status 2? Perhaps we occupy status 2! Is it morally forbidden to use people as means for the benefit of others, or is it only forbidden to use them for the sake of other people, that is, for beings at the same level?* Do ordinary views include the possibility of more than one significant moral divide (like that between persons and animals), and might one come on the other side of human beings?

Malcolm wrote:

Nozick, Robert (2013-11-12). Anarchy, State, and Utopia (pp. 45-46). Basic Books. Kindle Edition.

There are also Singer's arguments.

So the real question that ChNN is placing before us is: what does one do for the countless sentient beings that are slaughtered in food production? How do we benefit all these sentient beings (who indeed count for something)? What method do we use? Even Vegans have to admit that they use the above elite hierarchical model in their ethics, a "being may be sacrificed, harmed, and so on, for the sake of other beings at the same or higher levels on the scale" merely by permitting agriculture. However, their excuse, is in my opinion very lame. They claim in general, "While it is true that beings die in the production of plant-based food, we do not intend that harm nor are we raising beings to be used as food. The death of beings in food production is a regrettable fact of agriculture, a by-product that we do not intend but cannot avoid in order to sustain ourselves."

In other words, they claim they are following their diet because of the intrinsic value of living creatures, but at the same time resort to utilitarianism to rationalize the broad destruction of creatures in food production, claiming a utilitarian advantage to a plant based diet as a selling point, i.e. the myth that "less creatures would be killed in a plant-based diet." The other hoax in their thinking is that idea that we should not exploit creatures such as cows and bees for milk and honey, while happily using lady bugs to kill agricultural pests and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 11:22 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Boomerang said:

Okay, so is Garchen Rinpoche intentionally sending himself and hundreds of other people to hell, including me and other people on this forum?

Malcolm wrote:

I can only related to you what is described in the tantras. I am not going to opine on Garchen Rinpoche's intentions.

Boomerang said:

Does that mean you're agnostic about the validity of Garchen Rinpoche's recorded empowerments. I ask because to me it sounded like you were saying that you believe, with the Mahāmudratilaka Tantra as your reference, that regardless of Rinpoche's positive intentions and siddhis he is hellbound, as well as myself, Lhasa, Sherab Dorje, and others. If that's the case please tell me straight up so I can emotionally prepare myself; hell is scary. You have corrected my views in the past and I rely on you to do it again. You can PM me if that's what you prefer.

Malcolm wrote:

I think it is pretty clear that Garchen Rinpoche wants students to attend in person or by live webcast. As far as recordings go, I imagine that his thinking runs as follows, "if beginners, new people, want to practice, they can get an idea from watching an online recording, and perhaps there is some positive connection made to the teaching and if they recite the mantra, there is no harm."

But for example, HHDL makes it very clear that watching Kalacakra online does not grant one the empowerment. Also CHNN makes it very clear that empowerments that rely on substances cannot be given via webcast. Other Lamas may have a different ideas about this, but I really think in general all Lamas will agree that there is no way one can receive an empowerment from a recording of an empowerment. I am quite certain, for example, if you wrote ChNN on this subject, he would say very clearly to you that you cannot receive any kind of transmission from a recording.

And one thing I am pretty clear on is that no one receives empowerments or a lung from a recording.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I am something in a similar situation as LunaRoja, and am also informed by Pollen and others in terms of food politics. In the final analysis, it's actually hunting-gathering that has the least ecological impact and the least amount of suffering, so I figure I'm OK interpolating between a vegetarian diet and something of a flexitarian diet.

That said, this causes me some pause in dharma circles. I feel somewhat caught between a rock and a hard place. My vegetarian-vegan dharma siblings evoke Shabkar and Patrul on the Tibetan side, and sutra on the Chan/Zen side, and chide me for this flexitarian approach and chide me for incorporating meat in ganapuja. We have had vegetarian-vegan Buddhists show up for ganapuja and they have been horrified by the presence of meat. On the flip side, when I orbit into the vegan-vegetarian side of the pool, then I have my tantrica friends chiding me for "the worst type of compassion" and for breaking samaya at ganapuja for either putting on a white tsok, or for just tasting but not actively eating meat and drinking alcohol.

In some way I feel that I am on the margin of some larger cultural issue, maybe from the Tibetan side, but maybe from the inji convert side.

It's not just about meat either. I often encounter this belief that all five tastes must be present in the ganapuja, and this becomes something of a fault line when two people bring pickles and nobody ends up with "bitter" or "pungent". When I ask lamas they're like, well, in my part of Tibet we offered tsampa and just tsampa because that's all we had, so it's clear the forrest is lost for the trees on many levels.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, first it is six tastes (sweet, salty, sour, hot, bitter, astringent) and though there may be some text that specifies this, I have never seen it.

It is possible that one can do a ganapuja with nothing at all, after all, the important part is to work with circumstances. However, there is no one among us who unable to get meat and unable to get alcohol as offerings.

As to the idea of using nectar pills, well, this does not challenge one's capacity nor does it encourage one to integrate. The adoption of vegetarianism into ganapujas is a misapplication of the path of renunciation (i.e. common Mahāyāna) to Varjayāna.

According to ChNN, Zhabkar, Paltrul and Pema Duddul's exhortations to not eat meat are for non-practitioners, that is, people who do not understand the meaning of Dzogchen teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 8:10 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The connection is created by the practitioner towards the animal.

Reibeam said:

Would it be correct to assume this connection is also made if one uses candles made of tallow (animal fat) on thier shrine that are used during Ganapujas and other rituals such as invocation of the lamp?

Malcolm wrote:

Such candles are fine for wrathful rites, but should not be used in general, for the same reason we do not use animal products in sang offerings to Nāgās.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

jmlee369 said:

If there is no volition on the part of the animal to create the connection, how can it be accomplished?

anjali said:

Well, the way I've heard it explained is that we already have a connection with the animal--if you believe that all sentient beings have been our mother at some point in our past lives. In a sense, eating the flesh of an animal is eating the flesh of one of our former mothers. I can only speak for myself in saying that that understanding is enough for me to eliminate consuming meat as part of my diet, or consuming the least amount possible to satisfy vows in a ritual setting.

Malcolm wrote:

That connection is a debt, a lan chags. It is not a connection for liberation, but a connection from bondage in samsara.

Eating meat to satisfy vows for oneself is also the opposite of compassion concern for others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Interview with Khenchen Rigdzin Dorje on the Nyingmapa V

Content:

DENZONG said:

I HAVE ALL THE PAPERS AND DOCUMENTS TO PROVE THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE STATEMENTS BELOW.

Taktse Nyingma

Institute, Gangtok, Sikkim. This property belongs to The Chogyal(King) Tenzing Tobgyal Wongchuk Namgyal of Sikkim, and he later donated it to The Tsuklakhang Trust.

Khempo Rinzing was given in-charge of this Institute by the Chogyal under an agreement in 1997. And he broke many clauses of the agreement and due to which he was asked to leave the institute. And some of the clauses that he broke was getting married. Any teacher or professor or principal of a Sheda is not suppose to get married and if he does he has to leave the Sheda. He's been asked to leave the Sheda for many years and he has not yet vacated that Sheda. A case was registered in the Lok Adalat, Gangtok, Sikkim against him and he never turned out, not even once and the case is still going on. I hope this will clarify the ownership of the Sheda/Taktse Nyingma Institute, Gangtok, Sikkim.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, this is just hearsay on an internet website.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 22nd, 2015 at 7:15 AM

Title: Re: Ksha.ya'i.nad

Content:

pemachophel said:

Can anyone tell me what kind of disease ksha.ya'i.nad is?

Thanks

Malcolm wrote:

First of all it is a cold bile disease.

It is a wasting disease, but it is fact not tuberculosis. Tuberculosis is another illness, called " gcong chen zad byed ", something like "major chronic consumption."

Kṣaya [kshaya nagpo] is fatal, there is no cure. It is something like terminal jaundice. What happens here is that the bile from the bladder spreads through the entire body, including the channels, skin, bones and so on. Since it consumes them, it is call "consumption" (zad byed) in Tibetan. It is also called black [nag po] because the patients complexion becomes dark. The skin and so on become dark blue and the nails have black spots.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: HHDL advice: Westerners to take monk/nun as teacher

Content:

Adamantine said:

with this logic then Namkhai Norbu for instance would be less ideal as a teacher than any random bikshu? I have a hard time accepting that. I think level of realization is the most important factor in my own criteria for teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, ordinary people cannot ascertain who is awakened and who is not. The story of Virupa is illustrative here.

People's idea of who is "realized" is very fickle and subjective.

Adamantine said:

Yes but equally how could an ordinary person know when a bikshu is truly keeping their vows purely? Wouldn't you need extraordinary powers of insight to know even this?

Malcolm wrote:

Good thing we have the Dalai Lama around...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: HHDL advice: Westerners to take monk/nun as teacher

Content:

Adamantine said:

with this logic then Namkhai Norbu for instance would be less ideal as a teacher than any random bikshu? I have a hard time accepting that. I think level of realization is the most important factor in my own criteria for teachers.

Malcolm wrote:

In general, ordinary people cannot ascertain who is awakened and who is not. The story of Virupa is illustrative here.

People's idea of who is "realized" is very fickle and subjective.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 6:48 PM

Title: Re: Interview with Khenchen Rigdzin Dorje on the Nyingmapa V

Content:

DENZONG said:

Taktse Nyingma Institute, Gangtok, Sikkim. This property belongs to The Chogyal(King) Tenzing Tobgyal Wongchuk Namgyal of Sikkim, and he later donated it to The Tsuklakhang Trust. Khempo Rinzing was given in-charge of this Institute by the Chogyal under an agreement in 1997. And he broke many clauses of the agreement and due to which he was asked to leave the institute. And some of the clauses that he broke was getting married. Any teacher or professor or principal of a Sheda is not suppose to get married and if he does he has to leave the Sheda. He's been asked to leave the Sheda for many years and he has not yet vacated that Sheda. A case was registered in the Lok Adalat, Gangtok, Sikkim against him and he never turned out, not even once and the case is still going on. I hope this will clarify the ownership of the Sheda/Taktse Nyingma Institute, Gangtok, Sikkim.

Malcolm wrote:

This is just hearsay.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 6:47 PM

Title: Re: Phowa on insects

Content:

Tenso said:

I've heard some stories of people doing this. How possible is this for an average practitioner? Does one need to be of a high realization?

Malcolm wrote:

Better to sing song of the vajra, or six spaces of Samantabhadra. More effective...

Tenso said:

Why would that be more effective than phowa?

Malcolm wrote:

In order for phowa to be effective, one must expert in it, have done the practice and produced signs. By contrast, song of the vajra has no such requirement.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 6:40 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcom said:

Once an animal has been killed, its meat is inert. There is no consciousness present, ergo, purchasing the meat of an animal that has already been killed does not contribute to the suffering of that sentient being.

Otherwise, when you buy meat in a modern market, the consciousness of that animal is long dead, well on its way to yet another rebirth. There is no connection between meat that I buy, and the suffering of said animal.

Indeed, it is also not unrealistic to ask Vajrayāna practitioners to apply methods we have been taught to create positive connections so that beings whose flesh we consume meet the Dharma.

jmlee369 said:

This is one thing I've been curious about for a while now. There are several methods in both lower and higher tantric texts that enable practitioners to benefit beings by interacting in some way with dead remains. How exactly does this work if the consciousness is long gone from the body? Then there's the whole "Buddhas cannot wash away wrongdoing and obscuration with water..." thing, and how even the Buddhas and bodhisattvas cannot intervene if a being lacks the merit etc. If there is no volition on the part of the animal to create the connection, how can it be accomplished?

Malcolm wrote:

The connection is created by the practitioner towards the animal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 6:39 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

KeithBC said:

Solar power is good and necessary. But the real issue lurking behind all this is sustainability. How sustainable is the solar cell industry? To be specific, those solar cells are made in a coal-powered factory. So does the coal saved by their use equal the coal consumed by their manufacture? i don't know the answer, and I bet neither do the manufacturers. This is the type of question we need answers to in addressing climate change or any of the other sustainability issues. I would be a lot more comfortable with solar power if the panels were made in a solar-powered factory.

Om mani padme hum

Keith

Malcolm wrote:

Not only this, but solar cells require rare earth minerals, and in most places in the world, they are bound up with radioactive isotopes making them very problematical to mine. They also are only strip mined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

TocharianB said:

Overall, it is a difficult teaching that I am trying to observe to benefit beings.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think it is that difficult. The imperative is to create positive connections for sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 8:12 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

TocharianB said:

This teaching of ChNN Rinpoche rejects that idea--it enjoins me to act in a way that presupposes my being a practitioner of Buddhadharma sets me apart. I should eat meat while markets provide it to benefit beings, while believing that it would be better for everyone who is not a practitioner to abstain...

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, perfectly stated. Only I would go further and point out that part of the Madhyamaka tradition rejects the tathāgatagarbha tradition's prohibition against eating meat as long as it is pure in three ways.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 8:10 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

MiphamFan said:

I don't think Chatral is influenced by wanting donations from Chinese, and there has been a fairly long strain of vegetarianism in Nyingma.

In Mipham's Satirical poem on the four schools he notes that actually, and says that Gelugpas like meat the most.

But I think accommodating to Chinese tastes has influenced a lot of modern TB teachers. I think they are better off presenting themselves as laymen if they are such rather than being ambiguous about it to people who are uninformed though.

Malcolm wrote:

There exists no Mahāyāna commitment in the Indo-Tibetan tradition to avoid meat. It is not part of our bodhisattva vows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 8:06 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Eating meat is solely a problem if you killed an animal yourself, asked for it to be killed or witnessed it killed. Bhavaviveka demonstrates this quite well in the Tarkajavala.

These days, the main impetus to be vegetarian comes from narrow-minded Chinese Buddhists. Tibetan Lamas give into this because they want donations.

jmlee369 said:

I don't think you can criticise the Chinese too much for upholding the scriptures and precepts.

Malcolm wrote:

The prohibition against eating meat may exist in the Chinese bodhisattva vows, but not in the Indian bodhisattva vows, and the Tibetan traditions that follow the latter. And as I pointed out, the Tarkajavala rejects that idea that eating meat that is pure in three ways has a fault. Bhavaviveka, a Mahayañist, is quite aware of the Lanka and so on, and in fact mentions it by name.

The main sūtras that rail against meat eating are the Tathāhatagarbha sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 8:04 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

jmlee369 said:

In terms the meat that is pure in three ways, while it is indeed the case for monastics, I have yet to see that concept applied for lay people in scripture.

Malcolm wrote:

It applies since lay people have a vow against killing, just like bhikṣus, etc.

jmlee369 said:

As for plant cultivation and the harm it causes to sentient beings, meat eating is compounding the problem because of the feed that livestock consume. Going down one trophic level would reduce the amount of beings harmed from plant cultivation as well.

Overall, while it is unrealistic to ask the whole world to adopt vegetarianism, it's not too much to ask that people reduce their meat consumption a little bit.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, it is also not unrealistic to ask Vajrayāna practitioners to apply methods we have been taught to create positive connections so that beings whose flesh we consume meet the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:39 AM

Title: Re: Phowa on insects

Content:

Tenso said:

I've heard some stories of people doing this. How possible is this for an average practitioner? Does one need to be of a high realization?

Malcolm wrote:

Better to sing song of the vajra, or six spaces of Samantabhadra. More effective...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: "V"s in Sanskrit

Content:

MiphamFan said:

Tibetan ba or wa itself might have been a labiodental approximant in his time. It is in some modern Kham dialects still.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, the only people who know what a "labiodental approximant" is are modern linguists. Not even Sanskritists know WTF this is. Honestly. You are being a trifle ridiculous and unhelpful here.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Saoshun said:

No such thing as global warming. It's rather getting colder then it was couple years ago.

Urgyen Dorje said:

So you've made a truth claim. What is the factual basis for this truth claim?

Malcolm wrote:

Is it just me? Or did anyone notice our two climate deniers use Chinese nyms?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Saoshun said:

No such thing as global warming. It's rather getting colder then it was couple years ago.

Malcolm wrote:

Dude, you are so so wrong...

Saoshun said:

Worldwide, 2001-2010 was the warmest decade on record since thermometer-based observations began. Global average surface temperature has risen at an average rate of 0.15°F per decade since 1901 (see Figure 2), similar to the rate of warming within the contiguous 48 states. Since the late 1970s, however, the United States has warmed faster than the global rate.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.epa.gov/climatechange/science/indicators/weather-climate/temperature.html>

Saoshun said:

The globally averaged temperature over land and ocean surfaces for 2014 was the highest among all years since record keeping began in 1880. The December combined global land and ocean average surface temperature was also the highest on record.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.ncdc.noaa.gov/sotc/summary-info/global/201412>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:28 AM

Title: Re: Namkhair Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

bryandavis said:

But by buying meat I add to the demand for the meat. If nobody would buy it, nobody would be paid to slaughter animals

I believe the ChNNR said something like this already, but I will say it also.

Malcolm wrote:

He should just stop eating meat since he feels so strongly that it is wrong. The only one at fault here is him, since he admitted he eats meat, but feels that it is really, really karmically wrong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:22 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

theanarchist said:

Okay, next time I need a car, I buy one from a dealer in stolen goods, because, you know once the car is stolen from it's previous owner, it's inert.

When I buy it I automatically ask for it to be killed. The price of the meat includes the wage of the professional butcher doing it. I pay him with the money I pay for the meat.

Malcolm wrote:

Now, you are simply making irrational arguments. A car is inert from the start.

You only pay a butcher if you ask him to kill an animal for you. This is clearly forbidden. Otherwise, when you buy meat in a modern market, the consciousness of that animal is long dead, well on its way to yet another rebirth. There is no connection between meat that I buy, and the suffering of said animal. It already happened and is finished, for that life.

Karma is volition, and the secondary acts of body and voice that proceed from that. In order for killing to be part of my karma, I must request some being be killed or do it myself. Otherwise, there is no karma involved.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:19 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

theanarchist said:

You have to be to some degree be happy that someone else did the deed for you that enables you to eat this meat without doing it yourself.

I mean, the alternative is to sit in front of your steak feeling guilty while enjoying the delicious taste.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all.

I can enjoy the taste of meat at the same time that I am sorry there is the suffering of killing in the world. When I eat meat I do so in recognition that Samsara is a terrible place. Also, when I eat vegetables I likewise am aware of the many millions of creatures killed every day to bring nice vegetables to my table.

I do not feel guilty for the acts committed by others. If there was no meat in the markets, I would not eat it and I would not miss it for a second.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:13 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Saoshun said:

if someone have sincere heart will see that it's not about animal suffering .

theanarchist said:

No, slaughtering and eating animals is not about animal suffering...

Malcolm wrote:

Meat does not suffer. Once an animal has been killed, its meat is inert. There is no consciousness present, ergo, purchasing the meat of an animal that has already been killed does not contribute to the suffering of that sentient being.

Eating meat is solely a problem if you killed an animal yourself, asked for it to be killed or witnessed it killed. Bhavaviveka demonstrates this quite well in the Tarkajavala. These days, the main impetus to be vegetarian comes from narrow-minded Chinese Buddhists. Tibetan Lamas give into this because they want donations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Kelwin said:

Karma certainly works within the relative world...

Malcolm wrote:

Karma is volition, and that is all it is. Purchasing meat does not necessarily carry with it the volition to kill. Asserting that it does is absurd.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An action must be complete in three ways in order to accrue a full karma from it. .

theanarchist said:

But you still get an incomplete karma. Plus, it's said, if you rejoice in an act, you get as much karma as the person performing it.

Johnny Dangerous said:

Eating meat is not rejoicing in the killing of animals, what a hyperbolic suggestion.

Malcolm wrote:

Agreed, the suggestion is hyperbolic.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An action must be complete in three ways in order to accrue a full karma from it. .

theanarchist said:

But you still get an incomplete karma. Plus, it's said, if you rejoice in an act, you get as much karma as the person performing it.

Malcolm wrote:

No, actually, you don't as long as meat is pure in three ways.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. They would do that activity this regardless of whether you buy that meat or not.

theanarchist said:

But by buying meat I add to the demand for the meat. If nobody would buy it, nobody would be paid to slaughter animals. Of course my contribution is small, but as far as I have learned about karma, if you participate in a group activity, you have part of that karma.

Don't get me wrong, I do on occasion eat meat, but I see it as a karmically problematic activity, as I am not able to send anyone off to a pure land.

Malcolm wrote:

An action must be complete in three ways in order to accrue a full karma from it.

Anyway, the point is not sending sentient beings to a pure realm, the point is creating a connection so that sentient beings meet the Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 5:52 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

theanarchist said:

And what does he say about eating meat if you have to butcher the animals yourself?

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot kill animals. This kind of meat is forbidden.

theanarchist said:

So in fact, by buying meat you pay someone else to accumulate negative karma.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. They would do that activity this regardless of whether you buy that meat or not because there are so many other people who buy meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 2:51 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

If people have been keen to check up data, the current trend of increasing surface temperature started around 1910 (or there about).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, 100 years after wide spread deforestation and destruction of grasslands in the Northern Hemisphere and 150 years after the beginning of the industrial revolution.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 2:47 AM

Title: Re: Difference between 4th and 5th Skandha

Content:

catlady2112 said:

I'm very confused by the heap consciousness. I assume it means more than "thinking."

Malcolm wrote:

It means a moment of mind, that is all. Full disclosure: I am someone who has studied Abhidharma for many years, and have taught it on more than one occasion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Difference between 4th and 5th Skandha

Content:

catlady2112 said:

I'm having trouble understanding the skandhas in terms of "experience." Every teacher seems to have different ways of explaining them. I learned them as 1) Form 2) Feeling 3) Discrimination 4) Volition 5) Consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

They are 1) matter (as opposed to the object of the eye, form) 2) feeling 3) ideation 4) formations 5) consciousness.

catlady2112 said:

I find that every teacher uses a different words/translations for each heap. The set I listed are from Geshe Dargye, and it's what I grew up with, so I am most familiar with these word choices.

Malcolm wrote:

The terms for Sanskrit and Tibetan respectively are rūpa and gzugs. It is become a common thing for translators to translate rūpaskandha as the "form aggregate", but it is not accurate and does not correspond with the definition of form in English "configuration, formation, structure, construction, arrangement, appearance, exterior, outline, format, layout, design." What does correspond is "matter", i.e. "constituent, raw material, element, component."

When we are taking about the rūpāyatana, the sense base of form, however, the object of the eye, then form is perfect, i.e., "configuration, formation, structure, construction, arrangement, appearance, exterior, outline, format, layout, design."

Words are relative, but they are important in that they shape our understanding. If the terms we use are not accurate, how can our understanding be accurate? Geshe Dhargye never thought about these things in English. He did not know English. The fault lies with his translators.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activity

Content:

WeiHan said:

Not only has the ice cap not disappeared but it actually grows

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/sciencetech/article-2738653/Stunning-satellite-images-summer-ice-cap-thicker-covers-1-7million-square-kilometres-MORE-2-years-ago-despite-Al-Gore-s-prediction-ICE-FREE-now.html>

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.carbonbrief.org/blog/2014/09/some-important-context-on-arctic-sea-ice-melt/>

Read it and weep.

WeiHan said:

Like real. Of course they come out to patch their wrong prediction and you are happy with their explanation? Simply extending the time scale? Why not even longer time scale like what I suggested?

Malcolm wrote:

Because there is no data to support a longer time scale as far as pictures of arctic ice go. Of course, we have journal evidence from sailors and so on, but this is anecdotal at best.

Face it Wei Han, we are living in time when the climate change is 100 percent being caused by human activities. You remind me of this guy:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, last I checked Al Gore is also not a climate scientist.

WeiHan said:

That is not the point. The point is that politician can exaggerate the issue for their own self interest.

Malcolm wrote:

We are talking about the science behind it. That is what counts, not what politicians say.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:36 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

Not only has the ice cap not disappeared but it actually grows

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/sciencetech/article-2738653/Stunning-satellite-images-summer-ice-cap-thicker-covers-1-7million-square-kilometres-MORE-2-years-ago-despite-Al-Gore-s-prediction-ICE-FREE-now.html>

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.carbonbrief.org/blog/2014/09/some-important-context-on-arctic-sea-ice-melt/>

Read it and weep.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I guess I don't know how you can do actual anuttarayoga tsog if you are veggie.

Malcolm wrote:

You can't.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Can the offering be vegetarian?

Malcolm wrote:

Meat and alcohol are indispensable in a ganapuja.

If you refuse it, you are breaking a samaya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:21 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

The global warming crowds even predicted in 2008 that by June 2015, NYC will be underwater. ABC News.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_Gk-qiVK6C4

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...you are confusing entertainment with science. Not even the most radical, hysterical climate scientist would ever endorse such dramatizations.

WeiHan said:

Fine. 7 years ago, Al Gore predicted that the arctic will be completely gone in 5 years. Today, not only has it not disappear, it has grown in size and sea ice content.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm, last I checked Al Gore is also not a climate scientist.

As to your claim:

Arctic sea ice extent for May 2015 averaged 12.65 million square kilometers (4.88 million square miles), the third lowest May ice extent in the satellite record. This is 730,000 square kilometers (282,000 square miles) below the 1981 to 2010 long-term average of 13.38 million square kilometers (5.17 million square miles) and 70,000 square kilometers (27,000 square miles) above the record low for the month, observed in 2004.

<http://nsidc.org/arcticseaicenews/>

WeiHan said:

Sea ice in the Arctic Ocean is at its lowest May level since records began in the 1980s. Ice coverage around the North Pole is currently just 11.32m sq km, compared with a 30 year average of 12.5m sq km.

This figure is even lower than the 11.89m sq km of 2012, when sea ice coverage reached its lowest summer time level. Ice extent generally reaches its lowest level in mid September. In 2012 there were just 3.2m sq km of sea ice in the Arctic.

Arctic sea ice decreased at a rate of around four percent per decade between 1978 and 1996, according to the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC).

The IPCC expects the extent of sea ice to decrease by 20 percent by 2050, with some ice-free summers by the same time.

Melting sea ice does not affect sea levels but it does affect the amount of heat that is absorbed. Typically sea ice reflects between 50 and 70 percent of incoming solar radiation, compared with just seven to 10 percent by ocean water.

This is likely to result in accelerating warming in the Arctic, which in turn, raises the likelihood of accelerating ice loss – a negative feedback.

A loss of sea ice reduces the protection afforded to coastal regions and is expected to result in higher waves and an increase in storm surges, inundation and coastal erosion.

The loss of sea ice does have some benefits; previously inaccessible shipping routes will become open to commercial traffic.

For example, voyage times between Rotterdam, Netherlands and Yokohama, Japan, would be reduced by 40 percent using this Northern Sea Route compared with the conventional route through the Suez Canal.

It is uncertain whether this year's rapid decrease in coverage will be maintained, but warm air over Canada and Alaska is expected to move across the North Pole in the coming week.

The melting of surface ice sets up melt ponds which absorb heat and make the acceleration of ice loss much more likely.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.aljazeera.com/news/2015/05/arctic-sea-ice-disappearing-record-rate-150524091720040.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:07 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

The global warming crowds even predicted in 2008 that by June 2015, NYC will be underwater. ABC News.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_Gk-qiVK6C4

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...you are confusing entertainment with science. Not even the most radical, hysterical climate scientist would ever endorse such dramatizations.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 1:00 AM

Title: Re: Difference between 4th and 5th Skandha

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

off topic again - I've never understood why feeling comes before formations.

Malcolm wrote:

Because it is the strongest mental factor that keeps us in samsara. The aggregates are ordered by their strength in keeping us in samsara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: "V"s in Sanskrit

Content:

Greg said:

Are you saying that to trained ears it always sounds the same and they can never detect a difference?

Further, it is not a silly question. I am curious about why it sometimes sounds to me one way and sometimes sounds another. That is a perfectly legitimately thing to be curious about. If you are hung up on English equivalences we could just call them Sound A and Sound B.

Malcolm wrote:

In Kashmir, this sound was pronounced B as in Baj[z]ra (or as it is today in Nepal) , as noted by Sakya Pandita in How to Pronounce Mantras. It is pronounced Wa, according to his ear, by Central Indians.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 12:44 AM

Title: Re: Difference between 4th and 5th Skandha

Content:

catlady2112 said:

I'm having trouble understanding the skandhas in terms of "experience." Every teacher seems to have different ways of explaining them. I learned them as 1) Form 2) Feeling 3) Discrimination 4) Volition 5) Consciousness.

Malcolm wrote:

They are 1) matter (as opposed to the object of the eye, form) 2) feeling 3) ideation 4) formations 5) consciousness.

catlady2112 said:

It is easy for me to understand the 1st 3 in terms of what my mind does by 1) separating myself from other objects 2) having a positive, negative or neutral feeling and 3) creating a solid concepts around how I file/name them in my mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, the material aggregate includes all physical sense organs as objects. Your understanding of 2 and 3 is ok.

catlady2112 said:

I was taught that #4 was the reaction that resulted from the first 3. For example, I see what appears to be a large snake and become frightened. #4 might be an impulsive reaction: such as my body shaking, screaming or running away.

Malcolm wrote:

Here is another place where you are understanding incorrectly. The formation aggregate is composed of mental factors that operate in formations, there are either 51 or 100 mental factors depending on the presentation. So for example, a positive mind in the desire realm always has 22 mental factors accompanying it. Volition is only one of the ten neutral mental factors that accompany all minds in the desire realm.

Your perception of a snake, and reacting to it viscerally is still 2 and 3. 2 and 3 are mental factors also, but because they have such a strong role in samsara, they are treated as separate aggregates.

catlady2112 said:

Also I've always been confused about #5 Consciousness. Most texts tend to describe this as a concept instead of an experience.

Malcolm wrote:

The aggregate of consciousness is the identical to the mental organ, your mind, it is what thinks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 12:02 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But if you are a Dzogchen practitioner, then since you have methods to benefit sentient beings, being a strict vegetarian is, in his opinion, "miserable compassion."

tomamundsen said:

Does this mean ganachakra, or are there other methods as well?

Malcolm wrote:

All meals should be ganapujas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 20th, 2015 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

See.

Data released showed that "global warming" stopped 16 years ago. The graphs even show that it is cyclical.

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/sciencetech/article-2217286/Global-warming-stopped-16-years-ago-reveals-Met-Office-report-quietly-released--chart-prove-it.html>

So their model is predicting a continuous increase of surface temperature but yet temperature has stalled for 16 years and they have to come up with a cycle theory to patch up an explanation. What does it say? Bottom line, even for a novice that didn't read up their explanation, you should be able to conclude that the model that they have been relying on is inaccurate.

The linear trend from August 1997 (in the middle of an exceptionally strong El Nino) to August 2012 (coming at the tail end of a double-dip La Nina) is about 0.03°C/decade, amounting to a temperature increase of 0.05°C over that period, but equally we could calculate the linear trend from 1999, during the subsequent La Nina, and show a more substantial warming.

As we've stressed before, choosing a starting or end point on short-term scales can be very misleading. Climate change can only be detected from multi-decadal timescales due to the inherent variability in the climate system. If you use a longer period from HadCRUT4 the trend looks very different. For example, 1979 to 2011 shows 0.16°C/decade (or 0.15°C/decade in the NCDC dataset, 0.16°C/decade in GISS).

Looking at successive decades over this period, each decade was warmer than the previous – so the 1990s were warmer than the 1980s, and the 2000s were warmer than both. Eight of the top ten warmest years have occurred in the last decade.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://blog.metoffice.gov.uk/2012/10/14/met-office-in-the-media-14-october-2012/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Relapsing from Buddhist Practice

Content:

kdolma said:

Hi Malcolm and Johnny,

The problem is that since I've started practicing, these afflictive states have been stronger, more and prolonged. Before, there was not much tension/swinging emotions/delusions, maybe it's because I am trying to observe and not let anything manifest in my mind (and/or) letting it manifest but not reacting to it.

I guess I am afraid of creating future suffering through my afflictive states because once I have thought something bad, I am already creating bad karma. The biggest hindrance to this is my self-deception, ego, and self-centeredness. How can I be more honest and sincere in accepting my mistakes and faults?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course they SEEM stronger, but they are not. You are merely seeing them as they are for the first time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 11:47 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

smcj said:

I did not think much of her 30 years ago, but she's been at this a long time.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean when she was 10?

smcj said:

If I remember correctly she was active in the Santa Cruz area as Cali Ma back in the '80s as an adult. She was trying to get some land together near the crest of Hwy 17. She looked much the same.

It occurs to me that if she has figured out the secret to eternal youthful appearance she will become the biggest guru in America!

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, she would have been 11, actually. She was born in 1974, a wood tiger. I think your memory is a little fuzzy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 10:54 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

smcj said:

I did not think much of her 30 years ago, but she's been at this a long time.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean when she was 10?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Justamechanic said:

Thank you Malcolm for answering my post. I'm still confused as to how it is "miserable compassion" to not engage in meat eating. I've never heard him specify that it's okay for practitioners of the lower tantras to be vegetarians. In fact, at the teaching in LA he became red faced and angry and it appeared to me that he slammed his fist down in denouncing vegetarians, he didn't specify as to which practitioners could still be vegetarians. He never mentioned any scriptural reference or commentarial reference to back up this statement. Do you know of any? I have no doubt that Norbu is an enlightened being, it's just that his statements run counter to statements by Chatral Rinpoche and other Dzogchen masters. I thought as Buddhists we were supposed to do no harm. I'm just a blue collar guy in rural Northern California and this really has my head spinning.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, the famous one that ChNN always quotes from the Hevajra Tantra (though you won't find it in the extant two chapter version)

Those with compassion eat meat;

those with samaya drink alcohol.

The Hevajra also observes that one should not distinguish between pure foods (i.e. acceptable to Brahmins) and impure foods.

Then in a treasure of Kunzang Dechen Lingpa connected with six dimensions of Samantabhadra mantra (འཕགས་པ་ཉལ་མཁའ་མཁའ་), it is said:

If yogins who possess great compassion cannot help but accept meat and blood, that should be considered to be the flesh and blood is a sentient being that is actually present...Yogins who have created bodhicitta, there is nothing more profound than this to benefit migrating beings! For example, there isn't anyway to guide sentient beings who have no connections. As in the aforementioned example, likewise after flesh and blood is enjoyed in a feast, their minds are purified and sent up [into the dharmadhātu]. All my lineage of followers should practice this in earnest, bringing benefit both to themselves and others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Boomerang said:

Okay, so is Garchen Rinpoche intentionally sending himself and hundreds of other people to hell, including me and other people on this forum?

Malcolm wrote:

I can only related to you what is described in the tantras. I am not going to opine on Garchen Rinpoche's intentions.

The essence of Vajrayāna is a live connection with a teacher, emphasis on live. If someone wants to study with Garchen Rinpoche, then they should make the effort to go and meet him in person.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

Simon E. said:

How do you propose bringing China and India into line ?

Malcolm wrote:

They need this more than anyone else because they are the two most densely populated places on the planet.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

madhusudan said:

Could all (or most of) the goals of reducing Global Warming be accomplished through a campaign of reducing pollution?

Malcolm wrote:

No. We need a systemic and global reorganization of human society along the lines described by the deep ecologists and social ecologists. Then maybe, just maybe, we wont shit ourselves to death in our own beds.

madhusudan said:

Okay. And that accords perfectly with being responsible for the well being of all sentient beings. But how do you envision that being accomplished?

Locally and voluntarily through education, community building and neighborly collective action?

By fiat through centralized coercive force? e.g. U.N., treaties, laws, etc.

Some combination of those two?

Something else?

I'd prefer the first option, but it is slow and our current systems do not favor it. The urgency of environmental destruction compels us to consider the second. What is your view?

Malcolm wrote:

Our current economic system is not geared towards supporting sustainability because it is based on resource extraction and consumption, rather than conservation and durability.

So we need a combination of local initiatives as well as strong environmental and resource treaties.

We also have to abandon the idea of the growth economy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 8:39 PM

Title: Re: HHDL advice: Westerners to take monk/nun as teacher

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is something stated in the Kālacakra tantra, actually. The best guru is a bhikṣu or bhikṣuni, the next best, a novice, the inferior guru is a householder.

dzoki said:

I think that this statement should not be taken only literally. For example Saraha said after taking consort and having attained realization: "Now I am real bikshu."

I believe that bikshu means something else in tantras and tantric language than it means in sutra and vinaya. Hence the confusion in Tibetan monastic tradition.

Malcolm wrote:

Nice try, but in reality the commentaries like the Vimalaprabha, as well as the Fifty Verses of Guru Devotion, are pretty clear that in this case bhikṣu means bhikṣu, someone who holds all three vows completely, including monastic vows.

Also, Saraha was never a monk.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

madhusudan said:

Could all (or most of) the goals of reducing Global Warming be accomplished through a campaign of reducing pollution?

Malcolm wrote:

No. We need a systemic and global reorganization of human society along the lines described by the deep ecologists and social ecologists. Then maybe, just maybe, we wont shit ourselves to death in our own beds.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

tingdzin said:

In Tibetan Buddhism, as anywhere else, success is rewarded with accolade and failure is rewarded with obscurity, and it really has very little to do with puritan notions of authenticity, as much as we may wish it to be otherwise.

"Authenticity" is actually something to be valued, if the lineages are not to decline, long-term. This is not to say that the Tibetans had their act together on this matter all the time.

Malcolm wrote:

You are completely missing my point. My first point is that no one's qualifications to be a teacher has ever been established or refuted on a board such as Dharmawheel, and so on. My second point is that as long as someone can get some Tibetan to vouch for them, it is very difficult to make an argument that someone is an "inauthentic" teacher.

Those of us who have studied the actual history of Tibetan Buddhism, such as yourself, should understand that charges of charlatanism are quite wide spread among all four schools. We should also understand that charges of charlatanism have never ever prevented anyone from gathering students, building monasteries, funding stupas, statues, pujas, shedras and so on. The Shugden affair should prove that much to everyone. Do most of us here regard Shugden as inauthentic? Yes? Do most of us here regard teachers who promulgate this practice as inauthentic? Yes. Does that stop Shugdenpas in the slightest? No! The same thing applies to Michael Roach, and other "controversial" teachers.

Truly, the people who loose the most in this game of authenticity are the self-appointed purveyors of imagined authenticity. In order to question the authenticity of another teacher, first one must prove that one is in fact an arbiter of such authenticity. None of us here can do this. Because of this, accusing this women of being a fraud or a charlatan is a losing game. It is also unfair, and even sexist.

Honestly, the best practice is that when someone you know personally approaches you in private about this or that teachers credentials, then you can give your opinion — but making a public spectacle out of someone who is regarded as a teacher by others is simple bad form. I know, because I have been involved in this practice in the past and now regard it as folly.

You will recall that even Chogyur Lingpa in the beginning was derided as a charlatan. It was mainly due to his association with Khyentse Wangpo that his revelations were found acceptable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 7:35 AM

Title: Re: Namkhai Norbu and Vegetarianism

Content:

Justamechanic said:

Hello All, I'm a new member here and was wondering if anyone knows why Namkhai Norbu is so against vegetarianism? I attended one of his teachings about a year ago and he said that vegetarianism is the "worst kind of compassion". He has repeated this stance on other occasions. I know of no other Buddhist teacher or teaching that contains this message. My partner is a long time student of his and this is creating a lot of friction in my relationship as I am a long time vegetarian and an eleven year student of both Kagyu and Nyingma teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

He is not against Vegetarianism, per se. If you are a common Mahāyāna practitioner, or a practitioner of lower tantras, he is all for it.

But if you are a Dzogchen practitioner, then since you have methods to benefit sentient beings, being a strict vegetarian is, in his opinion, "miserable compassion."

If he is not your teacher, however, you should let your partner know that he or she is conditioning you, since that is also not correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 7:33 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Fa Dao said:

This is getting ridiculous... the abrahamic religions cannot and will not lead one to Total Enlightenment. Nowhere in any of their writings or teachings does it even include the idea of it..no base for it, no path for it, and no mention of any fruit for it. To say that these traditions are the spiritual equal of Buddhadharma in that regard is nothing but politically correct nonsense...its just that simple.....sorry man, I know its against the "rules" here but somebody had to say it...

steveb1 said:

Sorry, but there are strands of the New Testament that do include the idea of enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

Bodhi is a very specific idea. Nothing in Christianity remotely approaches it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 5:38 AM

Title: Re: Relapsing from Buddhist Practice

Content:

kdolma said:

Hi everyone,

I am still new to Buddhism and felt a tremendous sense of renunciation and clarity when I was first introduced. Death, impermanence, karma,etc..seemed to make complete sense before and I felt very inspired and confident, fearless, courageous, and uplifted like I had really found something profound that had stripped all the earlier notions I had about life/this world. But now, it's as if I have forgotten everything and the earlier renunciation seems to have faded, and I don't sense much urgency like before.

What can I do if I relapse with my practice? I feel so guilty, ashamed, and can't shake out the self-hate and self-blaming when I wasn't practicing mentally very well throughout the day. My anger and aggression keeps coming up and it completely overwhelms me that I end up mentally thinking bad things about others, hating them, blaming them and then I regret it and keep going round and round in circles. When I get angry at my friends and family, since I've harmed them, I can't shake out the anger, guilt, blame, and hate towards myself. Also, the most saddest thing is my self-deception, "oh it's ok, I can try even harder and purify next time even if I have gotten angry at someone..."

Please help me with your advice especially for someone who is still new to Buddhism.

Malcolm wrote:

All of this is afflictive thinking. You need to recognize it for what it is and not give it a lot of energy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 4:18 AM

Title: Re: Maintaining Motivation

Content:

Anders said:

How would one go about regulating this element to address such a disorder then?

Malcolm wrote:

Yantra yoga, prāṇayāma, eating a vata pacifying diet and so on.

Vasana said:

Do you have any reliable resources to point to for a vata pacifying diet Malcolm?

Not always satisfied with the credibility of some of the links found online.

Malcolm wrote:

Dr. Lad's website has good reliable information about this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 4:16 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Tenso said:

How so?

Malcolm wrote:

My afflictions are much reduced as a result of following the Dharma. I am unconfused about reality. What else is awakening other than that?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

Upaya must be explicit?

Malcolm wrote:

For example, Śīlabhadra writes in the Āryabuddhabhūmivyākhyāna:

Skillful means is the path that equally produces wisdom and compassion.

Asanga's Abhidharmasammucaya defines it like so:

Skill means is of four kinds: the skill in ripening sentient beings is the four means of conversion; [sentient beings] are placed in the virtues because of having been gathered by those [four means]

Queequeg said:

Please correct me if I'm mistaken.

My understanding of skillful means is that the being led by skillful means does not know that they are being led by skillful means. They may have no idea that they are being drawn onto the path. Its only in retrospect that they might realize they were being led.

I don't think this is at odds with the commentaries you cited.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm...we do not sucker people into following the Dharma. We lead them, openly and honestly, to the Dharma. We do not, as they say in Tibet, show the tail of the deer to sell horse meat, i.e. use deceptive practices.

In other words, we do not tell people oh, Jesus taught Buddhahood. We can say to Christians who show an interest in Dharma, however, "Jesus and Buddha are alike in that they both taught compassion", and then explain why the compassion taught by the Buddha is more profound than that taught by Jesus, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

Climate scientists caught fudging data again.

<http://news.heartland.org/newspaper-article/2014/09/19/australian-meteorologists-caught-fudging-numbers>

Malcolm wrote:

<https://theconversation.com/no-the-bureau-of-meteorology-is-not-fiddling-its-weather-data-31009>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is no. Neither of those two worldly traditions will bring anyone even within the vicinity of true awakening, let alone near it — so how can they be upāyas?

An upāya is something used to introduce someone to the path.

Tenso said:

Buddhism leads to true awakening? You know this for sure or is it just mere faith?

Malcolm wrote:

I know this for sure.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

Upaya must be explicit?

Malcolm wrote:

For example, Śīlabhadra writes in the Āryabuddhabhūmivyākhyāna:

Skillful means is the path that equally produces wisdom and compassion.

Asanga's Abhidharmasammucaya defines it like so:

Skill means is of four kinds: the skill in ripening sentient beings is the four means of conversion; [sentient beings] are placed in the virtues because of having been gathered by those [four means]

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, there are all kinds of Sufis. Some make the Taliban look like liberals.

My point still stands, however. If someone's refuge is Buddha, Dharma Sangha, then they are Buddhist — but if not, then not.

My knowledge of Sufism is limited to Mystical Dimensions of Islam.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm not going to debate whether she is really a Buddhist.

That would take getting into the theology and ontology of her school of Sufism and how she reconciled her native Sufi practice and upbringing with the dharma. That's not my voice. That said, in the time she tutored me in her tradition, there was nothing that contradicted the four seals of the dharma.

It's also something I categorically won't do: police people's refuge.
Sure. It's still weird to me though...

I hadn't thought of any of this stuff in years and years and years.

I guess it's my karma to be introduced to compassion to animals, vegetarianism, etc., from an observant muslim woman. Forever screwed to have have a perspective one can meaningfully share with others...

Malcolm wrote:

If her refuge is Buddha, Dharma, Sangha, she is not a Muslim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 2:16 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is no. Neither of those two worldly traditions will bring anyone even within the vicinity of true awakening, let alone near it — so how can they be upāyas?

Queequeg said:

That's a an unwieldy proposition - not disagreeing, but there are too many component parts - so I propose setting this aside for the time being at least.

Earlier you said:

A means used to bring people to the definitive meaning which is the Buddha, i.e. the state of total awakening.

An upāya is something used to introduce someone to the path.
Was this narrowing of scope intentional?

Malcolm wrote:

People cannot be brought to the definitive meaning without being introduced to the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 2:14 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

Climate scientists have been caught tempering with climate data that world scientists relied on <http://www.telegraph.co.uk/comment/11367272/Climategate-the-sequel-How-we-are-STILL-being-tricked-with-flawed-data-on-global-warming.html>

Malcolm wrote:

<http://www.factcheck.org/2015/02/nothing-false-about-temperature-data/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 2:06 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Sure. It' still weird to me though...

I hadn't thought of any of this stuff in years and years and years.

I guess it's my karma to be introduced to compassion to animals, vegetarianism, etc., from an observant muslim woman. Forever screwed to have have a perspective one can meaningfully share with others...

Malcolm wrote:

If her refuge is Buddha, Dharma, Sangha, she is not a Muslim.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 1:47 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

What about my question?

Malcolm wrote:

I answered it with another question.

Queequeg said:

I don't think your question answered my question at all.

Malcolm wrote:

The answer is no. Neither of those two worldly traditions will bring anyone even within the vicinity of true awakening, let alone near it — so how can they be upāyas?

An upāya is something used to introduce someone to the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Sidebar: This is a really good example of how strange I find this forum. I made a posting about whether anyone knew any muslims or had been to any Islamic cultural events, and a few posts later I'm defending whether I'd eat a halal kabob.

Malcolm wrote:

The kind of food and type of event has bearing on the discussion, no?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

What about my question?

Malcolm wrote:

I answered it with another question.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 1:40 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

I'm not ready to write everything non-Buddhist off. Convince me.

Malcolm wrote:

What is the cause of samsara?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Global Warming / Climate Change: Caused by human activi

Content:

WeiHan said:

I am the only one that vote NO. There is no global warming. It is a hoax created by corrupted politicians and quack scientists so that they can leverage more tax money to support their further corruption.

The plot of the average earth temperature with that of the activities of the Sun shows that it swing up and down in phase with the activities of the sun. In other words, temperature of earth moves in cycle and corelates more with the cycle of the activities of the Sun than anything else.

Malcolm wrote:

Anthropogenic global warming is the scientific consensus, whether you like it or not.

WeiHan said:

Climate-warming trends over the past century are very likely due to human activities. In addition, most of the leading scientific organizations worldwide have issued public statements endorsing this position. The following is a partial list of these organizations, along with links to their published statements and a selection of related resources.

Malcolm wrote:

<http://climate.nasa.gov/scientific-consensus/>

Here is a list of the all the scientific organizations that consent to that position:

http://opr.ca.gov/s_listoforganizations.php

So you are really going to go out on a limb and say that all of these scientific organizations made up of "quacks?"

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

Are means which draw a person closer to total awakening yet not completely, not upaya?

Malcolm wrote:

The question you ought to asking yourself is whether the two worldly traditions you have identified as "upāya" will draw a person anywhere even within the vicinity of total awakening, let alone near it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 19th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

Jesus?

Upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not an upāya, either for his followers, nor for Buddhists who do not have any need for Jesus.

Queequeg said:

Mohamed?

Upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not an upāya, either for his followers, nor for Buddhists who do not have any need for Muhammed.

Queequeg said:

Buddha?

Not upaya?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha is the definitive meaning for Buddhists, so no, again, not an upāya.

Queequeg said:

Upaya. All upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Not everything is an upāya.

Queequeg said:

How do you define upaya?

Malcolm wrote:

A means used to bring people to the definitive meaning which is the Buddha, i.e. the state of total awakening.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 10:18 PM

Title: Re: Maintaining Motivation

Content:

Anders said:

How would one go about regulating this element to address such a disorder then?

Malcolm wrote:

Yantra yoga, prāṇayāma, eating a vata pacifying diet and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So should Buddhists avoid sacrificed meat?

Meaning, that one should not be present at a sacrifice or a festival celebrating such a sacrifice and partake of that meat.

Urgyen Dorje said:

Thanks for the clarification. I hear what you're saying and appreciate it.

For me, I don't see the difference between the ritual sacrifice of Eid al-Adha and ritual sacrifice of dabiha (making halal meat). I don't think a Buddhist should be present at either, or partake of the meat of either.

Malcolm wrote:

So then in that case you, as a Vajrayāna practitioner, are condemning that animal to further samsara by refusing to partake of its meat at all. It is one thing to refuse lobster mistakenly killed for you by a host. The purpose of this is to make it clear that it is not an honor to slaughter animals for guests in order to prevent the idea that Buddhist monks in particular will be partial to those who kill their best animals in return for prayers and so on. It is quite another thing, if one is a meat eater, to refuse a kosher frank on the grounds that it was slaughtered according to a religious custom in which one played no part and refuse to consume it according to criteria laid out for the beneficial consumption of meat by lamas like ChNN and Kunzang Dechen Lingpa. Ironically, virtually all of the meat eaten by Tibetans in Lhasa in the past, and these days in, India is Halal. There have been some very blatantly racist attempts by Tibetans in Tibet to get Tibetans to stop eating in Muslim restaurants (such as the story that they gather the lice that feed on country people, the resulting human blood from which makes their food more tasty, or that they use the foot washing water of Imams to somehow magically convert people to Islam), but nevertheless, Tibetans continue to frequent Muslim restaurants and eat halal meat everywhere they are.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Interview with Khenchen Rigdzin Dorje on the Nyingmapa V

Content:

DENZONG said:

To whom does the Taktse Nyingma Institute, Gangtok, Sikkim. Belong to, who is the owner of the property?

Malcolm wrote:

Khenchen Rigzin Dorje, who graduated from the Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies in Sarnath, and is actually very learned.

<http://nyingmainstitutemartam.org/Institute.aspx>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

MiphamFan said:

What's incoherent?

He said yes, Buddhists should avoid halal/kosher meat. Sounds coherent to me.

Urgyen Dorje said:

I was responding to an earlier post, where Malcolm said this:

I did not say that Buddhists ought not eat halal/kosher meat, I said they should not attend such festivals, in the same way they should not attend the sacrificial pujas at Dakshin-kali in Nepal, or animal sacrifices in Africa and so on.

Before I submitted that response, he clarified, in response to your question actually, and said Buddhists shouldn't eat halal or kosher meat.

Malcolm wrote:

I didn't say that actually. As far as I am concerned it is fine, as long as you don't order the animal killed yourself, see it killed, etc.

I answered this question:

So should Buddhists avoid sacrificed meat?

Meaning, that one should not be present at a sacrifice or a festival celebrating such a sacrifice and partake of that meat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 9:29 PM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Queequeg said:

Jesus?

Upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not an upāya, either for his followers, nor for Buddhists who do not have any need for Jesus.

Queequeg said:

Mohamed?

Upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

No, not an upāya, either for his followers, nor for Buddhists who do not have any need for Muhammed.

Queequeg said:

Buddha?

Not upaya?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha is the definitive meaning for Buddhists, so no, again, not an upāya.

Queequeg said:

Upaya. All upaya.

Malcolm wrote:

Not everything is an upāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 9:22 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

It is an incoherent argument to suggest that Buddhists should not attend Eid al-Adha (agreed) but that Buddhists eating halal or kosher meat is fine. If you look at it closely, dabihah, ritual slaughter of animals for halal meat, is effectively ritual sacrifice as Allah's name must be evoked, the animal's head turn to the qibla, the direction of prayer, towards Mecca, the Qaaba, and so on.

The other aspect is that halal slaughter maximizes the suffering of the animal, so it is no different than Eid al-Adha. The animals are not stunned before theyir throats are slit.

Even if a Buddhist eats meat through the three purities and so on, unless halal is given as alms or as a gift from a host, I would think a Buddhist would avoid halal like contagion.

But that's just me.

MiphamFan said:
What's incoherent?

He said yes, Buddhists should avoid halal/kosher meat. Sounds coherent to me.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I did not say one should avoid either. Once the animal is dead, it is dead and there is no further suffering one is causing by going to a Middle Eastern Restaurant, for example, run by Muslims and ordering the lamb kabob. Same with a Kosher frank.

The problem lies in supporting a religious activity predicated on ignorance, not in eating meat itself.

The question of meat eating is separate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Malcolm...

It is an incoherent argument to suggest that Buddhists should not attend Eid al-Adha (agreed) but that Buddhists eating halal or koshet meat is fine. If you look at it closely, dabihah, ritual slaughter of animals for halal meat, is effectively ritual sacrifice as Allah's name must be evoked, the animal's head turn to the qibla, the direction of prayer, towards Mecca, the Qaaba, and so on.

The other aspect is that halal slaughter maximizes the suffering of the animal, so it is no different than Eid al-Adha. The animals are not stunned before theyir throats are slit.

Even if a Buddhist eats meat through the three purities and so on, unless halal is given as alms or as a gift from a host, I would think a Buddhist would avoid halal like contagion.

But that's just me.

Malcolm wrote:

Most people are not going to run into Halal meat in the US. In the rare instance they do, they probably won't know it. If you go to a Muslim country, most of the meat will be of that variety.

Eating food slaughtered with a prayer is not the same thing as attending a religious festival predicated on the ritual slaughter of millions of animals. I can see why some people think they are commensurate, but I do not. In the former case, you, as a practitioner, have a chance to benefit the animal with a mantra, no matter how it was slaughtered; in the latter case you are lending support to something which is done out of ignorance.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: "V"s in Sanskrit

Content:

MiphamFan said:

It's neither /w/ nor /v/.

It's a https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Labiodental_approximant. Sometimes it sounds more like /w/ or /v/ to your ears if you are unfamiliar with the sound.

Malcolm wrote:

That really clears things up.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 8:26 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

How is sacrifice at Eid al-Adha different from halal/kosher animal slaughter?

Should Buddhists also avoid halal/kosher meat?

I did not say that Buddhists ought not eat halal/kosher meat, I said they should not attend such festivals, in the same way they should not attend the sacrificial pujas at Dakshin-kali in Nepal, or animal sacrifices in Africa and so on.

MiphamFan said:

I know you didn't say that, that's why I'm asking.

What's the difference between regular halal/kosher slaughter and the festivals? It's just a greater scale on a particular occasion isn't it? Ordinary halal/kosher slaughter also is in the name of Allah/YHWH, so it's also "sacrifice". So should Buddhists avoid sacrificed meat?

Malcolm wrote:

Generally, yes, unless you are starving.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 7:58 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm curious how many people actually know muslims? How many people have family, friends, or colleagues who are muslims?

I'm also curious how many people have actually participated in a muslim religious activity? Gone to a mosque open house? Gone to a prayer service or a wedding or funeral? Attended an Islamic cultural event? Attended an Eid banquet at the end of Ramadan?

Given everything going on in the world, it's natural that much is being said about muslims and Islam. I guess that's good. It's important to think and discuss things. At the same time, I'm always curious where truth claims come from and how they are formed.

Malcolm wrote:

Eid al-Adha, the Festival of Sacrifice, is one of the chief roots of the problems with Islam: The sacrificed animals, called aḍḥiya (Arabic: أضحية, also known by its Persian term, Qurbāni), have to meet certain age and quality standards or else the animal is considered an unacceptable sacrifice. This tradition accounts for the slaughter of more than 100 million animals in only two days of Eid.
A Buddhist cannot and ought not attend such a feast.

The Ramadan feast, however does not present such problems.

MiphamFan said:

How is sacrifice at Eid al-Adha different from halal/kosher animal slaughter?

Should Buddhists also avoid halal/kosher meat?

Malcolm wrote:

I did not say that Buddhists ought not eat halal/kosher meat, I said they should not attend such festivals, in the same way they should not attend the sacrificial pujas at Dakshin-kali in Nepal, or animal sacrifices in Africa and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 7:55 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

tingdzin said:

Large, "successful" organizations with lots of "satisfied customers" does not mean authenticity by any means. Is the whole point of the thing to make people feel good while raking in their money? If real teachers with something to offer don't have students, it may be because the marketing skills of charlatans have kept them in the shade.

Malcolm wrote:

Frankly, I have noted a process, repeated often in western organizations, where after building a student base (even if considered charlatans), said organizers are then granted full legitimacy by some Tibetan, sometimes famous, sometimes obscure.

The process runs as follows; build students, present them to a lineage teacher (with donations to favored charities of course), have the lineage teacher recognize you as the teacher of said group of students, eventually gain recognition as a reincarnation or an emanation (or failing that, just be titled Lama So and So) — boom, you have arrived. Now you can confidently get articles published in Buddhadharma, Shambhala Sun, Tricycle, and land that Harper-Collins book deal you have been craving so that you can crack into the "Barnes & Nobles" Buddhist scene.

In Tibetan Buddhism, as anywhere else, success is rewarded with accolade and failure is rewarded with obscurity, and it really has very little to do with puritan notions of authenticity, as much as we may wish it to be otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 2:33 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Not remotely qualified either but IMHO the kind response from Garchen Institute is not quite the whole story. Apologies all round if I am incorrect, but Rinpoche has made his own statement on this. I can't remember exactly where I read it, but it is out there somewhere. It was a carefully qualified statement.

Boomerang said:

His qualifications were that you need faith and the recording should be a necessity, not a convenience. You should only rely on recorded empowerments if you are unable to get them live. The whole reason he started doing this was that he felt bad for people who traveled long distances for empowerments. He also said that the power of the video comes from your faith and devotion to the dharma, so if you have no faith an empowerment won't work even if you are there live.

Malcolm wrote:

The reasoning is the same as the following "If one has sufficient faith in some tantra one wants to practice, one can receive the empowerment from the book." This reasoning is condemned by the Buddha in the tantras themselves. The Buddha teaches in the Mahāmudratilaka Tantra:

Without empowerment there is no siddhi, just as pressing sand yields no oil.

If someone reveals the tantras and agamas with pride to those who lack empowerment, as soon as [both] master and disciple die they go to hell even if they obtained siddhi.

The commentary to this tantra, the Śrīguhyārthaprakāśamahādbhūta-nāma, states:
...the disciple upon whom the empowerment is correctly bestowed becomes a suitable vessel for the topics of the profound intimate instructions of the body and so on.
Without that however, if the meaning of the tantras is revealed to one who lacks empowerment, it is said the master and the disciple have a root downfall.

One should be very aware of the faults of not receiving empowerment. For example, The Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva Tantra states:

Where will accomplishment be without relying on the empowerments of secret mantra?
For example, like a boatman without a paddle, how will one be able to cross to the other side?

The Self-arisen Vidyā Tantra states:

The faults of not obtaining the empowerment are as follows: in the bardo one is alarmed, panicked, exhausted, impeded, and also one can lose consciousness.

While one has not left the body of traces, migrating beings will not see one as worthy of respect. One's merit will be small, one's life short, one's enjoyments of living will be few, one will be powerless and many obstacles will occur. Nothing will be accomplished.

Those are the faults of not obtaining the empowerment for the practice of Secret Mantra. So people who are interested in Vajrayāna should think very carefully about what is valid and what is not valid, one's path depends on it. In this respective, a conservative approach will never harm one.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Maintaining Motivation

Content:

Fa Dao said:

Wayfarer,

I am older as well (53) We all have problems with motivation from time to time. I try to keep it simple. You are going to die...maybe an hour from now or maybe a couple of decades BUT it IS going to happen. When I have problems with motivation I try to bring this to the forefront in my mind..not as an intellectual idea or construct but the Reality of it, the Knowing of it. So you have a choice...dying with Awareness and no fear or dying freaked out, confused and at the mercy of your past karma. Your practice is the ONLY thing that will get you through that process. I should clarify though..its not a matter of freaking yourself out and guiltting yourself into doing practice..its about giving yourself a reality check....putting things into perspective...

Malcolm wrote:

As Guru Rinpoche said:

Having assembled here, you all must listen well. The minds of all these Buddhists of Tibet, for the most part, have never been prepared. So in all of their Dharma activity, thoughts of death and impermanence have not arisen in their minds. If it had arisen, this laziness and indolence would have never existed...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 1:03 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I don't disagree with you. Animal sacrifice is some dark stuff.

I agree. Animal sacrifice will draw and encourage all sorts of dark stuff.

I'm just pointing out that there is a long standing response within the Islamic tradition against animal sacrifice, including Eid al-Adha. There is a tradition of scriptural interpretation that asserts it was Mohammed's intention that his followers be vegetarians and not sacrifice animals. People of such a tradition see animal sacrifice, including Eid al-Adha, as haram, not hallal.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is the sacrifice of animals, not the eating of meat. It is the same with Jews in Israel. If anyone wonders why there is so much violence in these regions of the world, Africa, Middle East, South America, Mexico and so on, it is largely due to the practice of sacrificing animals.

Not enough of a response, for example, to stem the 3.4 billion US spent in Pakistan each year for Eid al-Adha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 18th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Eid al-Adha, the Festival of Sacrifice, is one of the chief roots of the problems with Islam: The sacrificed animals, called adhiya (Arabic: أضحية, also known by its Persian term, Qurbāni), have to meet certain age and quality standards or else the animal is considered an unacceptable sacrifice. This tradition accounts for the slaughter of more than 100 million animals in only two days of Eid.

Urgyen Dorje said:

And thus the genesis of a long tradition of muslim vegetarians who don't eat meat, much less observe the animal sacrifices of Eid al-Adha.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is the sacrifice of animals, not the eating of meat. It is the same with Jews in Israel. If anyone wonders why there is so much violence in these regions of the world, Africa, Middle East, South America, Mexico and so on, it is largely due to the practice of sacrificing animals.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 9:23 PM

Title: Re: Myanmar monk's Islamophobia

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I'm curious how many people actually know muslims? How many people have family, friends, or colleagues who are muslims?

I'm also curious how many people have actually participated in a muslim religious activity? Gone to a mosque open house? Gone to a prayer service or a wedding or funeral? Attended an Islamic cultural event? Attended an Eid banquet at the end of Ramadan?

Given everything going on in the world, it's natural that much is being said about muslims and Islam. I guess that's good. It's important to think and discuss things. At the same time, I'm always curious where truth claims come from and how they are formed.

Malcolm wrote:

Eid al-Adha, the Festival of Sacrifice, is one of the chief roots of the problems with Islam: The sacrificed animals, called aḍḥiya (Arabic: أضحية, also known by its Persian term, Qurbāni), have to meet certain age and quality standards or else the animal is considered an unacceptable sacrifice. This tradition accounts for the slaughter of more than 100 million animals in only two days of Eid.

A Buddhist cannot and ought not attend such a feast.

The Ramadan feast, however does not present such problems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: HHDL advice: Westerners to take monk/nun as teacher

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is something stated in the Kālacakra tantra, actually. The best guru is a bhikṣu or bhikṣuni, the next best, a novice, the inferior guru is a householder.

Adamantine said:

What text was it that you quoted that said the best guru is a terton (who are mostly never bhiksus)?

Malcolm wrote:

No idea.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: HHDL advice: Westerners to take monk/nun as teacher

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is something stated in the Kālacakra tantra, actually. The best guru is a bhikṣu or bhikṣuṇi, the next best, a novice, the inferior guru is a householder.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Undifferentiated consciousness and non-duality

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

How can awareness have non-awareness as its cause, in the form of inert chemicals in a mass of flesh?

I mean, this conversation has been had a million times on DW, but it seems to come up every now and then anyway undefineable said:

Actually, it might if there is something in the complexity of advanced physical systems that ignites awareness. But this is to bring 'mind' into "matter", which is known as animism

Herbie said:

From my perspective using the word "mind" and associating "animism" is just the effect of not knowing yet what science still has to find out about what I called "conscious events". The issue here is that language which is based on subject-object-dualism is "applied to something" (again language!) which actually is not "something" but the ideating subject expressing itself which is without that dualism. But there is no way out. "A bulb is emitting light."

"A reaction of material chemicals is emitting heat or radioactive rays."

"A specific organisational structure of organic material is emitting conscious events."

Issue here is that the latter expression must fall short of linguistically expressing the transformation from subject-object to "non-dual subject" perspective. It always is fixed in linguistic subject-object-dualism merely through the fact that the expression has to be read (expression as object) and an idea synthesized which again mirrors subject-object-dualism of language. Therefore the meaning of "A specific organisational structure of organic material is emitting conscious events." rarely is understood appropriately. The same holds true with "every conscious event is just a representation of neuronal processes."

Malcolm wrote:

You really need to read Thomas Nagle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 7:16 AM

Title: Re: Dropping Jesus

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I recently encountered some rhetoric on this board that was so viscerally hateful of Christians and Christianity that it chilled my blood. It is something so contrary to my dharma experience and training that I couldn't get my mind around it. It kept me up at night.

Malcolm wrote:

As for myself, I am simply indifferent to Christianity. I find it weird the same way they find Buddhadharma weird. I cannot relate to a soul or a personal savior (or even an impersonal one at that). I can't relate to the Jesus myth on any level in a spiritual sense. It does not move me any more than any other story of humans being cruel to other humans, and in many respects, far less.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 5:59 AM

Title: Re: Exorcism for a nation

Content:

Norwegian said:

I think there's just one stupa in Norway...

Malcolm,

Changchub Dorje had a terma for the construction of 108 special stupas to avert the Chinese invasion of Tibet, and these were never built. But could they be built outside of Tibet, and have a similar effect (on negativities)? Or do we need entirely new termas for this purpose, or are there specific stupas already existing that would be built according to how each location is (qualifications, properties, etc.)?

And while we're on the topic of stupas, how much does a stupa with its construction cost? I know it depends on size, type of stupa, how it's made, and so on, but does anybody have an estimate price from at least the lowest price possible while still having a fully qualified and effective stupa that fulfills its purpose, like for example the stupas of Changchub Dorje's stupa terma.

Malcolm wrote:

It was a time sensitive terma.

A proper stupa would cost at least $50,000. So one would need $5,400,000, not including the land, at minimum. That does not include zoning, permits, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 5:50 AM

Title: Re: Exorcism for a nation

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

How many are in the USA now; how many in Mexico now?

Malcolm wrote:

Not so many in Mexico.

62 that I can count one page. They missed the one at Dzogchen Community in MA, so 63. Then there is the little stupa complex of William Cassidy. So may another 9 or so.

kirtu said:

There are at least 69 (including some pagodas) and a few not counted. But the Garden of 1000 Buddhas in Montana has at least 20-40 more right now.

But what we need is a stupa project, where the stupas are sited geomantically.

Which is quite different from what you said above

Malcolm wrote:

As would erecting 108 stupas in the US.

kirtu said:

placement wrt geomancy we probably do not have.

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Right, my point was 108 erected as a deliberate project, not just random stupas here and there, along the lines of the 108 stupas erected by Songtsen Gampo.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 4:25 AM

Title: Re: Maintaining Motivation

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

I like this piece of advice from ChNN's "Dzogchen: The Self-Perfected State": The Dzogchen teachings advise one never to force the condition of one's energy, but always to be aware of its limits in all the various circumstances one encounters. If at times one does not feel like sitting down to practice then one should avoid setting up a struggle against oneself. It could be that there is some problem of our energy that we don't know about behind our feeling like this. In such situations it is important to know how to relax, and how to give oneself space, in order not to block the progress of one's practice. Problems of loneliness, of depression, of mental confusion and so on, also often derive from an unbalanced condition of our energy.

Malcolm wrote:

And here he is talking rlung, vata, the air element in our bodies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 4:24 AM

Title: Re: Exorcism for a nation

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

How many are in the USA now; how many in Mexico now?

Malcolm wrote:

Not so many in Mexico.

62 that I can count one page. They missed the one at Dzogchen Community in MA, so 63. Then there is the little stupa complex of William Cassidy. So may another 9 or so.

But what we need is a stupa project, where the stupas are sited geomantically.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 2:48 AM

Title: Re: Exorcism for a nation

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

Things are so bad that exorcists are trying to expel some of the demonic forces from the entire nation of Mexico.

<http://www.ewtnnews.com/catholic-news/Americas.php?id=12235>

Malcolm wrote:

While in Mexico, I suggested to some Mexicans they needed to erect 108 stupas in the country. This would definitely pacify all problems in Mexico. As would erecting 108 stupas in the US.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 17th, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Decreasing attention spans.

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I have some experience with that actually. My first Tibetan teacher taught me to use the THDL translation tools. That was sort of cool. I could type in Wylie and get something I could try to gloss. My subsequent teacher was a linguist instead of an anthropologist/historian and he'd have none of that and he'd show me why glosses with THDL were robbing me from learning the language.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, too many mistakes are perpetuated by using the Valby/Rangjung Yeshe dictionary.

kirtu said:

The Rangjung Yeshe dictionary is problematic?

Kirt

Malcolm wrote:

Of course. It is at best a collection of terms earlier translators have used. I use it, but only in conjunction with Alak Kankar's Tibetan - Tibetan dictionary.

One cannot produce a reliable translation solely using the Valby/Rangjung Yeshe dictionary.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 8:57 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Jikan said:

I was hoping to go back to Malcolm's important posts on Rawls and subsequent libertarian thought. What differentiates Rawls from thinkers like Nozick, Friedman, Hayek, von Mises, or G Becker, and hacks like Ayn Rand, is a theory of justice--of freedom articulated as justice, and not just as brand preference or the will to power.

Here's a useful summary:

All social primary goods - liberty and opportunity, income and wealth, and the bases of self-respect - are to be distributed equally unless an unequal distribution of any or all of these goods is to the advantage of the least favored.

much more here:

<http://www.ohio.edu/people/piccard/entropy/rawls.html>

Does this assume some means to guarantee the equal distribution of social goods to all?

Yes. And interestingly enough, that is what differentiates conservatism (think Edmund Burke) and leftist thought on one side from liberal / neoliberal / libertarian thought on the other. I mean to say that there are elements on the left and the right that agree on the fundamental problems with libertarian doctrine and practice, which goes right back to the poll that started this thread. Speaking personally, I find it a lot easier to enjoy a conversation with a reader of William Buckley than a reader of Milton Friedman or a consumer of Atlas Shrugged.

Finally, on Nozick: G.A. Cohen's persistent critiques of Nozick and other libertarian thinkers remain relevant, even twenty years later, because they haven't yet been adequately rebutted. Start here if you're interested.

<http://www.cambridge.org/US/academic/subjects/politics-international-relations/political-theory/self-ownership-freedom-and-equality>

Malcolm wrote:

I think that characterizing Nozick, and for the matter Hayek, as "libertarians" is short-sighted. Certainly libertarians who have misread these two guys have held them up as influences.

Hayek's main bugaboo is the planned economy, and his main observation is that a planned economy cannot fairly predict all needs, and therefore, it becomes defacto unethical favoritism; whereas in an unplanned economy, the chips fall where they may lay. However, it is not the case that Hayek was completely opposed to regulation, social programs and so on.

Nozick, it seems, was not very interested in defending his book on any level. Rawls and he were good friends, and I suspect that in Nozick's case, ASU was an intellectual exercise rather than a intellectual commitment. One interesting outcome of his book however, is that he asserts in ASU that we do not have the right to slaughter animals, and he apparently was himself a vegetarian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lobsang said:

But still you seem not to have an understanding of the process of lung transmission, so it is just that you believe and state something that you don't understand, or I'm wrong?

Malcolm wrote:

You are wrong.

A "lung" happens when someone reads a text to you. It is a form of authorization to read a restricted text. It cannot be given by an inanimate object.

There is no "energy" or anything esoteric at all.

Sūtras, such as the Suvarnaprabhasa, do not require any transmission, reading or otherwise.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 2:22 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lobsang said:

Then it stands like your word 'vs' the words of Lama Zopa, HE Gyaltsab Rinpoche, Garchen Rinpoche, ...

But still there's no answer up here to my primary question - did HE Gyaltsab Rinpoche really state that?

Malcolm wrote:

Sutras DO NOT REQUIRE A LUNG.

There is no way a recording can bestow transmission, and I don't care who asserts the opposite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 1:29 AM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Update: appears to be a common error, but I swore in the credits they were cast as the Vulvalini.

dzogchungpa said:

OK, you're off the hook.

BTW, I saw it yesterday and the credits do indeed say 'Vuvalini'. I would be surprised if the similarity to 'Vulvalini' was unintentional though.

Malcolm wrote:

And your other impressions?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 1:06 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Everything you wrote here...

Lobsang said:

But it is if I have a notion of lung as a transmission of energy, ie. sound, ie. vibration onto an energy system of a human or other being. In that conception I could think that just hearing a complex of vibrations may 'initiate' my energies. So that makes it complicated, that's why I asked you about a detailed description of lung, what it is, and if it is necessary to project the energy to a certain part of the student's energy system, or is it necessary to invoke Buddhas who in actuality then give you a lung, etcetera, etcetera...

As an inanimate sound of music can brake windows if it's too loud, as an inamite sound of music can make my emotions different if it is in a certain 'proper' form, so I can think that a mantra recording of a specific sound of a specific master can make my energy system different in a significant manner to call it a lung. Or a master can have a siddhi to connect it with me, etcetera. Who knows;

that's why I'm asking.

Cheers.

Malcolm wrote:

...is a lot of complicated conceptual proliferation that has no basis whatsoever in the texts.

So, I really do not have anything more to add other than what I stated above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

Trolley car dilemma. With no other knowledge, you save as many people as possible.

The environmental train-wreck upon us is a bit different.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, and it may be too late.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 12:46 AM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all, you have a philosophical vantage point, but these issues are not easy.

For example, there is a train track and there is a split in the track. You are standing at the switch. There is a runaway train. On track A there is one person. On track B, a work crew. You have no time to alert either. If you do nothing, the work crew all die. If you save them, the person on track A dies.

What do you do?

dzogchungpa said:
Maybe these will help?

<http://www.dhammadownload.com/viewtopic.php?t=8528>
<http://blogs.dickinson.edu/buddhistethics/2014/01/05/the-trolley-car-dilemma/>

Malcolm wrote:
It does not help at all, since Pandita frames the question in entirely Hinayāna terms. He claims that Buddhist values are absolute, and this just isn't so.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 12:28 AM
Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives
Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:
Political ecology is something personal to me, so I apologize if I've contributed to the thread inappropriately. From Malcolm's prompt, it seems I should have been having this discussion from a specific philosophical vantage point. Maybe I'll get those books and read them.

Malcolm wrote:
Not at all, you have a philosophical vantage point, but these issues are not easy.

For example, there is a train track and there is a split in the track. You are standing at the switch. There is a runaway train. On track A there is one person. On track B, a work crew. You have no time to alert either. If you do nothing, the work crew all die. If you save them, the person on track A dies.

What do you do?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, June 16th, 2015 at 12:22 AM
Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")
Content:
Lobsang said:
that's not an explanation, that's a statement. For example, what I asked is to add 'an explanation' as in:

"It is not possible, because the lung is --- definition of lung here --- , and since a recording does not fulfill that condition, then it is not possible. But not to write 'it is not human, it doesn't have discrimination', since that is not enough. For cooking a lunch you also need discrimination, but that doesn't make it equivalent to a lung. So, what IS a Lung? What makes it possible ONLY by a human (and maybe some other being) and not 'by sound waves'? Without an explanation like that, we're still in the 'I know and you don't' sphere.

And also, this as an example:

<http://fpmt.org/education/teachings/sutras/golden-light-sutra/#receivetransmission>

Malcolm wrote:

A recording has no consciousness, it therefore has no will, it therefore cannot act, it therefore cannot give a lung. This is not a complicated principle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Simon E. said:

And in terms of Dharma, the result discussing these issues in a coherent manner would be....?

I believe I have may met the occasional Lama who was completely ignorant of Ayn Rand.

Malcolm wrote:

Ayn Rand was an idiot — barring that aside, these sorts of issues are secular, and in India, such texts written by Buddhist authors were rare, though not non-existent.

The point I am making is that these political categories (conservative, liberal, right, left) are erected without really having a detailed understanding of the competing philosophies underlying such discussions, a long conversation going to back to Socrates, Aristotle, and so on.

In modern secular ethics, Rawls and Nozick are two of the most important voices in this discussion.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 11:34 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lhasa said:

Garchen Rinpoche recently deliberately recorded a transmission and said that one had received it by watching the recording and that one also could give that transmission.

Malcolm wrote:

No. You have misunderstood everything. Such a transmission is impossible. It is no more possible to give a lung via a recording than it is for the Buddhas to remove your suffering with their hands.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 11:19 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Simon E. said:

Frankly I think the whole thread has degenerated into Pseuds Corner and pointedheaded one-upmanship. And the fact that it is being conducted on the pages of a Buddhist forum is merely incidental. It could have been lifted from any part of the internet where opining is the default activity.

No amount of analysis or displacement or substitution is going to fix samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, if people would read people like Rawls and Nozick, at least they would have some basis to discuss these issues in a coherent manner.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 10:42 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In general, two books are required reading here: A Theory of Justice by Rawls, and the response to it, Anarchy, State and Utopia by Nozick.

The opening paragraph of the former books states:

Each person possesses an inviolability founded on justice that even the welfare of society as a whole cannot override. For this reason justice denies that the loss of freedom for some is made right by a greater good shared by others.

RAWLS, John (2009-06-30). A THEORY OF JUSTICE (ORIG EDN) (Oxford Paperbacks 301 301) (pp. 3-4). Harvard University Press. Kindle Edition.

In the concluding paragraph of the latter book, Nozick declares:

The minimal state treats us as inviolate individuals, who may not be used in certain ways by others as means or tools or instruments or resources; it treats us as persons having individual rights with the dignity this constitutes. Treating us with respect by respecting our rights, it allows us, individually or with whom we choose, to choose our life and to realize our ends and our conception of ourselves, insofar as we can, aided by the voluntary cooperation of other individuals possessing the same dignity. How dare any state or group of individuals do more. Or less.

Nozick, Robert (2013-11-12). Anarchy, State, and Utopia (pp. 333-334). Basic Books. Kindle Edition.

Finally, an important question is asked by Rawls's Political Liberalism:

[H]ow is it possible for there to exist over time a just and stable society of free and equal citizens, who remain profoundly divided by reasonable religious, philosophical, and moral doctrines? The most intractable struggles, political liberalism assumes, are confessedly for the sake of the highest things: for religion, for philosophical views of the world, and for different moral conceptions of the good.

Rawls, John (2011-02-10). Political Liberalism: Expanded Edition (Columbia Classics in Philosophy) (p. 4). Columbia University Press. Kindle Edition.

Jikan said:

I'd like to flesh out that previous post a bit further, because now that I read it, I see that it's written in academese and I don't want to cause confusion.

Here's a useful blog post by a capable thinker on some of the problems with how the concept of "freedom" is articulated in contemporary libertarian discourse vis a vis the state.

<https://rationallyspeaking.blogspot.com/2012/07/fundamental-contradiction-of.html>

As is well known, the core idea of libertarian philosophy is the preservation of the maximum amount of freedom possible. Though the concept seems, in practice, to be limited to the freedom of employers, we will give the libertarian the benefit of the doubt and assume he really does mean freedom for all; which is what immediately generates the fundamental and, as far as I can see, inescapable contradiction of the libertarian doctrine.

The crucial problem is that one simply cannot have freedom without limiting freedom. I know, it sounds like an oxymoron, but in fact libertarians themselves acknowledge its truth. Libertarians are not anarchists, and they understand that individual freedom is maximized only by the presence of a government that regulates the rules of engagement among people (otherwise we are back to a Hobbesian war of all against all). So, for instance, no libertarian would argue that the possibility of charges of murder are an impediment to your freedom to kill me. That's because if you do kill me, my freedom is going to be (terminally, as it were) limited.

The same goes for your freedom to steal from me, obviously. So we already have two fundamental rights — to life and property — that do require government regulation, or our existence is going to be nasty, brutish, short and all the rest. Curiously, these also happen to be the only two kinds of freedom that libertarians acknowledge. But why? Our society recognizes additional freedoms that libertarians would find hard to object to in principle, and indeed, they strenuously defend when they perceive them to be threatened by government action. Freedom of speech and of action (e.g., how, when and with whom to have sex), to name just a couple.

And that's where the problem becomes obvious. Why, exactly, is it objectionable for the government to infringe on these liberties, but not for a private employer? In case you doubt — or, like most Americans, are simply unaware of — the fact that employers routinely do infringe in an entirely arbitrary manner on our personal freedom...

The rest of the post is very much worth reading. For now, it suffices to point out that freedom is not equally distributed to all--far from it--and the state is not the reason why. My employer articulates his freedom precisely by limiting and delimiting mine. When a mayor or governor or Senator does that, I can mobilize the vote to get him or her out. This is not typically possible in the workplace. (and a kneejerk "get another job bozo!" is no counterargument to this.)

Put differently, "freedom" as defined by libertarians is often freedom's opposite.

I would like to know from our libertarian friends here at DW what they think freedom means in this context. Again: freedom for whom, and to do what?

it might also be worthwhile to explore the assumptions about the self in liberal / neoliberal / libertarian economic theory, and compare/contrast those with Buddhism 101.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

PadmeSamadhi said:

I do hope my post create some controversies here, since I am a libertarian I have no side, right or left.

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly have a "side". Just read your own post.

PadmeSamadhi said:

That's true, but my side it is not left or right.

This is the Nolan diagram

Malcolm wrote:

I see, you are an "upist" as opposed to a "downist", it is still a side though.

BTW, this is the original:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

PadmeSamadhi said:

I do hope my post create some controversies here, since I am a libertarian I have no side, right or left.

Malcolm wrote:

You clearly have a "side". Just read your own post.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lobsang said:

Why do you think it is like that? Could you explain?

What's the logic behind it?

Thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

A recording is not a person. It has no mind and no discrimination.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 7:51 PM

Title: Re: Undifferentiated consciousness and non-duality

Content:

Herbie said:

I understand that you want to elaborate and express your ideas my words do cause but really, all I have been saying is that "every conscious event is just a representation of neuronal processes."

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and that makes you a materialist and not a Buddhist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lobsang said:

Thanks,

but maybe HE thinks that it (to hear a recorded recitation) is enough, so I am interested if that's true. Also, Lama Zopa Rinpoche claimed similar for the Golden Light Sutra transmission by help of a video recording of his personal transmission.

So, I am interested in that - if HE Gyaltsab Rinpoche really said that, and if I agree with that or not, due to my understanding or nonunderstanding of it is another topic...

Cheers!

Malcolm wrote:
Sutras do not require lungs at all.

You cannot receive a lung through a recording. It is not a matter of opinion.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 4:36 AM
Title: Re: Decreasing attention spans.
Content:
Urgyen Dorje said:
I have some experience with that actually. My first Tibetan teacher taught me to use the THDL translation tools. That was sort of cool. I could type in Wylie and get something I could try to gloss. My subsequent teacher was a linguist instead of a anthropologist/historian and he'd have none of that and he'd show me why glosses with THDL were robbing me from learning the language.

Malcolm wrote:
Yes, too many mistakes are perpetuated by using the Valby/Rangjung Yeshe dictionary.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, June 15th, 2015 at 12:34 AM
Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives
Content:
Nicholas Weeks said:
The main reasons for the poll are to try & get a little insight into the de-personalization of life in this polarized, media driven era. So far, the 20 plus folks do get away from DW screen enough to have contacts with conservative people directly.

Malcolm wrote:
I am a conservative person, religiously speaking. Politically however, I am neither liberal nor conservative, since I think these are false and unhelpful divisions. Many so called conservatives that I know would radically eviscerate environmental protections and so on., and general speaking abandon the "status quo" in the favor of radical policies that benefit only the ultra wealthy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: New Zealand recognizes all animals as sentient beings

Content:

Simon E. said:

Well they can be as PC as all get out. But the exporting of lamb to be killed for halal meat will no doubt continue to be a big national income generator.

Malcolm wrote:

"New Zealand, where men are men and sheep are afraid....", as an old Kiwi room mate of mine was fond of repeating.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

Jikan said:

Fury Road would make a really stupid book. It's a delightful action movie. It's not great cinema.

Malcolm wrote:

On the contrary, it is great cinema. It is technically one of the most well-edited, well-shot, well-planned, well-executed movies of all time.

This is movie has raised the technical bar. Directors are no longer going to be able to get away with CGI everything.

450 hours of filming, 3000+ plus hours of editing, all boiled down into 120 minutes. This says it all:

Here five things I can't believe Miller was allowed to do:

- Have Max be the sidekick in his own film.
- Hire Nicholas Hoult, one of Hollywood's youngest, most attractive stars, then shave his head, paint him bone white, and have him play a character with disgusting chapped lips for the entire movie.
- Get rid of Max's iconic car in the first few minutes of the flick.

- Ignore conventional action movie structure in order to present one giant, two-hour long car chase.
- Give the main villain a name that will confuse every one all the time, because they assume there's been some kind of error and the character's real name must be "Immortal Joe."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 8:12 PM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As someone who has primarily read science fiction for entertainment for the past 45 years, I should point out that movies are not books. They are an entirely different genre.

daverupa said:

Frank Herbert's Dune and then that... that hideous movie...

Mad Max: Arrakeen Road? Drive without rhythm...

Malcolm wrote:

Hideous indeed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 7:56 PM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

Okay ... I am happy that you are enjoying it, whatever your reasons and whatever its qualities ...

BUT (some of you saw that coming, I hope) (1) most of your comments have just reinforced my opinion that most of you don't read enough science fiction to be able to rate the depth or originality of the plot* and (2) it still doesn't sound like a movie I will ever choose to watch.

* that was a problem with Avatar, too. Visuals 4.5 stars out of 5, originality 0.5 stars, and hardly anyone noticed.

Malcolm wrote:

As someone who has primarily read science fiction for entertainment for the past 45 years, I should point out that movies are not books. They are an entirely different genre.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 7:45 PM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

seeker242 said:

I don't know how to vote because I don't know what "conservative" even means. For example, if a person is fiscally very conservative and socially very liberal, what are they?

Malcolm wrote:

Massachusetts Republican.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 2:17 AM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Simon E. said:

Well I suppose that's no better or worse than any other fantasy. But fantasy it is.(Urgyen Dorje) You have picked the wrong species on the wrong planet and left out the nature of the way that dependant origination unfolds.

As I see it there are only two alternatives..we make capitalism work for the many..or we kiss our bums goodbye.

Malcolm wrote:

The present environmental disaster, 200 years in the making, was caused by industrial capitalism. Why would anyone think the cause is the solution? Our descendants are going to be dealing with this for another 1000 years.

There are things we are manufacturing today that will not decompose in many thousands of years, if at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 1:49 AM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Simon E. said:

But markets do not cause that environmental hell either..the biggest polluter on the planet is a socialist republic.

Malcolm wrote:

Capital markets are causing environmental hell around the world, that is precisely the point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: POLL on knowing conservatives

Content:

Simon E. said:

This.

Life just aint black and white...I, for example am anti-capital punishment and have a pragmatic view of abortion. I think the west has a debt to its former colonies and a moral obligation to the third world..

But I also think that capitalism is the best of a number of bad ideologies.

Life is not simple and the world does not function by the logical , or by what is ' fair '..

Malcolm wrote:

Unfortunately, there are no market solutions to our environmental crisis, no market solutions to global warming, the extinction event, etc. Capitalism has failed us every bit as much as Socialism failed.

If we human beings do not get our collective shit together, our children will be living in an environmental hell of their parents making.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 12:20 AM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Vulvalini?

Malcolm wrote:

<http://theladiesfinger.com/bechdel-testing-mad-max-fury-road/>

dzogchungpa said:

Oh, I see, it's actually 'Vuvalini'. 'Vulvalini' would have been amusing, though.

<http://time.com/3850323/mad-max-fury-road-eve-ensler-feminist/>

Malcolm wrote:

No:

The plot leads us to the women and the two male allies finding the many mothers of Vulvalini (Vulva + Kundalini?), who once ran the green land. Due to the climate, the land has since been destroyed and only five of them have survived. They are bike-riding, gun-shooting old women who maintain a bag filled with various seeds that can be planted once they find the right patch of land. This is also where the film almost passes the Bechdel Test – the Keeper of the seeds and Dag have a conversation about the seeds and hope. Why almost? Because we never learn the name of the Keeper of the Seeds.

Update: appears to be a common error, but I swore in the credits they were cast as the Vulvalini.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 14th, 2015 at 12:08 AM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

dzogchungpa said:
Vulvalini?

Malcolm wrote:

<http://theladiesfinger.com/bechdel-testing-mad-max-fury-road/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 13th, 2015 at 11:12 PM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

Jikan said:

I agree with Malcolm.

one detail, though: it's not 160 miles across the salt flats, it's 160 DAYS across the salt flats. What are those salt flats? I can only guess they are what used to be the oceans. they had resolved to ride, effectively, from Victoria, Australia to Peru or so (hence the long ride).

Malcolm wrote:

You are right, my bad.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 13th, 2015 at 10:00 PM

Title: Re: Mad Max: Fury Road — Spoilers

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

To paraphrase someone who worked on it, "If you want a great action movie, go see it. If you want anything more - like a good story, for instance - forget it."

Malcolm wrote:

The fundamental story is the overthrow of a mercantilist patriarchal triumvirate, setting the stage for the rise of a matriarchal seed-saving society in the Wasteland.

Foremost, it is quest movie. Second of all, it is a chase movie. Third of all, it is an action film. Overall, it is another chapter in Miller's stunning post-apocalyptic vision. While nothing could ever recapture the sheer purity of the Road Warrior, this movie stands on its own in every way.

While there was no script, there was a story. The movie itself was composed in over 3000 story boards, making a huge graphic novel. Not only is there a story for every actor, a back story, which each actor was filled in on; every car, truck, town and so on was given a backstory upon which set was constructed and upon which the actors improvised their dialogue, as minimal as dialogue is in this film. If you know anything of theater history, you will remember Antonine Artaud's "Theatre of Cruelty" with its emphasis on mise en scène.

Also, Miller very cleverly divided up the three things that characterize modern economics; oil, weapons and agriculture into three communities, i.e. Gastown, the Bullet Farm and the Citadel. As someone concerned with the environment, Kim, you should understand this movie is very much about environmentalism and the consequences of not treating our planet well.

The actual movie itself — a quest to find The Green Place, Furiosa's home, from which she was kidnapped — is only a very small part of a much bigger story.

Furiosa escapes with Immortal Joe's wives to find the green place. There is a tremendous chase, but Max and Furiosa (having become allies) succeed in escaping Immortal Joe and his allies by losing them in a swamp, called the Place of Crows. After discovering some old biker women, the Vulvalini, who had turned to banditry in the Waste Land to survive, they inform Furiosa that the Green Place of her childhood had become tainted and vanished, turning into the place where they had lost Immortal Joe and his army, the Place of Crows. You should understand that Furiosa and her mother had been kidnapped from the Vulvalini and the Green Place when she was a small child by Immortal Joe. The Vulvalini had saved seeds, their most precious possession. Furiosa and the Vulvalini decide to try and cross the salt flats to find a new green place, but with Max's encouragement, they realize that they have no idea what they will find 160 miles across the salt flats, so they turn around to take on Immortal Joe and his minions, eventually taking over the citadel itself.

That is the story.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 13th, 2015 at 9:21 AM

Title: Mad Max: Fury Road

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Must. See.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 12th, 2015 at 11:16 PM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Shameless plug:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 12th, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Because they are emanations of Heruka.

WeiHan said:

Are we also taking refuge in them in general but not primarily?

Malcolm wrote:

We do not directly take refuge in them, but since they are activities of awakened beings, they can be included in the refuge field.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 12th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

WeiHan said:

Unfortunately, my curiosity leads to probe further and I find that Maharakta Ganapati is in the sakra Refuge tree.

As far as I know, unenlightened protectors or deities will never be included in the refuge tree but here he is there, lowest row of protector, leftmost

<http://sakyamedia.jugiter.net/foto/Refugetree/index.html#>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and there are several other worldly protectors shown there as well, for example the Cittipatis.

WeiHan said:

Cittipatis is worldly?

My next question is that then why are they in the refuge tree?

Malcolm wrote:

Because they are emanations of Heruka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, June 11th, 2015 at 7:48 PM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

WeiHan said:

Unfortunately, my curiosity leads to probe further and I find that Maharakta Ganapati is in the sakra Refuge tree.

As far as I know, unenlightened protectors or deities will never be included in the refuge tree but here he is there, lowest row of protector, leftmost

<http://sakyamedia.jugiter.net/foto/Refugetree/index.html#>

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and there are several other worldly protectors shown there as well, for example the Cittipatis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Undifferentiated consciousness and non-duality

Content:

Herbie said:

Hmh ... Maybe you can explain why my expression "Because every conscious event is just a representation of neuronal processes." makes you associate an "ontological thesis that 'everything is physical'" ?

Malcolm wrote:

Is there something that is not physical, in your view?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 9:08 PM

Title: Re: Historical relation of Dzogchen and Mahamudra

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I am of the personal opinion that Kagyu Mahāmudra as we know it today is largely the creation of Gampopa (following the opinion of the famed 13th century Drugpa Kagyu master, Yang gong pa).

sherabpa said:

It would be more correct to describe it as systematization than creation, i.e. he didn't just make it up: mahamudra is based on the sutras and tantras like everything else. And like everything else, it has some controversial aspects to it. People make a lot of fuss over them, but I can't see why. Sapan said much more devastating things about Gampopa's Dorje Phakmo tradition but when do you hear about that?

Malcolm wrote:

His four yogas of Mahāmudra is completely his own innovation, according Yangongpa.

As far as the Vārāhī blessings in Kagyu, Sakyapas talk about it a lot. Kagyus, not so much since it is their system. The Kagyu defense is that the Vārāhī blessing is for those of sharper faculties. The Sakyapas don't buy this reasoning. Personally, I am neutral.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 7:43 PM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

WeiHan said:

Then why is it during the Jenang, 12 arms red Ganapati was introduced as an emanation of Avalokiteshvara?

Is it the official view in Sakya or is it that even in Sakya there are two differing views?

Malcolm wrote:

Shiva is also considered an emanation of Avalokiteshvara, still Shiva is a worldly protector.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Ex Machina (movie)

Content:

Jikan said:

Fair enough, but in terms of spectator entertainment (film, television, &c) events like mixed martial arts and professional wrestling are hugely popular among the gents, and the only thing more homoerotic than that on a screen is straight-ahead gay porn.

Malcolm wrote:

Which brings up the question — is Caitlyn Jenner a lesbian?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Jikan said:

Am I alone in seeing a particular subtext at work here?

Malcolm wrote:
Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 5:08 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

conebeckham said:

So, is the "Empowerment" really an empowerment, or more of a permission or entrustment.....??

Malcolm wrote:
It is a jenang.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 3:31 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But there are also Sadhana where one arises as the protector, for example, the famous Vajra Cliff Fortress practice of Mahakala in Sakya. IN general all enlightened protectors have self generation as well.

WeiHan said:

Yes. The point is that requirement for oneself to generate as another wisdom Yidam doesn't disqualify the front creation deity as an enlightened emanation.

Malcolm wrote:

The real point is that Ganapati is a worldly protector.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 1:41 AM

Title: Re: Ganesh in Tibetan Buddhism

Content:

WeiHan said:

All the while, I have the understanding that any one practice in the Sakya 13 golden Dharmas can be taken alone as a sole path to enlightenment. and that include of course the 12 arms Maharakta Ganapati that has its source with Cakrasamvara Tantra.

Mr. G said:

Yes, it comes from the Cakrasamvara tantra, but Ganapati is a worldly deity. Why do you think it can be relied upon as a sole path to enlightenment? If it is a sole path to enlightenment, why does one generate oneself into an enlightened deity at the beginning of the practice? Do you think the sole practice of any worldly deity leads to enlightenment?

WeiHan said:

There are quite a few enlightened deity practices which require one to generate as another enlightened Yidam but that doesn't mean the front creation deity isn't enlightened. An example will be Namtose, in some practice, it requires one to generate as Vajrapani for example.

In certain enlightened protectors sadhanas, such as Mahakala, Ekajati etc...it also require a self creation into a powerful enlightened Yidam so that these enlightened protectors will performed one's wished Dharma activities.

Malcolm wrote:

But there are also Sadhana where one arises as the protector, for example, the famous Vajra Cliff Fortress practice of Mahakala in Sakya. IN general all enlightened protectors have self generation as well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 10th, 2015 at 1:39 AM

Title: Re: Historical relation of Dzogchen and Mahamudra

Content:

tingdzin said:

Thank you, Dzogchungpa; I've read the article. By the way, it calls to mind a difference in point of view between CNNR and Trungpa Rinpoche: The former insisted that sgra bla was the proper Tibetan spelling of "drala", and ties it in with the principle of sound (in "Drung, De'u and Bon"). CTR, after Mipham, says it's dgra bla, meaning "above the enemy".

Most Bonpo books agree with CNNR, while in most Buddhist sources, its spelled a third way: dgra lha.

Anyway, if you want to believe that most Gesar bards were Dzogchenpas, feel free. I just introduced the idea so that people could know there is more than one school of thought about the hand-to-the-ear gesture.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't necessarily believe that -- I just don't believe that Mila's posture lacks yogic significance, whether it is klong sde or vajra waves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 11:30 PM

Title: Re: Ex Machina (movie)

Content:

Jikan said:

I was at a conference last week where Jack Petranker (see below) presented an interesting analysis of this film. I haven't seen it, so I can only go with what he gave here. The gist of his argument is that Ex Machina gives a case study in how samsara reproduces itself. Garbage In, Garbage Out: the afflictions of the AI's maker are reproduced in the AI, and everyone suffers for it. Even their attempts at freedom serve only to tighten the knot. Important insight I think.

<http://www.mangalamresearch.org/about-mrc/people/>

Malcolm wrote:

And why is that lately A.I's are always cute girls? (Chappie being an exception)

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 9:58 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

With all due respect, David:

For example, leading Indologist Hajime Nakamura in his influential book, A History of Early Vedānta Philosophy, devotes forty pages to the question of ʾaṅkara's date.³¹ Before setting out his own theory that "he probably lived, roughly, 700-750 [C.E.]," <http://www.easterntertradition.org/original%20sankaracarya.pdf>

I myself read the text in question, but unfortunately, I cannot pull up the page number now from google books. However, in The Role of Divine Grace in the Soteriology of Śaṅkarācārya, on page two my assertion is confirmed. Moreover, Ingalls notes: The dates A.D. 788-820, which have been widely accepted for ʾSa^mkara in the past, must be pushed back. A detailed and scholarly treatment of the subject will be found in the first volume of Hajime Nakamura's Japanese work Shooki no Vedaanta Tetsugaku (Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1950), pp 63-121. The early limit for ʾSa^mkara is the date of Dharmakiirti, whom ʾSa^mkara quotes in the Upade ʾsa-saahasrii, K.r.s.na ʾSaastrii Navare, ed. (Bombay: Jagadishvara Press, 1886), XVIII.142. Dharmakiirti rose to fame between the visits to India of Hsuan Tsang and I Ching, that is, between A.D. 634 and 673. The later limit is given by two sets of facts. (A) ʾSa^mkara's pupil Sure ʾsvara is quoted by Vidyaananda, who must have lived slightly before A.D. 800. See Pathak in "Bhart.rhari and Kumaarila," Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, XVIII (1894), 225-229. (B) There must be at least two generations between ʾSa^mkara and Vaacaspati Mi ʾsra, who wrote the Nyaaya-suucii-nibandha in A.D. 841. The generations, on Nakamura's showing (op. cit., p. 89 and p. 98, note 12), are: ʾSa^mkara, ʾSriivatsaa^nka. Bhaaskara, Vaacaspati. Nakamura bases this at least in part on Yamuna's Siddhi-traya. Chowkhamba Snaskrit Series Work No. 10(Benares: Chowkhamba Sanskrit Book Depot, 1900), p. 6. One can prove the same result perhaps more surely by taking the following sequence: ʾSa^mkara, Padmapaada, and Sure`svara, Bhaaskara, Vaacaspati. For evidence that Bhaaskara is later than `Sa^mkara's pupils Padmapaada and Sure`svara, see note 4 below.

<http://enlight.lib.ntu.edu.tw/FULLTEXT/JR-PHIL/ew27155.htm>

So, I gotta to stick to my guns. We know for a fact that Śāntarakṣita was present in Tibet by 773, Frauwallner gives Śāntarakṣita's dates as 725-788, and we know he spent the last fifteen years of his life in Tibet. Kamalaśīla (fl. 740–795) accompanied him. It is extremely likely then that the Tattvasaṃgraha commentary was composed in Tibet, if not the original text.

David Reigle said:

Śāntarakṣita devoted verses 171-327 of his Tattva-saṃgraha to a critique of a permanent, personal ātman held by five different Indian schools, typically an ātman that is a karṭṛ, “doer,” and/or a bhokṭṛ, “experiencer.” When he arrived at the Advaita [Vedānta] idea of the universal or non-dual ātman, his comments were few (verses 328-335), and respectful. Even there, the ātman that he refuted was the jñāna/vijñāna-ātman, a cognizer that is permanent, not the parama-ātman that Śaṅkarācārya would later teach. .

Malcolm wrote:

H. Nakamura holds that Śaṅkarācārya is earlier than Śāntarakṣita, that is, prior to 750 CE.

As far as your other statement goes, 1) Kamashila specifically identifies this as the position of the Advaitans [གཞིས་མེད་པར་རྒྱ་བ་], followers of the Upanishads [གཞལ་བ་པ་རྒྱ་མཁས་], i.e. Vedantins.

There is no substantial difference with what is presented here and Śaṅkarā's thought: Dakshinamurti-Stotra-With-Manasollasa.tiff

15. Consciousness is of two kinds: Nirvikalpaka or the undifferentiated consciousness illumines the Thing itself, while Savikalpa or the differentiated consciousness is manifold as illumining the designations, etc.
<http://sacred-texts.com/hin/dast/index.htm>

Therefore, when Śāntarakṣita says their error is slight, he actually is saying their error is huge for proposing that consciousness, something impermanent, is permanent.

One can hardly read this text as any thing other than refutation of the parama-ātma postulated by Śaṅkarā.

David Reigle said:

First, I would just note that the intent of my few posts here at Dharma Wheel is to give information, e.g., about a new book, or about what it says. I do not wish to engage in arguments, or to appear disrespectful, especially to Malcolm. For the last couple days I have been trying to figure out how to reply to this post, or even if to reply to it. I cannot see a good solution. I do not want to seem like an ungrateful guest to his hosts, or to seem like I am arguing. At the same time, I feel a certain responsibility to Hajime Nakamura. So I will merely make the following statement and bow out, hoping that it will not be inappropriate here.

Hajime Nakamura regarded Śāntarakṣita as prior to Śaṅkarācārya. In his book, A History of Early Vedānta Philosophy, in the section on The Vedānta Philosophy Reported by Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla, pp. 221-257, he gives considerable evidence showing this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 9:12 PM

Title: Re: Daka and Dakini

Content:

waimengwan said:

Can people be reborn as a Daka or Dakini? If yes what is the cause for that?

Or that is only something tantrikas can learn about ?

Thanks

Tsongkhapafan said:

No, it's not a rebirth, it's a state of realisation. Dakas and Dakinis are male and female Tantric enlightened beings.

Malcolm wrote:

Not all ḍākas and ḍākinīs are realized. Like any class of beings, some are realized and some are not. So called lokaḍākinīs, worldly ḍākinīs, are not realized.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 5:16 AM

Title: Re: How effective are liberation-upon-seeing dharma doors?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

There is no magic no buddha god out there to make these liberation practices work. The dynamics that we are working on with buddhist practice are dynamics of the mind, right? Does anyone disagree?

Malcolm wrote:

They function because dependent origination is profound. For example, the six syllables in my signature are in reality the phonemic manifestation of the 6 buddhas in the six realms. Whoever sees or hears them will have implanted a cause for liberation.

Jesse said:

They don't show up. I only see x's. Ppl need to either install the font your using or the webmaster has to install it on the fileserver.

An easier method would just be to make an image of it and upload it then link the image.

Malcolm wrote:

Load tibetan machine web font

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 9th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

But from a perspective outside this long dispute, both have something in common, such as the understanding of the 'eternal round of birth and death' within which beings are trapped due to avidya.

Malcolm wrote:

The concepts of reincarnation in Advaita and Buddhadharma could not be more different. The notion of what constitutes avidyā are also different.

Wayfarer said:

Whilst you can acknowledge that there are differences, the differences are here depicted as absolute, and the adversaries depicted (and belittled) as 'enemies' and 'idiots'.

Malcolm wrote:

" Frauds and idiots ", not enemies and idiots.

Wayfarer said:

I guess in the context of several millenia of debate, that is understandable, but I don't know if it makes sense in the context of 'the global village' that we are now obliged to live in.

Malcolm wrote:

There are room for debate and disagreement in the global village, at least I hope so.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: How effective are liberation-upon-seeing dharma doors?

Content:

tomschwarz said:

There is no magic no buddha god out there to make these liberation practices work. The dynamics that we are working on with buddhist practice are dynamics of the mind, right? Does anyone disagree?

Malcolm wrote:

They function because dependent origination is profound. For example, the six syllables in my signature are in reality the phonemic manifestation of the 6 buddhas in the six realms. Whoever sees or hears them will have implanted a cause for liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 10:56 PM

Title: Re: Historical relation of Dzogchen and Mahamudra

Content:

tingdzin said:

Well, Dzoki and Malcolm, what about the Gesar bards, then? Were they also all Dzogchenpas?

Malcolm wrote:

Did they have Gesar bards in the 12th century?

Now that you mention it, Dzogchen is pretty wrapped up in the Gesar tradition too...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 9:57 PM

Title: Re: Undifferentiated consciousness and non-duality

Content:

Herbie said:

Actually subject-object non-duality is an undeniable fact. Why? Because every conscious event is just a representation of neuronal processes.

Malcolm wrote:

So say the physicalists.

Herbie said:

Whatever that means...

Malcolm wrote:

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Physicalism>

Herbie said:

I'd prefer "scientists".

Malcolm wrote:

Daniel Dennet is not a scientist, though he claims to be. He is a philosopher.

Thomas Nagle's new book, Mind and Cosmos: why the materialist neo-Darwinian conception of nature is almost certainly false, gives people like Dennet, Dawkins and so on a very good run for their money.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 9:15 PM

Title: Re: Undifferentiated consciousness and non-duality

Content:

Herbie said:

Actually subject-object non-duality is an undeniable fact. Why? Because every conscious event is just a representation of neuronal processes.

Malcolm wrote:

So say the physicalists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Historical relation of Dzogchen and Mahamudra

Content:

Jikan said:

I know much of this history is shrouded in mystery, and may be laden with sectarian commitments, but I'm putting the question forward anyway with the hope that everyone may benefit from it.

What do we know of the historical relation of Dzogchen and Mahamudra before, say, the time of Milarepa? I've heard conflicting claims on Milarepa specifically--that he was simultaneously a Mahamudra practitioner and a Dzogchenpa, or that he practiced Mahamudra but that Mahamudra itself has its origins in Dzogchen Semde, or that the Milarepa's realization of Mahamudra simply makes sense to Dzogchenpas while having nothing concrete to do with Dzogchen as such. (These are not authoritative positions, merely things I've heard in conversation over the years.)

I assume Milarepa is a significant figure in his own right, of course, but also that these conflicting claims are representative of broader claims and convictions on the historical relation of Mahamudra and Dzogchen.

DharmaWheel, please help me make sense of this. Thank you.

Malcolm wrote:

Milarepa says in one of his songs that he was stabbed in the chest by Mahāmudra, and stabbed in the back by Dzogchen.

I am of the personal opinion that Kagyu Mahāmudra as we know it today is largely the creation of Gampopa (following the opinion of the famed 13th century Drugpa Kagyu master, Yang gong pa).

As far as Longde goes, well, Dzeng Dharmabodhi lived in Lhodrak and had close connections with Kagyus living in that region. In terms of the famous posture of Milarepa, it could either be a Longde posture or the position used in the practice called "vajra waves."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 5:06 AM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I probably shouldn't have shared that aspect of my personal history.

Malcolm wrote:

I was a skinhead. So what?

Urgyen Dorje said:

I've caught a lot of grief in sanghas and social justice groups for it.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, people freak out when I tell them I was a skinhead, they always assume skinhead = fascist. But in fact, I was just a dumbass kid who thought punk rockers were hippies and I had already done that so...in it for the music and the laughs...

(Turns out the guy on the cover, Nicky Crane, a major National Front tough, later became a bouncer in gay nightclubs in London <http://www.bbc.com/news/magazine-25142557>).

...simultaneously I was into Industrial Music, Throbbing Gristle, etc., then PTV, then Crowley, then Buddhadharma...

To quote a band I dearly hate:

"What a long strange....trip its been...."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 3:26 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he says the tirthikas recognized the value of the Buddha's system of two truths and claimed it for themselves, albeit, fraudulently. So he is not happy about this. He states in the following verse that one should not mistake the two systems, just as one should not mistake a gem composed of metal for a real jewel. He states in the Tarkajvālā [268/ab, (D 3856) dbu ma, dza 40b7-329b4]:

Just as someone claims "a gem made of metal resembles a precious gem", though it's surface is polished, that cannot withstand burning, scratching, grinding and so on. Since they are completely different, whoever is skilled in recognizing precious gems will generate the perception of which is precious. In the same way, since [the tīrthika position of] self, permanence, all pervasiveness and oneness contradict their opposite, [the Buddhist position of] no-self, impermanence, non-pervasiveness and multiplicity, they are completely different; the one who is skilled in recognizing reality generates the perception of which is reality. Therefore, it is like showing the tail of the deer to sell horse meat.

In other words, what Bhavaviveka is saying that the Advaitans fraudulently misrepresent the teaching of the Buddha, and worse, cast it to mean the opposite of what it actually means, using the example of a merchant who displays something of high value to pass off something of no value.

David Reigle said:

Thanks, Malcolm, for posting this criticism of Vedānta made by Bhavya. These criticisms are frequent in his text, and it is important for us to see an example of one. Just as Bhavya is straightforward in his criticisms of the Vedānta of his time, so he is fair in seeing what is good in it. A few verses after the ones I referred to in his Vedānta chapter, he writes, addressing the Vedāntins (verse 95, Lindtner Sanskrit edition): "If an ātman of such kind is also intended by you, sirs, there is no fault, because of the many similarities of name, etc. It is logically acceptable." Bhavya is here referring to an ātman that is beyond thought and speech. Then, a few verses later, he says that an ātman is not tenable, because ātman and anātman are opposites (verses 100-101). Here, however, he specifies the ātman as a doer and an experiencer. So we have to be aware of what ātman he is referring to in any given statement. He does not make a blanket denial of the ātman.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not a statement of acceptability. He is taunting the tīrthikas for being afraid. He says in the commentary:

Just as whatever is shown by the term "nonarising" (including its reasoning) will be free from fault, also if you assert [such] a self, the dispute will be about a mere name. What conflict will there be with your so called "supreme self" and our "nonarising?"

But he immediately says:

Those terrified of selflessness still dwell in it even though they are terrified;
just as those who are terrified of space have no other place to dwell.

You can see very clearly he really thinks these tīrthikas are idiots for he says in the commentary:

Just as some fools are terrified of and frightened by space, they dwell in that space since no other place is seen [in which to dwell]. In the same way, also those terrified by selflessness, are supported on and dwell in that selflessness because there is no support other than that.

Honestly, it is really too much to believe that Bhavaviveka has a positive attitude towards these people. He thinks they are both frauds and fools.

He is basically saying, contrary to your perspective, that by adopting the two truths and adopting the terminology of nonarising, Advaitans are merely arguing themselves into a ridiculous corner where they have no choice but to abandon their concept of para atman. It is not we who are adopting their self, it is they who are adopting our reasoning about the two truths. This is why he earlier castigates them for stealing the teachings of the Tathāgatas and claiming it for themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

What Tibetan developments are you suggesting propose an impersonal universal principle?

smcj said:

Dolpopa.

Also Malcolm made the point with Khenpo Tsultrim in regards to his current presentation of Shentong.

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=48&t=8318&p=102251&hilit=advaita+greg#p102251>

I'm sure Malcolm finds the turn this thread has taken to be distressing. Just for the record, so do I.

Malcolm wrote:

Not at all. This thread has not taken any turn at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 1:59 AM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I probably shouldn't have shared that aspect of my personal history.

Malcolm wrote:

I was a skinhead. So what?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 1:25 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Bhavya did not try to deny the close similarities. Here he does not even say that the Vedāntins took these particular teachings from the Buddhists, .

Malcolm wrote:

He nevertheless does accuse them of fraudulent misrepresentation as I show above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

As a disclosure, I was brought up with Nazi ideology and the themes of Mein Kampf not as a German, but as an American who was indoctrinated into Nazi ideology. As such, my perspective are these ideas as ideas, not the actual historical and cultural experience of a people who had to endure the real expression of these ideas. I was introduced to these ideas as a medium of introducing extreme racism, hate, and nationalism. For me, with some 35+ years of recovery from this nonsense, it was an interesting lesson in the nuances in political systems, and quite honestly, the guy was muddled. More importantly exposure to this nonsense catalyzed my interest in dharma, peace, and nonviolence.

Malcolm wrote:

Fascism arose out of a reaction to the nationalist deficiencies of the international socialist movement, sure. This well documented, but it also went on to embrace typical right wings memes of god, country, family and so on - example, Mussolini.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 8th, 2015 at 12:11 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Śāntarakṣita devoted verses 171-327 of his Tattva-saṃgraha to a critique of a permanent, personal ātman held by five different Indian schools, typically an ātman that is a kartṛ, “doer,” and/or a bhokṛ, “experiencer.” When he arrived at the Advaita [Vedānta] idea of the universal or non-dual ātman, his comments were few (verses 328-335), and respectful. Even there, the ātman that he refuted was the jñāna/vijñāna-ātman, a cognizer that is permanent, not the parama-ātman that Śaṅkarācārya would later teach. .

Malcolm wrote:

H. Nakamura holds that Śaṅkarācārya is earlier than Śāntarakṣita, that is, prior to 750

CE.

As far as your other statement goes, 1) Kamashila specifically identifies this as the position of the Advaitans [གཞིས་མེད་པར་རྒྱ་བ], followers of the Upanishads [གསང་བ་པ་རྒྱ་མཐོན], i.e. Vedantins.

There is no substantial difference with what is presented here and Śaṅkarā's thought: Dakshinamurti-Stotra-With-Manasollasa.tiff (66.63 KiB) Viewed 3674 times

15. Consciousness is of two kinds: Nirvikalpaka or the undifferentiated consciousness illumines the Thing itself, while Savikalpa or the differentiated consciousness is manifold as illumining the designations, etc.
<http://sacred-texts.com/hin/dast/index.htm>

Therefore, when Śāntarakṣita says their error is slight, he actually is saying their error is huge for proposing that consciousness, something impermanent, is permanent.

One can hardly read this text as any thing other than refutation of the parama-ātma postulated by Śaṅkarā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

On the one hand my mind is blown. My entire idea about the history of Dharma is challenged. I don't know what to think.

On the other hand my own position was. Based on more modern authority and commentary. So it is unaffected. By I really am stunned.

Malcolm wrote:

All of the faults of the personal atman accrue to this so called impersonal atman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 11:01 PM

Title: Re: How effective are liberation-upon-seeing dharma doors?

Content:

Boomerang said:

There are a bunch of images and mantras and sutras that say you will be free of the lower realms forever just because you've seen or heard them. Does this really mean that if you hear Medicine Buddha's name or look at one of those little red and gold cards, you could become a serial killer and still never be reborn in the lower realms? If these things are really so powerful, you would think that everyone who has so much as heard HH The Dalai Lama's name or the mani mantra will never be reborn in the lower realms—a very large percentage of the Earth's population.

Is it really that easy to never be reborn in the lower realms? If it is, it would follow that every teaching about the lower realms is just a skillful means for generating compassion toward beings not of this world. You could chant the Akshobhya mantra to somebody, murder them, and rest assured that neither of you will suffer in the lower realms and always move toward Buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

It means that you have planted a cause of inevitable liberation. It does not mean that you can expect never to be reborn in lower realms if you are a nonvirtuous person.

For example, if you are wearing a liberation through wearing amulet and you engage in misdeeds, it intensifies the misdeeds. So I was warned by my teacher to never wear such things and engage in misdeeds. If you wear them for practice however, they can aid your practice a lot.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 10:55 PM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Hitler was a fascist, like the Italian Fascists. Socialism does not always means 'left'. There are right wing socialist ideologies as well. Hitler was just following the lead of Action française.

Urgyen Dorje said:

The phenomenon of nazism, in itself, really illustrates how tired and limited this right-left dicotomy is.

If you read Mein Kampf, Hitler simultaneously attacks both right wing and left wing political ideologies. He asserts that capitalism has run its course, and holds that capitalism damages nationalism because of international finances and the egotism inherent in capitalism. The national socialism created to support this was also anti-communist, as Marxist communism was not only seen as a Jewish creation, but because it threatened the middle class and eliminated prive property.

The economics of Nazism falls off the right-left capitalism-communism continuua, because it's rooted in different values. It aimed to create an alternative to both freemarket capitalism and Marixst communism through something akin to a proleteriat revolution, the revolution of the Volksgemeinschaft, the people's commuity, which had a racial and nationalistic identity. But it was also against the concept of class struggle, which has an inherent value of class equality. So in many ways it' is very socialist in feel.

On the flip side, the anticapitalist vibe of this national socialism alienated industrialists who were central to the nationalist project of war in Europe, so Hitler made any number of quid pro quo's with them. While Hitler's Nazism theoretically was pro-mercantile while being anti-multinational corp, companies such as Krups, VW, Siemens, were left unmolested as long as they supported the party and the war.

So sure, we can put a pin in a chart and identify Hitler as far right, but on other continuua, we could identify him as right, left, middle, or N/A and off the continuum.

In my mid it's important to put him off these right-left capitalist-communism continuua because of the value systems involved. Here is an economic system that is, at least nominally, based on values other than the production and distribution of capital. There is a hideous and grotesque nationalistic and racial project at hand as well.

I think this is important to look at that, as other economic models based on more than just capital are thus possible. Instead of grotesque nationalistic and racist interests, there could be environmental interests or what not.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...Hitler was right wing, anti communist, etc, supported Franco, if you you will recall. Hitler was a facsist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 10:46 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Tom said:

Yes, this gets into the oral instructions on the verse which actually relate to how correct clarity (luminosity) is discerned from faulty clarity - not really appropriate for board discussion. Still, luminosity here is being related to clarity.

Malcolm wrote:

Your assertion was that in this verse, od sal = gsal ba; a one to one identity. I disagreed before. I still disagree.

The line concerns what we might call the "fundamental mind of clear light" in Gelug terms. In Sakyapa terms, it would be the luminosity found in between two moments of mind. However we decide to parse it, it concerns the luminosity which is the basis from which arise the three consciousnesses, ref. Jnānavajrasamuccaya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 10:07 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Likewise earlier, Bhavya devoted most of his critiques of the ātman in his Madhyamaka-hṛdaya to the permanent, personal ātman as held in the Sāṃkhya and Vaiśeṣika schools, and even in the Vedānta school of his time. When in his Vedānta chapter (chapter 8) he did refer to the universal or non-dual ātman, he refuted it when it was also held to be a doer or an experiencer or a cognizer, but accepted it when it was held to be beyond thought and speech. In fact, he said that this latter idea was taken by the Vedāntins from the Buddhists (verses 84-86, Lindtner Sanskrit edition).

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, he says the tīrthikas recognized the value of the Buddha's system of two truths and claimed it for themselves, albeit, fraudulently. So he is not happy about this. He states in the following verse that one should not mistake the two systems, just as one should not mistake a gem composed of metal for a real jewel. He states in the Tarkajvālā [268/ab, (D 3856) dbu ma, dza 40b7-329b4]:

Just as someone claims "a gem made of metal resembles a precious gem", though it's surface is polished, that cannot withstand burning, scratching, grinding and so on. Since they are completely different, whoever is skilled in recognizing precious gems will generate the perception of which is precious. In the same way, since [the tīrthika position of] self, permanence, all pervasiveness and oneness contradict their opposite, [the Buddhist position of] no-self, impermanence, non-pervasiveness and multiplicity, they are completely different; the one who is skilled in recognizing reality generates the perception of which is reality. Therefore, it is like showing the tail of the deer to sell horse meat.

In other words, what Bhāvaviveka is saying that the Advaitans fraudulently misrepresent the teaching of the Buddha, and worse, cast it to mean the opposite of what it actually means, using the example of a merchant who displays something of high value to pass off something of no value.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 9:32 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Tom said:

Your translation is improved now that you have dropped "featureless apprehension."

However, in my translation it is more clear that མཚན་འཛིན་མེད་པའི་ with its genitive ending is modifying འོད་གསལ་. Your new translation makes it seem like you are translating མཚན་འཛིན་མེད་པ་ ར་.

This quibble aside, I think it is pretty clear that luminosity here is signifying clarity.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, sometimes "kyi" does not function as a genitive in the sense that we understand it in Latinate grammatical terminology. Here it does not, it sets off a clause.

Anyway, here 'od gsal is not a gloss for clarity anymore than bde chen is a gloss for bde ba.

It is a play on words.

The normal sequence is bde ba, gsal ba, mi rtog pa, not bde chen, 'od 'gsal, mi rtog pa.

Bde chen, great bliss, is something at the ultimate level, just like 'od gsal, not the level of transient experience like simple bde ba. And mi rtog pa can be either.

So I still don't agree with you, patronizing comments aside.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 8:28 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Tom said:

This thread was linked to in another thread which prompted a late reply...

Malcolm wrote:

These are experiences of a mind, not a cognizer itself, that should be obvious to you from the text.

Tom said:

I'm aware of this and mentioned that they were experiences (nyam) above.

I'm simply giving an example of the word luminosity ('od gsa l) standing in for the word clarity (gsal).

Malcolm wrote:

On the other, hand, if it is as you say, this is still not the rang bzhin 'od gsal, since that is clearly ultimate, and not a fleeting experience, the attachment to which results in a form realm rebirth.

Tom said:

Yes, and Situ Rinpoche supports my reading and comments on this line that attachment here will result in a form realm rebirth. Again, my point is only that here we have an example of the word luminosity standing in for the word clarity.

Malcolm wrote:

You elided rig in rang rig in your translation, in response I elided 'dzin pa.

Tom said:

This is a ridiculous response and why I initially thought not to bother to continue with the discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Perhaps what it should read is "the unobscured luminosity of a featureless apprehension."

Tom said:

No, that would again be an incorrect translation. My original translation is accurate.

Malcolm wrote:

No, "luminosity without grasping" is not correct.

If you read it, "not grasping signs, luminosity is free from covering obscurations..." then it would be correct, likewise for the line above it and below.

ཞེན་པ་མེད་པའི་བདེ་ཆུན་ཆད་མེད། །

Without clinging, great bliss is uninterrupted.

མཚན་འཛིན་མེད་པའི་འོད་གསལ་སྒྲིབ་གཡེགས་བྲལ། །

Without grasping signs, luminosity is free from covering obscurations.

སྒོ་ལས་འདས་པའི་མི་རྟོག་སྤྱོད་གྱིས་གྲུབ། །

Beyond mind, nonconceptuality is effortless —

སྤྱོད་མེད་ཉམས་སྤྱོད་ཆད་མེད་པར་ཤོག། may effortless experience be uninterrupted!

As for whether here we can take "' od gsal " as being a pure gloss for gsal ba to fill in the lines of the verse — I have my doubts.

And you did elide the rig in rang rig.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 7:35 PM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

As the token conservative around here, I suppose leftists would never admit that 'liberal' notions have anything to do with the totalitarian core of leftism.

Malcolm wrote:

Just as rightists will never admit that many of their notions have anything to do with the totalitarian core of "rightism."

Frankly, "left" totalitarianism and "right" totalitarianism are structurally indistinguishable. The only difference is rhetoric:

Left: people, democracy, universal rights

Right: god, family, country.

They are both equally ruthless.

Nicholas Weeks said:

Nonsense, at least in the 20th century. The 'bad' righties like Franco & Pinochet could not carry water for the murderous lefties such as Hitler, Stalin, Mao, Pol Pot etc.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummm...Hitler was right wing, anti communist, etc, supported Franco, if you you will recall. Hitler was a facsist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 2:30 AM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

M.G. said:

I'm sure there are abuses of hypersensitivity in some classrooms, but I never found any viewpoints squashed at the quite liberal university I went to.

Malcolm wrote:

And yet they are.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, June 7th, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

As the token conservative around here, I suppose leftists would never admit that 'liberal' notions have anything to do with the totalitarian core of leftism.

Malcolm wrote:

Just as rightists will never admit that many of their notions have anything to do with the totalitarian core of "rightism."

Frankly, "left" totalitarianism and "right" totalitarianism are structurally indistinguishable. The only difference is rhetoric:

Left: people, democracy, universal rights

Right: god, family, country.

They are both equally ruthless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

tingdzin said:

This attitude shows up a lot on this forum, too, if people haven't noticed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

tingdzin said:

I recently read an article (by Sherrock , in "Bayon: New Perspectives") that proposed that the main images of the famous Bayon temple in Angkor Wat represent Vajrasattva.

Malcolm wrote:

Cambodian Vajrasattva, 11th century:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Have I Ever Taken Refuge?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

But when crisis comes-- what happens? Do I hope the doctor fixes my wound, or do I just leave it with the Three Jewels?

Malcolm wrote:

You go to a doctor. When you are afflicted with the illness of hunger, do you eat, or just leave it to the three Jewels?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 9:50 PM

Title: Re: Article - "I'm a liberal professor..."

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The most salient point:

No one can rebut feelings, and so the only thing left to do is shut down the things that cause distress — no argument, no discussion, just hit the mute button and pretend eliminating discomfort is the same as effecting actual change.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

bryandavis said:

<http://www.artgallery.nsw.gov.au/collection/works/1.2001/>

From the above link.

This work is a three-dimensional mandala, or cosmic diagram, of Hevajra, who is the chief deity of the Tantric (Vajrayana) Buddhist path to enlightenment. Unlike Theravada and Mahayana Buddhism, the Tantric school believed that, with serious application and the guidance of a religious teacher, an initiate could achieve enlightenment in this life. The main exercise was meditation. While meditating, the practitioner focused all his mental energy on a deity, in this case Hevajra, thereby transferring to himself the characteristics of the deity. The cult of Hevajra flourished in Cambodia between the tenth and thirteenth centuries. Here Hevajra stands in the centre on an eight-petalled lotus surrounded by dakinis, minor female divinities in Tantric Buddhism, and one unidentified other figure.

Asian Art Department, AGNSW, May 2011

Kim O'Hara said:

Thanks for that link, bryandavis.

I don't know if you posted it in response to my request to Caodemarte and Malcolm for links and references. If so, it's not very strong support since Buddhism existed in SE Asia for roughly a thousand years before the dates mentioned in relation to this mandala. Caodemarte? Malcolm?

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

This summarizes the history of Buddhism in Cambodia.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhism_in_Cambodia

Long and short of it, the Theravada period in Cambodia dates from the 13th century onward. Prior to this Mahāyāna (including Vajrayāna) was the dominant form of Buddhism in this region.

This summarizes the history of Buddhism in Thailand.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhism_in_Thailand

Long and short of it, the Theravada period in Thailand dates from the 13th century onward. Prior to this Mahāyāna (including Vajrayāna) was the dominant form of Buddhism in this region.

This summarizes the history of Buddhism in Burma:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Buddhism_in_Burma

Long and short of it, the Theravada period in Burma dates from the 11th century onward. Prior to this Mahāyāna (including Vajrayāna) was the dominant form of Buddhism in this region.

In all three instances, the rise of Theravada is linked to the collapse of Buddhism in Mainland India. Without the great Mahāyāna Universities to produce missionaries, a vacuum opened up which was filled by missionaries from Shri Lanka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

cloudburst said:

And what is the difference between "a reality dependent on conventional designation" and "dependent existence?"

Malcolm wrote:

The first has no underlying Sanskrit term. But in simple terms it means the imputation of something as real, a fact, and so on, a conventionality because in our everyday perception world this or that seems to function properly. As Madhyamakas, we accept what people say about the world as long as that is not analyzed. We define relative truth fundamentally as a the object of a pre-analytic perception. Ultimate truth, at least the nominal ultimate, is an object of a post-analytic perception, in other words, whatever remains in our perception after analysis is taken to be true, real, irreducible and ultimate.

Dependent or extrinsic existence (parabhāva) is defined by Nāgārjuna as a species of svabhāva, a deferred svabhāva. Nāgārjuna is observing that there no existence (bhāva) not included in either svabhāva or parabhāva. That being the case, when inherent existence is not established, neither is existence and nonexistence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 9:28 AM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

Caodemarte said:

I would assume that Vajrajana was the main form of Buddhism in Thailand as it was in Burma and Cambodia before Theravada. If so, some parts it may have survived as part of Theravada in Thailand.

Kim O'Hara said:

Hi, Caodemarte,

Why on earth would you assume that? And what is your evidence for Vajrayana before Theravada in Burma and Cambodia?

Can you supply sources and references?

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

The archaeological record confirms this very well.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 9:22 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The emptiness which is the absence of inherent existence is common to all three vehicles, but it is not profound.

cloudburst said:

Can you please clarify, according to your understanding, the difference between existence and inherent existence.

Malcolm wrote:

There is none, as Nagārjuna states, "Where is there an existence not included in inherent existence or dependent existence? If inherent existence is established, existence is established." and "Those who have a view of inherent existence, dependent existence, existence or nonexistence have not understood the teaching of the Buddha."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 6:24 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

So here suffering is said to be unreal, because it's 'not inherent' and only things with 'inherent reality' are real.

I interpreted that as emptiness = non-existence. Was I mistaken in that?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, I explained that to you many times now. Mahāyāna emptiness = freedom from existence, nonexistence, both existence and nonexistence and neither. This is the profound emptiness of Mahāyāna. The emptiness which is the absence of inherent existence is common to all three vehicles, but it is not profound.

Saying there is no reality means that when one has examined phenomena, one finds they cannot be found to be real in any sense at all.

One cannot find they are 'real' in the sense implicit in the debate in Indian philosophy. That isn't 'cultural relativism': it is an observation about the background of the debate, the broader 'theory of meaning' that underlies the question itself. But in the modern context, the many discoveries about the nature of matter (like for instance discovery of the periodic table) are discoveries about things and principles that exist. I can't see the point in denying that.

These are no less conventions than the atoms perceived by ancient yogis in their meditation.

But then, I agree in the sense that material phenomena have been shown to have no irreducible component or basis. That is why the search for the 'atom' has developed into speculation on parallel worlds and the like. So I understand how phenomena are not ultimately real, i.e. empty of own-being, groundless, dependent. I think I get that. But I think you can recognize the emptiness of phenomena without saying they are utterly unreal.

If phenomena are not ultimately real, they are not real. There are no gradations of real, unreal, somewhat real, more real than not real, and so on. Things are either real or they are not. The only kind of reality things may be said to have is a reality dependent on conventional designation, and that is all, and when those conventional designations are examined they are found to be baseless, and therefore, the reality of that which they designate evaporates like dew hit by sunlight.

No one has said that we are confronted with the unreality of phenomena at the get go. No one says that we should be content to merely say "Everything is unreal" and leave it at the level of concept. One must discover the unreality of phenomena. I would suggest that in your case, you have not extended your analysis far enough.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 4:44 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna does not have a position from the tetralemma. He uses it to eliminate all positions. For example, in the Lokātitastava he writes:

An existing thing does not arise, nor does a nonexisting thing, nor does something both existing and nonexisting.

There is no arising from self, nor from other; without both how can there be arising?
It is reasonable for an existent to exist, but it is not reasonable for it to perish.
Since it is reasonable that a nonexistent does not exist, it will never perish.
It is not reasonable that there is a result from some perished cause, and there is [no result] from [a cause] that has not perished, therefore...

...you [the Buddha] have asserted that arising is like a dream. [/list]

srivijaya said:

Brilliant! Buddha did indeed state arising is like a dream.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, things are like dreams. When we are in a dream, we believe what we are experiencing is real. When we wake up, we understand it was never real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, the body does not transform, it reverts back into its real nature as wisdom light.

tomamundsen said:

What's the fundamental difference between 'transforming' and 'reverting'? At first glance, I can't see a difference.

Malcolm wrote:

In the first case, one thing turns into another thing; in the second case, one thing goes back to the way it was.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, June 6th, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is really no such thing as an immortal nirmanakayā because the rūpakāya always arises out of the dharmakāya, and therefore, the issue of mortal/immortal never arises for a buddha. If you can achieve buddhahood by a given path, then you realize dharmakāya, and if you realize dharmakāya, you can always generate rūpakāya, which you do so in response to the needs of sentient beings.

Tenso said:

When the body transforms into the five wisdom lights aka rainbow body, you are saying that it is the dharmakaya that is generating a rupakaya? I've read somewhere that the rainbow body is already present in each and every sentient being so would using the word "generate" be an incorrect word to use? How do you "generate" something that is already there?

Malcolm wrote:

In reality, the body does not transform, it reverts back into its real nature as wisdom light.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 11:52 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

srivijaya said:

The sutra stated "The Dharma taught by the tathāgatas is free of the four extremes" - sounds good to me. Now if that means that it contains a position from within the tetralemma, please point it out. I don't see any. Nothing there equates to Nagarjuna's subsequent take on it.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna does not have a position from the tetralemma. He uses it to eliminate all positions. For example, in the Lokātitastava he writes:

An existing thing does not arise, nor does a nonexisting thing, nor does something both existing and nonexisting.

There is no arising from self, nor from other; without both how can there be arising?

It is reasonable for an existent to exist, but it is not reasonable for it to perish.

Since it is reasonable that a non-existent does not exist, it will never perish.

It is not reasonable that there is a result from some perished cause, and there is [no result] from [a cause] that has not perished, therefore, you [the Buddha] have asserted that arising is like a dream.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 10:38 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

srivijaya said:

Compare this with what Nagarjuna claims that the Buddha said: "55. Everything is real and is not real,

Both real and not real,

Neither real nor not real.

This is Lord Buddha's teaching.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I was waiting for someone to bring up the positive tetralemma. Just when I thought I got it now I'm confused again.

Malcolm wrote:

No need to be confused. For example, the Buddha says in the Ārya-śraddhā-balādhānāvātāra-mudrā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

Mañjuśrī, furthermore, there are five acquisitions of solace in the purification of the first stage (bhūmi) of the bodhisattvas. If it is asked what are the five, they are as follows.

There is the acquisition of the solace of "I abide in the knowledge of the middle way inseparable with extremes. I will also place others in the knowledge of middle way inseparable with the extremes. In that regard, the middle way inseparable with extremes is that which is the nature of the extremes because there is no other middle way apart from the nature of the extremes. Since there is no middle way apart from the nature of extremes, the nature of extremes itself is the middle way. Since one knows the middle way of the nature of extremes, all phenomena are the middle way."

There is the acquisition of the solace of "I abide in the knowledge of the space inseparable with the nonbeing of space. I will also place others in the knowledge of space inseparable with the nonbeing of space. In that regard, space inseparable with the nonbeing of space is that which is the nature of the nonbeing of space. If it is asked why that is so, it is because space does not exist apart from the nature of the nonbeing of space. Since there is no space apart from the nature of the nonbeing of space, the nature of the nonbeing of space itself is space. Since one knows space of the nature of nonbeing of space, all phenomena are like space."

There is the acquisition of the solace of "I abide in the knowledge of the child of a barren woman inseparable with the nonbeing of the child of a barren women. I will also place others in the knowledge of the child of a barren woman inseparable with the nonbeing of the child of a barren women. In that regard, the child of a barren woman inseparable with the nonbeing of the child of a barren women is that which is the nature of the nonbeing of child of a barren women. If it is asked why that is so, it is because the child of a barren woman does not exist apart from the nonbeing of the child of a barren woman. Since there is no child of a barren woman apart from the nature of the nonbeing of the child of a barren woman, the nature of the nonbeing of the child of a barren woman itself is the child of a barren woman. Since one knows the child of a barren woman of the nature of the nonbeing of the child of a barren woman, all phenomena are equivalent with child of a barren woman."

There is the acquisition of the solace of "I abide in the knowledge of a mirage inseparable with the nonbeing of the mirage. I will also place others in the knowledge of a mirage inseparable with the nonbeing of the mirage. In that regard, the mirage inseparable with the nonbeing of the mirage is that which is the nature of the nonbeing of the mirage. If it is asked why that is so, it is because the mirage does not exist apart from the nonbeing of the mirage. Since there is no mirage apart from the nature of the nonbeing of the mirage, the nature of the nonbeing of the mirage itself is the mirage. Since one knows the mirage of the nature of the nonbeing of the mirage, all phenomena are like a mirage."

There is the acquisition of the solace of "I abide in the knowledge of right view inseparable with wrong view. I will also place others in the knowledge of right view inseparable with wrong view. In that regard, right view inseparable with wrong view is that which is the nature of wrong view. If it is asked why that is so, it is because right view does not exist apart from nature of wrong view. Since there is no right view apart from the nature of wrong view, the nature of the wrong view itself is right view. Since one knows that right view that is the nature of wrong view, all phenomena are right view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 9:52 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Ayu said:

Please take any "fight" you want to have, via PM! It is off topic here

Malcolm wrote:

No one is fighting.

Ayu said:

Very good. Then Simon E. will read that for sure. I quoted his word: "fight".

Malcolm wrote:

He was using an idiomatic expression in English: "I have no dog in this fight at all," which means "I have no personal stake in this issue." Similar expressions, "I don't have a horse in this race", etc. It does not mean that there is a "fight".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 9:42 PM

Title: Re: Why no Tantrism in Zen?

Content:

Kim O'Hara said:

[

The idea that there is 'no tantra in Theravada' is similarly undermined by the reality of religious practice in SE Asia. Bhante Gavesako started a long thread about it on the other Wheel a few years ago - see <http://www.dhammadwheel.com/viewtopic.php?t=10503> if you're curious.

Kim

Malcolm wrote:

Magical practices, creation of amulets and charms and so on, is not "Tantra" per se.

Vajrayāna is a very specific path, with a very specific understanding of the five paths and ten stages taught by the Buddha in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 9:37 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Ayu said:

Please take any "fight" you want to have, via PM! It is off topic here

Malcolm wrote:

No one is fighting.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Ayu said:

This is how you think, but you've put your informations in a wrong way together.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm no, I haven't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 9:16 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Dan74 said:

9 self identified Zen Buddhists responded and an even split. If we take this as representative of the membership, then only 1/3 seem to actually like the proximity to other traditions. This might be indicative of minority feelings. Whereas a lot more if the other Buddhists would prefer to keep the forum in its current form.

Not sure how representative this is of broader membership but maybe some food for thought...

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot count the three who responded as negatives, a third responded that they don't care either way.

Anyway, fragmentation is normal in internet forums. Vajracakra, for example, exists because people became unhappy here and so they left. Some of them still no longer post here. Some of them bounce back and forth.

Personally, I go where there are conversations that are of interest to me to participate in, such as the one Astus and I were having in the Mahāyāna thread that spawned this absurd poll.

Frankly, Dan, if you want to have another Zen forum that is not dominated by Nonin, you should. It is not hard. It is easy. It will not actually cause people to stop participating here. Then you can limit conversations to those you find palatable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 9:06 PM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

retrofuturist said:

Greetings,

Malcolm wrote:

This poll is just sour grapes.

retrofuturist said:

No - this is governance based on something other than self-styled autocratic leadership.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is sour grapes based on an interaction that Dan and I had which he found troublesome and frustrating, which is resulted in yet another untenable TOS resolution (like the one about metadiscussions).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 8:44 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

All I'm disagreeing with is the assertion that emptiness = non-existence.

Malcolm wrote:

I never asserted that emptiness = nonexistence. I did not make any assertions at all about existence or nonexistence. I objected to your claim that things were "real" as well as "merely existent" when you responded to my statement "gnas lugs med pa", i.e., there is no reality, no gnas lugs, bhutatā, etc. Saying there is no reality means that when one has examined phenomena, one finds they cannot be found to be real in any sense at all. Phenomena are found to be empty imputations, illusions, dreams, mirages, etc. Haribhadra, the famed 7th century commentator to the Abhisamayālaṃkāra stated that everything is illusory, the paths, stages and even buddhahood.

It may have escaped you, but you are actually arguing that things are not empty. And if you assert that things are merely empty of inherent existence, then what you are arguing is that the ultimate is a nonexistence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

srivijaya said:

Buddha flatly refused to engage with speculation on the four extremes. He neither confirmed nor denied them. He had no position.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true at all.

srivijaya said:

It is.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not, as the sūtra I cited quite clearly indicates.

srivijaya said:

In regards to the tetralemma which Vacchagotta was keen to draw the Buddha on:
"Does Master Gotama have any position at all?"

"A 'position,' Vaccha, is something that a Tathagata has done away with.
Why did he dissociate himself from these positions? Because they do not lead to disenchantment, dispassion, cessation; to calm, direct knowledge, full Awakening, Unbinding.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, and in the negation of the four extremes, one has eliminated all positions.

srivijaya said:

So he does not use the stick of logic and reasoning to poke the hornet's nest of distinctions in order to release a swarm of views.

Compare this with what Nagarjuna claims that the Buddha said: "55. Everything is real and is not real,

Both real and not real,

Neither real nor not real.

This is Lord Buddha's teaching.

That which Buddha tossed into the dirt, others subsequently picked up and dusted off.
The distinction of the two truths is the third option on the tetralemma.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, that depends on whether you accept the Mahāyāna sūtras as the Buddha's teaching, and if you don't, then I cannot understand why you are posting here.

srivijaya said:

Still, there's much in the Mahayana which goes way beyond this. The Great Way is not difficult for those who have no preferences. When love and hate are both absent everything becomes clear and undisguised. Make the smallest distinction, however, and heaven and earth are set infinitely apart.

Malcolm wrote:

[/quote]

This in no way exceeds Nāgārjuna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 8:27 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is meaningless to say something is real in anything other than an ultimate sense.

Wayfarer said:

That is where I disagree.

Malcolm wrote:

You can say that things are "conventionally real", but this does not help you. Why? Because once again, "conventionally real" amounts to nothing more than the assertion that something is "real" because two sentient beings agree on the identity of a shared appearance. And that also does not match how the term is used in English. "Real" in the OED means, "...actually existing as a thing or occurring in fact; not imagined or supposed" or as it is used in Philosophy, "...relating to something as it is, not merely as it may be described or distinguished."

In reality, a thing that is a conventional truth is true only in so far as it is functional. For, there is no "car" in a car. We use a number of parts, assemble them and create something we call a "car", using those parts to perform a function. But when we analyze those parts, we can find no car in them, nor separate from them. The "car" as such does not exist apart from our imputation of a car upon some parts, just as there is no person in the aggregates or separate from them. "Car" and "Malcolm" are imputations of an on a collection of parts and have no reality other than as an imputation. This means that the reality of cars and Malcolm's is strictly conventional.

This is why conventional truths are relative truths, "concealer truths" if we follow the etymology of samvṛtti, because their real nature is concealed by our deluded perceptions of things.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

srivijaya said:

Buddha flatly refused to engage with speculation on the four extremes. He neither confirmed nor denied them. He had no position.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not true at all. For example, the Buddha states to Mahāmati in the Lankāvatara: The Dharma taught by the tathāgatas is free of the four extremes as follows: not identical, not different, not both or neither; free of being existent, nonexistent, not existent, not nonexistent, permanent and impermanent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, June 5th, 2015 at 4:34 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

We are not denying conventional reality, we are merely saying that it appears without any existence.

Wayfarer said:

You don't have to be a scholar of Tibetan and Sanskrit texts to spot the problem with this sentence. It actually doesn't make sense. How can something 'exist without existing'?

Malcolm wrote:

I did not write that sentence. Cone did.

You are essentially asserting that 'the only reality is absolute' - as you have said elsewhere in this thread. For instance: I am sorry to say that if suffering were real, there would be no possibility of a path and no possibility of a result. Why? To say that something is real is much worse than saying that something exists. Why? To say that something is real is to say it is inherent.

To a suffering being - that's all of us, to all intents - you can't simply say 'look here, your suffering is really the result of deluded cognitions'.

But that is precisely the point of the Buddha's teaching, in toto: i.e., one's suffering is a result of deluded cognitions.

Now, it might actually be the result of deluded cognition - but to overcome this state of delusion is the point of the entire Buddhist teaching. That is why there is a path in the first place, so to deny that there is suffering, comes perilously close to denying the first truth of Buddhism.

I no more deny there is suffering than there is an appearance of illusion. I merely pointed out that neither are real.

So I object that to say 'something is real' is to say it has ultimate or inherent existence, or, in other words, that only the ultimate is real and that phenomena are unreal.

But that is precisely the point of Nāgārjuna's statement that existents must be included in either inherent existence or dependent existence. If inherent existence is established, then existents are established.

Every phenomenon can be understood as a result of causes and conditions, and in that sense, it has no inherent reality; that is the ground of the identity of Śūnyatā and dependent origination. But it is real in an empirical sense, even if not an ultimate sense. It is meaningless to say something is real in anything other than an ultimate sense. It is the reality of the existence for us unenlightened beings. It is the task of Madhyamika to demonstrate that the presumed solidity and independent reality of the objects of conventional experience is in fact empty. But that doesn't say they're non-existent, and to say that they are non-existent is nihilistic.

Madhyamaka indeed removes claims that existents exist. It is not annihilationist because Madhyamaka does not propose the existence of something to become non-existent. Your assertion of nihilism is unwarranted and out of place. I could care less what old fascist philosophers like Heidegger have to say about anything.

As far as 'deluded cognition' is concerned, an apple is still an apple, whether for the sage or for the ordinary worldly being.

I don't think so. For example, take the example of a liquid in the six realms, it is water for a human is molten iron for a hell being, pus and blood for a preta, nectar for a deva, etc. For a human being the perception of water is conventionally true, perception of molten iron, and so on are conventionally false. It is equally so in the rest of the six realms, for example, a hell being's perception of molten iron is conventionally true in the hell realms, but the perception of water in that realm conventionally would be delusion.

I think the problem I am having with your statements on this matter is that they are not taking into account the facts of existence - they are rather scholastic arguments, based on a scholastic tradition within they have a particular meaning.

Right, I am employing those arguments within the context of a tradition to which I am an actual heir, having been trained in those arguments in the traditional manner.

I'm actually interested in philosophy, Buddhist and otherwise, as a practical skill, and that has to accept the fact that suffering, objects of cognition, and the rest, do exist, even whilst they're ultimately empty.

Relative truths are objects of false cognitions. They are identified as such so that one will know how to discern ultimate truth, the understanding and realization of which leads to nirvana.

However, the extent to which you believe that so called "mere existence" is immune to analysis is the extent to which your view contains grasping to existents and falls far short of Madhyamaka view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2015 at 7:59 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

srivijaya said:

Hi Malcolm,

I see that you place emphasis on the deluded cognition here, rather than the object. Still, Wayfarer has a valid point. The Mahayana proposition rests on the revelation that such deluded cognitions perceive objects as existing inherently, whereas they are in fact empty (Two Truths). Direct experience of this is essential for liberation. If you remove this, then the whole premise is undermined wouldn't you say?

Malcolm wrote:

Truths are cognitions of objects, so yes, the emphasis is on the cognition, nevertheless, the definition is incomplete without including the object.

For example, a mirage is the object of a deluded cognition of the presence of water in the distance. The perceived object does not exist, and yet it still appears; when that appearance of investigated, no water is found which corresponds to that appearance.

"...such deluded cognitions perceive objects as existing inherently, whereas they are in fact empty..."

Such a distinction is not made by a worldly person. Worldly people do not think in terms of "inherent existence."

The problem with Wayfarer's perspective is that he believes that there is something in phenomena that can survive analysis, which he calls "mere existence." In reality, nothing can survive ultimate analysis, not even buddhahood.

Relative truths are by definition cognitions of objects which have not been subjected to ultimate analysis. The cognition of any object which can survive ultimate analysis is an ultimate truth.

The real point is that whatever arises from causes and conditions cannot survive ultimate analysis. For example, in the Hinayāna presentation of two truths the cognition of a vase is relative truth; when this is shattered with a hammer, the cognition of the shards and so on are ultimate truths. Likewise, the cognition of water is a relative truth; but the cognition of coolness, wetness and limpidity are ultimate truths.

When this is brought to the level of Madhyamaka, we can see that all things that arise from cause and conditions are equivalent with mirages, dreams, illusions and so on. Just as in a puppet show a bunch of rocks, sticks and paper is made to appear as elephants, warriors and so on through the "mantra" of the illusionist (meaning his narrative), likewise are phenomena appearing through causes and conditions. So too when it is understood that the illusion is a mere spell cast through skilled manipulation of bits and pieces of rocks, wood, string and so on, one understands that the illusions are unreal, and phenomena are also like this. When the basis of the illusions are investigated, they too are found to arise from causes and conditions and therefore are essentially unreal. There is no end to such analysis because there is no end to deceptive appearances.

I can't continue since I have to go out of town for a day or so, but I will leave you with this: whatever arises from causes and conditions does not exist in those causes and conditions nor separate from them, just as a self does not exist in the aggregates nor separate from them. Nevertheless, just as things are designated dependent on causes and conditions without really being there, selves are designated dependent on the aggregates without really being there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2015 at 11:19 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are aware then that relative truths such as cars, houses, diseases and the like are all objects of deluded cognitions, correct?

Wayfarer said:

I don't accept that the objects of everyday experience are simply 'deluded cognitions'. That is the exact problem: you're denying conventional reality, saying that is simply non-existent or illusory. That is what I am saying is nihilist.

Malcolm wrote:

Please reread my statement carefully. You did not read it correctly, as your statement above shows.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2015 at 4:36 AM

Title: Re: Experiences with crazy wisdom?

Content:

smcj said:

Buddhist masters can become senile. Their bodies are made of the five elements, just like the rest of us, and sometimes this means they can experience acute mental decline as a result of aging, despite whatever realization they may have attained.

That's interesting. I personally have not had the experience of a master mentally declining with age. But then my sample pooling is limited.

Malcolm wrote:

Tibetan masters are typically killed by a sedentary lifestyle, too much tea and bad food. They don't usually live long enough to be at risk for senile dementia.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Experiences with crazy wisdom?

Content:

ReasonAndRhyme said:

So, if I'm getting you right, you're saying that Chhimed Rigdzin was not a Buddhist master but just a senile old man, and I'm delusional? OK, I've reported your post and this is the last time I've communicated with you.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think he said any of the three things you attributed to him. Simon did not say that Chimed Rigzin Rinpoche was just senile old man, he did not say that Chimed Rigzin Rinpoche was not a Buddhist master, and he did not say you were delusional. What he said was that someone he knew who has some expertise in gerontology thought that Chimed Rigzin Rinpoche was showing signs of senile dementia.

Buddhist masters can become senile. Their bodies are made of the five elements, just like the rest of us, and sometimes this means they can experience acute mental decline as a result of aging, despite whatever realization they may have attained. It does not mean that the fruit of their realization vanishes into thin air. It means their bodies are worn out.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, June 3rd, 2015 at 3:00 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Protectors: Why Did China Invade Tibet?

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I personally find the "when the iron birds fly" narrative revolting. The subtext is that the Tibetan genocide was sort of OK because the dharma was spread across the world. It's like telling a woman that it was sort of OK that she was gang raped because she had such a beautiful child.

Malcolm wrote:

Anyway, the land of the red face people refers to Tibet and it is ultimately from a narrative about how the Tibetans conquered Khotan, and the spread of the Dharma into Tibet much later on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

conebeckham said:

[

Such Wisdom is nowhere near a Universal Atman, though, despite comments in the Uttaratantrashastra and elsewhere regarding the Paramitas of Permanence and Self. For one thing, it is said to be "personally experienced." It's not universal.

Malcolm wrote:

It [wisdom] is also relative since it is a cognition and is not a permanent cognition [apart from a buddha's wisdom] and also comes about through causes [which is also true in the case of a buddha's wisdom].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 5:22 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

things, whether compounded or uncompounded, either exist inherently or they exist conventionally. Apart from these two kinds of existence, there is no third kind of existence.

Wayfarer said:

I was referring to conventional existence. There are things that exists, like cars, houses, diseases, and things that don't, like unicorns and the square root of two.

Malcolm wrote:

You are aware then that relative truths such as cars, houses, diseases and the like are all objects of deluded cognitions, correct?

I am sorry to say that if suffering were real, there would be no possibility of a path and no possibility of a result. Why? To say that something is real is much worse than saying that something exists. Why? To say that something is real is to say it is inherent. Not necessarily.

I have some points in common with what you're saying but I don't think you're acknowledging the reality of existence. It is unreal from the point of view of the 'gone beyond' but for those who are in it, it is undeniably real. It is deniably real, if it were undeniably real, then it would follow that there would be no escape.

....

http://www.thezensite.com/ZenEssays/Nagarjuna/SecondBuddha_Nagarjuna_Loy.html

This citation does not help your point. Nāgārjuna says, as I stated above, if there something non-empty, there would be something to be empty; but as there is nothing not empty, where is there something to be empty?

...Emptiness, as articulated by Nāgārjuna, Tsongkhapa argues, is the absence of this kind of existence or property.

http://www.smith.edu/philosophy/docs/garfield_nihilism.pdf, Jay L Garfield

You are doubtless aware that Tsongkhapa's interpretation of Madhyamaka is a minority view, one that is hotly contested and refuted? I don't agree with Tsongkhapa on many details of his presentation of Madhyamaka, his presentation of the tetralemma in particular. It has become the dominant voice among Western Academics, but it is not the only, nor even the best presentation amongst Tibetan Madhyamakas.

Those quotes represent how it was taught to me.

Yes, I understand. The problem with the way you were taught is that you were taught to accept a residuum, called "mere existence," which accounts for your crypto-realism on the one hand, and you were taught to negate something other than the thing before you, which amounts to subtle nihilism because the way you were taught Madhyamaka maintains that an absence is ultimate [the famous non-affirming negation], the absence of inherent existence, i.e., the emptiness which is the absence of the true existence of things, on the other hand.

Gorampa for example, critiques in detail the subtle nihilism present in the Gelugpa view that you follow, as does Mipham. You should read them both.

I was taught old timey Madhyamaka that was not corrupted with those new-fangled fifteenth century innovations delivered by a "Mañjuśrī" channeler (Lama Umapa).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 5:09 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I'm staring to see Malcolm's position that this debate doesn't really matter. Rangtong vs shentong - maybe just a matter of emphasis between "not something" and "not nothing". All just skillful means.

Malcolm wrote:

As Āryadeva states:

Even though they wait for a long while,

no one can offer a reply to one who do not have [these] positions:

"[It] exists", "[It] does not exist" and "[It] exists and does not exist."

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 4:51 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

As Sapan famously quips, "If there is something beyond the freedom from extremes, that is an extreme."

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

Mind blown. Right.

Even the "middle" is an extreme. It has to be by definition.

Malcolm wrote:

The Samputa Tantra states:

Neither empty nor not-empty,
there is nothing to perceive in the middle.

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

In fact, the one single thing we cannot negate in an affirmative manner is the object of all four extremes itself.

... Which is, in fact, everything.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I think the argument is that since all negations are nominal whether affirming or non-affirming it is just as legitimate to nominally affirm the ultimate as it is to negate.

Otherwise we are just stuck on the first of Nagarjuna's extreme's, i.e. not-x. I think smcj is just arguing the second extreme, i.e. not not-x.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not stuck on the first extreme, I am not asserting non-existence is the ultimate. The point is that absence of the four extremes, which is ultimate, is not arrived at through a mere assertion, it is arrived at through examination. It is a conclusion, a result of analysis, not a hypothesis about the ultimate (unlike smcj's perspective, which is just a proposition, an proffered theory). It is not an idea you hold in your mind, "Oh the ultimate is free from four extremes." Why? Because when you turn your analysis to the ultimate, no ultimate can be found which is itself free from the four extremes. At the point, your proliferations should cease. As Sapan famously quips, "If there is something beyond the freedom from extremes, that is an extreme."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 3:34 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

If you argue that there is nothing established to either affirm or negate in the first place then that argues both ways - you may as well state that nominally the negation is affirming as non-affirming.

Otherwise the whole strategy of the four extremes falls down, since all of them are negations. Since the four extremes are negations there has to - at least nominally - be something to negate. If that isn't the case, Nagarjuna's whole argument goes out the window and you are left with pure nihilism.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is nominally something to negate, appearances. Nāgārjuna's arguments run in three phases: first, self-arising is negated; then, arising from others is negated; and finally causeless negation is negated. Of these three types of arising, the second is what we conventionally term "arising."

This is why, at the conclusion of the first chapter, Buddhapalita notes:

Because results, conditions, and nonconditions do not exist, descriptions for arising are merely conventional.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 1:43 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapa said:

The translation is not a literal translation of the words but a translation of the meaning. .

Malcolm wrote:

We disagree. It does not translate meaning of the verse, nor the words.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 1:37 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

I personally am not using the term "Shentong" rigorously. Shentong, as a view utilizes the three natures paradigm taken from the Yogacara. I use it as a shorthand for talking about emptiness as an affirming negation, or "empty-of-other". I don't really see a need to elaborate on how that Reality might be characterized, although there is plenty of literature that tries to do so.

Malcolm wrote:

In order for there to be something empty of something else, that something has to be established in the first place. It is not established in the first place, what is the use of talking about either intrinsic or extrinsic emptiness.

The whole gzhan stong trip is a flimsy house of cards.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

PK lays it all out here: <http://www.pemakhandro.org/emptiness-madhyamaka/>

Malcolm wrote:

It is incorrect to identify the approach of Candarkīrti (aka prasangika) as rang stong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, June 2nd, 2015 at 1:30 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Simon E. said:

' Transcendent ' ? What does it transcend ?

dzogchungpa said:

As Adriano Clemente says in his foreword to "The Supreme Source": In all the gnostic traditions, the absolute is the equivalent of the ineffable, of that which transcends word and thought.

Malcolm wrote:

Ultimate truth is inexpressible, but not "The Ineffable."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 11:29 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

M: "To say that something is real is to say it is inherent."

Not necessarily, if by meaning or definition, real = inherent, then fine. But experientially, 'real' is ineffable.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that something is real means that it actually exists.

Experiences come and go.

Nicholas Weeks said:

Reality is not some thing; so I will redo as: Experientially, reality is ineffable, permanent suchness.

Malcolm wrote:

Suchness is not established. The Ārya-varmavyūhanirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

The dhamadhātu is difficult to imagine,
it does not come or go,
the dharmadhātu is not the aggregates, nor the elements or sense bases.
Since there is no place to abandon,
it is unmoving.

The suchness of the dharmadhātu,
it's natural purity, does not exist.

In the same vein, the Mahāsiddha Virupa concludes his Doha:

...the two truths don't exist in the dharmadhātu, the dharmadhātu does not exist.

Indeed, the Ārya-ghanavyūha-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra says:

The suchness of all phenomena arises through power of mutual relation, the yogins seeing in that way
clearly see it as suchness.

The perfected nature is the dharmatā of phenomena;
all phenomena do not arise
as the substantial entities of the imputed:
empty, insubstantial,
beyond the extremes of existence and nonexistence,
similar with illusions and dreams,
like fairy castles,
like opthalmia and like mirages.

In other words, suchness, here described as the perfected nature, the dharmatā of dharmas, cannot be established apart from those very dharmas. If those very dharmas are not established, how can their suchness be established? When the relative is not found, what ultimate can be said to be established? The two truths are only established from the perspective of we ignorant fools.

This tendency to reify the ultimate is very pernicious. For this reason, Nāgārjuna clearly states in the Sixty Verses of Reasoning:

This pair, samsara and nirvana, does not exist.

Thorough knowledge of samsara is said to be nirvana.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 10:39 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

M: "To say that something is real is to say it is inherent."

Not necessarily, if by meaning or definition, real = inherent, then fine. But experientially, 'real' is ineffable.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that something is real means that it actually exists.

Experiences come and go.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

It's very difficult to explain what the deities are from a Madhyamaka perspective. It's very easy to do so from a Shentong perspective. If the deities are not "empty-of-other" then we are all wasting our time.

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite easy to explain what "deities" are from a Madhyamaka perspective: they are a method, a path to realize a result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 9:33 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Unknown said:

Sure something is real. Suffering is real, and the path is real. Those who understand and follow the path, find a way out of suffering that is real. Can that be disputed?

Malcolm wrote:

I am sorry to say that if suffering were real, there would be no possibility of a path and no possibility of a result. Why? To say that something is real is much worse than saying that something exists. Why? To say that something is real is to say it is inherent. On the other hand to say that something exists allows for the possibility that it may not exist. When it comes to the use of the term "real," it is not possible to say that the real can become unreal — these are contradictions in terms. On the other hand, it is perfectly acceptable in common language to say "That which existed then no longer exists now." Hence, to say that "suffering is real" is to condemn all sentient beings in the six realms to endless torment.

Unknown said:

In all the billions of ways that billions of things exist.

Malcolm wrote:

That is no kind of answer: but to provide the proper answer, things, whether compounded or uncompounded, either exist inherently or they exist conventionally. Apart from these two kinds of existence, there is no third kind of existence.

The question then should be, "What is the conventional existence of things?"

Unknown said:

Nagarjuna's intention is to show that compound things are not inherently real. He does not say that 'nothing exists', and to say that nothing exists is nihilistic.

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna's intent, first and foremost, is to represent the intention of the Prajñāpāramitā, defend Mahāyāna and show that the realism pervasive in Hinayāna schools is not the intent of the Buddha.

Secondly, he shows quite clearly that attempts to demonstrate that things have anything other than conventional existence are incoherent. And he also shows that when conventional things are examined, they are found to lack any reality at all.

Unknown said:

Anyway, Nagarjuna's statements about 'existence' and 'arising' were made in the context of a philosophical or cultural milieu within which such terminology had specific meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in his milieu, bhāva meant "to exist," much as "to exist" means to exist" to us today. Your attempt to avoid the issue of dealing with Nāgārjuna statements through a form of philosophical/cultural relativism is weak dodge. How can you expect me to take this seriously?

Unknown said:

As I said, many claim that Buddhism is nihilistic. Do you think it is? If it isn't, how isn't it?

Malcolm wrote:

I already stated this before: when one does not propose something as existent, one cannot be accused of being an annihilationist. I have not proposed any claims of non-existent, I have merely removed claims for existing existents, as Buddhapaṇita remarks in his comments on chapter 5 of the MMK

We do not claim aggregates, sense bases and elements are nonexistent, but we do eliminate the claim that existents exists.

He also remarks at the end of chapter five:

In order to prove an unknown topic with a known topic: most worldly people say that space does not exist in any way. Thus, partisans claim "All of those proliferations are like space." The intent of such a statement is "All of those are nothing at all." For that reason, it is proven that space is emptiness in order to elucidate the example, "The remaining five elements [dhātus] are equivalent with space."

In other words, in MMK:5 (the analysis of the dhātus), of the six dhātus — earth, water, fire, air, space and consciousness — only space is actually subject to analysis. Why? Since Nāgārjuna shows:

Therefor space is not existent, it is not non-existent, is not the characterized,

is not a characteristic.

The remaining five elements [dhātus] are equivalent with space

Buddhapalita discusses this passage:

Why is that so? When investigated, the characterized and the characteristic does not exist, and also there is no other existent not included in the characterized and the characteristic. If the existent does not exist, also the non-existent does not exist.

Therefor, although space is not existent, it is also not non-existent, although the characterized does not exist, also the characteristic does not exist. Thus, if even a subtle thing called 'space' came to be, when counting whether anything in those four [alternatives] is valid, because those four [alternatives] are not [valid], therefor space does not exist.

For this reason, characterizing the Madhyamaka position that "there is no reality" as annihilationist is inappropriate.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 10:55 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I say the view that 'there is no reality' is a nihilist view. 'Nihilism' means that nothing is real, or that everything is illusory, or that nothing has any ultimate meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

In order to the statement "no reality" to be annihilationist, it would be necessary to propose that there was something that was real. For example, Nāgārjuna states very clearly:

If were anything all that was not empty, there would something to be empty; but since there is nothing at all that is not empty, where is there something to be empty?

Wayfarer said:

My view is, I think there is 'an ultimate', but that this is not something that can properly be named or designated as such. So as soon as you assert 'an ultimate' and get into a debate about it, it's already a lost argument, because you're trying to talk about or gesture towards something that is over the horizon of discursive reasoning. But I don't accept the interpretation of Śūnyatā as meaning that 'things really don't exist', tout courte. Things are empty of own-being, meaning that no determinate entity contains its own origin or cause, and in fact nothing in the phenomenal realm does. That is demonstrably true, even in scientific terms. But it doesn't mean, 'nothing is real'.

Malcolm wrote:

You have just shunted off inherent existence onto something else, a so called dependent existence, which is refuted quite handily by Nāgārjuna in the chapter 15 of the MMK.

In other words, your view holds that things are real. But how? In what way can things exist? You propose things are not self-sufficient, but when examined, even this dependency cannot be found. Why? Causes do not exist at the same time as their effects, but they also cannot exist apart from the time of their effects. As Nāgārjuna states:

Existents do not arise from existents, existents do not arise from non-existents;
nonexistents do not arise from existents, nonexistents do not arise from nonexistents:
where then is there arising?

In the end, so called "mere existence" is just a convention, and is not real since such conventions will not bear analysis. If you imagine that there are some existents that can bear analysis, you have not really understood the Buddha's intention.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 10:45 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

This non-conceptual Wisdom Mind is not the object of the conceptualizing process and so is not negated by Madhyamaka reasoning. Therefore, it can be said to be the only thing that has absolute and true existence.

Malcolm wrote:

Yeah, actually, "This non-conceptual Wisdom Mind" it is both negated by Madhyamaka reasoning and is nothing but a product of the conceptualizing process.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 6:59 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

...and that is inexpressible.

I cannot see having an actual disagreement about the right way to characterize something that we agree is inconceivable and inexpressae.

Malcolm wrote:

It is how you get there that counts...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

What does "the ultimate" mean?

Malcolm wrote:

don dam pa, parmārtha, highest goal.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 4:08 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

> Since nothing in the relative is found to be free of the four extremes, nothing can be found in the ultimate that is free of the four extremes.

This is exactly what is disputed. This doesn't follow, neither does the converse statement.

Malcolm wrote:

It was mis-stated, my bad. What I should have said, is that since one cannot find anything in the relative according to any of the four extremes, there is nothing in the ultimate that can be said to be free from the four extremes. In other words, since the four extremes do not exist in the relative, also there is no ultimate free from extremes, and is that is inexpressible.

The best thing you can say is 'gnas lugs med pa", there is no reality.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, June 1st, 2015 at 4:02 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

Since nothing in the relative is found to be free of the four extremes, nothing can be found in the ultimate that is free of the four extremes. You are claiming that there is something which is free from the four extremes in the ultimate, but such a claim is incoherent.

Since the Shentong position is that the ultimate is beyond conceptuality, and therefore not subject to such criticisms, I have absolutely no qualms about it being incoherent. This approach to emptiness is not supposed to be accessible by the intellect, but is approached instead by faith.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is, that one cannot say anything about the ultimate that is free from extremes, much less assert that it is immune to Madhyamaka analysis. The moment you make a proposition about the ultimate, you have fallen into an extreme. If you claim the ultimate is atman, that is an extreme; if you claim the ultimate is a nonaffirming negation, that is an extreme; if you claim the ultimate is an affirming negation, that is an extreme.

When you understand that the ultimate is free from all extremes, then you understand that it is not only beyond mind, it is also inexpressible. The problem with the gzhan stong pas as well as the Gelugpas is that they sound like a couple of kids bickering, "Is so!", "Is not!", ad nauseam.

Since nothing can be found to exist by any of the four extremes in the relative, nothing can be ascertained in the ultimate according to any of the four extremes, and that is inexpressible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:01 PM

Title: Re: Visualization Training

Content:

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

So basically you are saying that I do not need to have completed ngondro before beginning the Kriya forms of Chenrezig, Manjushri, etc.

Is that the case even if I have not received at least a jenang?

Malcolm wrote:

If you have not received any initiation, you are not even practicing Kriya yoga, technically speaking.

And yes, you do not need to have even started ngondro, let alone completed it to meditate on any deity for which you have received the proper transmission.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 7:54 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

Depending on your exact definition of "real", in a word, yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually exists...

smcj said:

No. That is suggestive of something manifest and therefore subject to the tetralemma.
...is ultimate, irreducible, cannot be analyzed further, is unconditioned, etc.
Yes.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that something is ultimate, irreducible, cannot be analyzed further, is unconditioned, etc. is precisely the same thing as saying "actually exists."

Since nothing in the relative is found to be free of the four extremes, nothing can be found in the ultimate that is free of the four extremes. You are claiming that there is something which is free from the four extremes in the ultimate, but such a claim is incoherent.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:57 AM

Title: Re: TNH's new translation of the Heart Sutra

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

...simplified translations.

Malcolm wrote:

it is not a translation, it is crib, a gloss, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:55 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

Depending on your exact definition of "real", in a word, yes.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually exists, is ultimate, irreducible, cannot be analyzed further, is unconditioned, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:52 AM

Title: Re: Visualization Training

Content:

tingdzin said:

"Really, though, one shouldn't be doing deity practices until one completes ngondro,

Malcolm wrote:

Total nonsense. This is a modern fiction.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:45 AM

Title: Re: TNH's new translation of the Heart Sutra

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Not sure which you're talking about,

Malcolm wrote:

The rūpa skandha includes five things: the five sense organs and the five sense objects which are all composed of the four elements.

There is a rhythm in reciting, "there is no eye, no ear, no nose..." etc., which is missing from this gloss entirely.

Personally, I think it is entirely clumsy.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:35 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So you are saying that there is something real that cannot be known in any way?

smcj said:

Cannot be known dualistically. It can be known without a subject/object dichotomy.

Malcolm wrote:

So basically, you are suggesting that consciousness is ultimately real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:23 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Compared to what? That doesn't avoid nihilism - that is nihilism. The task is to awaken to the real, which is distinguishable from the merely existent, those things that are compound, transient, and subject to decay.

Malcolm wrote:

There is something real? What's that?

smcj said:

Nothing that can be taken as an object of consciousness in a dualistic way.

Malcolm wrote:

So you are saying that there is something real that cannot be known in any way?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:12 AM

Title: Re: TNH's new translation of the Heart Sutra

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

I really like this translation.

This and Red Pine's feel like the smoothest i've read.

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with translation rūpa skandha as "body" is that it excludes the five objects of the senses, which are also part of the rūpa skandha.

There are other problems with it as well. It is at best a gloss on the Heart Sūtra and not a translation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 9:09 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Compared to what? That doesn't avoid nihilism - that is nihilism. The task is to awaken to the real, which is distinguishable from the merely existent, those things that are compound, transient, and subject to decay.

Malcolm wrote:

There is something real? What's that?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 7:58 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Johnny Dangerous said:

Zen sees itself as superior to other Sutra traditions by virtue of being a direct path outside of scripture.

Malcolm wrote:

All paths are outside scriptures. There are two kinds of Dharma, the Dharma of realization and the Dharma of texts.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 7:46 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

how to avoid nihilism, then?

Malcolm wrote:

One can only be an annihilationist if one first proposes that something exists which later gets utterly destroyed.

If one checks one's bank balance and finds one's account is empty, is one a thief merely because one discovers one is broke?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 6:57 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

anjali said:

It's the understanding of the nature of the experience where Hindu and Buddhist yogis differ.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct.

anjali said:

Where's the beef?

Malcolm wrote:

There isn't any beef, that is the whole point. The cow (and everything else) is totally illusory, and there is nothing else to discover apart from that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 5:23 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

...because tathāgatagarbha is nothing other than natural luminosity of one's mind, which is to say that one's mind has always been innately pure from the start.

So a buddha's mind expressing it's natural luminosity can be said to be "empty-of-(anything)-other" than that expression, right?

Even Buddhas are not ultimately real, so how can their qualities be ultimately real?

Funny, but that is exactly how I've heard Karmapa VIII's position portrayed in a Guy Newland YouTube video; "Self-empty by nature but other-empty by expression."

Lots and lots of ways to skin that cat.

Malcolm wrote:

I guess the point is that in this context, this "other emptiness" is trivial and not at all profound. It's like saying, my clean white shirt is empty of stains, but it is not empty of being clean.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 4:59 AM

Title: Re: Poll: Should Zen/Chan/Seon have a separate Forum?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This poll is just sour grapes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 3:29 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

Although I self identify as a "Shentongpa" I'm not particularly attached to the 3 Natures paradigm.

Malcolm wrote:

The whole point of the term "gzhan stong" is to prove, via the (incorrect) use of the three natures that the ultimate truth is empty of the relative truth, but not empty of itself through the assertion that the perfected nature [yongs grub] is empty of the dependent [gzhan dbang] and the imagined natures [kun brtags].

smcj said:

I don't have any objections to it particularly, I think it is a side issue. I'm more an advocate for some form of "empty-of-other" idea, of which there are quite a few. Once I get through "When Clouds Part" (Brunnholz!) I'll have a better idea of which one I feel most comfortable with. As of now I'm uncommitted about that.

Malcolm wrote:

It is quite trivial to say that tathāgatagarbha is not empty of qualities but is empty of faults, because tathāgatagarbha is nothing other than natural luminosity of one's mind, which is to say that one's mind has always been innately pure from the start. This however does not mean that those famous qualities are real, established, ultimately exist and so on. Even Buddhas are not ultimately real, so how can their qualities be ultimately real?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 3:15 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Unknown said:

"Misguided man, have I not stated in many ways consciousness to be dependently arisen since without a condition there is no origination of consciousness?"

Malcolm wrote:

MN 38

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

You are the one that keeps on bringing it up.

Malcolm wrote:

Look, I don't go out of my way to negate gzhan stong, but as I have made clear, AFAIC, gzhan stong does not = tathagatagarbha doctrine.

Gzhan stong is a Tibetan attempt, of several, to try and reconcile the Yogacara treatises of Maitreyanatha with Nāgārjuna's Madhyamaka.

It is not the case that this type of reconciliation was not attempted by Indians, it was, notably in Ratnakārashanti's Madhamaka-alamkara.

The problem is how the Tibetans in the gzhan stong school went about it, not that they tried it. Ratnakārashanti, Dharmapāla before him, also tried to reconcile the two approaches, but they did not do so by overwriting the Yogacara treatises themselves. They did so within the constraints of the classical Yogacara system. What I specifically find fault with in the gzhan stong system is the incorrect way they apply the three natures to the two truths, that is really the essence of my disagreement with their tenet system and what causes them all the problems they face with other Tibetan scholars. Longchenpa does not do this, and this is why his treatment of tathāgatagarbha is generally considered more acceptable overall, as is Rangjung Dorje's.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

Point conceded. Full stop. The interpretation I side with is of the Cittamtra texts that are of a later Tibetan re-interpretation. Hence my consistent and valid characterization of making a distinction between the classical Indian commentaries and the later Tibetan commentaries.

Malcolm wrote:

A later Tibetan interpretation which based on a misunderstanding of those very same classical Indian commentaries themselves. It would be like you pointing to the west, and saying "go that way", while I insist on saying "Oh, you mean go east."

smcj said:

Ok, attention everybody that is following this (and similar) threads!

Is it clear now that Malcolm does not accept many of the later Tibetan interpretations of the classical Indian texts to which I subscribe? We really need to get this behind us. I've been challenged on it too many times and it is getting annoying.

BTW, as I've said before, I appreciate and even admire his position. I find no fault with it. However he finds fault with mine, therefore discussion. That's 100% ok. What else can generate so much discussion about Dharma on the internet!

Malcolm wrote:

You are the one that keeps on bringing it up. You did not need to bring this issue up in this thread.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 2:39 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

anjali said:

If we accept that he had the experience, how is one to explain it from a Buddhist perspective?

Malcolm wrote:

He mistook the clarity aspect [gsal cha] of his mind as a self.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

Point conceded. Full stop. The interpretation I side with is of the Cittamtra texts that are of a later Tibetan re-interpretation. Hence my consistent and valid characterization of making a distinction between the classical Indian commentaries and the later Tibetan commentaries.

Malcolm wrote:

A later Tibetan interpretation which based on a misunderstanding of those very same classical Indian commentaries themselves. It would be like you pointing to the west, and saying "go that way", while I insist on saying "Oh, you mean go east."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 2:11 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Positing a self at any level (even a subtle level) would then lead to clinging and grasping at that level.

Malcolm wrote:

Correct. For this reason, Vaibhāṣika, Sautrantika and Yogacara are considered the three realist Buddhist tenet systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 2:09 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

KB?

Malcolm wrote:

Karl Brunnholz

smcj said:

Khenpo Tsultrim isn't a modern Tibetan?

Malcolm wrote:

There are plenty of other modern Tibetans who do not share KTG's affection for gzhan stong. His views are not particularly modern, BTW.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

smcj said:

I side on the more modern (and Tibetan) perspective.

Malcolm wrote:

No you don't, you side with an understanding of the Cittamatra texts that even KB admits has no basis in those very texts themselves.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 1:51 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

The calculus doesn't add up. How can the Buddha have so clearly refuted this, and yet:

1) taught an unborn, undying knower

Malcolm wrote:

Like Kapila, Buddha was a pluralist, accepting that "knowers" were unique and separate. Unlike Kapila, he did not teach that there was a purusha separate from the aggregates; further he rejected the idea that phenomena were transformations of a single substance (prakriti), and likewise rejected the idea that there was one universal knower.

Code: #

or alayavijnana or bhavanga citta, which is very similar to the Advaita atman?

How is the ālayavijñā, the bearer of karmic imprints (vasanas, bijas), something conditioned and contaminated, similar to the Advaita atman, something unconditioned and uncontaminated?

Matt J said:

2) established a set of teachings that led to the rise of the Chittamatra, which (under some interpretations anyway) seems very similar to Advaita vedanta?

Malcolm wrote:

Cittamatra is not at all like Advaita. Were you not aware that Vasubandhu argues forcibly for the existence of individual mindstreams?

Matt J said:

3) established a set of teachings that a leading Buddhist teacher was unable to separate the shentong Buddhist view from Advaita according to a dharma scholar and eyewitness?

Malcolm wrote:

There is merely a structural similarity with how the two truths are dealt with, not a substantive similarity.

Matt J said:

Now I'm not saying that the Buddha was an Advaitin (if anything, it seems that the Advaitins adopted many Buddhist views), but to say that the refutation is so clear doesn't add up.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it does, once the fog of confusing this tenet system with that tenet system is removed from the brain.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 31st, 2015 at 12:39 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Which seems to be close to the alaya vijnana discussed here:

<http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=40&t=19679&p=284748&hilit=alaya#p284748>

Malcolm wrote:

The ālayavijñāna is exclusive personal, and it is not a self at all, as the Samdhinirmocana sūtra states:

The appropriating consciousness is profound and subtle,
in which all seeds flow like a river,
I do not teach it to the immature, as it is said "It is not proper to conceive it as a self."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

So the Buddha did not refute the transcendental Atman-Brahman, only the caricatured thumb sized, reified Atman spoken of by some but not all the Upanishads, and certainly not as later developed by Gaudapada and Shankara. So for example, the Chandyoga Chapter 14:

2—3. He who consists of the mind, whose body is subtle, whose form is light, whose thoughts are true, whose nature is like the akasa, whose creation in this universe, who cherishes all righteous desires, who contains all pleasant odours, who is endowed with all tastes, who embraces all this, who never speaks and who is without longing— He is my Self within the heart, smaller than a grain of rice, smaller than a grain of barley, smaller than a mustard seed, smaller than a grain of millet; He is my Self within the heart, greater than the earth, greater than the mid—region, greater than heaven, greater than all these worlds.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddha definitely refuted this, which is why this whole conversation is completely inane.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

What is all this fussing about Shankara?

Was not Brahman-Atman, the one self-existent impersonal Spirit plainly described as such in some of the Upanishads, irrespective of any commentary and long before Adi Shankara or any of the others?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as a personal self the size of a mustard seed, or a thumb, and so on in the body...this idea was definitely refuted by the Buddha.

anjali said:

Yes, the personal atman is traditionally located in the heart-center with the size of a mustard seeds or thumb. But the atman was certainly considered more than just personal.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, nevertheless it is refuted in the Nirvana sūtra.

Tenzen Wangyal, from [i]Healing with Form, Energy, and Light[/i], p. 115 said:

Conceptually, this is not different than, for example, the role that the heart plays in togal teachings in dzogchen: Although rigpa is not actually localized, many practitioners can most easily recognize it through a connection to the heart center. The Six Lamps specifically discusses this in terms of the space inside the physical heart. Westerners often find this strange, but it's similar to what we mean when we say that "in" each being is the nature of mind. The nature of mind is not individual and not localized. It is truer to say that we exist in the nature of mind than to say the nature of mind is in us. But in our experience it is easier to recognize the nature of mind if we go "in" to the deepest place in ourselves, the heart. This is why we say that the rigpa resides in the heart, and why the heart is the center of the life-force prana and why love is always connected to the heart. Thus we talk about the "light of the heart".

Malcolm wrote:

This thumb-sized self is refuted in the Dzogchen tantras as well.

With regard to TW's concepts around so called "khyab rig", this has been extensively refuted by John Luc Achard.

<https://khyungmkhar.blogspot.com/2012/06/khyab-rig-pervading-knowledge-and-its.html>

<https://khyungmkhar.blogspot.com/2012/07/khyab-rig-final-word-from-drenpa-namkha.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 6:01 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

What is all this fussing about Shankara?

Was not Brahman-Atman, the one self-existent impersonal Spirit plainly described as such in some of the Upanishads, irrespective of any commentary and long before Adi Shankara or any of the others?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as a personal self the size of a mustard seed, or a thumb, and so on in the body...this idea was definitely refuted by the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 4:13 AM

Title: Re: What are sentient beings?

Content:

Vasana said:

But there is still a dynamic interplay of energy, even if Buddhas and beings are both equally empty. Maybe it's my question i need to readdress.

I'll check out the tantra mentioned too, thanks.

Malcolm wrote:

No, there is no dynamic interplay of "energy"; there are two states; one in which consciousness recognizes itself, called rigpa, and one in which consciousness does not recognize itself, called marigpa. A being who has fully integrated that recognition at the deepest level is called a 'Buddha'; the rest are sentient beings.

Vasana said:
What are you currently translating Malcolm?

Malcolm wrote:
Stay tuned.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 2:20 AM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:

daverupa said:
It's an argument from silence that won't grow out of being a fallacy, and it's getting pretty ad nauseam.

David Reigle said:
The argument from silence, of course, cuts both ways. It is just as much an assumption to assume that the universal ātman is the ātman that the Buddha denied, as to assume that it is not the universal ātman that the Buddha denied. Ergo, if it is a fallacy to hold that the Buddha did not deny the universal ātman, then it is equally a fallacy to hold that the Buddha did deny the universal ātman.

Malcolm wrote:
Of course, there is the fact that Śāntarakṣita did refute Advaita can give you an indication of the general impression of Advaita in Buddhist circles, not least of which was the fact that Śaṅkarācārya was an enemy of Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 2:16 AM
Title: Re: WOMPT & Sex
Content:
Malcolm wrote:

If you are a lay tantric practitioner you need to practice the yoga of passion, perceiving yourself as a heruka and your partner as a dakini (for example, Kalacakra and Vishvamata). The yoga of passion is not connected with the completion stage, it is connected with the creation stage, so there is no need to worry about losing semen and so on.

As far as which orifice, etc., this is mainly a sutrayāna affair. There are no restrictions for a practitioner practicing the yoga of passion. The body of a deity is completely pure.

N

frankc said:
But Gampopa speaks of three types of sexual misconduct in the Jewel Ornament Of Liberation which includes wrong parts of the body. Wasn't he a tantric practitioner? I don't understand.

Malcolm wrote:
It is a sūtra text.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 2:06 AM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:

David Reigle said:

True. Kamaleswar Bhattacharya's thesis has two parts: (1) that the Buddha did not deny the universal ātman; (2) that in denying the ātman in a person the Buddha thereby indirectly affirmed the universal ātman. The first part is, I think, demonstrable. Pali scholars agree that the Buddha does not specifically deny the existence of the attā anywhere in the Pāli canon, nor do the Sanskrit Buddhist texts deny the non-dual universal ātman. The second part is not demonstrable, on the basis of the great majority of Buddhist texts. It is so only if we accept the tathāgata-garbha sūtras that teach the perfection of ātman (ātma-pāramitā), and accept that these represent the Buddha's final teachings, as the Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra represents itself to be.

Malcolm wrote:

No, this is not certain. Again, you would be projecting backward, asserting that intention of the Buddha in the Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra is commensurate with Śāṅkarācārya's intention 1200 years later, or 700 years later if you assume the sūtra was composed in the first century CE.

I don't think that Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra teaches a universal atman of the type Śāṅkarācārya advocates. I think it is impossible to demonstrate that it does.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 12:34 AM
Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons
Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is only a difference in the coarseness or subtlety of the mind that apprehends suchness.

Astus said:

And what does that stand for? How can non-abiding be coarse or subtle? There is nothing to grasp or apprehend in suchness.

Malcolm wrote:

The nature of reality is what is termed "non-abiding"; the mind that apprehends suchness can be coarse or subtle. The sūtras in general place emphasis on the object side. The tantras emphasize the subject side.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 30th, 2015 at 12:17 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see that passage as pointing out the nonconceptual wisdom of a bodhisattva and a tathāgata are the same.

It is not actually a very common term in the sūtras, occurring in only three sūtras in the bka' 'gyur.

Astus said:

Nirvikalpajñāna (無分別智) should be a fairly common term in sutrayana, at least in yogacara and tathagatagarbha works.

Malcolm wrote:

Rnam par mi rtog pa'i ye shes, nirvikalpa-jñāna is more common the commentaries. It is not that common in the sūtras themselves. It's occurrence in the bka' 'gyur is restricted to the sūtras I referenced.

Astus said:

According to the Cheng Weishi Lun, this is what a bodhisattva gets at the path of seeing, what a bodhisattva practises with on the path of meditation, and it is the great mirror wisdom's perception of suchness.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, correct. A first stage bodhisattva enters a nonconceptual wisdom on the path of seeing.

Astus said:

The difference between the nonconceptual wisdom of bodhisattvas of one stage and another, as well as buddhas, is the degree to which they have developed sarvakārajñāna.

However, I still don't see how can there be any difference between not abiding anywhere for a bodhisattva and a buddha.

Thanks for the recommendation of Aryadeva's Lamp.

Malcolm wrote:

There is only a difference in the coarseness or subtlety of the mind that apprehends suchness.

Sure, it is necessary for understanding much of Vajrayāna thinking around these issues. It is perhaps one of the most important theoretical commentaries on Vajrayāna, and its influence is much more widespread than the Arya tradition of Guhyasamāja.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Well, one difference I see is the translation of this passage you refer to seems to be an abbreviation when compared with the same passage as translated into Tibetan:

Astus said:

What about the difference regarding non-conceptual wisdom?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, one difference I see is the translation of this passage you refer to seems to be an abbreviation when compared with the same passage as translated into Tibetan:

Astus said:

What about the difference regarding non-conceptual wisdom?

Malcolm wrote:

I don't see that passage as pointing out the nonconceptual wisdom of a bodhisattva and a tathāgata are the same.

It is not actually a very common term in the sūtras, occurring in only three sūtras in the bka' 'gyur.

For example the term occurs only once in the whole the Prajñāpāramitā corpus, in the Ārya-candragarbha-prajñāpāramitā-mahāyāna-sūtra:

Son of a good family, in that respect, the inexhaustible perfection of discerning wisdom is the nonconceptual wisdom of the of path of seeing. Because that wisdom is free from all concepts, it is therefore nonconceptual.

It also occurs in the Ārya-avikalpa-praveśa-nāma-dhāraṇī and the Ārya-gośṅgavyākaraṇa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra.

By contrast, it occurs in six tantras. Anyway, this is a besides the point. The real point is that the wisdom of bodhisattvas for example, cannot perceive tathāgatagarbha, even tenth stage bodhisattvas perceive only a generic approximation of it. The difference between the nonconceptual wisdom of bodhisattvas of one stage and another, as well as buddhas, is the degree to which they have developed sarvakārajñāna.

When it comes to the difference between minds in sūtra and tantra, there are no means taught in the sūtras to quell coarse minds. For example, Caryāmelāpakapradīpa points out:

As such, the Mahāyāna sūtras explain that the nature of consciousness that is without color, signs or shape is self-knowing wisdom. On the other hand, without entering the mahāyoga tantras of Vajrayāna, such as Guhyasamāja and so on, one will not be able to understand one's mind just as it truly for all the eons equal with the sands of the Ganges river and will not see relative truth. Therefore, one may know just how the three consciousness truly are from the kindness of the guru through following the Śrī Jñānavajrasammucaya tantra.

If you wish to understand more about the distinction between the coarse mind taught in sūtra, and the subtle mind taught in the tantras, you should study Āryadeva's Lamp that Integrates the Practices, Wedemeyer, Columbia, 2007.

This, incidentally, is among the reasons sūtrayāna takes so damn long, i.e., outside of Vajrayāna, there are no methods access the most subtle mind and use it in practice. That at least is the point of view of Vajrayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 8:18 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So as far as you are concerned the non-conceptual wisdom of a first stage bodhisattva and the non-conceptual wisdom of a buddha is exactly alike?

Astus said:

Yes. What difference do you see?

"a Bodhisattva gives alms in the same way as would a Tathāgata, without any difference. This is how a Bodhisattva takes Bodhisattva actions. Likewise a Bodhisattva observes the precepts, endures adversity, makes energetic progress, does meditation, and develops wisdom in the same way as would a Tathāgata, without any difference. This is how a Bodhisattva takes Bodhisattva actions."

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra46.html>)

Malcolm wrote:

Well, one difference I see is the translation of this passage you refer to seems to be an abbreviation when compared with the same passage as translated into Tibetan:

“Mañjuśrī, how does a bodhisattva practice within the conduct of a bodhisattva?

[F.298.b] Mañjuśrī, a bodhisattva does not think of destruction, arising, non-destruction, non-arising, and the utter destruction of destruction; nor is he disturbed by utter non-arising. It is in this way, Mañjuśrī, that he practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva. Furthermore, Mañjuśrī, a bodhisattva does not practice by thinking, ‘The past mind is destroyed;’ he does not practice by thinking, ‘The future mind has yet to be obtained;’ he does not practice by thinking, ‘The present mind abides.’ He is not stuck in the past, future, or present mind. As he practices in this way, Mañjuśrī, a bodhisattva practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva. [136]

“Mañjuśrī, giving, awakening, and sentient beings and, on the other hand, the Tathāgata: these are non-dual, they are not divided into two.⁴¹ Practicing in this way, a bodhisattva practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva. Mañjuśrī, discipline, awakening, and sentient beings and, on the other hand, the Tathāgata: these are non-dual, they are not divided into two. Practicing in this way, a bodhisattva practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva.

“It is the same way with forbearance, awakening, and sentient beings, and, on the other hand, the Tathāgata; diligence, awakening, and sentient beings, and, on the other hand, the Tathāgata; concentration, awakening, and sentient beings, and, on the other hand, the Tathāgata; and similarly, wisdom, awakening, and sentient beings, and, on the other hand, the Tathāgata. These are non-dual, they are not divided into two. Practicing in this way, a bodhisattva practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva.

“Mañjuśrī, a bodhisattva may practice thinking that ‘form is not empty’ and also ‘not non-empty.’ Practicing in this way, Mañjuśrī, that bodhisattva practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva. And why? He thinks, ‘Form itself is empty of the essence of form. In the same way, [F.299.a] feeling, notion, co-producing factors, and consciousness are empty.’ He practices thinking in this way and also thinking that ‘they are not non-empty.’ Practicing in this way, Mañjuśrī, a bodhisattva practices within the conduct of a bodhisattva. And why? Because mind, mentality, and consciousness are not perceived.

<http://read.84000.co/#!ReadingRoom/UT22084-047-002/36>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 3:54 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Don't you distinguish between the nonconceptual wisdom of a first stage bodhisattva and a tenth stage bodhisattva? The object is the same, but the degree of subtlety is not.

Astus said:

There can be only one state that deserves the name non-conceptual wisdom, in other words, non-abiding awareness. Anything else would be conceptual, would be abiding somewhere. What do you mean by difference in subtlety?

Malcolm wrote:

So as far as you are concerned the non-conceptual wisdom of a first stage bodhisattva and the non-conceptual wisdom of a buddha is exactly alike?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Protectors: Why Did China Invade Tibet?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:
No teachings are ever destroyed.

Jikan said:
Texts were destroyed. Temples were destroyed. Stupas were destroyed. Worst of all, people were destroyed. These are vessels of the teaching.

Is it not fair to say that the teachings--or the transmission of the teachings--was disrupted?

Malcolm wrote:
All these things, while regrettable, did not and cannot disrupt the Dharma or its transmission.

In order for the teachings to be disrupted, the source of the teachings would have to be disrupted. And that is just not possible.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 3:24 AM
Title: Re: Corporate "Mindfulness".
Content:
MrBlueSKY said:
To make sense of the future in regard to this corporate mindfulnessNo ?

Malcolm wrote:
No, mindfulness is not Buddhadharma.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 3:03 AM
Title: Re: Dharma Protectors: Why Did China Invade Tibet?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Dharmapālas protect the Dharma, not people.

ClearblueSky said:
Exactly, but due to teachings getting destroyed someone could make the argument they "didn't protect the Dharma". Or the opposite argument, based on Vajrayana teachings spreading more widely than ever. One can't say for sure, unless you could compare it side-by-side to a 2015 where Tibet was not invaded (and even then it'd be hard to).

Malcolm wrote:
No teachings are ever destroyed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 2:25 AM

Title: Re: Dharma Protectors: Why Did China Invade Tibet?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Dharmapālas protect the Dharma, not people.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same nature, the mind that recognizes it however is much more subtle.

Astus said:

How can non-conceptual wisdom have levels?

Malcolm wrote:

Don't you distinguish between the nonconceptual wisdom of a first stage bodhisattva and a tenth stage bodhisattva? The object is the same, but the degree of subtlety is not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

There is pointing out the nature of mind even in Hinayāna.

Astus said:

Is one directly introduced to a different nature than what is pointed out?

(<http://www.khenposodargye.org/2013/11/attaining-buddhahood-by-revealing-the-nature-of-reality-and-attaining-buddhahood-in-a-single-life/> seems to say no.)

Malcolm wrote:

It is the same nature, the mind that recognizes it however is much more subtle.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. And that is just an an eye blink in time.

Astus said:

I'm curious, what is the source for that number?

Chan lacks the direct introduction found exclusively in Vajrayāna

Do you mean empowerment here? How about pointing out the nature of mind?

Malcolm wrote:

There is pointing out the nature of mind even in Hinayāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

1×10^{56} , i.e. 1 followed by 56 zeros.

Astus said:

That is, the minimal time to complete the entire bodhisattva path is 3×10^{56} years?

zengen said:

To the best of my knowledge, It's 3×10^{56} Maha-Kalpas, not human years.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Vasana said:

How does the notion of time and emptiness come in to play here ?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a buddha, for you there is no time since for you there are no objects, and for you there are no thoughts, no concepts, etc., and therefore, no time.

But if you are not a buddha, even if you are a tenth stage bodhisattvas, for you there are objects, for you there are thoughts, concepts. and therefore, there is time.

Vasana said:

Yeah, this is true.

On a side note, aren't the 10 stages 'absent' in Vajrayana /Mahamudra/Dzogchen or replaced with another frame of reference ?

You probably know more about this, not a topic i've looked in to deeply yet.

Malcolm wrote:

In Vajrayāna, no the ten stages are not absent. There are instead thirteen stages.

In Kagyu Mahāmudra, the stages are not taken as seriously, also in Dzogchen they are not taken as seriously, but then again, these are systems belonging to Vajrayāna, and in each of these systems there are clear indications of how far along the path one is.

In Kagyu Mahāmudra, there are various schemes, but the first two yogas are generally held to correspond to the two mundane paths and the path of seeing, the third yoga is the path of cultivation, and the fourth yoga, nonmeditation is equivalent to buddhahood.

Likewise, in Dzogchen, the first two visions are below the path of seeing, the second two visions cover the path of seeing and beyond.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 29th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Vasana said:

And again from the Mahāprajñāpāramitā Mañjuśrīparivarta Sūtra

The Buddha told Mañjuśrī : If a person is able to hear this teaching without fear, then the seeds of good roots have not only been planted with thousands of buddhas, but good roots have truly been planted with hundreds of thousands of myriads of buddhas.

Therefore, one is able to be without alarm and fear of the extremely profound Prajñāpāramitā.”

http://lapislazulitexts.com/tripitaka/T0232_LL_manjusri_prajnaparamita

Is it not true that realization 'exists' outside (but not separate from) time and space?

How does the notion of time and emptiness come in to play here ?

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a buddha, for you there is no time since for you there are no objects, and for you there are no thoughts, no concepts, etc., and therefore, no time.

But if you are not a buddha, even if you are a tenth stage bodhisattvas, for you there are objects, for you there are thoughts, concepts. and therefore, there is time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 10:34 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

1 x 10(56), i.e. 1 followed by 56 zeros.

Astus said:

That is, the minimal time to complete the entire bodhisattva path is 3×10^{56} years?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. And that is just an eye blink in time.

Astus said:

Vajrayānists, including Indian Vajrayānists, consider everything that is not Vajrayāna part of common Mahāyāna. Huayan. Tientai, etc., are all schools based in Mahāyāna sūtra.

Just like those schools have their own classification systems. For instance, from a Huayan perspective Vajrayana would fall into the category of Final Mahayana, that is above Madhyamaka and Yogacara but below the Sudden Enlightenment teaching. And from the Chan view Tantra is still a gradual path based on temporary skilful means.

Malcolm wrote:

These historical interpretations of the Buddha's career have no relevance at all to Vajrayāna. The idea of dividing up the career of the Buddha into distinct epochs is a uniquely Chinese historiographical idea. The Indian Mahāyānis certainly didn't care about such interpretations and never made them, in fact they rejected them.

As to the Chan point of view, this is addressed by Nubchen Sangye Yeshe. Chan lacks the direct introduction found exclusively in Vajrayāna, this is why he ranks Chan below Mahāyoga.

As far as I am concerned, Chan sudden enlightenment is mere rhetoric and cannot be taken seriously. But I am sure if I were a Chan or a Zen practitioner, I would feel differently about it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: Maenla & Orgyen Maenla

Content:

Urgyen Dorje said:

I believe my Gelug teachers said that Maenla comes from the sutra tradition, and as such it doesn't have wang, but rather a jenang associated with the practice. There we had the sadhana of the seven Medicine Buddha brothers.

Malcolm wrote:

This practice was introduced to Tibetan by Shantarakshita in the 8th. This was the main practice of Tibetan kings for many generations. It is part of kriya tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 9:30 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that to attain full buddhahood it takes three asaṃkhyakalpas (asaṃkhyā does not really mean incalculable, it is the name of a large number). The point of knowing where one is on the path is to know that, for example, if one is not yet on the path of seeing, one has a long way to go in common Mahāyāna terms. Even if one is on the path of seeing, one has a long way to go in common Mahāyāna terms.

For example, when it is says that bodhisattvas can attain full buddhahood in seven lifetimes, this is not referring to bodhisattva on the path of accumulation, it is referring to bodhisattvas on the eighth bhūmi, etc.

Astus said:

What number asaṃkhyā is?

Malcolm wrote:

$1 \times 10^{(56)}$, i.e. 1 followed by 56 zeros.

Astus said:

Schools like Huayan, Tiantai and Chan do not consider themselves common Mahayana, and they don't fit the system Tibetan's use.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayānists, including Indian Vajrayānists, consider everything that is not Vajrayāna part of common Mahāyāna. Huayan. Tiantai, etc., are all schools based in Mahāyāna sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 9:07 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

the above refers to a thought that bodhisattva has, not an actual fact of his or her saving anyone

Astus said:

I did not intend anything else with it, just to demonstrate what I have referred to.

You left out the next passage

It's part of the whole point. Even encountering the Dharma is a sign of previous good karma. Thus it fits Dan's remark: "Maybe we've already been on it for incalculable kalpas minus one lifetime!"

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that to attain full buddhahood it takes three asaṃkhyakalpas (asaṃkhyā does not really mean incalculable, it is the name of a large number). The point of knowing where one is on the path is to know that, for example, if one is not yet on the path of seeing, one has a long way to go in common Mahāyāna terms. Even if one is on the path of seeing, one has a long way to go in common Mahāyāna terms.

For example, when it is said that bodhisattvas can attain full buddhahood in seven lifetimes, this is not referring to bodhisattva on the path of accumulation, it is referring to bodhisattvas on the eighth bhūmi, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 7:42 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Dan74 said:

Perhaps it is holding to the notion of stages that makes the path take aeons and aeons? Sounds like the good old polishing the brick into a mirror story...

Astus said:

The sutras themselves give some indication on one's state.

“If good men and good women, having heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā, can come to resoluteness in their minds, not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, know that they stand on the Ground of No Regress. If those who have heard this profound prajñā-pāramitā are not shocked, not terrified, not baffled, and not regretful, but believe, accept, appreciate, and listen tirelessly, they have in effect achieved dāna-pāramitā, śīla-pāramitā, kṣānti-pāramitā, vīrya-pāramitā, dhyāna-pāramitā, and prajñā-pāramitā. Moreover, they can reveal and explicate [the teachings] to others and can have them train accordingly.”

(<http://www.sutrasmantras.info/sutra13.html>)

Malcolm wrote:

You left out the next passage:

The Buddha asked Mañjuśrī, “In your opinion, what is meant by attaining anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi and by abiding in anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi?”

Mañjuśrī replied, “I have no anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi to attain, nor do I abide in the Buddha Vehicle. Then how should I attain anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi? What I describe is only the appearance of bodhi.”

The Buddha praised Mañjuśrī, “Very good! Very good! You have so skillfully explained the meaning of this profound Dharma. You have long planted your roots of goodness under past Buddhas, training with purity in the Brahma way of life according to the dharma of no appearance.”

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 7:39 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So you mean, you are not responsible for your own liberation? When someone first stage bodhisattva sees your emptiness, you are liberated.

Were it so easy...

Astus said:

That wouldn't make much sense, would it?

All the different types of sentient beings, whether they be born from eggs, born from a womb, born from moisture or born spontaneously; whether or not they have form; whether they abide in perceptions or no perceptions; or without either perceptions or non-perceptions, I save them by causing them to enter nirvana without remainder. And when these immeasurable, countless, infinite number of sentient beings have been liberated, in actuality, no sentient being has attained liberation. Why is this so? Subhūti, If a bodhisattva abides in the signs of self, person, sentient being, or life-span, she or he is not a bodhisattva."

(http://www.acmuller.net/bud-canon/diamond_sutra.html, ch 3)

Malcolm wrote:

You left out an important part: "The bodhisattvas and mahāsattvas should subdue their thoughts like this...."

The Tibetan and Sanskrit make it more clear, the above refers to a thought that bodhisattva has, not an actual fact of his or her saving anyone.

Subhuti, here, the one who has correctly entered into the bodhisattvayāna thinks in this way, "However many sentient beings there are, included in egg-birth, womb-birth, heat and moisture-birth and apparitional birth, with form, without form, with perception, without perception or without perception and non-perception, as many sentient beings as are designated sentient beings, all of them I will free through total nirvana in the state [dhātu] of nirvana without remaining aggregates. As such, though limitless sentient beings have been freed through total nirvana, no sentient beings will have been freed through parinivana." Thus that one should generate this thought.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 3:52 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

cloudburst said:

I am more interested in your idea

Malcolm wrote:

You can find my idea in thub pa'i dgongs gsal, concerning the five paths, specifically the path of preparation and seeing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 2:29 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

conebeckham said:

The first two lines are clear--there are two truths, Relative and Absolute. The third line indicates that the Absolute is not an object of the intellect. "Intellect," in this case, is a fairly specific word, in Tibetan, blos., which stands for an aspect of conceptual mind. "Intellect" is a good translation, IMO. Malcolm translated it as "Mind," and that is okay, but it's a more specific aspect of the mental continuum, in my opinion, and "Intellect" is more precise.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhi: the power of forming and retaining conceptions and general notions , intelligence , reason , intellect , mind , discernment

conebeckham said:

Even more precise, thanks!

Malcolm wrote:

The issues is that the terms "mind", "consciousness", "intellect" and so on are at best ambiguously distinct from one another in English . The other word that blos translates is mati, which this case bears the connotations of the mind , perception , understanding , intelligence , sense , judgment...{mind}.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 2:23 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

conebeckham said:

The first two lines are clear--there are two truths, Relative and Absolute. The third line indicates that the Absolute is not an object of the intellect. "Intellect," in this case, is a fairly specific word, in Tibetan, blos., which stands for an aspect of conceptual mind. "Intellect" is a good translation, IMO. Malcolm translated it as "Mind," and that is okay, but it's a more specific aspect of the mental continuum, in my opinion, and "Intellect" is more precise.

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhi: the power of forming and retaining conceptions and general notions , intelligence , reason , intellect , mind , discernment

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 12:56 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have
Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Granted, there is a certain tendency to do this, but one reason why I rarely cite Tibetan scholars about anything anymore is that there is too much sectarianism in their work.

cloudburst said:

For me, generally speaking, these discussions form the body of my education about the views of other Buddhist traditions (in the Tibetan lineages, I have never had any interest whatsoever in Zen or Chinese Buddhisms. Theravadins are cool but incomplete imho) as they are lived and understood by modern westerners.

I also have an opportunity to refine my views regarding my own school by having them challenged. For me this is edifying. (I find it interesting that some of the characters that go at it tooth and claw here are probably share more in view with each other's than with nearly anyone on planet earth.)

In any case, I find the discussions here increase my faith in my own tradition, and help me understand the traditions of others. I see that as a good and worthwhile thing.

I plan to press you on your unwillingness/inability to give a coherent account of how one passes from the path of preparation to the path of seeing, but due to such things as having a job etc. that will have to wait until another day.

Cheers all, sorry to be annoying.

Malcolm wrote:

Present your your idea. Then we will see how it adds up.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 28th, 2015 at 12:12 AM
Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have Content:

cloudburst said:

All Tibetan Buddhists regard the Indian founders as authoritative...

Malcolm wrote:

Except western Gelugpas and their derivatives, who often give the appearance of believing that no one understood Buddhism, let alone realized anything, until Tsongkhapa came along.

cloudburst said:

I think this is mainly an internet phenomenon. I have been reading and posting here and on esangha for years and years, and have seen this ridiculous triumphalist tone regarding the works of their founders, from jonang, kagyu, sakya, nyingma, western dzogchenpa with Tibetan names etc etc as well as Gelug derivatives and the like.

I have been guilty of it myself. As far as I know, no-one is immune, and it's unpleasant wherever you see it.

Generally speaking I think they are just excited because they have met the best thing that ever happened to them and they have a feeling of certainty that they want to share. Often they have met a person that is wise and kind to them, and they finally feel like they have something to crow about.

It passes.

Malcolm wrote:

Granted, there is a certain tendency to do this, but one reason why I rarely cite Tibetan scholars about anything anymore is that there is too much sectarianism in their work.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 11:54 PM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Kelwin said:

Malcolm, this is an old post, but could you elaborate a bit? As far as I know Pramoha is part of the Shitro mandala, and usually not considered a local protector? Is there anywhere I can find more about her being related to Europe?

Thank you!

Malcolm wrote:

It is a name for Dorje Yudronma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 11:40 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

cloudburst said:

All Tibetan Buddhists regard the Indian founders as authoritative...

Malcolm wrote:

Except western Gelugpas and their derivatives, who often give the appearance of believing that no one understood Buddhism, let alone realized anything, until Tsongkhapa came along.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 11:07 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

cloudburst said:

As you yourself just experienced, when Malcolm refers to "Sakya, Nyingma and Kagyu commentaries," this does not change your view. Why? You do not regard these as authoritative.

Malcolm wrote:

He does not even regard Indian authorities, including the Buddha, as authoritative, and thinks they are in need of repair.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 11:05 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Astus said:

A bodhisattva sees that there are no beings to liberate, that is how all beings are liberated.]

Malcolm wrote:

So you mean, you are not responsible for your own liberation? When someone first stage bodhisattva sees your emptiness, you are liberated.

Were it so easy...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 11:04 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

Dan74 said:

Are they literal? In which case how far along are we? Maybe we've already been on it for incalculable kalpas minus one lifetime!

Malcolm wrote:

This is why it is important to understand the paths and stages, so we can know where we are on the path.

Then we will have an idea of how much longer we need to continue.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 10:35 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

conebeckham said:

Direct, non-conceptual experience of emptiness occurs in equipoise, but lower-level Bodhisattvas have (conceptual) mind and subject/object dualism in post-meditation. A couple verses in translation, this time from Geshe Tenzin Zopa of Sera Je Monastery:

And another version of verse 2:

Relative and absolute,
These the two truths are declared to be.
The absolute is not within the reach of intellect,
For intellect is grounded in the relative.

TsongKhapaFan, you can see that even a Gelukpa Geshe's translation is more in line with the actual words. You should compare this to your version.

Tsongkhapafan said:

This translation is very poor. There are no absolute things because there is nothing that does not depend and nothing that is not relative. Ultimate truth is not absolute.

Even though it is a bad translation, the meaning is in line with my understanding - a direct realisation of emptiness, that is, a non-conceptual realisation, is not possible with a conceptual mind (badly rendered as 'intellect' here). This is Shantideva's intention. It is absurd to assert that the mind cannot know emptiness because the mind is a conventional truth, which was Malcolm's original and incorrect assertion. It is only the mind that knows anything, and if the mind doesn't know it, how else is it possible to perceive and realise emptiness?

Your interpretation is clearly not what Shantideva is saying at all, but you're free to believe whatever you want.

Malcolm wrote:

One, you are not qualified to judge any translations, since you a) do not know Tibetan b) do not know Sanskrit.

Second, what Shantideva states is the following:

When existents and nonexistents do not remain before the mind, then, since there is no other aspect,

[the mind] is pacified because there is nothing to perceive.
M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

This is a literal translation of his words, not his intended meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the verse you cited is a completely corrupt and invalid rendering, and has nothing to do with Shantideva's intended meaning. My translation is affirmed by all the Indian commentaries on this text, of which there are ten, not to mention numerous Sakya, Nyingma and Kagyu commentaries.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Then they all misinterpreted Shantideva's words. It's important to know the meaning, not just the words.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that you do not know the meaning, and neither does the person who translated the citation you provided.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

This is a literal translation of his words, not his intended meaning. This is often the problem in Buddhism - literalism. His intended meaning is given in the verse I quoted above.

conebeckham said:

First you claim that "Shantideva doesn't say this at all," then we provide reliable translations of what Shantideva actually says, and you claim that his intended meaning is other than his words. So, in your view, what Shantideva says is actually not what he says, but what someone else asserts is his "intention." This is tortured explication, indeed, and far from the intent of the author.

Malcolm wrote:

'When I use a word,' Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, 'it means just what I choose it to mean — neither more nor less.'

'The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make words mean so many different things.'

'The question is,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'which is to be master — that's all.'

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 9:20 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

I have now finished reading Bhavya's Vedānta chapter and other chapters of his Madhyamaka-hṛdaya. I found it interesting that even in this chapter, like in his refutations of the ātman in previous chapters, the ātman he refutes is a karṭṛ, "doer" or "agent," and a bhokṭṛ, "enjoyer" or "experiencer." This confirms Kamaleswar Bhattacharya's thesis that the ātman refuted in Buddhism was not the universal ātman. Bhavya, like Vasubandhu before him, and like Śāntarakṣita after him, understood the ātman that Buddhists refute to be a permanent personal ātman that can act and experience. It was not until a couple centuries after Bhavya that Śāṅkarācārya formulated the Advaita Vedānta view of the ātman, on the basis of passages found in the Upaniṣads, and promulgated it widely. This idea of a non-dual universal ātman that, as such, cannot be an agent or an experiencer, has dominated Indian thought ever since. But this was not the idea of the ātman that Buddhists refuted, as their texts show, and it is incorrect to project this idea backwards onto the ātman that they refuted.

Malcolm wrote:

All that you have stated is that the concept of a universal atman is specifically Śāṅkarācārya's point of view. It is also equally incorrect therefore to project this idea backward and infer that this universal atman is one that is implicitly affirmed by the Buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 8:06 PM

Title: Re: Dharma protectors and samaya

Content:

Adamantine said:

I believe this same question came up in some other thread and the original link is now broken, but I recall that this woman's quoted post preceded Kali Ma's name change to Pema Khandro. She started out teaching as Kali Ma, then "Troma Rinpoche" and finally shifted to Pema Khandro. Pema Khandro was a rather late name for her, in her ongoing name-transformations. I may have missed a couple. So chronologically it doesn't map out for it to be the same woman, according to my own memory.

Malcolm wrote:

Unless it was a personal nick she was using at the time.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 8:05 PM

Title: Re: Aeons and Aeons and Aeons

Content:

frankc said:

Is anyone discouraged that it's said to take aeons and aeons and aeons to achieve Buddhahood? Why practice?

Malcolm wrote:

For the benefit of others.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 8:32 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

This is a literal translation of his words, not his intended meaning.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the verse you cited is a completely corrupt and invalid rendering, and has nothing to do with Shantideva's intended meaning. My translation is affirmed by all the Indian commentaries on this text, of which there are ten, not to mention numerous Sakya, Nyingma and Kagyu commentaries.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 8:22 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

But if you meditate with a conceptual mind you are not meditating on the ultimate, since the ultimate, according to Shantideva, is not within the range of the mind, the mind being relative.

Tsongkhapafan said:

Shantideva doesn't say this at all. He says that the ultimate cannot be realised directly by a mind that has dualistic appearance:

(2) The two truths are explained as conventional truths and ultimate truths.

Ultimate truth, emptiness, is a non-affirming negative phenomenon
That cannot be realized directly by a mind that has dualistic appearance,
For such minds are conventional, and thus mistaken awareness.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure he does: saṃvṛtiḥ paramārthaśca satyadvayamidaṃ matam| buddheragocarastattvaṃ buddhiḥ saṃvṛtirucyate
saṃvṛtiḥ paramārthaśca
ཀུན་རྫོབ་དང་ནི་དོན་དམ་མེ

Relative and ultimate,

satyadvayamidaṃ matam|
འདི་ནི་བདེན་པ་གཉིས་སུ་འདོད།

this is asserted as the two truths.

buddheragocarastattvaṃ
དོན་དམ་སྒོ་ཡི་སྤྱད་ཡུལ་མེན།

The ultimate is not [within] the range [gocara, spyod yul] of the mind;

buddhiḥ saṃvṛtirucyate
སྒོ་ནི་ཀུན་རྫོབ་ཡིན་པར་བཤིང།

The mind is said to be relative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 7:09 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

cloudburst said:

Can you please explain the development, from a conceptual mind on the path of preparation, of a mind to which neither object or nor non-object appears?

Malcolm wrote:

All grasping to signs ceases, that is the path of seeing. The path of seeing is a (temporary) cessation of the conceptual mind, not a transformation of a conceptual mind into a nonconceptual mind.

When neither an object or a non-object remain before the mind, since there is other alternative, that time the mind is pacified.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 4:43 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

cloudburst said:

the issue here is that if you are a person who has not entered the path of seeing, if you are not meditating with a conceptual mind you are not meditating on the ultimate, since you cannot meditate on the ultimate with a non-conceptual mind because if you could you would be on the path of seeing

Malcolm wrote:

But if you meditate with a conceptual mind you are not meditating on the ultimate, since the ultimate, according to Shantideva, is not within the range of the mind, the mind being relative.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 4:42 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, heat on the path of preparation/application is a conceptual mind, it is a samadhi on an inferential emptiness.

cloudburst said:

so how do you then explain that one goes from the path of preparation, a conceptual mind, to the path of seeing, a non-conceptual mind? If you insist on using only your specific terminology/ translation style, could you explain how one goes from the path of preparation, a conceptual mind, to the path of seeing, a non-conceptual wisdom?

Malcolm wrote:

To paraphrase Shantideva:

When neither an object or a non-object remain before the mind, since there is other alternative, that time the mind is pacified.

This is also the intent of the siddha Kotalipa:

Do not meditate on non-existents, also do not meditate on existents...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 27th, 2015 at 3:49 AM

Title: Re: What kind of mind do Buddhas have

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

This means that having completed one's analysis one simply rests in the nature of the mind as one finds it, without modifying it in anyway.

cloudburst said:

Is this your understanding of how to meditate on the ultimate? So a person on the path of preparation analyses and then, conceptually understanding reality free from extremes, he or she drops the conclusion and meditates on the conventional nature of the mind?

Malcolm wrote:

It means that you have no further need of analysis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 8:25 PM

Title: Re: What are sentient beings?

Content:

Vasana said:

Able to point to any relevant places where the complexities may have been explained?

I'm still trying to frame the question from the perspective of the totality, the Dharmadhatu.

Malcolm wrote:

The dharmadhātu is just the emptiness of all phenomena.

Vasana said:

Beyond beings and buddhas, what is bound and what is unbinding?

Malcolm wrote:

Nothing at all.

My upcoming translation explains this all from a Dzogchen perspective. This is also explained in the Jñānāvajrasamuccaya tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 8:08 PM

Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows

Content:

jmlee369 said:

It seems like someone in Chinese media did a terrible job of doing research. The second article posted by Malcolm focuses on Shirley Kwan who revealed the identity of her son's father. Looking through the original Chinese article, there are a series of photos of the lama who is said to be the father of the child. There is a screenshot of an instagram page with the lama's picture and a caption describing the relationship. The lama pictured is clearly NOT Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche. While the instagram account sh3rylk is no longer there, one of the screenshots names the lama as Zuri Rinpoche from Bhutan. Somehow, the authors of the more recent article in the OP must have thought there was only one Bhutanese tulku in existence, or did not bother to look up pictures of Khyentse Rinpoche.

Another problem with this kind of article is that it does not make explicit in Chinese that lamas like Ponlop Rinpoche and Khyentse Rinpoche are not ordained monks. In the eyes of the Chinese, they are monks, leading to a great number of misunderstandings, as evidenced by the comments section in the Chinese article.

Malcolm wrote:
Thanks.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 11:19 AM
Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows
Content:
bryandavis said:
I dont really care one way or the other

Malcolm wrote:
Me either...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 9:40 AM
Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows
Content:
Jikan said:
Malcolm, did you get the sense that the Tibetans who are discussing this article actually take its claims at face value, or at least as plausible?

Malcolm wrote:
Yup.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 8:24 AM
Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?
Content:
Monlam Tharchin said:
Malcolm, may I use your post to start a new discussion? I don't want to derail this one.

Malcolm wrote:
Sure, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Monlam Tharchin said:

Isn't this moving buddhahood further and further away from the capacities of ordinary sentient beings?

Malcolm wrote:

Ordinary sentient beings cannot attain buddhahood, only tenth stage bodhisattvas can attain buddhahood. The question is, what is the fastest, most effective way to become a tenth stage bodhisattva? Another way to put it, there are five paths: two are mundane, three are transcendent. Ordinary sentient beings are on the path of accumulation and preparation while noble beings are on the paths of seeing, cultivation and no more training.

In Mahāyāna the path requires at minimum three incalculable eons. In Vajrayāna, the path can be reduced to one, three, seven or at most sixteen lifetimes. The paths and stages however are the same.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 26th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

And since when was this ever in question?

Astus said:

No, it wasn't. Although since I have started from the beginning with stating that arhats are free from the aggregates, the counter-arguments toward their being still bound by various things did not actually apply to the arhats that are free, simply because the Mahayana-type arhat is not free from the beginning.

Malcolm wrote:

There are three kinds of arhats: śrāvaka arhats, pratyekabuddha arhats and buddha arhats. The first two have traces, even though they are free from the afflictions which cause rebirth in the three realms. Secondly, the first two have nonafflictive ignorance, since they a) lack knowledge of the buddha dharma and b) since they lack the knowledge of the paths which would otherwise enable them to eradicate those traces and c) since they still have beliefs in subject and object, subjects, and so on, i.e., even though they are free from the view of the self of persons, they are not free of the view of the self of phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 10:30 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus said:

And from this it is clear that the interpretation of arhatship is quite different in the two doctrines.

Malcolm wrote:

And since when was this ever in question?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 10:08 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and the point is that, according to the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras, arhats have not abandoned "a lingering residuum", i.e. the traces I mentioned in a previous post. Also here it is clear that distinction between the noble disciple with these lingering residuums is precisely the difference between equipoise and post equipoise, as I also stated above, the idea being that arhats in this instance have nothing left to remove so that whether they are in equipoise or not is a matter of preference, not of liberation.

Astus said:

I don't really understand what is a matter of preference here.

Malcolm wrote:

The matter of preference is the enjoyment of equipoise. Buddhas are never not in equipoise, 24/7/365.

Astus said:

As for the other part, do you mean that from a Mahayana perspective it is fine to say that arhats have not actually gave up all clinging to the aggregates? So, the very assumption that arhats are completely free from grasping the skandhas is not true in the Great Vehicle?

Malcolm wrote:

They are not free of all traces of affliction and have no path to realize complete freedom from all traces of affliction because they do not possess sarvakārajñāna, knowledge of all aspects. And, according to AA, they "take a stand" in nirvana, believing it to be real.

Nirvana, incidentally, is not part of the aggregates, since it is unconditioned. It is part of the dharmadhātu, however.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 9:46 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus there is the contradiction in your thinking that I mentioned before. Arhats abandon ten fetters, but as the view of self is the one of the three lower fetters, it is abandoned only once, at stream entry, and at that time, it is abandoned totally.

Astus said:

Knowing that there is no self, that is, obtaining correct view, and abandoning all clinging to the aggregates are not the same. A stream-enterer is convinced of the four noble truths, an arhat has completely realised the four noble truths. See also:

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn48/sn48.053.than.html>.

"In the same way, friends, it's not that I say 'I am form,' nor do I say 'I am other than form.' It's not that I say, 'I am feeling... perception... fabrications... consciousness,' nor do I say, 'I am something other than consciousness.' With regard to these five clinging-aggregates, 'I am' has not been overcome, although I don't assume that 'I am this.'

"Friends, even though a noble disciple has abandoned the five lower fetters, he still has with regard to the five clinging-aggregates a lingering residual 'I am' conceit, an 'I am' desire, an 'I am' obsession. But at a later time he keeps focusing on the phenomena of arising & passing away with regard to the five clinging-aggregates: 'Such is form, such its origin, such its disappearance. Such is feeling... Such is perception... Such are fabrications... Such is consciousness, such its origin, such its disappearance.' As he keeps focusing on the arising & passing away of these five clinging-aggregates, the lingering residual 'I am' conceit, 'I am' desire, 'I am' obsession is fully obliterated. (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn22/sn22.089.than.html>)

"My friend, although I have seen properly with right discernment, as it actually is present, that 'The cessation of becoming is Unbinding,' still I am not an arahant whose fermentations are ended. It's as if there were a well along a road in a desert, with neither rope nor water bucket. A man would come along overcome by heat, oppressed by the heat, exhausted, dehydrated, & thirsty. He would look into the well and would have knowledge of 'water,' but he would not dwell touching it with his body. In the same way, although I have seen properly with right discernment, as it actually is present, that 'The cessation of becoming is Unbinding,' still I am not an arahant whose fermentations are ended."

(<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.068.than.html>)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, and the point is that, according to the Buddha in Mahāyāna sūtras, arhats have not abandoned "a lingering residuum", i.e. the traces I mentioned in a previous post. Also here it is clear that distinction between the noble disciple with these lingering residuums is precisely the difference between equipoise and post equipoise, as I also stated above, the idea being that arhats in this instance have nothing left to remove so that whether they are in equipoise or not is a matter of preference, not of liberation.

So the point is, to repeat my earlier citation, the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā states:

...because they have not attained knowledge of all aspects, there is the obscuration of not abandoning all afflictions connected with traces, the śravakas and prayekabuddhas endowed with [traces of] afflictions do not have a path by which those may be abandoned.

So the choice is really simple, you can either accept the Buddha's Mahāyāna teaching in this instance or you can ignore it. It is clear from Mahāyāna accounts that arhats and pratyekabuddhas, along with bodhisattvas, have not abandoned all traces. And it is because of this that arhats and pratyekabuddhas are "woken" from their samadhis of cessation to continue on the bodhisattva path to attain full buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... the more interesting allegation:

Liu is not the only female celebrity to marry and have a child with a Rinpoche. Hong Kong singer Shirley Kwan admitted in 2014 that her son's biological father is Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche, also known as Khyentse Norbu.

ReasonAndRhyme said:

Is that an allegation (in the sense of accusation)? Is DJKR a fully ordained monk with all these vows, including chastity? I always assumed he was not.

Malcolm wrote:

It is an allegation in the sense that DKR has not, apparently, recognized the child or validated the claim. DKR is not a monk.

A Tibetan brought this to my attention. Apparently in the Tibetan Community, this article is something of a big deal and there is considerable gossip about it.

There is a barely readable further account here, that must be a google translation of a chinese gossip column from last year.

<http://www.iduobo.com/2015/05/14/secret-living-buddha-rinpoche-i-have-been-with-actress-shirley-birth-to-son-38411.html>

Original link here:

<http://ent.163.com/15/0514/08/APIHK5I800031H2L.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 8:29 PM

Title: Re: What are sentient beings?

Content:

Vasana said:

--

Feel free to correct me if any of this is off the mark, i still think there's probably a more concise way of saying it

Malcolm wrote:

The way this is explained in tantra is a little complicated to explain, but simply put, sentient beings arise from beginningless traces which come about from not recognizing their own state.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 8:17 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus said:

Stream-entrants are convinced that the Buddha's teaching is true, but they have not yet abandoned grasping at the aggregates. This section illustrates the difference (<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.035.than.html>):

Malcolm wrote:

They have eliminated the fetter of grasping a self, along with two other fetters:

"He attends appropriately, This is stress... This is the origination of stress... This is the cessation of stress... This is the way leading to the cessation of stress. As he attends appropriately in this way, three fetters are abandoned in him: self-identity view, doubt, and grasping at habits & practices."

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.002.than.html>

"In this community of monks there are monks who, with the total ending of [the first] three fetters, are stream-winners, steadfast, never again destined for states of woe, headed for self-awakening."

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/mn/mn.118.than.html>

Thus there is the contradiction in your thinking that I mentioned before. Arhats abandon ten fetters, but as the view of self is the one of the three lower fetters, it is abandoned only once, at stream entry, and at that time, it is abandoned totally.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 10:54 AM

Title: Re: The one who doesn't die. An equivalent in Tibetan Buddhi

Content:

monktastic said:

I've always been confused by this. The Thai Forest masters place a lot of emphasis on citta:

It was apparent to him that "arahant" referred to the citta that had been purified of defilements.

As we begin eliminating the kilesas, we catch a glimpse of the mind's true essence, what we call the citta.

Until, finally, when we realize the nature of the citta completely, the attachment to the world entirely disappears. There is no need to make an effort to give up things because at that stage giving up is automatic. This is the true aim of the Buddha's teaching.

Could you really replace "citta" with "alayavijnana" in the above?

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 2:03 AM

Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows

Content:

conebeckham said:

Since when is someone with $10k in the "U.S. Middle Class?"

Malcolm wrote:

Since Credit Suisse said so? BTW, it is not the US middle class, but US$10,000.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 1:38 AM

Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows

Content:

conebeckham said:

Ridiculous. To even suggest Ponlop Rinpoche is a fake.....they are pathetically transparent propaganda

Malcolm wrote:

I don't think they were suggesting he was fake. But this is the more interesting allegation: Liu is not the only female celebrity to marry and have a child with a Rinpoche. Hong Kong singer Shirley Kwan admitted in 2014 that her son's biological father is Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche, also known as Khyentse Norbu.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Fake Lamas flourish as China's middle class grows

Content:

Ayu said:

I was wondering: "Who is china.org.cn ?"

Found this: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/China_Internet_Information_Center

The wiki-article suggests to "See also":
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Xinhua_News_Agency

Doesn't that mean, it is a newspaper authorized by the Chinese government?

Also this page looks like Chinese government speaking trumpet:

<http://www.china.org.cn/opinion/index.htm>

What do you think?

(I think, independent press looks different, and this brings up the next question: Why do they report about Buddhist Lamas in China? What is their main intention?)

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, this is official Chinese media.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 25th, 2015 at 12:18 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I was going to mention it, but I forgot, but Bryan Davis's post elsewhere prompted my memory — according to you, there is no difference between stream entrants and buddhas, since even stream entrants are free from a view of self in the aggregates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Chinese Press:Fake Lamas flourish as middleclass grows

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

http://www.china.org.cn/china/2015-05/21/content_35623634.htm

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 8:33 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

While arhats do not grasp the aggregates as a self, that is not mutually exclusive with still believing in ultimate atoms, subject and object, etc.

Astus said:

Believing in any view is itself contrary to not identifying with the aggregates. Like establishing a duality of subject and object when it is perfectly clear for an arhat that there is no subject to establish anywhere.

Malcolm wrote:

According to PP and AA, arhats view nirvana as real. Moreover, there is no contradiction between understanding there is no self in the aggregates, and nevertheless, regarding the twelve āyatana as real.

In this case, the subject is not a self, it is simply a consciousness which cognizes an entity, which is nevertheless, not a "self" or an identity. Arhats regard that consciousness and its object as real, pratyekabuddhas only regard the subject as real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 6:36 AM

Title: Re: The one who doesn't die. An equivalent in Tibetan Buddhi

Content:

zengen said:

That's pretty interesting. Never knew Theravada recognizes the Alaya.

Malcolm wrote:

They generally call it Bhavanga citta, "linking consciousness".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 4:28 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Where does it say that arhats are free from all grasping?

Astus said:

All that can be grasped are included in the aggregates. Arhats do not grasp the aggregates.

Malcolm wrote:

While arhats do not grasp the aggregates as a self, that is not mutually exclusive with still believing in ultimate atoms, subject and object, etc.

Anyway, it is very clear that the Buddha has taught in the PP and other sūtras that Arhats etc., are not completely free of all traces of affliction. And why? Because they do not have all-knowledge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 2:01 AM

Title: Re: The one who doesn't die. An equivalent in Tibetan Buddhi

Content:

frankc said:

Some Thai forest masters in Theravada describe a stable reality completely outside the five khandas that doesn't have the three characteristics. They call it the citta. It isn't born, doesn't die, and when you get to nirvana it merges with nirvana and goes home. It is the unchanging reality, the unchanging knower. It occupies a neutral position between dualities like happiness and suffering. It simply knows them. No English equal of this word exists so it is difficult to translate from Pali into English and in fact the citta can't even be expressed properly in words or concepts so it doesn't really matter. It is usually translated as mind but this is incorrect because what we generally refer to as mind is just a bunch of transient things that arise and fall away. This isn't the citta. The citta exists entirely without reference to time and space. It does not arise or fall away. It is the creator, it creates the five aggregates of body and mind. It is the very foundation of samsara. It is the essence of being that wanders from birth to birth. The Citta is naturally pure but it's the mental defilements infiltrating the citta that cause it to experience happiness and suffering but the true nature of the citta has none of these qualities. I can go on and on but basically I'm just looking to find out if there's anything similar to this in Mahayana, Vajrayana, Tibetan Buddhism, maybe even Bon, etc. And any Theravada Buddhists that might be passing through that have no idea what I'm talking about you can read Ajahn Pannavaddho's book uncommon wisdom online for free, he has an entire section on the citta. Things like Merging with nirvana and going home are not things I made up.

Malcolm wrote:

In Vajrayāna it would be called the ālaya. In Mahāyāna, the ālayavijñāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 24th, 2015 at 1:55 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a problem, as has been explained to you now several times: arhats, pratyekabuddhas as well as bodhisattvas on the bhumis are subject to varying degrees of conceptuality when not in equipoise. And in the Agamas/Nikayas it is recognized that the knowledge of arhats is in no way equal to that of a Buddha.

The two obscurations are mentioned in the Āryāṣṭasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā-sūtra.

Astus said:

How is an arhat subject to conceptualisation if there is no grasping of mental dharmas? This is the question not answered yet.

Malcolm wrote:

Where does it say that arhats are free from all grasping?

Astus said:

Although the Great Prajnaparamita Sutra in the Chinese canon (Taisho 220) is not necessarily the same, but that is the only one to contain the term "two hindrances" (二障) among the prajnaparamita texts, and even there it is just one section repeated at three different places where the qualities of the bodhi of great bodhisattvas are described, and contains no explanation what the afflictive and cognitive hindrances (煩惱所知二障) mean. It is also noteworthy that it was translated by Xuanzang, who brought many Yogacara works to China.

Malcolm wrote:

The Āryāṣṭasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā-sūtra states:

Bhagavān, the prajñāpāramitā, for the purpose of abandoning the obscurations of affliction, knowledge and all related traces, does not generate all phenomena.

The Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā mentions afflictive obscurations: in response to the question of whether or not śravakas and pratyekabuddhas abandon the obscuration of traces of affliction it also answers in the negative :

...because they have not attained knowledge of all aspects, there is the obscuration of not abandoning all afflictions connected with traces, the śravakas and pratyekabuddhas endowed with [traces of] afflictions do not have a path by which those may be abandoned

So, according to the Prajñāpāramitā, not only do śrāvaka arhats and pratyekabuddha arhats not realize the knowledge of all aspects, they do not have a path where they can abandon all traces of affliction.

The Prajñāpāramitā in general mentions three kinds of obscurations: karma, affliction and view. It also clarifies that though śrāvaka arhats and pratyekabuddha arhats do abandon afflictions, there are left over traces which do not adhere to the tathāgata: Though all the śravakas and pratyekabuddhas abandon afflictions, there are changes of the body, but the tathāgata does not possess such [changes], that is called "the tathāgata's total abandonment of the obscuration of traces."

So not only are three obscurations mentioned in the PP, but also the fact that arhats and pratyekabuddhas have traces of affliction for which they lack of path for abandoning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2015 at 9:18 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus said:

Once it's been introduced in Mahayana that there are two kinds of hindrances, primarily in the mind-only sutras, it is not any more just the accumulated merits that count but the level of wisdom as well. And that's where the problem raised here arises, that if arhats are free from the aggregates then there is nothing else left to let go of.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a problem, as has been explained to you now several times: arhats, pratyekabuddhas as well as bodhisattvas on the bhumis are subject to varying degrees of conceptuality when not in equipoise. And in the Agamas/Nikayas it is recognized that the knowledge of arhats is in no way equal to that of a Buddha.

The two obscurations are mentioned in the Āryāṣṭasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā=sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

So, using a given Mahayana text to ascertain the earlier Scholastic & pre-sectarian context is wholly anachronistic, and makes little sense to me.

Malcolm wrote:

That text, the AA, was authored by Maitreya Bodhisattva.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2015 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

The historical Buddha didn't even speak about a Bodhisattva Path.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course he did, the record of that discussion is the subject of the Mahāyāna sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2015 at 1:13 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

But of course an arahant is not a Buddha. The Buddha never taught people how to become Buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

Of course he did. This is the subject matter of the Mahāyāna sūtras in general.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 23rd, 2015 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Notice, Astus, that you did not answer the question. The answer is of course that only buddhas are in equipoise on reality 24/7/365, this is because they free of all obscurationNs.

Arhats are at a stage of a kind of no more training, but whoever said they were at the level of non-meditation? Only a buddha is at that stage.

Astus said:

With the complete elimination of conceptualisation there is no grasping at subject or object. That is the level of non-meditation (e.g. Direct Path to the Buddha Within, p 385-386). Since an arhat does not grasp any mental dharma how could there be distraction from the perfect view? That's why I started with saying that an arhat has nothing more to train in, there is nothing more to be free from, and at the same time does not fall back to attaching to phenomena.

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats have no more training with regard to being free from the afflictions and fetters which cause rebirth in the three realms. This does not however mean that they are free from all conceptual grasping, let alone concepts. Arhats have concepts, Astus. So to pratyekabuddhas. The latter has grasping to phenomena as well as a subject, the former has grasping to the subject.

You can either accept what Buddha taught about this in the Prajñāpāramitā, Lanka and so on or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 8:40 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus said:

As noted before, the superior qualities of a buddha can be explained if we consider them the results of merit accumulation, and that is the model found in both Theravada and basic Mahayana. But once the tathagatagarbha is introduced, the doctrine fundamental to later Mahayana whence the still living traditions of Tiantai, Chan, and Tantra come from, buddhahood becomes available in this life exactly because all the buddha-powers are readily available in every being's mind, and one just needs to be free from the obscurations to reach it. That's where emptiness is inseparable from compassion, so even an arhat must have compassion if s/he has wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

Even with the tathāgatagarbha theory, full buddhahood takes at minimum three incalculable eons in Mahāyāna.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 8:23 PM

Title: Re: Article by John Horgan Why Buddhism Wasn't For Him

Content:

cjdevries said:

I just read this article by John Horgan:

http://www.slate.com/articles/arts/culturebox/2003/02/buddhist_retreat.html

Malcolm wrote:

Filled with inaccuracies and misunderstandings...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 7:37 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, let me ask you a question: are arhats in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are pratyekabuddhas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are bodhisattvas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are buddhas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365?

The answer to those four questions is your answer to how someone can be liberated from rebirth in the three realms and yet, still have some nonafflictive ignorance, conceptuality about subject and object and so on.

Astus said:

Arhats have cut all bonds, so they cannot fall back from being unfettered by the aggregates. Bodhisattvas, on the other hand, are still in training, and only with the attainment of buddhahood are they eternally free. So, both arhats and buddhas have the stage of non-meditation, while bodhisattvas are still working on reaching that.

As noted before, the superior qualities of a buddha can be explained if we consider them the results of merit accumulation, and that is the model found in both Theravada and basic Mahayana. But once the tathagatagarbha is introduced, the doctrine fundamental to later Mahayana whence the still living traditions of Tiantai, Chan, and Tantra come from, buddhahood becomes available in this life exactly because all the buddha-powers are readily available in every being's mind, and one just needs to be free from the obscurations to reach it. That's where emptiness is inseparable from compassion, so even an arhat must have compassion if s/he has wisdom.

Malcolm wrote:

Notice, Astus, that you did not answer the question. The answer is of course that only buddhas are in equipoise on reality 24/7/365, this is because they are free of all obscurationNs.

Arhats are at a stage of a kind of no more training, but whoever said they were at the level of non-meditation? Only a buddha is at that stage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 9:10 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

zengen said:

Arhats and Pratyekabuddhas do still have obstructions to omniscience. This is known in Mahayana. In Theravada, this is not taught.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is, otherwise, Bhikkhu Bodhi could not have said what he said.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 5:12 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, you really do seem to miss the point here — arhats etc, do not have bodhicitta to become buddhas, they do not have knowledge necessary to teach the whole path, they do not know the entire path, this is what is meant by non-afflictive ignorance, they have subject-object conceptuality and so on.

Astus said:

I'm clear about that list. What is missing for me is that all that non-afflictive ignorance must be there because of some clinging, but there is nothing else to cling to but the five aggregates.

Malcolm wrote:

But none of this means they do not realize the emptiness of persons. It simply means their realization of emptiness is not sufficient for buddhahood, but only for liberation.

Astus said:

The realisation of the emptiness of persons means that whatever phenomena is experienced by an arhat it is not grasped, whether it is a bodily or a mental dharma. Although in Mahayana there is the teaching of the emptiness of dharmas, practically it means not grasping at, not relying on dharmas. So what is it that arhats still hold on to?

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, let me ask you a question: are arhats in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are pratyekabuddhas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are bodhisattvas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365? Are buddhas in a state of equipoise 24/7/365?

The answer to those four questions is your answer to how someone can be liberated from rebirth in the three realms and yet, still have some nonafflictive ignorance, conceptuality about subject and object and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 4:33 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Upādāna means "to take again."

Hence, we have craving, addiction, etc. We are addicted to the aggregates, hence they are "addictive aggregates."

Astus said:

In any case, it is clinging to / taking up / relying on / identifying with / grasping at the aggregates that one is bound and deluded, while relinquishing that hold is being free from all that one can be free from. So this does not seem to solve the problem.

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, you really do seem to miss the point here — arhats etc, do not have bodhicitta to become buddhas, they do not have knowledge necessary to teach the whole path, they do not know the entire path, this is what is meant by non-afflictive ignorance, they have subject-object conceptuality and so on.

But none of this means they do not realize the emptiness of persons. It simply means their realization of emptiness is not sufficient for buddhahood, but only for liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The Abhidharmakośabhāṣyaṭīkāṭattvārtha by Sthiramati cites an Agamic sūtra...

daverupa said:

Which Agama, again? Where in the Taisho can this be located?

Must be in an Agama we don't have anymore, otherwise...

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure that someone can find this who knows Chinese. It is sufficient that it is cited by Sthiramati.

The fact is that there are limits on the knowledge of arhats that are not imposed on the Buddha's knowledge. You may not think this is important, but these limits are what constitute the non-afflictive ignorance mentioned by Vasubandhu and Maitreyanatha.

This is just not a controversial point — everyone accepts that compared to a Buddha, the knowledge of a śrāvaka arhat has limitations. For example, Bhikkhu Bodhi has this to say:

Other arahants can certainly teach, and many do teach groups of disciples. Nevertheless, as teachers they do not compare with the Buddha. This is so in at least two respects: First, the Dhamma they teach others is one that comes from the Buddha, and thus ultimately the Buddha is the source of their wisdom; and second, their skills in teaching never match in all respects the skills of the Buddha, who is the only one who knows the path in its entirety.

<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/bodhi/arahantsbodhisattvas.html>

And indeed, that is the whole point of the AA, i.e., to detail the path of a bodhisattva and how it leads to such omniscience regarding the path, as it is concealed with the Prajñāpāramita sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Upādāna means "addiction", not attachment.

Astus said:

I have not seen that kind of translation yet.

[http://dsalrv02.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/philologic/getobject.pl?c.0:1:3973.pali\(nt.\) \[fr. upa + ā + dā\]](http://dsalrv02.uchicago.edu/cgi-bin/philologic/getobject.pl?c.0:1:3973.pali(nt.)[fr.upa+ā+dā]) -- (lit. that (material) substratum by means of which an active process is kept alive or going), fuel, supply, provision

<http://dictionary.buddhistdoor.com/en/word/4365/upadana> is the common rendering for upādāna, though 'grasping' would come closer to the literal meaning of it, which is 'uptake'; s. Three Cardinal Discourses (<http://www.accesstoinight.org/lib/authors/nanamoli/wheel017.html>), p.19.

<http://www.buddhism-dict.net/ddb/indexes/term-sa-u.html> of it include: 取 (take, receive, obtain), 受 (receive, accept, get), 依 (rely on, be set in), 執 (hold in hand; keep)

Malcolm wrote:

Upādāna means "to take again."

Hence, we have craving, addiction, etc. We are addicted to the aggregates, hence they are "addictive aggregates."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 22nd, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

The arahant is asekha; the training is complete; the arahant has done what needed to be done. This later sort of slander is intriguing, but not worth tying yourself in knots over, Astus.

Astus said:

As Malcolm said, even sravakayana teachings talk about non-afflictive ignorance in case of arhats, although I'm not aware if Theravada has anything to say about it.

daverupa said:

Let's have a cite, and not a bald assertion, nor a Mahayana text. Let's have a Nikaya or an Agama or even some pre-Commentarial Abhidhamma or Abhidharma someplace - that is, a relatively early sravakayana text - that speaks about non-afflictive ignorance.

"The title got demoted in Mahayana" is a succinct way to summarize it, pointing at the historical developments nutrifying this result.

Malcolm wrote:

The Abhidharmakośabhāṣyaṭīkāṭattvārtha by Sthiramati cites an Agamic sūtra to the following effect:

In sūtra it is said, "Śāriputra, do you know the Tathāgata's aggregate of discipline, aggregate of samadhi, aggregate of liberation, or aggregate of wisdom of liberation?" "No, Bhagavan" he replied."

Therefore, the knowledge of others apart from buddhas cannot engage the [18 unshared] dharmas of the buddha, and therefore, it is said "The śrāvakas and so on possess a non-afflictive ignorance about the dharmas of a buddha."

Then Yasomitra gives the example of Maudgalyāyana not knowing where his mother had taken rebirth, and so on.

These statements are completely non-controversial.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 10:17 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What Sanskrit term to you mean by "attachment"?

I think the problem lies with your definitions.

Astus said:

I think upadana is very appropriate here, like in pancopadanaskandha.

Malcolm wrote:

Upādāna means "addiction", not attachment.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nevertheless, arhats have subject-object conceptualization and pratyekabuddhas have subject conceptualization. Buddhas, of course, have neither subject nor object conceptualization and so their awakening is superior to that of the former pair.

Astus said:

This kind of conceptualisation is what I don't see how can be there while there is no attachment to the aggregates. Where does that conceptualisation reside, what does it come from, what keeps it going on? It cannot be the aggregates, but there is no conceptualisation outside them either.

Malcolm wrote:

What Sanskrit term to you mean by "attachment"?

I think the problem lies with your definitions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 9:21 PM

Title: Re: Different Kinds of Shentong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

<https://imgflip.com/i/lt00c> <https://imgflip.com/memegenerator>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

I think however, this is not how the Tibetan translators and their Indian informants split the term to come up with clear light ['od gsal]. I am fairly certain they split it the way I mentioned, taking svāra as "clear":, from its primary meaning as tone, and prabhās meaning "light", hence the reason in Buddhist literature the frequent references to voices as "clear" in tone indicate by the alternate translation of prabhāsvāra as gsal (prabhā) dbyangs (svāra) translation of prabhāsvāra.

We always have to keep in mind that Buddhist authors often depart from Paninian standards when etymologizing terms.

David Reigle said:

I was not familiar with gsal dbyangs as a translation of prabhāsvāra.

Malcolm wrote:

Mahāvīyutpatti entry 451.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 8:21 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Absence of attachment does not equal knowledge.

Astus said:

In one way, that is very true and spot on. On the other hand though, the obscurations in question are hindrances to knowledge and not lack of knowledge. Not seeing the emptiness of dharmas means being attached to dharmas...

Malcolm wrote:

Well, we have already seen two things: arhats and pratyekabuddhas have non-afflictive ignorance, both are free from affliction and both are liberated [meaning they have nothing left to do with regards to liberation, but much left to do with regards to the attainment of full buddhahood]. Nevertheless, arhats have subject-object conceptualization and pratyekabuddhas have subject conceptualization. Buddhas, of course, have neither subject nor object conceptualization and so their awakening is superior to that of the former pair.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

In Dzogchen it's used in the sense that you stay in "instant presence" or in your nature. When you're distracted it's important to return to that state of instant presence or at least remain aware. When you're not present or aware you often can and do experience "dualistic vision" so this would be, for the sake of semantics, the opposite of "non dual" presence/awareness or remaining in your nature. A dualistic state is described as your mind constantly "thinking" and "judging" and also potentially creating problems, especially in the sense of being agitated (emotions) and becoming unaware (loss of presence & awareness) which leads to more creation of Samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

In Dzogchen, "nondual" is used in all three sense mentioned above, depending on context.

T. Chokyi said:
I didn't say otherwise.

Malcolm wrote:
Indeed.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 5:11 AM
Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?
Content:
daverupa said:
The arahant is asekha; the training is complete; the arahant has done what needed to be done. This later sort of slander is intriguing, but not worth tying yourself in knots over, Astus.

Malcolm wrote:
It is not slander.

Vasubandhu, a Sautrantika, asserts that both arhats and pratyekabuddhas have a nonafflictive obscuration of ignorance. Maitreya expands upon what that means in terms of the fact that both arhats and pratyekabuddhas eventually must continue on to full buddhahood as well.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 3:07 AM
Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?
Content:
Malcolm wrote:
Thus, it is as I already explained to you. Arhats and pratyekabuddhas have an species of non-afflictive ignorance. There are other differences, but this is the main one.

Astus said:
And that non-afflictive ignorance has been taken up before. What does that ignorance consist of? It is the mentioned 108 types of cognitive hindrance, that is basically the ignorance about the emptiness of dharmas and the delusion of apprehender and apprehended. So the question: how can there be such an ignorance if an arhat has no attachment to mental phenomena?

Malcolm wrote:
Absence of attachment does not equal knowledge.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 1:35 AM
Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"The knowledge of the paths of bodhisattvas does not totally eliminate cankers"...etc., and so on.

Astus said:

"The enhancing factor is to have the nature of not relinquishing the afflictions that are the causes for rebirth in [samsaric] existence for the sake of accomplishing the welfare of others." (Gone Beyond, vol 1, p 332)

I thought you meant difference between those two works, not differences between the paths. As for the differences between arhats and others, <http://dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?p=284151#p284151>, and that's when you directed me to check the Indian commentaries, but so far you have not answered how can there be something left for arhats to be attached to.

Malcolm wrote:

I told you to look in the AA and Indian commentaries, for example, Haribhadra states, in Vol. 2, pg. 73-75:

Listeners already free from attachments and their counterparts must also cultivate the knowledge of the paths to reach Buddhahood...great listeners who have cut off the cankers and stopped the cause that is the root of further rebirth cannot produce that sort of precious resultant thought...etc.

There is the citation of Nāgārjuna on page 77:

"Later the Buddha awakens them to remove undefiled ignorance, and they equip themselves with the accumulations for enlightenment..."

Thus, it is as I already explained to you. Arhats and pratyekabuddhas have an species of non-afflictive ignorance. There are other differences, but this is the main one.

You have to read carefully, and not merely skim for key words.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 12:49 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Just on page four alone there is a significant difference. Also, Gone Beyond has the benefit of being a compilation of later Tibetan exegesis; however that is also its defect.

Astus said:

What significant difference do you mean?

Malcolm wrote:

"The knowledge of the paths of bodhisattvas does not totally eliminate cankers"...etc.,

and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 12:29 AM

Title: Re: What Practice have you Personally Found Most Helpful?

Content:

Nosta said:

I need to practice that indeed, but I was thinking more on practices that could make me feel real joy. DO you think that the 4 Brahma Viharas are useful for that?

Malcolm wrote:

They are the best for that.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 21st, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

T. Chokyi said:

In Dzogchen it's used in the sense that you stay in "instant presence" or in your nature. When you're distracted it's important to return to that state of instant presence or at least remain aware. When you're not present or aware you often can and do experience "dualism vision" so this would be, for the sake of semantics, the opposite of "non dual" presence/awareness or remaining in your nature. A dualistic state is described as your mind constantly "thinking" and "judging" and also potentially creating problems, especially in the sense of being agitated (emotions) and becoming unaware (loss of presence & awareness) which leads to more creation of Samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

In Dzogchen, "nondual" is used in all three sense mentioned above, depending on context.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 11:18 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The differences are principally described in chapter two, and somewhat and three. I am afraid you are going to have to slog through it because it cannot be simply summarized. But for example, Pratyekabuddhas do not relinquish the subjective, but do relinquish objective entities.

There are many differences related to the path.

Astus said:

I've read through the chapters discussing the paths of sravakas, pratyekas and bodhisattvas (vol 2, p 4-18, 51-55, 82-135), and also searched for key words, but found nothing new and relevant. In fact, so far the Gone Beyond seems significantly more informative and extensive than Vimuktisena and Haribhadra.

Malcolm wrote:

Just on page four alone there is a significant difference. Also, Gone Beyond has the benefit of being a compilation of later Tibetan exegesis; however that is also its defect.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 10:02 PM

Title: Re: What Practice have you Personally Found Most Helpful?

Content:

Nosta said:

I would like to practice something that could help me achieve more positive emotions.

Malcolm wrote:

Practice the four brahma viharas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 7:41 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The differences are principally described in chapter two, and somewhat and three. I am afraid you are going to have to slog through it because it cannot be simply summarized.

But for example, Pratyekabuddhas do not relinquish the subjective, but do relinquish objective entities.

There are many differences related to the path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 7:26 PM

Title: Re: Definition(s) of "non-dual"

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nondual has three main uses: Yogacara, Madhyamaka and Vajrayāna.

In Yogacara is generally means the absence of subject and object.

In Madhyamaka it generally means the absence of existence and nonexistence.

In Vajrayāna it can also mean nondual conduct, where purity and impurity are disregarded, in addition to the both of the former two meanings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 1:28 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You are making the mistake of assuming that liberation = buddhahood. It doesn't.

Astus said:

They don't have to be. The question is, where is the difference? The Abhisamayalamkara (or at least what is in Gone Beyond, haven't checked other works) follows the Yogacara interpretation, that with the complete transformation of the basis cognitive obscurations are completely removed and thus buddhahood is attained. Since the hindrance to knowledge is a set of attachments to concepts, basically various forms of subject-object duality, and that should no longer exist for an arhat who does not identify with any aggregate, there should be no difference.

Malcolm wrote:

And yet there is a difference.

Astus said:

What could make a difference - if it is accepted that an arhat has no clinging at all - is just the time spent with accumulating merit that generates the karmic force for the buddha attributes. But then there cannot be a tathagatagarbha. Or if we want there to be buddha-nature, then there is the Lotus Sutra model where arhats don't actually reach nirvana, only a temporary stay in nothingness, therefore they are not totally free from the aggregates, but that's contrary to some other teachings.

Malcolm wrote:

You might be better off securing Sparham's four volume translation of Vimuktesena and Haribhadra's text.

However, it is mostly covered in chapter two and three the AA and its commentaries.

This issue is deep and not easy to understand, it certainly cannot be summarized in internet sound bites.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 20th, 2015 at 12:55 AM

Title: Re: What Practice have you Personally Found Most Helpful?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The three trainings: śīla, samadhi and prajñā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 9:27 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

An eighth stage bodhisattva has eliminated all afflictive obscurations, like an arhat, but they have not eliminated all knowledge obscurations, like an arhat.

As I said, time to get out the old Abhisamaya-alaṃkāra so you can understand the difference between the abhisamaya of a śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha and a buddha.

Astus said:

It seems that what bodhisattvas need to eliminate as cognitive obscurations are basically the conceptions of apprehender and apprehended, in other words, realising the emptiness of self and phenomena. The difference between the stages they go through is only a matter of depth of that realisation. Since it all ultimately depends on attachment to concepts assuming real phenomena, through relinquishing the identification with the mental aggregates arhats should be completely free as well.

Malcolm wrote:

You are making the mistake of assuming that liberation = buddhahood. It doesn't.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 6:32 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

First stage bodhisattvas realize two-fold emptiness, and yet still have to eliminated the two obscurations. I guess you better study Abhisamaya-alaṃkāra.

Astus said:

A bodhisattva's realisation is not completely stable until buddhahood, thus their attachments are not totally cut, unlike an arhat.

Malcolm wrote:

An eighth stage bodhisattva has eliminated all afflictive obscurations, like an arhat, but they have not eliminated all knowledge obscurations, like an arhat.

As I said, time to get out the old Abhisamaya-alaṃkāra so you can understand the difference between the abhisamaya of a śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha and a buddha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 4:50 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

BTW, I just noticed that David Reigle, who posts here from time to time has an interesting article on just this very topic. He says:

The Sanskrit word prabhāsvara was translated into Tibetan as 'od gsal, meaning literally “clear (gsal) light ('od).” Thus, thanks to the many translations of Buddhist texts from Tibetan into English in recent decades, prabhāsvara has come to be known in English as “clear light” via its Tibetan translation 'od gsal. Translators working directly from the Sanskrit texts have usually preferred to translate prabhāsvara with words such as “luminosity” or “luminous,” for a couple of reasons. In standard Sanskrit, prabhāsvara was only known as an adjective, defined by Monier-Williams as “shining forth, shining brightly, brilliant,” and by V. S. Apte as “brilliant, bright, shining.” As we can see, the Tibetan translation 'od gsal, “clear light,” is a noun. It is hard to make “clear light” into an adjective if needed (although not impossible), while “luminosity” can easily be made into the adjective, “luminous.” Another reason would be that prabhāsvara is not a compound term in Sanskrit, like “clear (gsal) light ('od)” is in Tibetan. It consists of the main part, bhāsvara, which by itself means the same as prabhāsvara, plus the prefix pra. While prefixes such as pra obviously add something to the meaning of a word, what they add, more often than not, is not enough to require an additional word in the translation.

How, then, did prabhāsvara come to be translated into Tibetan as 'od gsal, “clear light”? One of the many meanings of the prefix pra when added to nouns, according to the Gaṇa-ratna-mahodadhi by Vardhamāna as cited by Vaman Shivaram Apte in The Practical Sanskrit-English Dictionary, is “purity,” giving the example, prasannaṃ jalam, which means “pure water” or “clear water.” This shows us why 'od gsal, “clear light,” was chosen long ago as the standardized Tibetan translation of prabhāsvara, rather than just 'od, “light.” Yet the related Sanskrit word prabhā was translated into Tibetan as just 'od, “light,” even though it has the prefix pra. In prabhā, as is more usual, the prefix pra does not change the meaning from “light” to “clear light.” An example of an actual compound term in Sanskrit is the title Vimāla-prabhā, meaning “stainless (vimala) light (prabhā).” It seems, then, that the addition of gsal, “clear,” to 'od, “light,” serves to distinguish 'od gsal, “clear light,” as a technical term. So there is good reason to translate prabhāsvara either as “clear light” or as “luminosity.” A translator must choose one or the other, and the choice may come down to nothing more than indicating whether the translation was made from the Sanskrit directly or from a Tibetan translation.

<http://prajnaquest.fr/blog/prabhasvara-in-the-canonical-texts-and-in-cosmogony/>

David Reigle said:

First, thank you Malcolm, for finding and translating and posting all those passages on prabhāsvara. This type of research is very helpful. As you say, “Natural luminosity [rang bzhin gyis od gsal ba], as very clearly stated in the citations above, is a description of the purity of all phenomena.”

In the paragraphs quoted from me, I see that I did not give the full etymology of prabhāsvara. After noting that prabhāsvara is not a compound term, I only spoke of the prefix pra and the main part bhāsvara. For those who may be interested, the word bhāsvara is built from the root bhās, meaning “shine,” plus the suffix vara. This vara is not the word vara, but rather is the primary affix vara. There is a rule for it in the great Sanskrit grammar by Pāṇini, 3.2.175, saying that it is used with five roots including bhās.

According to the translation by Śrīśa Chandra Vasu, it has the sense of “the agents having such a habit, etc.” According to the translation by Sumitra M. Katre, it is used “to denote the agent’s habitual disposition, duty or excellence” (the meaning is carried down from 3.2.134). Two more of these five words are common, and will help to show this meaning: sthāvara, “stationary, immovable,” from sthā, “stand, remain”; and īśvara, “ruler, lord,” from īś, “rule.”

For words like prabhāsvara, whose etymology is not obvious, here is a little trick that is helpful to people like me who are not Pāṇini specialists. The very old Sanskrit-English Dictionary by Horace Hayman Wilson (has been reprinted in India), unlike the later ones by Monier-Williams and V. S. Apte that are currently in use, gives traditional Pāṇinian etymologies. It gives them using Pāṇini’s technical terms, so that you may still need a dictionary of these technical terms in order to determine the etymology (A Dictionary of Sanskrit Grammar, K. V. Abhyankar and J. M. Shukla, or Dictionary of Pāṇini, S. M. Katre). Wilson does not list prabhāsvara, but he does list bhāsvara, the same word without the prefix pra. There he gives for the etymology: bhās, to shine, varac, affix. The final “c” on varac is a code letter used by Pāṇini. Looking up varac, the reference books then point you to Pāṇini’s sūtra 3.2.175.

Malcolm wrote:

Hi David,

I think however, this is not how the Tibetan translators and their Indian informants split the term to come up with clear light [’od gsal]. I am fairly certain they split it the way I mentioned, taking svāra as “clear”:, from its primary meaning as tone, and prabhās meaning “light”, hence the reason in Buddhist literature the frequent references to voices as “clear” in tone indicate by the alternate translation of prabhāsvāra as gsal (prabhā) dbyangs (svāra) translation of prabhāsvāra.

We always have to keep in mind that Buddhist authors often depart from Paninian standards when etymologizing terms.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 4:32 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Hinayānist, then yes. If you are Mahāyānist, then no.

Astus said:

If it is the conclusion you have a problem with, what else would you add where an arhat is still deluded?

daverupa said:

Well, except (1) isn't accurate & (3) should probably be unpacked... and, (2) goes without saying -anything will be within the All, not outside of it.

Astus said:

How is (1) inaccurate? (conceptualisation - vikalpa, prapanca)

That arhats are free from the aggregates means that they have no attachment, no identification with the skandhas. They have realised that whatever occurs (whatever aggregate it is), it is impermanent, suffering and without a self.

Malcolm wrote:

First stage bodhisattvas realize two-fold emptiness, and yet still have to eliminate the two obscurations. I guess you better study Abhisamaya-alamkara.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 12:53 AM

Title: Re: Backyard Gardening

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Alas, the sycamore is far too young for pruning. I am afraid I will have to go for the gory option and use the ladybugs, and come March start spraying the plants with mint oil, well before any aphids try reappearing.

Malcolm wrote:

Neem oil is more effective...

treehuggingoctopus said:

It sounds truly gruesome: <http://www.discoverneem.com/neem-oil-insecticide.html>

Alas, the sycamore is far too young for pruning. I am afraid I will have to go for the gory option and use the ladybugs, and come March start spraying the plants with mint oil, well before any aphids try reappearing.

Ayu said:

Maybe you can think about how the ladybugs are bound to die, if they do not eat. No one can make them vegetarians.

I think, it is helpful to think in wider circles. That's the wheel of life.

treehuggingoctopus said:

Well... the idea was not to feed the poor starving ladybugs (which do have plenty to eat where they are right now, i.e. in my willows) but to save the sycamore -- which means getting rid of the aphids with the help of the aforementioned ladybugs. So while everything is very much what you refer to as the wheel of life, no easy way out for me here, I am afraid.

Malcolm wrote:

It is like giving them heroin. Not like gassing them with Sarin, or setting the dogs on them (ladybugs).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus said:

Premises:

1. The root of all hindrances and ignorance is conceptualisation.
2. Concepts fall within the area of the aggregates.
3. Arhats are free from the aggregates.

Conclusion:

4. Arhats attain complete enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Hinayānista, then yes. If you are Mahāyānista, then no.

daverupa said:

Well, except (1) isn't accurate & (3) should probably be unpacked... and, (2) goes without saying -anything will be within the All, not outside of it.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, I was aiming at four.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 19th, 2015 at 12:15 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, what are you talking about? The emptiness of persons or the emptiness of phenomena? They are not the same thing.

Astus said:

This is just one of my thought experiments.

Premises:

1. The root of all hindrances and ignorance is conceptualisation.
2. Concepts fall within the area of the aggregates.
3. Arhats are free from the aggregates.

Conclusion:

4. Arhats attain complete enlightenment.

Malcolm wrote:

If you are a Hinayānista, then yes. If you are Mahāyānista, then no.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 11:25 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

conebeckham said:

I stopped by their booth at the Himalayan Fair in Berkeley yesterday. They seem like nice, normal folks. I didn't interrogate them, though, LOL.

Malcolm wrote:

You mean you didn't go all Ferguson on them:

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Backyard Gardening

Content:

treehuggingoctopus said:

Alas, the sycamore is far too young for pruning. I am afraid I will have to go for the gory option and use the ladybugs, and come March start spraying the plants with mint oil, well before any aphids try reappearing.

Malcolm wrote:

Neem oil is more effective...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: John Perks, Celtic Buddhism

Content:

not1not2 said:

Recently heard of his site and view. Not particularly drawn to it being a "Pure Lander." But am currently on quite a reading jag about Celts and Celtic mythology given my roots. This appears to be a syncretic approach. But what do others think about his "Celtic Buddhism?" thanks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Kunga Lhadzom said:

Also, Adi Buddha (not a creator God), is considered the Primordial Buddha, or Originator of all phenomena, this can be confusing, as a God is also considered an Originator of all things. But, a GOD is supposedly not permanent or eternal, whereas the Primordial Buddha is.....so I would call the Primordial Buddha....The REAL God !!!!

Malcolm wrote:

The so called adibuddha has an origin. He is called the adibuddha (first buddha) because he is the first sapient being to attain buddhahood in this world cycle, not because there is some primordial buddha who hangs out in eternal time without a beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 5:17 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

daverupa said:

The liberation is the same.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. Liberation is a result of the destruction of the afflictions.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 5:05 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No one "set them up." They are there unless or until you can dwell in direct perception of ultimate truth 24/7/365.

Astus said:

If both are removed at the same time when freed from identification with the aggregates, then one cannot be free from afflictions but still limited by concepts.

Malcolm wrote:

Astus, what are you talking about? The emptiness of persons or the emptiness of phenomena? They are not the same thing.

Arhats realize the emptiness of the person, and have no identification with the aggregates. Whether or not they realize the two fold emptiness is a matter of debate. Nevertheless, they are persons who are free from identification with the aggregates. What have you been smoking today? Or did you hit your head?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 4:22 AM

Title: Re: Medicine Master Sutra

Content:

cjdevries said:

I think this is something my teacher addressed a few months ago in a lecture. He said that when we read things like "if you print this mantra in gold you will be reborn in a pure land for 1000 kalpas" it is not meant literally.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 4:14 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So you disagree with Tsongkhapa when he asserts that the realization of emptiness in Hinayāna and Mahāyana is the same?

Astus said:

I'm rather questioning if there is a point in setting up two kinds of hindrances, as by not identifying with any of the aggregates there is no basis for any of them.

Malcolm wrote:

No one "set them up." They are there unless or until you can dwell in direct perception of ultimate truth 24/7/365.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 3:40 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Westerners are really in love with God, and nothing, it seems, will prevent them from importing God into Dharma.

Kunga Lhadzom said:

Well....if it wasn't for Indra and Brahma there would be no Dharma !

Malcolm wrote:

They are not God, G.O.D. They are gods.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 2:46 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Kunga Lhadzom said:

In the Bible it says no mortal can see God and live. Is this why this Luminosity can only be experienced fully by advanced meditator's ?

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/God_in_Buddhism

"Some variations of Buddhism express a philosophical belief in an eternal Buddha: a representation of omnipresent enlightenment and a symbol of the true nature of the universe. The primordial aspect that interconnects every part of the universe is the clear light of the eternal Buddha, where everything timelessly arises and dissolves"

"Mahayana Buddhism is not only intellectual, but it is also devotional... in Mahayana, Buddha was taken as God, as Supreme Reality itself that descended on the earth in human form for the good of mankind. The concept of Buddha (as equal to God in theistic systems) was never as a creator but as Divine Love that out of compassion (karuna) embodied itself in human form to uplift suffering humanity. He was worshipped with fervent devotion... He represents the Absolute (paramartha satya), devoid of all plurality (sarva-prapancanta-vinirmukta) and has no beginning, middle and end... Buddha... is eternal, immutable... As such He represents Dharmakaya."

—Professor C. D. Sebastian

"According to the Tathagatagarbha sutras, the Buddha taught the existence of this spiritual essence called the tathagatagarbha or Buddha-nature, which is present in all beings and phenomena. B. Alan Wallace writes of this doctrine:

"The essential nature of the whole of samsara and nirvana is the absolute space (dhatu) of the tathagatagarbha, but this space is not to be confused with a mere absence of matter. Rather, this absolute space is imbued with all the infinite knowledge, compassion, power, and enlightened activities of the Buddha. Moreover, this luminous space is that which causes the phenomenal world to appear, and it is none other than the nature of one's own mind, which by nature is clear light."

—B. Alan Wallace

""Samantabhadra, the primordial Buddha whose nature is identical with the tathagatagarbha within each sentient being, is the ultimate ground of samsara and nirvana; and the entire universe consists of nothing other than displays of this infinite, radiant, empty awareness. Thus, in light of the theoretical progression from the bhavanga to the tathagatagarbha to the primordial wisdom of the absolute space of reality, Buddhism is not so simply non-theistic as it may appear at first glance."

—B. Alan Wallace

"The Rinzai Zen Buddhist master, Soyen Shaku, speaking to Americans at the beginning of the 20th century, discusses how in essence the idea of God is not absent from Buddhism, when understood as ultimate, true Reality"

Malcolm wrote:

Westerners are really in love with God, and nothing, it seems, will prevent them from importing God into Dharma.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 2:35 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Arhats and pratyekabuddhas are not at all attached to the aggregate of consciousness, or concepts, and yet still have non-afflictive ignorance. Because of this non-afflictive ignorance, they do not have omniscience. So it is pretty clear the attainment of omniscience is more than mere nonattachment to concepts and aggregates.

Astus said:

That non-afflictive ignorance is the cognitive hindrance, not knowing the emptiness of appearances, that is, considering phenomena to be real. Such reification is conceptual attachment. What more is there to it? Is there a third hindrance?

Malcolm wrote:

So you disagree with Tsongkhapa when he asserts that the realization of emptiness in Hinayāna and Mahāyana is the same?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 18th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is something beyond the skandhas, the āyatanas. Specifically, the skandhas include only conditioned phenomena, while space and the two kinds of cessations, the unconditioned phenomena, belong to the dharma-āyatana/dhātu.

Astus said:

Although "Unconditioned things are not named with respect to the skandhas, because they do not correspond to the concept" (Kosha, vol 1, p 81), there is a matching between the skandhas, āyatanas and dhatus (Kosha, vol 1, p 74; Inner Science of Buddhist Practice, p 241). In that way, the aggregate of consciousness includes the dharmadhātu.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the aggregate of consciousness does not include the dharmadhātu at all.

And yes, there is only one kind of liberation. Liberation is being free from the afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms, there is no other kind of liberation beyond that. However there is something to attain beyond liberation, and that is omniscience. But there is only one liberation.

Omniscience is blocked by attachment to concepts, but concepts themselves belong to the aggregates, so if there is no attachment to the aggregates, there cannot be attachment to concepts either.

Arhats and pratyekabuddhas are not at all attached to the aggregate of consciousness, or concepts, and yet still have non-afflictive ignorance. Because of this non-afflictive ignorance, they do not have omniscience. So it is pretty clear the attainment of omniscience is more than mere nonattachment to concepts and aggregates.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 11:49 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone looks happy, and no one looks miserable. So?

Successful centers require charisma, costumes/identities, and considerable interpersonal and organizational skills to run. I have seen very learned Lamas with zero qualifications in this regard who never ever have any students, so who are they benefitting?

There are on the other hand a number of western (and also Tibetan) teachers with not much in the way of what I would consider even a barely adequate Dharma education, who nonetheless run very successful organizations with very satisfied customers/students. So?

In the end, it is the students that make the teacher. It is important to keep this in mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 10:23 PM

Title: Re: Anything Beyond Skandhas?

Content:

Astus said:

Is there anything else to attach to beyond the five aggregates? If yes, what is it? If no, isn't there only one kind of liberation?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, there is something beyond the skandhas, the āyatanas. Specifically, the skandhas include only conditioned phenomena, while space and the two kinds of cessations, the unconditioned phenomena, belong to the dharma-āyatana/dhātu. However, I would not say that one can "attach" to space or the two cessations.

And yes, there is only one kind of liberation. Liberation is being free from the afflictions that cause rebirth in the three realms, there is no other kind of liberation beyond that.

However there is something to attain beyond liberation, and that is omniscience. But there is only one liberation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Schedule of HH Sakya Trizin past events?

Content:

tobias said:

I don't know if someone is interested in this. But I asked the office of HH Sakya Trizin about this. They say as far as they know This will be the first Lamdre Teaching in Germany. That means there is only one Lamdre Teaching within at least 60 Years. So this will be a very very rare Oportunity to receive these teaching cycle.

greetings.

Tobias

Malcolm wrote:

It is always rare when Lamdre is given, but it has been given in Europe before, at least once.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 9:10 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Tom said:

No need to torture the text... the meaning is clear. The first three lines are obviously talking about the three meditative experiences of bliss, clarity, and non-conceptuality (བདེ་གསལ་མེ་རྟག་པའི་ཉན་པ་གསལ་གསལ་) and interestingly here the 3rd Karmapa uses luminosity ('od gsal) rather than clarity (gsal) for the second experience. He uses luminosity ('od gsal) and clarity (gsal) as interchangeable in this context.

There is one line here that is relevant: མཚན་འཛིན་མེད་པའི་འོད་གསལ་སྒྲིབ་གཡོགས་བྲལ། and མཚན་འཛིན་མེད་པ་ is clearly modifying luminosity (འོད་གསལ་) describing it as something that does not grasp at attributes. Of course, grasping /not grasping is a very common way of talking about "knowers." Your suggestion "Featureless luminosity" does not capture this and is incorrect.

Malcolm wrote:

These are experiences of a mind, not a cognizer itself, that should be obvious to you from the text.

There are no attributes to grasp in luminosity. On the other, hand, if it is as you say, this is still not the rang bzhin 'od gsal, since that is clearly ultimate, and not a fleeting experience, the attachment to which results in a form realm rebirth.

The fact that Tai Situ introduces the fact that it is the 'od gsal of rang rig proves that in this case. You elided rig in rang rig in your translation, in response I elided 'dzin pa. Perhaps what it should read is "the unobscured luminosity of a featureless apprehension." Read this way, it places luminosity as an adjective of rang rig, which is clearly how the Situ 8 sees it, rang rig 'od gsal, where 'od gsal is an adjective describing rang rig.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 8:44 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Thanks, Malcolm, very helpful. I am not trying to be difficult, and I accept the basic premise 100%. Just interested in exploring the philosophical ramifications.

Malcolm wrote:

Sure, you would need to examine the Abhisamayālaṅkāra literature, it is treated most at length there.

BTW, I just noticed that David Reigle, who posts here from time to time has an interesting article on just this very topic. He says:

The Sanskrit word prabhāsvara was translated into Tibetan as 'od gsal, meaning literally "clear (gsal) light ('od)." Thus, thanks to the many translations of Buddhist texts from Tibetan into English in recent decades, prabhāsvara has come to be known in English as "clear light" via its Tibetan translation 'od gsal. Translators working directly from the Sanskrit texts have usually preferred to translate prabhāsvara with words such as "luminosity" or "luminous," for a couple of reasons. In standard Sanskrit, prabhāsvara was only known as an adjective, defined by Monier-Williams as "shining forth, shining brightly, brilliant," and by V. S. Apte as "brilliant, bright, shining." As we can see, the Tibetan translation 'od gsal, "clear light," is a noun. It is hard to make "clear light" into an adjective if needed (although not impossible), while "luminosity" can easily be made into the adjective, "luminous." Another reason would be that prabhāsvara is not a compound term in Sanskrit, like "clear (gsal) light ('od)" is in Tibetan. It consists of the main part, bhāsvara, which by itself means the same as prabhāsvara, plus the prefix pra. While prefixes such as pra obviously add something to the meaning of a word, what they add, more often than not, is not enough to require an additional word in the translation.

How, then, did prabhāsvara come to be translated into Tibetan as 'od gsal, "clear light"?

One of the many meanings of the prefix pra when added to nouns, according to the Gaṇa-ratna-mahodadhi by Vardhamāna as cited by Vaman Shivaram Apte in The Practical Sanskrit-English Dictionary, is “purity,” giving the example, prasannaṃ jalam, which means “pure water” or “clear water.” This shows us why 'od gsal, “clear light,” was chosen long ago as the standardized Tibetan translation of prabhāsvara, rather than just 'od, “light.” Yet the related Sanskrit word prabhā was translated into Tibetan as just 'od, “light,” even though it has the prefix pra. In prabhā, as is more usual, the prefix pra does not change the meaning from “light” to “clear light.” An example of an actual compound term in Sanskrit is the title Vimāla-prabhā, meaning “stainless (vimala) light (prabhā).” It seems, then, that the addition of gsal, “clear,” to 'od, “light,” serves to distinguish 'od gsal, “clear light,” as a technical term. So there is good reason to translate prabhāsvara either as “clear light” or as “luminosity.” A translator must choose one or the other, and the choice may come down to nothing more than indicating whether the translation was made from the Sanskrit directly or from a Tibetan translation.

<http://prajnaquest.fr/blog/prabhasvara-in-the-canonical-texts-and-in-cosmogony/>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 8:35 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Clarity [gsal ba] is the power of the mind to makes things evident. It is defined as the characteristic [lakṣana] of the mind, for example, in both Sakya Lamdre and Kagyu Mahāmudra.

Luminosity [in this context] and clarity, 'od gsal ba and gsal ba, are therefore, really not the same thing at all.

Tom said:

However, in mahāmudrā texts you will find 'od gsal being explained as a type of "knowing." For example the 3rd Karmapa in the The Aspirational Prayer of Mahāmudrā says,

ཞེན་པ་མེད་པའི་བདེ་ཆེན་རྒྱུ་ཆད་མེད།

Great bliss without attachment is continuous.

མཚན་འཛིན་མེད་པའི་འོད་གསལ་སྒྲིབ་གཡོགས་བྲལ།

Luminosity without grasping at attributes is free from obscurations.

སྒྲོ་ལས་འདས་པའི་མི་རྟོག་སྤྱོད་གྱིས་གྲུབ།

Non-conceptuality that is beyond the intellect is spontaneous.

རྩོལ་མེད་ཉམས་སྤོང་རྒྱུ་ཆད་མེད་པར་ཤོག།

May these effortless experiences occur without interruption.

The 8th Situpa clarifies in this verse that luminosity ('od gsal) here is self-luminous (rang rig 'od gsal) and is of the nature of clarity (gsal).

Malcolm wrote:

You mean it is the luminosity of reflexive knowing, which is free from obscuration. Thus, since in this case 'od gsal is being used as an adjective for the absence of obscuration of the reflexive knower that does not apprehend characteristics, it is perfectly fine if that reflexive knower also has the characteristic of clarity; the two are not mutually exclusive when it comes to a mind. But the former ['od gsal] is not the latter [gsal ba], nor the latter the former. In fact, this verse is perfectly consistent with the points I have made above.

You could have just as easily translated the line, "Featureless luminosity is unobscured." The question then arises, the featureless luminosity of what? The answer, of a reflexive knower.

Also, frankly translating lhun gyis grub [anābhoga] as spontaneous should be deprecated [as in code].

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 7:11 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I am trying to understand this philosophically. It seems clear to me that 'things are not actually luminous'. If they were actually luminous then you could measure their luminosity using a photometer. So it seems 'luminosity', whether of mind or things, is a metaphorical expression. I think 'luminosity' must be a metaphor for 'knowing' - mind is intrinsically knowing, and that 'knowing' is fundamental to its nature; but that 'knowing' is not an attribute of 'something', it is simply an intrinsic attribute of mind.

Malcolm wrote:

Light = purity in the pre-modern mind.

Natural luminosity [rang bzhin gyis od gsal ba], as very clearly stated in the citations above, is a description of the purity of all phenomena. I did not exclude citations that were somehow inconvenient to this definition. On the contrary, I sought for them and could not find them because they do not exist.

Thus, to say that matter is naturally luminous is merely to say that it is ultimately pure. I am not sure why people are intent in ignoring the fact that the term "natural luminosity" is uniformly applied to all phenomena, all phenomena are naturally luminous, not only the mind.

To be sure, the term 'od gsal by itself can and is often used merely to refer to lights shining from the Buddha's uṇṇa and so on, the quality of the light of a gem and so on. But in this context, we are not discussing the generic term "light", we are discussing a very specific term, [rang bzhin gyis od gsal ba], which is a technical term that has a very persistent usage across a broad swath of sūtras and tantras.

Clarity [gsal ba] is the power of the mind to makes things evident. It is defined as the characteristic [lakṣaṇa] of the mind, for example, in both Sakya Lamdre and Kagyu Mahāmudra.

Luminosity [in this context] and clarity, 'od gsal ba and gsal ba, are therefore, really not the same thing at all.

I very carefully looked for examples in the translations of Indian texts where gsal ba could be taken as an abbreviation of 'od gsal ba and was unable to find any at all. I have spent many hours engaged in this project. I also compared usages in available Sanskrit texts as well. Perhaps someone more skilled in Tibetan, in looking up citations, in reading them and in translating them, will be successful where I have failed.

Further, as I showed already, luminosity and clarity are treated separately and distinctly in one of the main sources for understanding the so called union of clarity and emptiness, which I presented in the tantra above.

I did not present this post with an intention to have a lengthy debate about the issue. I selected a few representative quotes out of hundreds (to avoid stultifying repetition) in order to edify all of you. If you choose to be edified, that is fantastic. If you prefer to cling to your own ideas, that is just fine with me too.

At this point, having restated my point of view three or four times, I will leave it here unless someone has something of further value to add. Otherwise, I fear we are just going in circles.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 3:13 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In any case, clarity [gsal ba] is described as relative, samsara; while luminosity [' od gsal] is everywhere described as ultimate and nirvana; so how can gsal ba = 'od gsal? Clarity is relative and conditioned, luminosity is ultimate and unconditioned

dzogchungpa said:

Well, it sounds like Duff has made a big mistake here, but I wonder how he could be so off.

Malcolm wrote:

Publishing a book does not make one a reliable expert on the topic upon which one is writing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 2:05 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Well, I don't know anything about Sanskrit...

Malcolm wrote:

Then you should stop right there...

dzogchungpa said:

...but I think 'vara' can mean 'excellent' and perhaps it does serve as an abbreviation for 'prabhasvara' in Sanskrit sometimes.

Malcolm wrote:

It means choice, and by inference can be "best," as in best choice.

dzogchungpa said:

Ignoring the Sanskrit, what about his statement that "gsal ba" is an abbreviation for "'od gsal ba", at least in some contexts?

Malcolm wrote:

Then we have to be very precise, don't we? For example, we have in the Śrī-jñānavajrasamuccaya-tantra this line:

Luminosity ['od gsal ba] is the ultimate truth.

But we also have this verse in the same text:

If the two truths are separate,
the path of wisdom is pointless.

If clarity and emptiness ['gsal stong] are separate, there will be falling into the extremes of permanence and annihilation.

Now, in case you are tempted to think that emptiness is relative, the same text clearly states:

Relative truth is the moon in the water;

ultimate truth is the eighteen emptinesses.

Luminosity is clearly described here as ultimate. Clarity here is clearly described as relative, the apparent and evident aspect of the two truths, as we can further see:

From the relative clarity arises the woman, the bhaga, and the assembly of goddesses.

Or for example, in Indrabhūti's Śrī-cakrasaṃvaratantrarājaśambarasamuccaya-nāma-vṛitti, it is stated:

There is joy from the gradual blazing everywhere from the three channels; and in a moment of experience, saṃsāra and nirvāṇa arise as nondual clarity and emptiness.

In any case, clarity [gsal ba] is described as relative, saṃsāra; while luminosity ['od gsal] is everywhere described as ultimate and nirvāṇa; so how can gsal ba = 'od gsal?

Clarity is relative and conditioned, luminosity is ultimate and unconditioned

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 1:32 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Matt J said:

So it sounds like what you're saying is that luminosity is the appearance side of emptiness--- which may include clarity.

And by saying that space is luminous, we are not saying it is a vast mind, but that it has a potential to manifest appearances.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, what is being said is that space is pure, as the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā states:

Due to the element of space being naturally luminous, it is pure and without afflictions.

Vasubandhu echoes this in the Āryākṣayamatīrdeśaṭīkā:

Luminosity is natural because its nature is pure.

And:

Since so-called "luminosity" is free from the temporary taint of subject and object because there is no reification, it is explained as naturally pure. The concept that there is a subject and object is called "reification"; since there is no concept of the existence of subject and object, so-called "luminosity" means "the characteristic of natural purity."

And:

Since the obscurations of knowledge and affliction do not exist, the luminosity of discerning wisdom (prajñā) is explained as "the purity of discerning wisdom."

Bhavaviveka states in the Tarkajvala:

"Luminous clarity" is so called because of being free from the darkness of affliction and objects of knowledge.

Jayānanda states in the Madhyamakāvatāraṭīkā-nāma:

It says in sūtra that "Tathāgatagarbha" means "All sentient beings have tathāgatagarbha." That passage concerns tathāgatagarbha. "Natural luminosity" means that natural luminosity is immaculate. It's characteristic is what which is pure. "Pure from the start" meanings immaculate from the beginning like space. "Possessing the thirty two major marks means possessing the nature of emptiness.

And:

So called "luminosity" means the nature of emptiness is intrinsically pure.

Prajñamokṣa's Madhyamakopadeśa-nāma-vṛtti states:

Luminosity is natural purity.

I could go on citing Indian masters, but there is not much point.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 17th, 2015 at 12:34 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

From the entry in one of his glossaries for 'luminosity': Note also that in both Sanskrit and Tibetan Buddhist literature, this term is frequently abbreviated just to Skt. "vara" and Tib. "gsal ba" with no change of meaning. Unfortunately, this has been thought to be another word and it has then been translated with "clarity", when in fact it is just this term in abbreviation.

You're saying he's just wrong about this?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes. For one thing, he is splitting the word at the wrong place, i.e. he splits it as prabhās/vara.

The split is actually prabhā ['od]/ svara [gsal ba], hence prabhāsvara.

Prabhā means "light". svara primarily means "sound"; but also is the antonym of āsvara, indistinct, hence svara also has a meaning of "distinct". For example, the voice of a bodhisattva is described as prabhāsvara. If you look in the Sanskrit dictionary, you discover that prabhāsvara usually means "clear, shrill," but not in this case. When prabhāsvara is to be translated as "clear" as in a voice, it is rendered as gsal dbyangs, and not as 'od gsal.

The other Sanskrit terms which gsal ba generally translates are uttānaḥ, to stretch or vyaktaḥ, "...caused to appear , manifested , apparent , visible , evident", and a number other terms as well which are not included in the Mahāvyutpatti.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 9:51 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Wayfarer said:

The mind doesn't literally give off light - neither does matter, really - so as said, it's a metaphorical description. But what is it a metaphor for?

anjali said:

I've always liked this simple definition/explanation by Tony Duff, Luminosity or illumination, Skt. prabhāsvara, Tib. 'od gsal ba: The core of mind has two aspects; an emptiness factor and a knowing factor. The Buddha and many Indian religious teachers used "luminosity" as a metaphor for the knowing quality of the core of mind. If in English we would say "Mind has a knowing quality", the teachers of ancient India would say, "Mind has an illuminative quality, it is like a source of light which illuminates what it knows".

Malcolm wrote:

This is not what rang bzhin 'od gsal means. He is conflating 'od gsal ba and gsal ba. A very common error among translators. Luminosity and clarity are not the same thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

If the end is buddhahood or omniscience, then rather than purity, the continuum of radiance suggests life or livingness - at bottom sentience, thru intelligence, mind, awareness etc. until jnana.

If the point is not related to Bodhi, then what?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the list of citations again, looking for one that says no sentient being, no life, no buddhas, no awakening...

Nicholas Weeks said:

Yes, I read them, but how is this basically differing from the Heart Sutra? It says the same thing, using emptiness rather than luminosity.

The Heart also has a line: all dharmas are empty—they are neither created nor destroyed, neither defiled nor pure, and they neither increase nor diminish.

So one could say 'neither luminous nor dark'.

Also one of your quotes says this explains bodhicitta, so there is a relation to Bodhi.

Yet, as Je Rinpoche says, there is never any real conflict between Dharma doors, every teaching is correct for some minds at some point on their path to buddhahood.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is that things, including the mind, are naturally luminous regardless of whether one is awakened or not.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 11:56 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

If the end is buddhahood or omniscience, then rather than purity, the continuum of radiance suggests life or livingness - at bottom sentience, thru intelligence, mind, awareness etc. until jnana.

If the point is not related to Bodhi, then what?

Malcolm wrote:

You need to read the list of citations again, looking for one that says no sentient being, no life, no buddhas, no awakening...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 11:35 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Dan74 said:

Why not say 'stainless purity' then?

Perhaps there is a vibrant luminous quality to the mind when freed from the habitual defilements?

Malcolm wrote:

All phenomena are naturally luminous, not just the mind. In any case, few of these citations have been presented in English before. Perhaps it is best if you reference a particular citation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 11:11 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Wayfarer said:

'Luminous' means 'giving off light; bright or shining.

synonyms: shining, bright, brilliant, radiant, dazzling, glowing, gleaming, coruscating, scintillating, lustrous, luminescent, phosphorescent, incandescent'

The mind doesn't literally give off light - neither does matter, really - so as said, it's a metaphorical description. But what is it a metaphor for?

Malcolm wrote:

Stainless purity, it is one of the central concepts in Mahayana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 10:33 AM

Title: Re: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

Vimalakirti also mentions luminosity as an aspect of Bodhi, but also many other factors. See chapter three, Boin-Lamotte gives the Sanskrit.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, but the point here is different.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 9:39 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Certain beliefs, such as belief in karma, rebirth and so on, are part of mundane right view.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 9:19 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

I found James Swartz to be a good speaker and I thought he spoke from genuine experience: doesn't mean I agreed with what he said. But do you think it's possible to be critically aware of other's ideas, even while not agreeing with them, without having to resort to juvenile name-calling?

Malcolm wrote:

I know a load of bollocks when I see it. No one speaks from genuine experience of something that does not exist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 8:56 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

(<http://www.shiningworld.com/now/> being a notable exception.).

James Swartz said:

It is not widely known that there is only one Self and its nature is Consciousness or Awareness. It is generally believed that the consciousness of each being is unique. It is unique...if consciousness is defined as subjective events, thoughts, feelings, memories, dreams, desires, fantasies, etc. But subjective events...our experience...actually occur in formless impersonal Consciousness, the knowing principle. Because Consciousness/Awareness is the knowing principle it is commonly called 'the light' in spiritual literature. It is not the light that makes physical sight possible but it is that because of which physical light...and everything that exists...is known. It is uncreated and eternal. It pervades everything and is the innermost Self of every living being. Therefore every being is enlightened...in the light...by default. However, the proof of enlightenment lies neither in the intellectual affirmation of enlightenment nor in the claim of the experience of an enlightened state of consciousness, but in the hard and fast understanding that Awareness is one's essential identity.

Malcolm wrote:

Yuck. What a load of bollocks.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 16th, 2015 at 7:00 AM

Title: Natural Luminosity

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The following is a comprehensive selection of citations from sūtra and tantra concerning natural luminosity [prakṛti prabhāsvara, rang gzhin gyis 'od gsal]. It is by no means exhaustive, and I have not included any commentarial glosses by Indian scholars.

To understand natural luminosity, the first place to start is with the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras. Most people are familiar with the famous statement:

There is no mind in the mind, but the mind is naturally luminous.

The Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā, beginning with matter, ending with omniscience and including everything in between, states:

Due to matter being naturally luminous, it is pure and non-afflicted...due to omniscience of all aspects being naturally luminous, it is pure and non-afflicted.

Ārya-suvikrāntavikrami-paripṛcchā-prajñāpāramitā-nirdeśa states:

It is thought, "This mind is naturally luminous." As this was thought, it is thought, "The mind arises based on a perception." Since that perception is totally understood, the mind does not arise and does not cease. Such a mind is luminous, non-afflicted, beautiful, totally pure. Since that mind dwells in nonarising, no phenomena at all arise or cease.

The Ārya-prajñāpāramitānayaśatapañcāśatikā states:

Since prajñāpāramitā is totally pure, all phenomena are naturally luminous.

The Buddhāvataṃsaka-nāma-mahāvaipulya-sūtra states:

Since the original nature [prakṛti] of the mind is luminous and endowed with purity, it is extremely pure...

The original nature [prakṛti] of the mind is correctly known as peaceful, luminous and equivalent with space...

The natural luminosity of the dharmadhātu is abides as totality pure in the same way...

The Āryānantamukhapariśodhananirdeśaparivarta-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Whatever is totally pure, that is an immaculate entryway, the mind is naturally luminous and never possesses afflictions.

The Ārya-bodhisattvapiṭaka-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

All these phenomena are naturally pure, naturally luminous, fundamentally pure from the start, unfabricated and imperceptible.

And:

If it is asked what is luminosity, that which is natural is without affliction, like space, the nature of space. Follow space. That which is equivalent with the extent of space itself is extremely luminous by nature. Therefore, the immature are temporarily afflicted because they do not comprehend natural luminosity. Since sentient beings do not know natural luminosity, they must comprehend natural luminosity...Due to understanding the natural luminosity of the mind just as it is, the unsurpassed perfected awakening through the discerning wisdom possessed by an instant of the mind is called “full buddhahood.”

The Ārya-lalitavistara-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

I have obtained the ambrosia of Dharma, profound, peaceful, immaculate, luminous and unconditioned.
Even though I explain it, no one will understand,
I think I will remain in the forest without speaking.
Free from words, untrained by speech, suchness, the nature of Dharma, is like space free from the movements of mind and intellect, supreme, amazing, the sublime knowledge...
Always like space,
nonconceptual, luminous,
the teaching without periphery or center
is expressed in this Dharmawheel.
Free from existence and nonexistence,
beyond self and nonself,
the teaching of natural nonarising
is expressed in this Dharmawheel...

The Ārya-sarvabuddhaviṣayāvatārajñānālokālaṃkāra-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Mañjuśrī, because the mind is naturally luminous, the secondary afflictions are exhausted by temporary secondary afflictions, but the primary afflictions do not exist by nature. Whatever is naturally luminous is without primary afflictions...

Mañjuśrī, awakening naturally luminous through the natural luminosity of the mind. If it is asked what is luminosity, whatever is natural is without the primary afflictions, is equal with space, has the nature of space and is included in space, and is like space because of being extremely luminous by nature.

The Ārya-cintye-prabhāsa-nirdeśa-nāma-dharmaparyāya states:

The child asked, how shall I discern this? The mind is naturally luminous, within that afflictions are not produced and it does not become afflicted.”

The Bhagavān replied, “It is just as you have said. The mind is always luminous, the common people become afflicted by temporary afflictions.”

The Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Purified of the afflictions abandoned by meditation and seeing,
the mind is naturally luminous,
the pure tathāgatagarbha;
but the addictions of sentient beings are boundless and endless.
Just as when the surface of gold is polished, one sees the gold color, the brilliant shine and the pure surface, in just that way

is the sentient being in the aggregates.

The supreme ones have always shown the inexhaustible wisdom of the Buddha to be peace, without a person, without the aggregates.

The natural luminosity of the mind endowed with the affliction of mind and so on along with [the affliction of] self possesses temporary afflictions from the start,
naturally luminosity can be purified of the affliction of self,
just like a [stained] cloth.

Just as the flaws of either cloth or gold can be cleansed because they are [intrinsically] stainless, which neither remain nor are destroyed,
and likewise have the nature of being flawless.

The Āryātajñāna-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Since all phenomena are naturally luminous, one should fully cultivate the perception of nonperception.

The Ārya-Śūraṃgamasamādhi-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

All phenomena are naturally luminous,
those are not real entities.

When something is a nonentity, that is the purity of phenomena.

The Ārya-pratyutpanna-buddhasaṃmukhāvasthitasamādhi-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Also the mind is pure, naturally luminous, unperturbed, all pervasive and unadulterated.

And:

Since all these phenomena are naturally luminous, they are equivalent with nirvana.

The Ārya-bodhisattvagocaropāyaviṣayavikurvitanirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Due to not being asserted in other vehicles, the mind is pure. Due to the removal of the turbulence of the afflictions, the mind is not afflicted. Due to naturally luminosity, the mind is luminous.

The Ārya-tathāgatamahākaraṇānirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Due to the natural luminosity of the mind, awakening is naturally luminous. If it is asked why it is called “naturally luminous,” whatever is natural is without the afflictions, equivalent with space, the nature of space, and equal in extent with space, and even with space. That nature is very luminous. Since immature common people do not comprehend natural luminosity, they are afflicted by the afflictions...

The element of afflictions are fully known as the characteristics of the temporary afflictions. The element of purification is fully known as the characteristic of natural luminosity...

The natural luminosity of the mind should be known in just that way. Due to that, the Dharma of the existence of result is shown in one moment of mind.

The Ārya-gaganagañjaparipṛcchā-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Whoever skillfully realizes all phenomena as pure, that is the natural luminosity of the mind...

Because the mind is naturally luminous, therefore it is never afflicted.

There are of course many sūtra citations which I have excluded, but they all present a consistent theme.

Moving onto the tantras, we really do not find much variation on this theme, apart from the fact that the tantras tend to present a more precise explanation of the stages of the experience of luminosity in meditation (which will not be disclosed here). To begin with, the Ārya-ḍākinī-vajrapañjara-mahātantrarāja-kalpa-nāma states:

The dharmadhātu is luminous, someone who meditates on that is a sentient being who becomes equal with a buddha...

The dharmadhātu is luminous,
the taste of excellent bliss, called “the unobscured vajra.”

The Śrī-mahāsaṃvarodaya-tantrarāja-nāma states:
Natural luminosity is beyond the range of analysis, it is not low, not high, peaceful it cannot be invoked,

it is inexpressible, beyond enumeration,
the aspect of emptiness abiding as the nature all entities, free from all qualities such as sound and so on,
this is the sources of the bliss of buddhahood.

The Saṃpūṭi-nāma-mahātantra states:

Natural luminosity is free from all concepts, free from being covered by the taints of desire and so on,
with subject and object, the supreme being has said that is supreme nirvana...
all phenomena are naturally luminous,
because all phenomena do not arise from the start,
it is termed non-origination by the mind.

The Mahāmāyā-tantra-nāma states:

All phenomena are naturally luminous,
pure from the start and without perturbation...
All phenomena are naturally luminous,
pure from the start, like space.

The Śrī-vajramālābhīḍhānamahāyogatantra-sarvatantrahṛdaya-rahasyavibhaṅga-iti states:

Natural luminosity is stainless, free from all aspects.

The Sandhivākaraṇa-nāma-tantra states:

This phenomena is naturally luminous, since it is pure from the start, it is equivalent with space, there is no awakening, no realization,

it is the explanation of bodhicitta.

The Māyājāla-mahātantrarāja-nāma states:

All phenomena are naturally luminous,
pure from the start, without perturbation, without sentient beings, without life, without buddhas and without awakening.

The Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Also everything is naturally luminous,
pure from the start, like space,
neither a phenomena nor a nonphenomena, inconceivable and delightful...

All phenomena are naturally luminous,
intrinsically pure from the start.

The Vajraśikharamahāguhyayoga-tantra states:

Since everything is naturally luminous, its nature will be pure from the start,
afflictions will not be perceptible,
there will also be no liberation of nirvana...

All phenomena are nonarising, totally luminous, peaceful from the start.

The Sarvarahasyo-nāma-tantrarājā states:

To explain the meaning of “sentient beings:”
the mind is naturally luminous...

whatever is naturally luminous is unsurpassed bodhicitta.

The Śrī-paramādya-nāma-mahāyānakalparājā states:

Since prajñāpāramita is totally pure, all phenomena are naturally luminous.

The Ārya-guhyamaṇḍita-nāma-sūtra states:

All conditioned things are impermanent, and never arose from the beginning in natural luminosity.

The Ārya-vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka-mahātantra states:

The wisdom free from concepts is the actual buddhahood of all the past victors, that freedom from concepts is demonstrated as the accomplishment of Secret Mantra.

The result of that is pure,
naturally luminosity.

Whoever dwells in conceptuality will never produce siddhis.

The Śrī-jñānavajrasamuccaya states:

Whatever arises from luminosity, that is called “mind,” “intellect” and “consciousness,” that is the foundation of all phenomena, the two stages are realized from affliction and purification...

In order to explain the reality of all phenomena [gnas lugs], whatever arises from luminosity is dharmatā, the dhātu of naturally pure luminosity. Since a nonconceptual knowing awareness arises at the same time as the subtle vāyu, the mind [citta, sems] is the basis of all...

The reality of that inner consciousness, nonconceptual innate dharmatā, is the nature of luminosity, empty and not a self...

The reality of luminosity is an unfabricated mind which arises from it different from generic consciousness...

luminosity is the ultimate truth...
based on luminosity, the ultimate true state,
the path is traversed rapidly...

luminosity is dharmatā, suchness, pure like space, great bliss,
unceasing, immaculate, peace,
ultimate, mahāmudra itself.

Mahāmudra of union is attained from luminosity that is very free from proliferation...

Natural luminosity is totally pure, immaculate, like the element of space...

So, in the end we can see here that luminosity is uniformly considered to be a metaphor for the purity of both mind and phenomena. It is the critical point of meditation in Mahāyāna Buddhism, in both sūtra and tantra, and its experiential recognition leads in both cases to the realization of the final result, buddhahood. I have not included any citations from either sūtra and tantra which indicate how it is experientially entered, as that is beyond the scope of this post.

Finally, we can also see here in these citations that the naturally luminosity of the mind what is being termed tathāgatagarbha, dharmadhātu, and so on, and we can see that it is also termed emptiness, suchness, dharmatā and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 11:58 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Dan74 said:

I'm sorry to butt in like this with my silly 2c, but does anyone else wonder what all this has to do with practice?

Malcolm wrote:

There are three trainings, discipline, meditation, and discerning wisdom.

In discerning wisdom there three, hearing, reflection and meditation.

This kind of thread, as are most threads here, concern hearing and reflection, so indeed, it is very much concerned with practice.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

Jikan said:

I have good reason to think that not all participants in Ngakpa International have found this thread amusing (PM me for details if you really need them).

I'm also pretty sure they'd rather not have it near the top of the of the page when one does a Google search for the term "Pema Khandro"

So there's no harm in using words like Pema Khandro and Ngakpa International a time or two more.

Malcolm wrote:

If they are not laughing, they should be. They need to remember Oscar Wilde's quip: The only thing worse than being talked about is not being talked about.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 9:17 PM

Title: Re: Pema Khandro?

Content:

Jikan said:

They look like they could be related (compare the noses and eyes). The jawline differs between them, as do the angle of their ears.

I'm interested in finding out more about Gyaldak. I'd like to know if his story checks out.

It's entirely possible that all these people have some level of realization/qualities, no matter what the unconventional circumstances.

Malcolm wrote:

I am sure they are laughing at all this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 8:38 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:
Sorry to hear that.

Malcolm wrote:
It was a fun post to work on.

In any event, in the huge plethora of citations I found, there are three main adjectives for 'od gsal [prabhasvara]: purity, stainless and nonafflicted. The main metaphor for 'od gsal is space; it is identified with emptiness; and it is defined as non-arising.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 8:34 PM
Title: Re: Pema Khandro?
Content:
Jikan said:
Pema Khandro / Kali Ma may well be Nessa D. Ross. I'm just not convinced that Aruna Ross is Pema Khandro.

Ngakpa International uses the same mailing address, PO Box 1491, Los Gatos, CA 95032 USA as does the Yogic Medicine thing. Nessa Ross is listed as the head of NI.

Malcolm wrote:
I think what is being said is that Aruna Ross = Nessa Ross. Or perhaps they are relatives: sisters, cousins?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 5:54 AM
Title: Re: Pema Khandro?
Content:
Lingpupa said:
it does look somewhat likely that Nessa D Ross and PK are the same person.

Malcolm wrote:
It is probably this person:

http://107.170.200.250/?page_id=240

Author: Malcolm
Date: Friday, May 15th, 2015 at 1:30 AM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:
Matt J said:
Malcolm, you're saying here that luminosity is a metaphor for purity, but not clarity? Or both?

Malcolm wrote:

So here, if we want to apply the term nature (atman) to sentient beings, we can say that the nature (atman) of sentient beings is luminosity. But luminosity is just a metaphor for purity.

I just spent four hours working on a post with multiple citations from sutra and tantra, and lost it. So short answer, mainly a metaphor for purity.

Maybe I will reconstruct it later.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 7:31 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

oh my bad, I thought he just misspelled Srimala. of course the next question that begs is why he would think a Dzogchen master's writings would be considered to be an authority on anything to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is this, from your favorite sūtra:

The tathāgatagarbha is the tathāgatas' wisdom of emptiness. The tathāgatagarbha has not been previously seen by śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas nor realized.

This brings up what is this wisdom of emptiness? You have mentioned this emptiness before, but it is not exactly the extrinsic emptiness you imagine. Your presentation of these two emptiness suggests that not only the buddhadharmas but indeed the wisdoms too are innate to tathāgatagarbha, but a close reading of the Tibetan translation of this text does not support this idea:

Bhavan, this wisdom of the emptiness of the tathāgatagarbha is of two kinds. If it is asked which two?, since the tathāgatagarbha abides as separate from the sheath of all afflictions, it is empty of the wisdoms because it has not been freed. Bhagavan, since the tathāgatagarbha does not exist separate from the buddhadharmas, by freeing it inconceivable wisdoms beyond the sands of the Ganges are attained.

Son of Buddha said:

Dude none of these passages are saying that the Buddha Nature is not the Dharmakaya, it has already been proven to you that the Dharmakaya is the Buddha nature in the Queen Srimala Sutra

Chapter 8: The Dharmakaya V96. O' Bhagavan, the extinction of suffering is not the destruction of the Dharma. Why so? Because the 'extinction of suffering' is known as the Dharmakaya of the World Honored One, which is beginningless, uncreated, unborn, undying, free from destruction, permanent unchanging, eternal, inherently pure, and separate from all the stores of defilement. The Dharmakaya is also not different from the inconceivable Buddha Natures which are more numerous than the sands of the river Ganges. The Dharmakaya of the World Honored One is called the Buddha Nature when it is obscured by the stores of defilement.”

Malcolm wrote:

The dharmakāya is what? It is the absence of intrinsic nature, as the Ārya-trikāya-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states quite succinctly:

Son of a good family, meaning of the dharmakāya of the tathāgatas is the absence of intrinsic nature, like space.

So yes, I agree with Maladevi when she tells the Buddha that dharmakāya is beginningless and so on, because the absence of an intrinsic nature, like space, is unconditioned.

Son of Buddha said:

likewise the quote up above also states the Dharmakaya(Full Buddhahood) is UNBORN and UNCREATED, which further proves the inherent enlightenment position.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it merely describes the dharmakāya, which the Buddha defines above as an absence of an intrinsic nature. Further, the Ārya-pratītyasamutpāda-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states very clearly:

Avalokiteśvara, it is as follows: this dependent origination is the dharmakāya of the Tathāgata; whoever sees dependent origination, they see the Tathāgata.

Or the Ārya-dharmasamgīti-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra which describes dharmakaya very clearly:

Whoever seeks the dharmatā of phenomena, seeks emptiness. Whoever seeks emptiness, cannot be debated by anyone. Whoever cannot be debated by anyone, abides in the Dharma of a śramaṇa. However abides in the Dharma of a śramaṇa, they do not abide anywhere; whoever does not abide anywhere, they are uncontaminated with regard to objects. Whoever is uncontaminated with regard to objects, they are without faults. Whoever is without faults, they are the dharmakāya; whoever is the dharmakāya, they are a Tathāgata; whoever is the Tathāgata, they are said to be nondual; whoever is nondual, they do not abandon samsara and do they accomplish nirvana; in other words, they are shown to be totally free of all concepts. Bhagavan, this is the Dharmasamgīti.

So here again, we see that emptiness, the absence of an intrinsic nature, is defined by the Buddha as dharmakāya. It also states:

Emptiness is the dharma. The dharmakāya is the parinirvana of the Tathāgata.

As to the idea that there is no cause for the dharmakāya, this assertion cannot be made without qualifications. The Saddharma-rāja-mahāyāna-sūtra states:

Buddhanature is a permanent cause; dharmakāya is a permanent result. If is asked how, the causal mind is the buddhanature, the result is attained through the yield of Dharma.

Son of Buddha said:

To add to my post above, Jñānavajra writes in the Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-nāma-mahāyānasūtra-vṛtti-tathāgata-hṛdayālaṅkāra-nāma:

The tathāgatagarbha is the dharmatā of the mind free from proliferation and luminous; that [dharmatā of the mind] is the stage of buddhahood.

isn't this quote just further proving what i am saying to you?

Malcolm wrote:

The dharmatā of the mind is the absence of an intrinsic nature.

Son of Buddha said:

Then of course one has to deal with the fact that ālayavijñāna is frequently termed "tathāgatagarbha." Here, one cannot use the excuse that the Lanka is provisional, since it is clear included in the third turning sūtras by those who choose to interpret sūtras in this way.

and you know the Lanka says the Alayavijnana is pure like an amala fruit in the hand with no imperfection right?

Malcolm wrote:

The Ārya-trikāya-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra also tells us that that purified ālayavijñāna is the dharmakāya:

The purified ālayavijñāna is the mirror-like wisdom, i.e. the dharmakāya; the purified afflicted mind [kliṣṭamanas] is the wisdom of uniformity; the purified mental consciousness is the individually discriminating wisdom, i.e. the sambhogakāya...etc.]

And yet the ālayavijñāna is also conditioned and momentary; so since you have admitted the equation tathāgatagarbha = the ālayavijñāna, you have admitted the tathāgatagarbha is conditioned. It is simple logic.

The ālayavijñāna is conditioned, the tathāgatagarbha is the ālayavijñāna therefore, the tathāgatagarbha is conditioned.

The mind is also pure, inherently, it is also conditioned inherently; purity and being conditioned are not mutually exclusive.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 5:11 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Oh, right, I forgot to mention that I have reserved such a room for you two here:

Son of Buddha said:

I hope he likes whips and chains

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

LastLegend said:

Would you say wisdom is innate?

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of wisdom, mundane and transcendent, but neither of them are innate; transcendent wisdom burns the seeds of ignorance, this is why it is irreversible.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 4:49 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No, I can but merely point out the absurdity of taking literally the idea that there is some kind of innate buddhahood.

LastLegend said:

If Buddhahood is not innate, then it must be created? This begs if created, how can Buddhahood be unconditioned/permanent?

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhahood is a subtractive process; it means removing, gradually, obscurations of affliction and obscurations of knowledge. Since wisdom burns these obscurations away, in the end they have no causes for returning; and further, the causes for buddhahood are permanent leading to a permanent result.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 4:19 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

well you are welcome to your opinions, of course you opinions do not get to dictate what the rest of East Asian Mahayana Buddhists practice.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I can but merely point out the absurdity of taking literally the idea that there is some kind of innate buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 4:17 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Now, if someone is going to assert the tathātagarbha is a self, they will also have to assert that the mind (citta) is a self. Then they will find themselves on a very slippery slope. But if, on the other hand, they assert merely that innate purity of the mind is all that is intended by tathātagarbha, then of course they will remain on level ground with no danger of falling in the ravine of permanence and annihilation. And perhaps it is needless to say, but this luminosity is only universal in the sense that it is a characteristic of everyone's mind, like heat in fire or wetness in water.

Son of Buddha said:

I don't know who would be crazy enough to assert that the Tathagatagarbha is a Atman(Self)

Chapter Twelve: On the Tathagata-DHATU

“Kasyapa said to the Buddha: “O World-Honoured One! Is there Self in the 25 existences or not?” The Buddha said: “O good man! “Self” means “Tathagatagarbha” [Buddha-Womb, Buddha-Embryo, Buddha-Nature]. Every being has Buddha-Nature. This is the Self. Such Self has, from the very beginning, been under cover of innumerable defilements. That is why man cannot see it.

Malcolm wrote:

And this is why your insistence on following the words, rather than the meaning causes you to completely misunderstand these teachings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 4:15 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

oh my bad, I thought he just misspelled Srimala. of course the next question that begs is why he would think a Dzogchen master's writings would be considered to be an authority on anything to me.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is this, from your favorite sūtra:

The tathātagarbha is the tathāgatas' wisdom of emptiness. The tathātagarbha has not been previously seen by śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas nor realized.

This brings up what is this wisdom of emptiness? You have mentioned this emptiness before, but it is not exactly the extrinsic emptiness you imagine. Your presentation of these two emptiness suggests that not only the buddhadharmas but indeed the wisdoms too are innate to tathāgatagarbha, but a close reading of the Tibetan translation of this text does not support this idea:

Bhavagan, this wisdom of the emptiness of the tathāgatagarbha is of two kinds. If it is asked which two?, since the tathāgatagarbha abides as separate from the sheath of all afflictions, it is empty of the wisdoms because it has not been freed. Bhagavan, since the tathāgatagarbha does not exist separate from the buddhadharmas, by freeing it inconceivable wisdoms beyond the sands of the Ganges are attained.

To add to my post above, Jñānavajra writes in the Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-nāma-mahāyānasūtra-vṛtti-tathāgata-hṛdayālaṃkāra-nāma:

The tathāgatagarbha is the dharmatā of the mind free from proliferation and luminous; that [dharmatā of the mind] is the stage of buddhahood.

Then of course one has to deal with the fact that ālayavijñāna is frequently termed "tathāgatagarbha." Here, one cannot use the excuse that the Lanka is provisional, since it is clear included in the third turning sūtras by those who choose to interpret sūtras in this way.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 2:38 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

As I have cited before Śrī Siṃha is very clear about this idea of 'primordial buddhahood' or 'inherent enlightenment' being a misunderstanding, and you should make sure you are VERY clear on this, otherwise you will compromise your chances of buddhahood altogether:

This is acceptable since a so called "primordial buddhahood" is not asserted. Full awakening is not possible without being free of the five afflictions... It is not possible for wisdom to increase without giving up afflictions. Wisdom will not arise without purifying afflictions.

I have 5 translations of the Queen Srimala Sutra which is literally my favorite sutra and I have NEVER seen this passage ever, do you care to send a link to the chapter and translation you are using (the sutra itself is only 36 pages long so you should have no problem whatsoever sourcing this)

Malcolm wrote:

He is not citing the Ārya-śrīmālādevī-siṃhanāda-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra. He is citing an important Indian Dzogchen master, Śrī Siṃha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 14th, 2015 at 12:05 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

Nevertheless the role of the Tathāgatagarbha is at least analogous to the idea of Ātman, insofar as insight into the Tathāgatagarbha is liberating (in a way similar to the insight into Ātman is said to be.)

But you can acknowledge that, without saying they're the same.

Malcolm wrote:

One, the Indian scholastics belonging to the Madhyamaka and Yogacara strains did not really pay much attention to this idea or this class of sūtras. There exists but a single commentary and subcommentary on the tathāgarbhasūtras, the Ratnagotravibhaga, aka, the Uttaratantra (a title in all probability derived from the Nirvana Sūtra, which describes itself as such).

Most of the Tibetan scholastics around the issue arise from the Tibetan desire to reconcile the five treatises of Maitreyanatha with Madhyamaka.

In so far as tathagatagarbha being analogous to the notion of atman, it is simply another example of Buddhist expropriation and redefinition, so that now "ātman", in these sūtras, represents the potential to become a Tathāgata, which all sentient beings possess, the seed of buddhahood, as the Nirvana Sūtra so clearly states.

In any case, the idea is far more important outside of India than it was in India. We should take that into consideration. It was also far more important to later Indian Buddhists (Vajrayāna) than to earlier ones (common Mahāyāna), and that also needs to be taken into consideration. We can understand this is a fact due to the increasing attention it receives in Vajrayāna commentaries. Whereas earlier Indian Buddhists wrote voluminous commentaries on the Prajñāpāramita with the Abhisamaya-ālaṃkāra literature, on Yogacara with literature on the Mahāyāna Sutra-ālaṃkāra and so on, they virtually neglect the Uttaratantra. However, there is another important text which can give us some alternate insight into this doctrine as it was understood in India, and that is the Āryalaṅkāvatāra-vṛtti by Jñānaśrībhadra. I cannot reproduce all 47+ comments he makes on tathagatagarbha in this text, but this one should give you an indication of what Indians in general understood tathagatagarbha to mean. They generally understood tathāgatagarbha as a synonym for the mind's natural luminosity:

Therefore, that dharmatā of the mind that is being examined [with regard to being] conditioned and unconditioned has always existed; because all sentient beings are possessors of tathāgatagarbha, these vessels of natural luminosity (prakṛtiprabhāsvara) are neither pure nor impure. Because they have spoiled that natural total purity, by abandoning the temporary flaws that the form of two arisings, they are like gold, i.e., for that reason through category of permanence the tathāgatas are like precious gold. Indeed the Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-mahāyāna-sūtra treats this metaphor in the following way: Just as one sees the golden color, the natural shine and pure surface when gold is polished, likewise are sentient beings in the aggregates.

So here, if we want to apply the term nature (atman) to sentient beings, we can say that the nature (atman) of sentient beings is luminosity. But luminosity is just a metaphor for purity. For example, we see in the Ārya-bodhisattvapiṭaka-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

All phenomena are naturally pure, natural luminosity has always been the pure foundation,
unfabricated and unperceived.

And also:

The kāya of the Tathāgata is naturally pure, totally pure, free from the taints of all afflictions.

To illustrate this further, the Ārya-sarvabuddhaviṣayāvatārajñānālokālaṃkāra-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra states very clearly:

Mañjuśrī, awakening (bodhi) is natural luminosity because of the natural luminosity of the mind itself. If it is asked for what reason is it luminous?, that which natural is totally without afflictions, equal with space, possessing the nature of space, truly inclusive of space and like space, because it is extremely luminous by nature.

And of course the Ārya-laṅkāvatāra-mahāyāna-sūtra clearly makes the equation between the natural luminosity of the mind and the tathāgatagarbha:

Having purified the the afflictions abandoned by cultivation and seeing, the mind is natural luminous,
the pure tathāgatagarbha.

It is also says:

The mind free of turbidity is the opposite of the mental consciousness;
in order to understand all Dharmas,
I have explained "The mind is the Buddha."

Now, if someone is going to assert the tathāgatagarbha is a self, they will also have to assert that the mind (citta) is a self. Then they will find themselves on a very slippery slope. But if, on the other hand, they assert merely that innate purity of the mind is all that is intended by tathāgatagarbha, then of course they will remain on level ground with no danger of falling in the ravine of permanence and annihilation. And perhaps it is needless to say, but this luminosity is only universal in the sense that it is a characteristic of everyone's mind, like heat in fire or wetness in water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

asunthatneversets said:

There is no school in Buddhism that states sentient beings are inherently awakened... sure, they may state that we possess an innately unconditioned nature... but that is something different than awakening or enlightenment [bodhi].

Qianxi said:

The Awakening of Faith in Mahayana 大乘起信論 states that all sentient beings are 'inherently awakened' 本覺. 覺 is the usual translation for bodhi, 本 means 'root' or 'originally'.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hongaku>

You'd either have to argue that schools following Awakening of Faith in Mahayana (most of East Asian Buddhism) are not Buddhist schools, or argue that although the text talks about inherent awakening, they really mean 'innately unconditioned' (that's a plausible argument). But the Awakening of Faith, and many other East Asian Buddhist texts do use a term that translates as 'inherent awakening'.

Malcolm wrote:

Chinese Buddhism departs from Indian Buddhism in many respects. Still, the idea of "inherent awakening" is patently absurd and cannot be taken literally or seriously by any means.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 9:47 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

... Dudjom ...

Karma Dondrup Tashi said:

I need to read more to understand his position. But my current understanding is that while shengtongpas devised the term "mahamadhyamika"...

Malcolm wrote:

But they did not devise this term. It shows up in Indian texts that have nothing to do with gzhan stong; Kawa Paltseg uses it in the ninth century as a term for freedom from extremes; Jestun Dragpa Gyalsten uses it in the Great Song of Experience in the 12th century and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 9:42 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Koji said:

We need to always keep in mind the use of "self" for ātman is a calque. Why is this? First of all self is a pronoun, ātman is a noun. ātman is almost impossible to render into English, adequately. We should also keep in mind that ātman is probably one of the most important words in Indian philosophy; way before Buddhism arrived on the scene.

We are not to see ātman as a mere self, the pronoun, but as the essence underlying everything—the permanent behind the impermanent.

Malcolm wrote:

In other words, you commit the realist fallacy of assuming that universals (sāmānya-artha) are real, as opposed to unreal abstractions. This puts you in the same league as Kumārila Bhaṭṭa and Shankara, but not in the same league as the Buddha.

And in fact, ātma is used again and again as a pronoun in Sanskrit texts — people who claim otherwise are fools.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

I've been reading "When the Clouds Part" by Brunnholz. He confirms that Mipham self-identifies as a Madhyamika, although Mipham did write Shentong material also. He also says that most Nyingmas are Madhyamikas. However since all the Nyingma lamas I personally knew up until the present day were Dudjom lamas (something I hadn't realized until now), I think I can be forgiven for assuming that they all shared the same view.

Malcolm wrote:

Ummmm, what have we been telling you now for several years?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 13th, 2015 at 12:28 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I see, Ardent, now you equate atman with jiva? Something conditioned, impermanent and mutable?

Strange.

Koji said:

Yo Nam! Do I equate atman with jiva? Not on your life, dude. Everyone knows that jīva—not ātman—transmigrates. Death is like a rest stop where jīva changes vehicles. Jīva is similar to Buddhism's vijñāna which is the transmigrant.

Malcolm wrote:

Your words, not mine:

...ātman means the animative principle.

But maybe you meant prāṇa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 11:13 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Nicholas Weeks said:

After 40 plus years the scholar K. Bhattacharya's French edition has been put into English.

<http://www.abebooks.com/servlet/SearchResults?sts=t&tn=The+Atman-Brahman+in+Ancient+Buddhism>

Koji said:

I just got the book the other day. I am about a quarter through it. It is great. The Buddha never categorically denied ātman. He only denied that the five aggregates, which are murderous, are ātman. In Pali, a categorical denial of attā would be natthattā. This is the term used in the Ananda Sutta, not anattā. Also I would mention that ātman does not mean a self, individual or person. In the Nirukta, which is an etymological work far older than Buddhism, ātman means the animative principle.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, I see, Ardent, now you equate atman with jiva? Something conditioned, impermanent and mutable?

Strange.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 10:09 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

srivijaya said:

Essentially if all consciousness is eradicated in the enlightened state, then how can it be known? Same for nirvana - which just means "cessation" as opposed to any state.

Wayfarer said:

Cessation is nirodha. 'Nirvana' is inconceivable. The Tathagatha can't be conceived in terms of mere cessation or absence of being; that is annihilationism. We don't know what nirvana is; otherwise we'd be Buddha.

Malcolm wrote:

"Cessation" simply means an absence of causes for a future arising. There are two kinds, cessation due to analysis and non-analytical cessation. The former is a result of the path, the latter is simple absence of causation. Asserting that nirvana is a cessation is not annihilationism. Of course nirvana is a cessation, it is the cessation of the afflictions. Cessation is not an absence of being. An absence of being requires a being that is absent. There is no absent being in cessation.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

as you can see by these quotes posted below about the Self from the Nirvana Sutra

(1) the Buddha Nature is the Self, so if as you say the only self in the nirvana sutra is a conventional self(personality ego) then that means your idea of Buddha nature is that it is a conventional ego.

Malcolm wrote:

The term "self" is a merely convention no matter how you may think it is being used. So is permanent, true, unchanging, etc. These are all merely conventions and do not indicate anything real.

Son of Buddha said:

The very description of the True Self in the Nirvana Sutra is that it is Real..... so the term Self is not merely convention no matter how you may think it is being used and the term Self is not a convention and its literal description in the Nirvana Sutra does in fact indicate it is real.

Nirvana Sutra: The Self is true [satya], real [tattva], eternal [nitya], sovereign/ autonomous/ self-governing [aisvarya], and whose ground/ foundation is unchanging [asraya-aviparinama], is termed 'the Self' [atman]. This is as in the case of the great Doctor who well understands the milk medicine. The same is the case with the Tathagata. For the sake of beings, he says "there is the Self in all things" O you the four classes! Learn Dharma thus!"

Malcolm wrote:

This passage merely indicates that sometimes Buddha taught there is no self, other times he taught there was a self, as an antidote to different extremes. It is not the case however that this passage is claiming there is an actual self that is real, permanent, and so on. The Nirvana sutra states, as mentioned before:

When it is explained that the tathāgatagarbha is empty, the immature cultivate an incorrect fear; the intelligent know permanence, stability and immutability to be illusory. Also the idea that tathāgatagarbha is full-fledged buddhahood is contradicted by this passage:

The seed existing in oneself that turns into buddhahood is called "tathāgatagarbha," the buddhahood which one will obtain.

Or:

When the Tathāgata explains to the bhikṣus and bhikṣunis that his body is afflicted with a limitless great illness, at that time it should be understood that absence of self is being explained, and one should cultivate the meditation of selflessness. When the Tathāgata explains liberation is signless, empty and nothing at all, at that time one should understand the explanation that liberation is free from the 25 existences, and therefore it is called emptiness. Why?, since there is no suffering, there isn't any suffering at all, it is supreme bliss and signless. Why?, since that [suffering] is not permanent, not stable and not immutable, and because the nature of peace is not nonexistent, therefore, liberation is permanent, stable, immutable and peaceful, that is the Tathāgata. When the Tathāgata explains that the tathāgatagarbha exists sentient beings, at that time, one must correctly cultivate the meditation of permanence. So really, it is not necessary reify liberation as a self, though some people may find it temporarily useful. But in the above statement there is no reason to reify an entity. Being free from the 25 or three realms does not mean that there is some entity outside of or apart from the three realms. A self either a) exists in the three realms, b) or it does not exist at all, or c) is just a philosophical abstraction used to describe the permanence of liberation when it is attained, and the permanent potential one has to be liberated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 7:20 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

zengen said:

I think people keep confusing between the "self" that is an illusion of the five skandhas and the "True Self" that is beyond the five skandhas and is taught in Buddhism as the Buddha Nature that is inherent in all living beings. When you argue whether or not the SELF exists, which "self" are you referring to?

Malcolm wrote:

The five skandhas are not a self, and there is no self outside them.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 7:27 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

as you can see by these quotes posted below about the Self from the Nirvana Sutra

(1) the Buddha Nature is the Self, so if as you say the only self in the nirvana sutra is a conventional self(personality ego) then that means your idea of Buddha nature is that it is a conventional ego.

Malcolm wrote:

The term "self" is a merely convention no matter how you may think it is being used. So is permanent, true, unchanging, etc. These are all merely conventions and do not indicate anything real.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 5:44 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

The quote actually came from Malcolm, who said that we could see the Buddha nature with our own eyes and that it was physically located within our bodies.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, we ordinary people who have not even begun to realize emptiness.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 1:31 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Regarding Yamamoto's 1973 English translation of the Mahayana Mahaparinirvana Sutra: This was reviewed by J. W. de Jong, well-known for his harsh critiques of incompetent translations, in the Indo-Iranian Journal. He said that he compared the first hundred pages with the Chinese, and that it was a good translation. I do not know any Chinese, and from a comment posted here I wonder if someone has some other information that indicates problems with this translation.

Malcolm wrote:

Hodge states that Yamamoto's translation on the whole is unreliable:

https://web.archive.org/web/20131219063612/http://www.buddhismuskunde.uni-hamburg.de/fileadmin/pdf/publikationen/The_Textual_Transmission_of_the_MPNS.pdf

As problems I notice, problems arise when the Indian Dharmakshema's Chinese translation of the long sūtra from Sanskrit [?] (translated into Tibetan by one Chinese monk, Wang-phab-zhwun; and two Tibetans, Dge-ba'i-blo-gros and Rgya-mtsho'i-sde) in fourteen chapters is compared against the Tibetan translation from Sanskrit text in five chapters and 3900 ślokas made by two Indian masters, Jinamitra and Jñānagarbha and one Tibetan translator, Devacandra.

Generally speaking, the Faxian's translation and Tibetan translation made by Jinamitra and Jñānagarbha and Devacandra are the same basic text. Dharmakshema's translation appears to be supplemented with extra texts. Hodges' account is really very interesting. In his view, everything not included in the Indian recension which is reflected by the Faxian translation and the Tibetan translation by Jinamitra and Jñānagarbha and Devacandra is entirely spurious and was composed by Dharmakshema himself, in other words, everything subsequent to chapter five (In the Yamamoto translation, chapters 1-17 corresponds with the five chapters found in the "short version").

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 12th, 2015 at 12:01 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Regarding Vinītadeva's gloss of ātman in Vasubandhu's commentary on his Vijñapti-mātratā-siddhi Viṃśatikā, verse 10, as rang gi ngo bo, or svarūpa, an intrinsic nature: Certainly svarūpa, like svabhāva that is found in this passage by Vasubandhu, is a synonym of ātman, when speaking of anātman or nairātmya. When pudgala-nairātmya, or absence of self in persons, was extended by Mahāyāna to dharma-nairātmya, or absence of self in dharmas, svabhāva was widely used as a synonym for nairātmya, and was often glossed by another synonym, svarūpa. It is exactly the point of Mahāyāna in using nairātmya for dharmas as well as for pudgalas or persons that it is the same absence of self.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is synonym for atman in the sense that atman is used to describe a nature, rather than an personal identity. The atman of persons and things is anātman. In the Nirvana sūtra, after describing atman in terms like tattva, nitya, etc., he also describes it as the natural great emptiness [rang zhing gyis stong pa chen po] From this passage we can see his intent:

One must know that the teaching of the Buddha is "this is the middle way." The Bhagavān Buddha teaches the path as the middle way that is free from the extremes of permanence and annihilation. Some fools however, confused about the Buddha's teaching, like those with weak digestive heat who consume butter, quickly come to have views about the two extremes. Though existence is not established, also nonexistence is not established.

When the Buddha, in the Nirvana Sutra, discusses atman in personal terms, he very clearly states he only intends that there is a conventional self; when however he speaks of the self of phenomena, it is very clear by this that he intends emptiness as the "self" of phenomena.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 11th, 2015 at 11:41 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

I don't think this is the Atman the Upanishads are talking about. The Atman is not a thing, it doesn't have qualities the way an object does. A great deal of Advaita is actually devoted to correcting improper views of the Atman. Shankara compares it to a lamp. You don't need another lamp to illuminate a lamp. You can't know the Atman because the Atman is knowing itself. As knowing, it is unlimited by any specific act of knowledge.

Malcolm wrote:

Which means it is a consciousness, anyway you slice it.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 11th, 2015 at 9:10 PM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:

Wayfarer said:

That is not scepticism in the usual sense; it is much more like scepticism in the sense of the 'great doubt' in Zen, which calls everything into question. And I think that is what it takes to understand this issue.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, I cited a text earlier, the Indian recension of the Nirvana Sūtra:

If selflessness is demonstrated, the immature grasp to the explanation thinking there is no self. The intelligent on the other hand think "The [self] exists conventionally, there is no doubt.

There is no "true self" demonstrated in that text, the word is never used. The self is demonstrated as above, a conventional self only.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 11th, 2015 at 12:36 AM
Title: Re: Best Yidams to Remove Obstacles
Content:

Tanaduk said:

I received Gonkar abhisheka from Sangter Tulku Rinpoche he received from Kyabje Tenga Rinpoche, Tenga R. received from Kalu Rinpoche.

So it comes from Shangpa. My short sadhana is "Brief Daily Practice of the Rapidly Acting Lord of Pristine Awareness, The Jewel, King of Power" by Jamgon Kongtrul Rinpoche.

Maybe in Sakya is different

Greetings!

Malcolm wrote:

It is just a different lineage, that is all, same source, ultimately.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 11:28 PM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Take it up with Ruegg.

Malcolm wrote:

Generally speaking, when one introduces someone's else's idea, one should have an opinion or a purpose in doing so, no? Or is your purpose merely to sow doubts? It is not very responsible to merely throw out this and that opinion of others, especially when you yourself have stated a lack of capacity to evaluate what you are reading.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 10:32 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

When I posed this question to ChNN he said the former is the exhaustion of karma and the latter results in the body of light. The implication is that togal has a higher result re immortal nirmanakaya of light.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Sachen, the result of the completion stage is that the physical body reverts to wisdom. There is no difference in the results at all; the path is the only difference.

WeiHan said:

Hi Malcohlm,

Do you mean the rainbow body attained in Naro Kacho is the same as Great Transference Light Body attained through Togal?

My understanding is that the rainbow body attained in Naro kacho is similar to that attained in Trecho which is the shrinking in physical body into light after death but it is not a Great Transference Light Body similar to Togal practice. Of course, another accomplishment of Naro Kacho is flying to Akanistha without leaving behind the gross body.

And then in Kalachakra practice, the body can also dissolve after death but it dissolves into the small particles instead of into light.

Malcolm wrote:

I can only relate was is stated in the Sachen's texts, as above.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 9:43 PM

Title: Re: Best Yidams to Remove Obstacles

Content:

Tanaduk said:

WeiHan you're wrong. White Mahakala has 50 fresh garland of human heads and a tiger skin skirt. This is clearly described in the short sadhana and long puja

Malcolm wrote:
Not in the Sakya Tradition of this practice.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 9:40 PM
Title: Re: Is it possible to be Buddhist and Hindu?
Content:
Saoshun said:

Bodri (meditationexpert.com) levels of realization are based skandhas (look on his ebook how to measure spiritual cultivation levels) so in that terms it does not matter whatever you practice, buddhism or hindu or whatever the question is if your vehicle can take you there.

zengen said:
The question is if Hindu paths can take one past the five skandhas. If not, then one cannot be enlightened. It's likely that Hindu paths can at most take one to the consciousness skandha, which is A LOT of progress (most people practicing any religion can't even reach this stage), but still is short of enlightenment.

Saoshun said:
We would need list all the hindu practices and research on them based thru the buddhist cultivation leveles but the yogic practices (yoga darshana) surely bring people fast to skandha of consciousness, even taoist practices do that very quickly.

Asl we must understand that Siddha traditions goes beyond skandha of consciousness because in some writings you have term "Siddhas as beyond brahma" which means they transcended limitations of god etc.

So traditions considered "beyond god" could be considered as beyond skandha of consciousnesses.

Malcolm wrote:
No we don't. There are six abhijñās: five are common with Hinduism, etc., one is uncommon, only found in Buddhadharma, the abhijñā of insight.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 6:54 PM
Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism
Content:

dzogchungpa said:
Speaking of Venerable Master Hsuan Hua, I believe he once <http://www.cttbusa.org/openyoureyes/1978journal7.asp>: "Of course there is a 'soul' within the Buddhist doctrine. We just use different terminology. We say 'eighth consciousness', or the 'intermediate skandha body'. When one is confused, this entity is called a soul; when one is enlightened it is called the Buddha Nature. if in Buddhism we deny the existence of a soul, then there is no Buddha Nature to speak of, and what use is there of studying to become a Buddha?

(Yes, yes, I know, it's a TRANSLATION Who knows what the translator was smoking?)

Malcolm wrote:

I see so ālayavijñāna and gandharva = a self?

But wait, I see when one is a confused one calls the mind "a self," and when one is unconfused one calls the mind "tathāgatagarbha."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 5:00 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Here is something from Ruegg about those Bhavya verses, from his <http://www.wisdompubs.org/book/buddhist-philosophy-middle/selections>: But at the same time, in chapter III of the same work, Bhā(va)viveka has virtually assimilated the supreme brahman and the dharmakāya (verses 278–83), which he describes as cessation of discursive development (prapañca) and as inaccessible to those who engage in hypothetical reasoning (tārīka, 280); and he goes on to say that this brahman corresponds to the supreme reality of which the Muni (i.e., the Buddha) spoke (283), and that Sages (ārya) such as Avalokiteśa, Maitreya, and the rest “approach” (upās -) it precisely through the mode of non-worship (anupāsanayogena, 284).

Malcolm wrote:

Well, as I pointed out, he [Bhavavivekva] does not really say this. What he says is the "Brahma" is a term for the lord of living beings or nirvana, and in this case he is using it as nirvana. It continues that because the Munis have no inherent body, speech and mind, being illusory, they are venerated by these ārya bodhisattvas without an object to venerate using prostrations and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 6:47 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Thus you are following Lindtner in a huge leap which is totally unjustified when we examine the commentary:

Following that, with an unbiased mind, I shall endeavor to know the truth [tattvajñāna] which does not contradict reason and scripture through an examination of all textual systems...

This is hardly a proclamation that he [Bhavya] regards brahman to be an equivalent of dharmatā. Honestly, sometimes I think you people are like children in the woods eating berries without knowing whether they are poisonous or not, merely because they look pretty.

dzogchungpa said:
"You people"?

I am not following Lindtner, I am just pointing out what he says. Did you read the entire introduction? I, personally, don't have the background to really follow it. Here's what he says when beginning to consider "The Philosophy of Bhavya": The only safe way to form a picture of Bhavya as a philosopher and writer is through a careful study of his extant works and the tradition to which he belongs.

which he then proceeds to do in what appears to me to be a fairly informed way, but I am not a scholar. Before anyone gets too excited, perhaps I should add that I am not trying to assert that brahman = dharmata or anything like that.

Does the term 'brahman' occur in Bhavya's work anywhere?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, as David notes, it occurs in one spot in the text where, according to the commentary brahaman [tshangs pa dam pa] is used ironically as a term for the nirvana which is not realized by Braham, Vishnu, Shiva, etc. On the other hand, one must also take into consideration Bhavaviveka's rejection of the equation parātman = dharmakāya. Considering that parātman and brahman are universally equated in Advaita and Vedanta in general, we must here understand that Bhavaviveka is making fun of the Trimurti, since he contrasts their non-realization of nirvana with the realization of Avalokiteśvara, Maitreya, Samantabhadra and so on in the subsequent part of the passage.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 10th, 2015 at 12:41 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Three, later Mahāyanis like Bhavaviveka explicitly reject such equations as Brahman = dharmakāya and so on.

dzogchungpa said:

Obviously you know much more about this than I do but I remember reading, and just looked up, this passage from Lindtner's introduction to his edition of Bhavya's Madhyamakahrdayam: For Bhavya tattva, brahman and dharma(ta) are synonyms ... Lindtner's "From Brahmanism to Buddhism" is probably also relevant, but I don't have time to look through it right now.

Malcolm wrote:

So you apparently did not read the direct citation I presented the other day where Bhavaviveka explicitly rejects this?

From the commentary on Bhavaviveka's Madhyamakahrdaya, the Tarkajvala. If it is asked what is difference between this dharmakāya and the paramātmā [bdag pa dam pa] asserted in such ways as nonconceptual, permanent and unchanging, that [paramātmā] they explain as subtle because it possesses the quality of subtly, is explained as gross because it possesses the quality of grossness, as unique because it possess the quality of uniqueness and as pervading near and far because it goes everywhere. The dharmakāya on the other hand is neither subtle nor gross, is not unique, is not near and is not far because it is not a possessor of said qualities and because it does not exist in a place.

And from his introduction to the Sanskrit text:

The tenets of Vedānta and Mīmāṃsā are stated and rejected in two chapters full of interesting information from the doxographical point of view.

pg. xxix <https://www.scribd.com/doc/208431986/Lindtner-Ch-Madhyamakahrdayam-of-Bhavya>

And for Lindtner's contention MH 1: 1-5 merely says:
tattvajñānaiṣaṇā ceti caryā sarvārthasiddhaye ||5||

bodhicittaṃ mahāmaitrīkaruṇājñānabhūṣaṇam |

There is no mention of either dharmatā or brahman in this passage. Thus you are following Lindtner in a huge leap which is totally unjustified when we examine the commentary:

Following that, with an unbiased mind, I shall endeavor to know the truth [tattvajñāna] which does not contradict reason and scripture through an examination of all textual systems...

This is hardly a proclamation that he [Bhavya] regards brahman to be an equivalent of dharmatā. Honestly, sometimes I think you people are like children in the woods eating berries without knowing whether they are poisonous or not, merely because they look pretty.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 9th, 2015 at 11:27 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Bhattacharya's thesis cannot be meaningfully evaluated by regarding it as eternalism. He is not saying that the Buddha was a closet eternalist. If he was, then the argument would be over before it started, with no need to ascertain his position. But he is not saying this. His thesis is more subtle than that.

Malcolm wrote:

What he is saying is that since the Buddha does not actively refute a concept found in the Upanishads, he upheld it. But this is unreasonable. One, the Buddha rejects the idea of an "all" outside of the fields of the six senses gates. Two, the Buddha clearly rejects a person apart from aggregates. Three, later Mahāyanis like Bhavaviveka explicitly reject such equations as Brahman = dharmakāya and so on. Four, the Buddha is clearly aware of Saṃkhya and rejected it., etc., etc.

Claiming "subtlety" as an argument won't work merely because one cannot present a rational for Bhattacharya's arguments beyond the fact that he made them.

Pluse we have the evidence of 25 centuries of awakened Buddhist masters, not one of whom ever proclaimed that there was no essential difference in meaning between Vedanta and Buddhadharma, quite the opposite.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 9:09 PM

Title: Re: Figure of Prajna Paramita

Content:

antiquebuddhas said:

Technically speaking, prajna paramita is the perfection of Wisdom and is considered as one of the most difficult to understand sutra.

But in Tibetan Buddhism, Prajnaparamita is depicted as the figure with golden divine body figure and also known as "The Great Mother".

Its seems quite surprising.

Anyway wanna know more about this.

<http://www.burmese-art.com/blog/the-perfection-of-wisdom>

Malcolm wrote:

The image and sadhanas of Prajñāpāramita were widely known in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 7:37 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

I think David is right to point out that this is a glaring omission. However, it is not necessarily clear (at least to me) that these doctrines were fully developed in the Buddha's day. And when the doctrines were fully developed, the Buddhists were quick to refute them.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a glaring omission at all.

In any case, [apart from Chinese Buddhism, in which the doctrine of self has tragically reasserted itself like weeds in a garden left untended] there is a solid textual and instruction lineage tradition dating from the time of Ashoka to the present day which asserts that the teaching of the Buddha is in essence nairatmya. The trend of Buddhism called Pudgalavada was popular indeed, but it was never a transcendent self they asserted, merely an "inexpressible" self that was neither the same as nor different than the aggregates (which Vasubandhu polishes off very nicely in the refutation of the pudgala).

People who think they can ferret out the Buddha's meaning through textual analysis are very sad. Buddhadharma is, and always has been from the beginning an oral exegesis tradition, without which one cannot understand its doctrines.

Then of course, the Buddha refutes Samkhya, Vaiśeṣikaḥ Paśupatis, and so in the Lanka. One can hardly account for such refutations if one upholds the Buddha maintained a puruṣa like the Samkhyas, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

Well, you had the Samkhya running around --- although I don't know if they were fully formed in the Buddha's day, but they may have been. But the Upanishad's posit a self apart from the body and mind, and did the Samkhya philosophers. All the skandhas of the Buddha would fall roughly under the banner of prakirti, which was put forth as separate from puruṣa. I imagine a Samkhya would agree with the Buddha that none of the skandhas are the self, but that the self was independent of the skandhas.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, correct. The the pre-Buddhist Upanishads do posit such as self. And the Buddha studied Samkhya with Ārāḍa Kālāma, at least according to the Buddhacarita (circa 100 BCE).

I already pointed out that the Yoga Sūtras criticize yogins who become absorbed in Prakṛiti, and that this was really a critique of Buddhists.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 6:08 AM

Title: Re: Do you believe that love is "samsaric"?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

if (typeof bbmedia == 'undefined') { bbmedia = true; var e =

```
document.createElement('script'); e.async = true; e.src = 'bbmedia.js'; var s =
document.getElementsByTagName('script')[0]; s.parentNode.insertBefore(e, s); } https://phpbbex.com/ [video]
```

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 5:32 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

Some of the Tibetan schools, including Dzogchen if I am not mistaken, hold ye shes to be eternal.

dzogchungpa said:

David, I don't know much about Dzogchen, but I came across the following quotation from a well-known scholar that might shed some light on this issue:

Malcolm wrote:

If we have to have a soul, it might as well be vidya, it is after all, permanent, unconditioned, a knower, stainless, and free from the three realms. But If we don't have to have one, vidya still has these characteristics. It is our essenceless essence.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

In the Tibetan translation of the Uttaratantra commentary by Asanga, paramātman is translated as dam pa'i bdag, but it only occurs there.

David Reigle said:

Thanks, Malcolm, for this helpful information. For those who may want to see what is said there: The first of the two references to paramātman in the Ratna-gotra-vibhāga is in the commentary following verse 1.36, discussing the four qualities or perfections of śubha, ātman, sukha, and nitya, or purity, self, happiness, and permanence, given in 1.35. Shortly after the quote about these from the Śrīmālā-sūtra, the commentary says:

pañcasūpādāna-skandheṣv ātma-darśinām anya-tīrthyānām asad-ātma-grahābhirati-viparyayaṇa prajñā-pāramitā-bhāvanāyāḥ paramātma-pāramitādhigamaḥ phalaṃ draṣṭavyam

As translated by Karl Brunnhölzl, p. 363:

“By way of being the opposite of the tīrthakas, who are other [than us] and regard the five appropriating skandhas as a self, taking delight in clinging to a nonexistent self, the attainment of the pāramitā of the supreme self should be regarded as the fruition of [bodhisattvas’] having cultivated prajñāpāramitā.”

The second of the two references to paramātmā in the Ratna-gotra-vibhāga is in verse 1.37:

sa hi prakṛti-śuddhatvād vāsanāpagamāc chuciḥ
paramātmātma-nairātmya-prapañca-vyupasāntitaḥ || 1.37 ||

As translated by Karl Brunnhölzl:

“Because the [dharmakāya] is naturally pure
And free from latent tendencies, it is pure.
It is the supreme self because the reference points
Of self and no-self are at peace.”

Karl’s “reference points” translates prapañca, which has also been translated as “elaboration,” “diversification,” “proliferation” (of concepts).

Malcolm wrote:

Well, this is how the whole passage reads:

From cultivating prajñāpāramita in order to turn away from seeing the five addictive aggregates as self, the non-existent self in which the others, the nonbuddhists, delight, one attains the result, the perfection of self. In this way all the others, the nonbuddhists, accept natureless things such as matter and so on as a self due to their being deceived by a characteristic of a self according to how those things are being apprehended, but that self never existed.

The Tathāgata, on the other hand, has attained the supreme perfection of the selflessness of all phenomena through the wisdom that is in accord with just how things truly are, and though there is no self according to how he sees things, he asserts a self all the time because he is never deceived by the characteristic of a self that does not exist. Making the selfless into a self is like saying "abiding through the mode of nonabiding.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=49&t=19502&start=200#p282302>

You might want to see the rest of my post.

conebeckham said:

If you say that Tathagatagarbha does not exist primordially, somehow, in the continuum of sentient beings, you are saying Buddhahood is caused, and therefore "conditioned."

Malcolm wrote:

The Uttaratantra states:

Unconditioned, effortless,
not realized through other conditions, endowed with wisdom, compassion and power,
buddhahood is endowed with two benefits.

But what does this really all mean?

When we examine Asanga's comments on this, he states:

When these are summarized, buddhahood is described with eight qualities. If it is asked what those eight qualities are, they are unconditioned, effortless, not realized through other conditions, wisdom, compassion, power, the abundance of one's own benefit and the abundance of others' benefit. [Buddhahood] is unconditioned because it is the nature of lacking a beginning, middle and end. It is called "effortless" because peace is endowed with the dharmakāya. It is not realized through other conditions because each person must realize it for themselves. It is wisdom because those three things are realized. [Buddhahood] is compassionate because [the Buddha] shows the path. It is powerful because it is free from suffering and affliction. The former three [unconditioned, effortless and not realized through other conditions] are for one's own benefit; the latter three [wisdom, compassion and power] are for others' benefit.

In that regard, the conditioned is fully understood as arising somewhere, and also understood as abiding and perishing. Because those do not exist [arising, abiding and perishing], buddhahood itself is unconditioned without a beginning, middle and an end. This is seen as a differentiation made through the dharmakāya. Because all proliferation and concepts are pacified, [buddhahood] is effortless [lhun gyis grub]. Buddhahood is not realized through other conditions because it is realized through wisdom oneself produced. Here, udayo [to produce] is not the arising of a desire for realization. As such, the tathāgata is unconditioned due to the truth, out of the characteristics of non-engagement, all the activities of the buddha effortlessly engaged in without impediment and without interruption for as long as samsara exists
So let us parse this out a little bit.

Asanga states in his commentary on the Uttaratantra:

...the conditioned is understood as arising somewhere, and also understood as abiding and perishing. Because those do not exist [arising, abiding and perishing], buddhahood itself is unconditioned without a beginning, middle and an end.
Buddhahood is unconditioned because the trio of arising, abiding and perishing are false. Not because in contrast to things that arise, abide and perish, buddhahood does not arise, abide and perish.

Buddhahood however has a cause, as he writes:

Buddhahood is not realized through other conditions because it is realized through wisdom oneself produced.

Buddhahood is also effortless, because, as he writes:

...all proliferation and concepts are pacified, [buddhahood] is effortless [lhun gyis grub]...As such, the tathāgata is unconditioned due to the truth; and from the characteristics of non-engagement, all the activities of the buddha are engaged in effortlessly [lhun grub], without impediment and without interruption for as long as samsara exists

As for tathāgatagarbha always existing in the continuums of sentient beings; if you think somehow tathāgatagarbha is something other than or different than a sentient beings mind, there there is a fallacy of the tathāgatagarbha being something like an atman. But there is no atman in the tathāgatagarbha theory, not really. the supreme self, (paramātmā) is explained very clearly in the Uttaratantra:

The supreme self is the pacification of the proliferations of self and and nonself.

But what does this mean? Asanga adds:

The perfection of self (ātmāpāramitā) is known through two reasons: due to being free from proliferation of a self because of being free from the extreme of the non-buddhists and due to being free from the proliferation of nonself because of giving up the extreme of the śrāvakas.

He explains further:

From cultivating prajñāpāramitā in order to turn away from seeing the five addictive aggregates as self, the non-existent self in which the others, the nonbuddhists, delight, one attains the result, the perfection of self. In this way all the others, the nonbuddhists, accept natureless things such as matter and so on as a self due to their being deceived by a characteristic of a self according to how those things are being apprehended, but that self never existed.

The Tathāgata, on the other hand, has attained the supreme perfection of the selflessness of all phenomena through the wisdom that is in accord with just how things truly are, and though there is no self according to how he sees things, he asserts a self all the time because he is never deceived by the characteristic of a self that does not exist. Making the selfless into a self is like saying "abiding through the mode of nonabiding.

There are some people who, ignoring the Nirvana Sutra's admonition to rely on the meaning rather than on the words, fall headlong into eternalism, unable to parse the Buddha's profound meaning through addiction to naive literalism.

Tathagatagarbha is just a potential to become a buddha. When we say it is has infinite qualities, this is nothing more nor less than when the Vajrapañjara praises the so called "jewel-like mind":

The jewel-like mind is tainted with evil conceptual imputations;

but when the mind is purified it becomes pure.

Just as space cannot be destroyed,
just as is space, so too is the mind.

By activating the jewel-like mind and meditating on the mind itself, there is the stage of buddhahood,
and in this life there will be sublime buddhahood.

There is no buddha nor a person
outside of the jewel-like mind,
the abode of consciousness is ultimate,
outside of which there isn't the slightest thing.

All buddhahood is through the mind...

Matter, sensation, perception formations and consciousness
these all arise from the mind,
these [five] munis are not anything else.

Like a great wishfulfilling gem,

granting the results of desires and goals,
the pure original nature of the true state of the mind
bestows the result, Buddha's awakening

There is no other basis apart from this natural purity of the mind that is inseparable clarity and emptiness. We can call it whatever we want, but still this fact remains. The Lankāvatara rightly observes that tathāgatagarbha is just a name for emptiness and the ālayavijñāna for those afraid of emptiness. Jayānanda writes that ālayavijñāna is the mind that comprehends the basis, i.e. emptiness. How else can the mind be purified of evil conceptual imputations other than by realizing emptiness? Emptiness free from all extremes is the pure original nature of the true state of the mind, so why bother confusing oneself with all kinds of rhetoric? The mind itself has two aspects, emptiness and clarity, ka dag and lhun grub, and these are inseparable. This inseparable clarity and emptiness is called the ālaya in gsar ma and the basis in Nyingma. This also known as tathagatagarbha when it is encased in afflictions, the dharmadhātu from its ultimate side, the ālayavijñāna from its relative side and so on. It really is not that complicated.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 3:42 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

If the whole point of the Buddha's refuting of self only applied to the aggregates for the purpose of clearing the ground to deny a supreme self that is separate from the aggregates, then why is it that in the hundreds of passages when he applies the teachings of non-self to the aggregates he never follows it up by giving a teaching denying a universal self? He could have easily said "Form etc are all impermanent, dukkha, and non-self, but there is no reality beyond them that is permanent, blissful, and actually IS a self"? If the whole point of rejecting the aggregates as self were to deny the true self, then the Buddha must have been horribly inept to not just say so.

Malcolm wrote:

Why would the Buddha negate a self which is wholly unrelated to a person? Such an abstract self bears no need for negation because no thinking person would imagine that there was such a self that was somehow separate from their body or mind. The Buddha would be horribly inept to refute something that was totally without any basis. If the point of the Buddha's teaching was to identify some supreme self, why did he not merely come out and say so? It is not like the Buddha was a cagey gambler who kept his cards close to his chest.

Indeed, in the Sutta Nipatta, the Buddha is reported to have said of arhats, that when someone goes out, attains nirvana, there is nothing left by virtue of which their nonexistence can be discussed.

The continuing abstraction of the ultimate self in Hinduism is just a result of the continued and persistent Buddhist negation of any such entity. There is also the fact that Hindu opponents of Buddhism continually castigate Buddhists for nihilism. How can so many centuries of Buddhists have gotten it so wrong. Why are there no awakened Buddhists returning to tell us how wrong we all have it?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 2:42 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Sherlock said:

At any rate, Padmasambhava and other Buddhists who did live during the time when Advaita was in vogue did in fact refute it.

David Reigle said:

Yes, Śāntarakṣita devoted verses 328-335 of his 3,646 verse Tattvasamgraha to a refutation of Advaita. Well worth reading. He says that their error is slight (alpa), since they accept jñāna only (jñāna-mātra), which is reasonable (yukti), but that their error is in holding jñāna to be permanent (nitya). As we know, jñāna is in Tibetan ye shes. Some of the Tibetan schools, including Dzogchen if I am not mistaken, hold ye shes to be eternal.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, some gzhan stong pas might erroneously hold this view, but it is not the view of Dzogchen. In point of fact, the Rig pa rang shar tantra, one of the most important tantras on Dzogchen explicitly rejects Shankara's views by name, as well as those of Kumarila.

Anyway, the view of Dzogchen is that wisdom arises from prajñā, as the Rig pa rang shar also states:

All phenomena arise from within the self-originated wisdom (prajñā) that is not a phenomenon.

Pristine consciousness (jñāna) arises from that.

To go into how that prajñā self originates is a little beyond our scope, but suffice to say it arises on the basis of a stirring of a vāyu which propels a jñāta which is neutral; and when this jñāta knows its appearances as its own state, it becomes a self-originated prajñā, self-originated because its knowledge of its own state did not come from outside, not because it is something that just pops into existence all of a sudden. And needless to say, if this same jñāta does not recognize its own state, it becomes avidyā.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 2:19 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Sherlock said:

Advaita did not even exist in the time of the Buddha.

They repurposed Buddhist dialectical techniques to re-interpret the Vedas. I know Hindus and Theosophists like to claim there is some actual lineage behind them but this is completely unproven.

At any rate, Padmasambhava and other Buddhists who did live during the time when Advaita was in vogue did in fact refute it.

Why should I take the word of Hindus living in the present day over Padmasambhava's word?

Malcolm wrote:

Or more cogently, Śāntarakṣita, who specifically addressed refutations against Advaita in his Tattvasamgraha. There is also this from the commentary on Bhavaviveka's Madhayamakāridaya, the Tarkajvala.

If it is asked what is difference between this dharmakāya and the paramātmā [bdag pa dam pa] asserted in such ways as nonconceptual, permanent and unchanging, that [paramātmā] they explain as subtle because it possesses the quality of subtlety, is explained as gross because it possesses the quality of grossness, as unique because it possesses the quality of uniqueness and as pervading near and far because it goes everywhere. The dharmakāya on the other hand is neither subtle nor gross, is not unique, is not near and is not far because it is not a possessor of said qualities and because it does not exist in a place.

He then addresses those who advocate puruṣa, pradhana, those who advocate for a creator Brahma, and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 12:59 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

Brahman is...

is the Absolute Consciousness devoid of particularities,

Malcolm wrote:

And this is rejected by Buddhism in toto as a fantasy. Where the term "self" is used in special cases, as I have shown before it is used as nature, not as any kind of absolute entity such as Brahman.

Will said:

Hardly an 'entity' if it is free of upadhis or vehicles. I suspect the word 'Consciousness' is cited - which is not any sort of awareness we can fathom, thus the qualifier 'Absolute'.

Malcolm wrote:

Is it a knower? Or is it inert?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 12:32 AM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

That's a different issue. I'm only wanting to identify this distinction. Tregcho is about exhausted karma and only disappearing into particles. These mahamudra results equate here. Togal has another result. I have no idea who. Can do such a retreat. But if one has such lineage at least there is the future possibility. For those who have such lineage of course should regard this feature highly as most precious.

Malcolm wrote:

Sorry, but this just does not correspond to what I am saying.

Sachen is very clear that at the culmination of the completion stage, the body does not just perish into atoms, it reverts into wisdom light, in terms identical with what it is stated in thögal.

Sachen uses the term "' lus zag med 'od kyi lus ", "the immaculate body, the body of light", actually, and the "the body transforms into the body of wisdom." He says further when discussing the result, "The body of wisdom is adorned with thirty-two major marks and eighty minor marks, and is the sambhogakāya. The nature of that existing as emptiness is the dharmakāya and the various benefits of sentient beings produced from the latter is the nirmanakāya. The single nature of those three is the svabhāvakāya. That is the so- called mahasukhakāya of the mantra system."

Author: Malcolm

Date: Friday, May 8th, 2015 at 12:06 AM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

Brahman is...

is the Absolute Consciousness devoid of particularities,

Malcolm wrote:

And this is rejected by Buddhism in toto as a fantasy. Where the term "self" used in special cases, as I have shown before it is used as nature, not as any kind of absolute entity such as Brahman.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 11:59 PM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Whatever happened to the result of two stages and mahamudra are only equal to tregcho and togal goes beyond that? ChNN holds to that. I asked him about the result of Vajrayogini and the body disappearing. He said that's from the exhaustion of karma. He was implying no rainbow body of great transference happens there. Not that we are going that far but at least we should be clear about it.

Malcolm wrote:

No one ever said that the result of Mahāmudra is only equal to tregchö.

There are two approaches to rainbow body. Both involve exhausting the karma of the elements in the body, that is all rainbow body is, whether via the new Tantras or the old.

We have fantasies for eons about which one is faster, but as far as I know, they both take a lot of practice. To achieve rainbow body via thogal an average practitioner will have to go into strict retreat for 12 years, or so the texts say. So, who among us is going to do that?

It does get to the point where people have to either put up or shut up. Otherwise, it is like arguing about who should have won the 1939 world series.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

But my mind is a blank now when it comes to finding in a Mahayana sutra a refutation of paramatman (not atman); surely there are such?

David Reigle said:

I have just checked the large Sanskrit-Tibetan Dictionary by Lokesh Chandra. It gives paramātma as Tibetan mchog bdag, which one must look up in his 19-volume Tibetan-Sanskrit Dictionary to find the references. There, in the Supplement volumes, it gives as reference the Amarakośa, and only that. This does not help us at all, since this book gives lists of words, and served as a dictionary. I then checked the 16-volume Negi Tibetan-Sanskrit Dictionary, which gives only the same reference to the Amarakośa. Between the two multi-volume Tibetan-Sanskrit dictionaries, a large number of Buddhist texts are covered, but far from all.

I then did a search on all five of the GRETIL files of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā, covering the entire Sanskrit text of the 25,000 line Perfection of Wisdom. The word paramātma does not occur in it. Nor does it occur in the 8,000 line version. Nor in the portions of the 100,000 line version that have so far been input.

It may be that we have to use references to brahman, as Dzogchungpa suggested.

Will said:

Do not want to jump to conclusions, but with no sutra refutation yet found and the only uses are in two of the Maitreyan shastras, and those are not criticisms but positive uses... seems very odd to me.

Malcolm wrote:

They are not positive uses. They do not occur in the Uttarantra itself. Asanga basically states that "supreme self" is the negation of the extremes of self proposed by tīrthikas (meaning all of them) and the nonself proposed by the śravakas.

Some people seem to have this strange idea that when Buddhists refute tīrthikas, somehow there is a special class of tīrthikas that are excluded from this thorough refutation — as if Buddhists were not somehow aware of the Upanishads, the Brahma Sutras and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 11:31 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Matt J said:

I think Leigh Brasington makes a good argument that the Buddha was familiar with, and rejected the Atman here:

http://www.leighb.com/ud1_10.htm

He compares the Bahiya Sutta with the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad.

Compare:

'In the seen will be merely what is seen; in the heard will be merely what is heard; in the sensed will be merely what is sensed; in the cognized will be merely what is cognized.' In this way you should train yourself, Bahiya.

With:

"The unseen seer, the unheard hearer, the unthought thinker, the uncognized cognizer... There is no other seer but he, no other hearer, no other thinker, no other cognizer. This is thy self, the inner controller, the immortal...." Brhadaranyaka Upanishad 3.7.23.

Malcolm wrote:

Right....we have: the latter proposes a unified permanent agent, the former does not.

You have to understand that the criticism in the Yoga Sūtra about those yogis who become caught up in prakṛti is referring precisely to Buddhist yogis.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 11:02 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

But my mind is a blank now when it comes to finding in a Mahayana sutra a refutation of paramatman (not atman); surely there are such?

David Reigle said:

I have just checked the large Sanskrit-Tibetan Dictionary by Lokesh Chandra. It gives paramātmā as Tibetan mchog bdag, which one must look up in his 19-volume Tibetan-Sanskrit Dictionary to find the references.

Malcolm wrote:

In the Tibetan translation of the Uttaratantra commentary by Asanga, paramātmā is translated as dam pa'i bdag, but it only occurs there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 9:25 PM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

It's funny bc I've saying for years that all these paradigms are malleable and that sarma has everything DC has. They just keep it in the oral tradition. Malcolm would be on his DC superiority kick.

One point stands out from this era that still registers with me as supremely useful for us Westerners who are very very intelligent we just have heavy burdens and no time. We need some way to accelerate if we can. Why? Not for cool points. We need help and it has to work at work. And work here is serious. Mistakes can land you in court.

Longchenpa explains how the clear light yoga of nyingthig makes use of only the central channel which is pure and does not gather winds from chakras but leaves them to dissipate in their own place thus reducing the danger of jacking up the intensity of emotions which is a big danger with methods dealing with the chakras. So he successfully isolates the precise point that distinguishes nyingthig.

So rainbows and evaporating cadavers aside, this method give someone a chance to experience the clear light innate Buddha within without having to do a complicated sadhana, one, and, two, without creating dangerous obstacles related to loud emotional energy. Of course obstacle come up like diseases and such, and the anuyoga yidams related with DC help a lot for that.

Sure from a scholar's or realized person's standpoint this or that round up to the same thing. But from a practitioner standpoint especially a beginner, knowing ahead of time that some two step method will crank up the anxiety level might help them decide "hey in my line of work I can't have that," and what a godsend a method that doesn't is.

Maybe on this board it sounds cool to wax poetical but folks need to go off board and go outside more. Interact with folks while engaging the teachings and see how folks react to you. See how you react with them. That's the pudding where the proof is. Do they like you, feel comfortable around you? Can you set someone at ease? Can you be kind? If not don't feel bad abt it just ganapuja, Vajrasattva, go to an empowerment, you know refresh the blessings and try again. If you are lucky enough to meet a DC master then you have a great opportunity to put an end to anxiety, depression, weakness, etc.

At least for me the two stage stuff did jack up me emotions. The teacher said this was a blessing and had me examining my feeling in the moment. This made me jumpy. It hurt my performance at work a lot. But somehow the lineage kept me blessed. I won awards and business was great. But I didn't feel right. I started following DC teachers and that helped some. But it was so hard like Malcolm said to sort out which scheme to follow. There are so many. In the meantime we got six yogas of Naropa from a higher master and the tummo thing began to work to help deep relaxation instead of jumpy. So for a while I was at a loss which was working. I took time off from sarma kinda went back to my feral state and that's when Guhyagarbha began a year of all DC. This helped to distinguish.

So if you get a DC empowerment, reading transmission and the experiences are clearly explained with a good translator, you definitely can practice in that style and it will help. That is a big if bc these things are very rare, and rarer and rarer still are all these elements together.

Malcolm wrote:

The point is, that when we are the bee stage, each flower we visit is better than the last one.

When we are done collecting pollen, we look at the whole field of flowers and realize, they are all flowers and they all have pollen. Then we may decide, we like the taste of the red flowers more than the blue flowers, whatever, but it is all pollen just the same, it all makes honey.

As far as your experience goes Paul, you have been in for 10 years now. Wait till you hit the 25 year mark. I think you will find that your attitude towards things will have changed.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 9:19 PM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

He also disparages Nyingma and makes it seem right the silver tongue of a devil. This after forever proclaiming DC utter superiority. Oh well.

Malcolm wrote:

I did not disparage Nyingma, I just pointed out what is obvious to anyone who spends time reading Dzogchen tantras, i.e., that Dzogchen tantras themselves spends reams of paper criticizing lower yanas, and then successively, upper levels of ati criticize the lower levels of ati yoga until we get to yangti, where it seems that the triumphalism peters out since there is nothing else to say. Well, that is until some westerner invents:

Ati lite™ New and Improved! With more flavors than ever!

Then you wind up like some people do (not referring to anyone here), not doing anything at all because they think Dzogchen is not about doing anything, lost in a net of proliferation.

If we are honest with ourselves, we will recognize that the likely hood of any of us attaining the ultimate fruits of any of these systems that we hold up as the bee's knees in this lifetime is very small. Maybe some of us will attain realization in the bardo. But rainbow body? In this life? Among we here who are posting now? I don't think so. And that is not a criticism of any lineage. So you have to take my criticisms for what they are, antidotes to what I perceive as rhetorical excesses. Have I committed my own fair share? Of course, its the internet. I understand the impulse to praise what one is into. Are Dzogchen teachings amazing? Sure. Is Lamdre amazing? Sure. Is Naro Chodrug amazing? Absolutely, Sadanga yoga and Kalacakra? Of course, etc., etc.

For this reason, it is a little strange to say that oh this teachings is more experiential than that teaching. All teachings are experiential, as are all empowerments.

As far as obstacles go, well, Virupa's advice is to take the obstacles as the attainments, and the faults as the qualities. This of course does not mean that we should be crazy people.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 6:30 AM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

Yes, if you're not a Buddha. If you are a superior being in meditative equipoise on emptiness, there are no conventional appearances at all, only emptiness. Buddha says this in the Heart Sutra when he says "there is no form, no feeling, no discrimination, no compositional factors, no consciousness".

tomamundsen said:

That's not at all how I interpret that passage. Also, it was Avalokiteshvara, not Shakyamuni. It's a statement about ultimate truth, doesn't specify about apperances.

Malcolm wrote:

Avalokiteśvara was speaking through the power of the Buddha's samadhi.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

He did Guru Dragpo instead. Maybe next time. I'm pretty sure the GGT was complete. we got those complete instructions. I like to work on the full ganachakra puja there. But I'm in a place I try to work on GY and trecho. I'm a DC dog.

Malcolm wrote:

GGT?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 6:29 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Spoken like a true sarma.

Malcolm wrote:

I have come to the point where I really do not see any lineage as being better than any other. It is not about the lineage, it is about the practitioner.

Give a dog Dzogchen introduction and he will still be a dog. He may be a "Dzogchen" dog, but he will still bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks. Give him Mahamudra instruction, and he may be a "Mahamudra" dog, but he will still bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks., etc.

People talk about their lineages all the time, "I have this powerful teachings, it is so fast, it is so quick, it is so deep, it is so x...", but if at the end of the day they behave like schmucks, so what? I know so many people who have received every level of Dzogchen teaching, and they have not changed one little bit. They still behave like immature children, doing nothing but causing themselves and others headaches and trouble. I know people who only recite the mani, and watch them grow nicer and more mature everyday. I see many people posturing in their tantric garb, very elegant, who have no concentration and less mantra power, who become angry over the smallest slight, accusing everyone who disagrees with them of being samaya breakers.

I think in this day and age, focusing on blessings as a substitute for practice is disease we've contracted from Tibetans, so naturally no blessing arise from our practice. I think that in this day and age substituting devotion for understanding is a disease we have contracted from Tibetans, so naturally no understanding arises from our devotion. In reality blessings arise from practice, and devotion arises from understanding, not the other way around.

Really, we live in degenerate times.

Crazywisdom said:

Yeah. I can get with some of this. Some of these criticisms definitely apply to me also. I've also seen the simple type people like mani practitioners being way better than others. But also some of these methods stir up problems. So maybe they don't behave so nice but maybe that's a phase that has to happen. I never met someone without obstacles. The folks I see dedicating a lot of time have the loudest obstacles. I also see we Westerners loving to posture in all sorts of ways. Besides how are we supposed to know someone's obstacle from some blessing? Tantra has a madness element in its approach. Being nice and being good are two different things. I learned that from Disney Buddha. Most people crocosmile while secretly planning to subvert you. And at least a Dzogchen dog has an auspicious connection. That's one lucky dog. I am a very lucky Dzogchen Dog. And these degenerate times are too lucky, these tantric methods work even better due to commitments of Buddhas. Obstacles are lucky opportunity to gain vast merit dancing in the view. So all is so well as always.

Malcolm wrote:

Vajrayāna is not an excuse to play out one's complexes on others, obstacles or not. But in our culture we externalize everything, we feel too much — we have gone to the other extreme. Too much is about our feelings. The rising heights of food narcissism in our country is an example of this (GF, NF, SF, Vegan, Paleo etc. it's crazy).

In my opinion, people over play the "madness" element in Vajrayāna, not understanding the different levels of the path and when it is appropriate to engage in this or that conduct and when it is not. Conduct is a reflection of realization, not obstacles. There is a vast difference between someone who is merely behaving like Vajryāna hot mess and someone's whose conduct is a result realizing heat....

anyway....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 6:21 AM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Luckily the VK wang came. This practice is so precious.

Malcolm wrote:

Try, if you can, to receive the lower activities empowerment someday. You only received the upper activities.

Crazywisdom said:
I hope so. How would I know?

Malcolm wrote:
The lower activities empowerment is an extra day.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 6:21 AM
Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism
Content:

Malcolm wrote:
I have come to the point where I really do not see any lineage as being better than any other. It is not about the lineage, it is about the practitioner.

Give a dog Dzogchen introduction and he will still be a dog. He may be a "Dzogchen" dog, but he will still bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks. Give him Mahamudra instruction, and he may be a "Mahamudra" dog, but he will still bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks., etc.

dzogchungpa said:
I wonder how a "Hindu" dog would behave?

Malcolm wrote:
...bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks...

Author: Malcolm
Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 3:39 AM
Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism
Content:
Crazywisdom said:
Spoken like a true sarma.

Malcolm wrote:
I have come to the point where I really do not see any lineage as being better than any other. It is not about the lineage, it is about the practitioner.

Give a dog Dzogchen introduction and he will still be a dog. He may be a "Dzogchen" dog, but he will still bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks. Give him Mahamudra instruction, and he may be a "Mahamudra" dog, but he will still bark, pee on fire hydrants, chase cats and fetch sticks., etc.

People talk about their lineages all the time, "I have this powerful teachings, it is so fast, it is so quick, it is so deep, it is so x...", but if at the end of the day they behave like schmucks, so what? I know so many people who have received every level of Dzogchen teaching, and they have not changed one little bit. They still behave like immature children, doing nothing but causing themselves and others headaches and trouble. I know people who only recite the mani, and watch them grow nicer and more mature everyday. I see many people posturing in their tantric garb, very elegant, who have no concentration and less mantra power, who become angry over the smallest slight, accusing everyone who disagrees with them of being samaya breakers.

I think in this day and age, focusing on blessings as a substitute for practice is disease we've contracted from Tibetans, so naturally no blessing arise from our practice. I think that in this day and age substituting devotion for understanding is a disease we have contracted from Tibetans, so naturally no understanding arises from our devotion. In reality blessings arise from practice, and devotion arises from understanding, not the other way around.

Really, we live in degenerate times.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 1:11 AM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

smcj said:

The "empty-of-other" paradigm is used in post meditational discussion.

Malcolm wrote:

Then why claim the difference is experiential?

smcj said:

In terms of approach to meditation, the two differ between relying on intellect and relying on faith.

Malcolm wrote:

Nonsense. You belittle everyone when you make such claims.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 1:10 AM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

conebeckham said:

but if one creates a conceptual "image" of emptiness... this is not meditation

Malcolm wrote:

Correct, no one asserts that it is...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Thursday, May 7th, 2015 at 12:30 AM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

smcj said:

HHDL: There is a tradition of making a distinction between two different perspectives on the nature of emptiness: one is when emptiness is presented within a philosophical analysis of the ultimate reality of things, in which case it ought to be understood in terms of a non-affirming negative phenomena. On the other hand, when it is discussed from the point of view of experience, it should be understood more in terms of an affirming negation.

Here HHDL is rephrasing the Shentong position on how Madhyamaka is for talking about emptiness from an intellectual perspective, and Shentong from an experiential perspective. I'm sure he is aware of all the types of objections you raise, but if HHDL-- a Gelugpa --is ok with it, that's good enough for me.

Malcolm wrote:

Gzhan stong pas assert that in equipoise there is no difference in how they and so called rang stong pas meditate, so claiming there is a difference via vie experience is just lip service to make the gzhan stong pas feel validated. HHDL is a nice person, he wants everyone to feel good.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 10:49 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

Assertions are not thought.

Make you a deal Malcolm. I will apologize for presuming you have not read the book, if you will also apologize for presuming you understand his book based on a few excerpts & comments by those who have read it.

Malcolm wrote:

Will, you posted a plethora of his articles, which I have had a chance to review. I am telling you, his arguments are just wishful thinking.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Religious background and eternalism

Content:

Sherlock said:

I am curious how the religious background of people affects what views they have.

I was always nominally a Buddhist, but my parents weren't very serious, I do not have eternalist views.

Malcolm wrote:

I can't answer your poll — you missed one option "raised without religion at all, became a Buddhist."

I did not convert from anything.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 10:29 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If selflessness is demonstrated, the immature grasp to the explanation thinking there is no self. The intelligent on the other hand think "The [self] exists conventionally, there is no doubt."

-- Nirvana Sūtra

Hardly a ringing endorsement for Bhattacharya's views.

Will said:

A view which you do not understand. Since you have not read the book, that is understandable.

Malcolm wrote:

I do understand his view.

His view is not different than that of many people in the past who have tried to argue that Buddha was not refuting the pre-Buddhist Upanishadic view of atman. He uses the same arguments, use the same citations (incorrectly) and has the same set of misunderstandings because, in the end, he is not a Dharma practitioner, he is a Hindu scholar trying to reconcile what the Buddha explicitly teaches with what he wants to believe.

He presents not one single decisive argument.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 10:12 PM

Title: Re: Universal Atman in Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

If selflessness is demonstrated, the immature grasp to the explanation thinking there is no self. The intelligent on the other hand think "The [self] exists conventionally, there is no doubt."

-- Nirvana Sūtra

Hardly a ringing endorsement for Bhattacharya's views.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 9:28 PM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

smcj said:

Well Dolpopa and Kongtrul both comment on Maitreya/Asanga's "Uttaratantra" from a Shentong perspective. In fact they base much of their view on it, so there's no consensus on that.

Malcolm wrote:

Actually, no — Dolpbupa's commentary on the Uttaratantra is surprisingly tepid and not at all novel. Kongtrul's commentary largely just follows Rongton's.

smcj said:

Yep, that's right. Square pegs don't fit into round holes.

Malcolm wrote:

Yet, it is exactly this mapping that exposes gzhan stong to most of the criticism it receives; it is their deformation of Madhyamaka that is the problem. They want to be Madhyamakas, but they also want to use the three own natures in their presentation of the two truths. So they twist both Madhyamaka and Yogacara in ways that are just not justifiable.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 9:03 PM

Title: Re: Do you believe that love is "samsaric"?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Yeah love characterized by compassion is the foundation to bodhichitta which is the wish to help beings awaken followed up by actions according to the six paramitas.

Malcolm wrote:

Indeed, however, as Dharmakirti observes, love and compassion by themselves do not have the force to burn away afflictions and so on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 8:49 PM

Title: Re: Do you believe that love is "samsaric"?

Content:

boda said:

I discovered yesterday that some Buddhists make distinctions between what they believe is "samsaric," and what they believe is something else, something not samsaric. Some believe that love, of all things, is samsaric.

I don't understand how it makes any sense at all to make such distinctions. If anything it seems to me that making such distinctions is "samsaric."

Any thoughts about this?

Do you believe that love is "samsaric"?

Malcolm wrote:

Love, from a Buddhist point of view, is the wish that someone be happy and have the virtuous causes of happiness. But love does not have the power to lift another out of samsara, or even oneself, and so while it is an important and necessary thing for Buddhists to cultivate, it is not sufficient as a path.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 8:41 PM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

Sherlock said:

OK, I see, thanks.

So how are the 2 truths presented in gzhan stong? Is it similar to Nyingma 9-yana system?

Malcolm wrote:

The three own natures are mapped onto the two truths in the following way:

Ultimate truth = the perfected nature (parinispanna)

Correct relative truth = the dependent nature (paratantra)

False relative truth = the imagined nature (parikalpita)

Ultimate truth, parinispanna, is held to be empty of the dependent and the relative. According to this system in general, whatever is held to be ultimate is unconditioned, permanent and so on, and is empty of the conditioned, impermanent and so on.

So, it is a very dualistic perspective in many regards, positing all kinds of dualisms such as empty/not-empty; impermanent/permanent; conditioned/unconditioned; and so on.

In reality, according to the Maitreya, Asanga and Vasubandhu's treatises, the perfected nature is merely the absence of the imagined in the dependent nature. So, the two truths theory does not really work well if you try to map it to the three own natures as they are explained by the three great Yogacara masters.

If you understand the dependent nature as the union of the two truths — in this case the imagined is the relative truth; the perfected, the ultimate truth; which corresponds to Candrakirti's observation that all things bear two natures, one relative, one ultimate. However, there is no classical presentation like this anywhere, AFAIK, and definitely not within gzhan stong.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 8:24 PM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

LastLegend said:

I have never met any dharmakaya in my life.

Malcolm wrote:

You never met the Buddha either, is it is not surprising.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 8:19 PM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

Sherlock said:

Why is rang stong said to err towards nihilism? I don't get this common remark by gzhan stong pas. Rang stong is actually a realist position, they only limit their emptiness to svabhavas, very similar to Sautrantikas, so it is very confusing to see them claim to be Prasangika.

Also I always found this terminology of translating inherent existence or some other variant very confusing until I learned that it was just svabhava/rang bzhin. Using the Sanskrit really makes everything clearer.

Malcolm wrote:

Well, first of all, Gelugpas are not rang stong pas, even Khedrupje rejects this appellation for their view and heaps ridicule on it.

Second of all, the reason why Gelug view leans towards nihilism is the insistence that ultimate is merely "the emptiness that is the absence of true existence in things". Hence they assert the ultimate is a mere nonexistence, and that leans towards ucchedavada.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 7:55 PM
Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas
Content:
Tsongkhapafan said:
Buddhahood is not truly existent either.

LastLegend said:
Namo Amitabha. Who is Shakymuni then?

Malcolm wrote:
An illusory emanation of the dharmakāya, what else?

Author: Malcolm
Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 7:53 PM
Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas
Content:
smcj said:
Anyway it's not as if Shentong is completely absent from Sakya. Deshung R. was a very important Sakyapa. I think Malcolm personally just doesn't like it because it's too close to Hinduism, and that freaks him out.

Malcolm wrote:
Nope, gzhan stong is not completely absent from Sakya. However, there are important differences between the gzhan stong of Shakya Chogden and the gzhan stong of Dolbupa. These have been summarized in a short text by Taranatha.

The long and short of it is that Shakya Chogden considered wisdom relative and conditioned, among many other things. Shakya Chogden's main aim, at least one point in his long and varied career (he shifted his views many times and is therefore perhaps the most interesting Sakya scholar of the classical period) was to show that all the treatises of Maitreya were definitive and not in contradiction with Madhyamaka.

However, in general within Sakya the view of gzhan stong is generally considered to be incompatible with the practice of Lamdre since the notion that the ultimate is empty of the relative, with the former truly existing and the latter not existing at all, is incompatible with the view of the inseparability of samsara and nirvana; the view of gzhan stong is considered to be a misinterpretation of the doctrines of the Yogacara school (this is a point of view shared with Tsongkhapa); the view of gzhan stong is considered to lean toward the extreme of existence, just as Tsongkhapa's views are considered to be lean toward the view of nonexistence.

Now then, gzhan stong scholars in Tibet don't freak me out at all; then there are westerners who have naively jumped on the gzhan stong bandwagon who often proclaim a view of Buddhahood that is really indistinguishable from how Hindus conceive of brahmin because these people do not know how to understand words like permanent, stable and unchanging. These people don't freak me out either, I just feel they have been very misled by what has been up till now very poor scholarship on the subject.

That has changed, but still, when we talk about this issue, rather than talk about what is actually a unique feature of gzhan stong teachings, the way in which they present the two truths, people would rather talk about infinite unconditioned qualities of tathāgatagarbha, as if that was really the issue at stake. It isn't really the issue.

As the Buddha said in the Nirvana Sūtra above:

If it is explained "tathagatagarbha is empty." The immature cultivate the dread of annihilation. The intelligent know that permanence, stability and immutability exists as a mere illusion.

People could start, for example, by understanding the Buddha, Maitreya, Asanga, and so on were not gzhan stong pas.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 9:05 AM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

smcj said:

The problem with gzhan stong is the idea that these infinite wonderful qualities are somehow truly existent and not themselves empty (among other things)

So "these infinite wonderful qualities" are fiction? Or are they non-fiction? If fiction, they are like Santa Claus or the Easter Bunny. If non-fiction, they have soteriological capacity and validity.

If they are non-fiction, which I believe them to be, then obviously it can easily be said that they are "empty of anything other than their own qualities". The English "existent", as I've said before, is misleading and I think inappropriate as it suggests something manifest or material. Obviously that is not the case. Going to my thesaurus, I propose as alternates: genuine, authentic, valid, true, unmistakable, actual, and non-fiction. If someone else has a better thesaurus I'm open to more terms.

Malcolm wrote:

Did you read the sutra citation?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 6:53 AM

Title: Re: Kagyupas are (mostly) Shentongpas

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

The problem with gzhan stong really is not the idea that tathāgatagarbha is empty of adventitious afflictions. The problem with gzhan stong is the idea that these infinite wonderful qualities are somehow truly existent and not themselves empty (among other

things0

The emptiness of other, the emptiness that is not empty, as the Nirvana sutra puts it, is not the profound emptiness of freedom from extremes. It is not more profound than the emptiness taught in the Cullasuññata sutta where the Buddha says a village is empty of a city because the people are not there. etc. Also the Buddha repeats this emptiness example in the Nirvana Sutra.

However the Buddha also teaches profound emptiness in the Nirvana Sutra (Sanskrit recension translated into Tibetan). It is important to know the difference between the trivial emptiness of the so called affirming negation the emptiness of free of extremes. One must know that the teaching of the Buddha is "this is the middle way." The Bhagavān Buddha teaches the path as the middle way that is free from the extremes of permanence and annihilation. Some fools however, confused about the Buddha's teaching, like those with weak digestive heat who consume butter, quickly come to have views about the two extremes. Though existence is not established, also nonexistence is not established.

For example, just as when the elements of pitta and so on become disturbed and have mutual conflicts, doctors pacify pitta for the illness of pitta, remove vata when vata predominates, eliminate kapha in those with kapha, and apply combination remedies for those with combination disorders. Without causing mutual conflicts also the happiness [of the patient] improves. Like a doctor, infinite illnesses of afflictions are removed by extremes and perfect health is restored.

So called "perfect health" is the tathāgatagarbha, i.e. the so called "buddhadhātu", but it is free from all [other] dhātus, being permanent, stable and persistent. Though the intelligent are not attached to existence, also so called "nonexistence" arises from telling lies. Silent about called "existence," they also do not make it into a premise. They also do not dispute it. These are to be understood as natural dharmatā.

Fools who do not understand words, "While the seed of happiness exists in my body, this conflicts with permanence because suffering is shown." Grasping everything, these immature ones think "my body is not stable." If impermanence is explained, the immature think it is like a pot made by a potter. Since the intelligent on the other hand think "The seed of dharmakāya exists in my body," they do not grasp to everything. If selflessness is demonstrated, the immature grasp to the explanation thinking there is no self. The intelligent on the other hand think "The [self] exists conventionally, there is no doubt. If it is explained "tathagatagarbha is empty." The immature cultivate the dread of annihilation. The intelligent know that permanence, stability and immutability exists as a mere illusion.

158/a—159/a Lhasa edition

So here in the Nirvana Sutra we can clearly see that the Buddha refers to permanence, stability and immutability as being illusory. What does it mean to be illusory? Not real, but apparent. The Buddha continues:

When liberation is demonstrated, the immature grasp the thought, after the Buddhas are liberated, they become nonexistent. The intelligent know that the Buddha has come and the Buddha has gone, and say "The lion of humans arrived." The immature grasp ignorance conditioning formation as a duality. The intelligent understand there is no difference between ignorance and knowledge, they are nondual. The immature grasp consciousness conditioned formation as a duality. The intelligent know that there is no difference between the formation and the absence of formations, they are nondual. Likewise, the immature grasp all virtue and nonvirtue as two different things. The intelligent understand them as nondual...the immature cultivate the idea that in the tathāgatagarbha, everything conditioned is impermanent. The intelligent understand this as nondual. That is the nature of the intelligent. The immature grasp all phenomena as nonself in Buddha's explanation of nonself. The intelligent understand that "self exists" and "there is no-self" are nondual, that is the nature of the intelligent. The tathāgatagarbha praised by buddhas beyond measure was explained by me in the Sarvaṇya-samuccaya sūtra, in which it is held that the "self exists" and "the self does not exist" are nondual.

Son of a good family, in the appearance of entering into the nonduality in the Sarvaṇya-samuccaya sūtra and the great Prajñāpāramita sūtra, I have explained the "self exists" and "the self does not exist" as nondual, remember this!"

159/a —160/a

So, here the main point is not to get hung up on the words, permanent, stable, immutable, which are just illusions, nor should one get hung up on self and nonself, knowing that self is just a convention. All in all, pretty standard Buddhist fare.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Then, what exists appearing to be things

And their non-existence, pure being, emptiness

Are essentially inseparable, one taste

Malcolm wrote:

This term is dharmatā, chos nyid, translating it as pure being is very wrong as there is no dharmatā without a dharmin.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 3:51 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Buddhahood is unconditioned because the trio of arising, abiding and perishing are false. Not because in contrast to things that arise, abide and perish, buddhahood does not arise, abide and perish.

Buddhahood however has a cause

tomamundsen said:

This appears to be contradictory. First you negate causation and then you posit a cause.

Malcolm wrote:

"False" mere simply means relative, also the attainment of buddhahood is relative since it is result of realizing the falsity of arising, abiding and ceasing, etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 2:56 AM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Luckily the VK wang came. This practice is so precious.

Malcolm wrote:

Try, if you can, to receive the lower activities empowerment someday. You only received the upper activities.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 2:54 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

I have. I'm referring to the way it is presented. For example the 3rd requires a consort. That don't happen at the ceremony. What happens is simulacrum. Of course due to the blessing of the lineage one can connect directly with the teachers state in the 4th. In Rigpa'i tsal wang it is describes what the light is about. In mahayoga or Anu it is presented but not fully explained. It's this subtlety of explanation that makes it special in Nyingma. I know hardly anyone gets anything. That's karma. But some do. So that's what matters for the lineage. BTW HHST gave a perfect wang in Richmond. In a Kagyu-Nyingma-Sakya-Bonpo aka Vajrayanist.

Malcolm wrote:

Empowerments are related to practices. And there are all kinds of rig pa'i tshal dbangs, from ones that just hold up one to two items to those that give full fledged explanations of various aspects of the path [the kind you are talking about]. So it is really not enough to say "Oh, the rig pa'i tshal dbang is the best thing since sliced bread." You have to be very specific. There are lots of rig pa'i tshal dbang that are no different than the fourth in brevity.

Of course the GZT goes all out, is like a kitchen sink of dbangs, elaborate, unelaborate, very unelaborate, extremely unelaborate, and it does not stop there, I know since I was at the one in Virginia, but...dbangs are one thing, practice is another.

(And, while I am getting every closer to putting out the Vimalamitra book, there are reams of stuff yet to edit and publish from the GZT.)

Frankly, in my opinion, claiming that this thing and that thing is more profound than this and that is a bit of an error. For example, where you aware that in Kālacakra there is an outer four empowerments, an inner four empowerments and so on? Or that in Lamdre there are many empowerments, not just a few, so in reality, when you make the claims that you do, you cheapen Nyingma by falsely elevating it.

Nyingmapas like to claim their teachings as the highest thing on Buddha's green earth, but when you get right down to it, it is all just a complicated mess of ever conflicting systems, with each "higher" level saying the last one is shit. It is really a lot of proliferation and I have studied it and practiced it in detail for 20 years now.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Wednesday, May 6th, 2015 at 2:28 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

If you say that Tathagatagarbha does not exist primordially, somehow, in the continuua of sentient beings, you are saying Buddhahood is caused, and therefore "conditioned."

Malcolm wrote:

The Uttaratantra states:

Unconditioned, effortless,
not realized through other conditions,
endowed with wisdom, compassion and power,
buddhahood is endowed with two benefits.
But what does this really all mean?

When we examine Asanga's comments on this, he states:

When these are summarized, buddhahood is described with eight qualities. If it is asked what those eight qualities are, they are unconditioned, effortless, not realized through other conditions, wisdom, compassion, power, the abundance of one's own benefit and the abundance of others' benefit. [Buddhahood] is unconditioned because it is the nature of lacking a beginning, middle and end. It is called "effortless" because peace is endowed with the dharmakāya. It is not realized through other conditions because each person must realize it for themselves. It is wisdom because those three things are realized. [Buddhahood] is compassionate because [the Buddha] shows the path. It is powerful because it is free from suffering and affliction. The former three [unconditioned, effortless and not realized through other conditions] are for one's own benefit; the latter three [wisdom, compassion and power] are for others' benefit.

In that regard, the conditioned is fully understood as arising somewhere, and also understood as abiding and perishing. Because those do not exist [arising, abiding and perishing], buddhahood itself is unconditioned without a beginning, middle and an end. This is seen as a differentiation made through the dharmakāya. Because all proliferation and concepts are pacified, [buddhahood] is effortless [lhun gyis grub]. Buddhahood is not realized through other conditions because it is realized through wisdom oneself produced. Here, udayo [to produce] is not the arising of a desire for realization. As such, the tathāgata is unconditioned due to the truth, out of the characteristics of non-engagement, all the activities of the buddha effortlessly engaged in without impediment and without interruption for as long as samsara exists
So let us parse this out a little bit.

Asanga states in his commentary on the Uttaratantra:

...the conditioned is understood as arising somewhere, and also understood as abiding and perishing. Because those do not exist [arising, abiding and perishing], buddhahood itself is unconditioned without a beginning, middle and an end.

Buddhahood is unconditioned because the trio of arising, abiding and perishing are false. Not because in contrast to things that arise, abide and perish, buddhahood does not arise, abide and perish.

Buddhahood however has a cause, as he writes:

Buddhahood is not realized through other conditions because it is realized through wisdom oneself produced.

Buddhahood is also effortless, because, as he writes:

...all proliferation and concepts are pacified, [buddhahood] is effortless [lhun gyis grub]...As such, the tathāgata is unconditioned due to the truth; and from the characteristics of non-engagement, all the activities of the buddha are engaged in effortlessly [lhun grub], without impediment and without interruption for as long as samsara exists

As for tathāgatagarbha always existing in the continuums of sentient beings; if you think somehow tathāgatagarbha is something other than or different than a sentient beings mind, there there is a fallacy of the tathāgatagarbha being something like an atman. But there is no atman in the tathāgatagarbha theory, not really. the supreme self, (paramātmā) is explained very clearly in the Uttaratantra:

The supreme self is the pacification of the proliferations of self and and nonself.

But what does this mean? Asanga adds:

The perfection of self (ātmapāramitā) is known through two reasons: due to being free from proliferation of a self because of being free from the extreme of the non-buddhists and due to being free from the proliferation of nonself because of giving up the extreme of the śrāvakas.

He explains further:

From cultivating prajñāpāramita in order to turn away from seeing the five addictive aggregates as self, the non-existent self in which the others, the nonbuddhists, delight,

one attains the result, the perfection of self. In this way all the others, the nonbuddhists, accept natureless things such as matter and so on as a self due to their being deceived by a characteristic of a self according to how those things are being apprehended, but that self never existed.

The Tathāgata, on the other hand, has attained the supreme perfection of the selflessness of all phenomena through the wisdom that is in accord with just how things truly are, and though there is no self according to how he sees things, he asserts a self all the time because he is never deceived by the characteristic of a self that does not exist. Making the selfless into a self is like saying "abiding through the mode of nonabiding.

There are some people who, ignoring the Nirvana Sutra's admonition to rely on the meaning rather than on the words, fall headlong into eternalism, unable to parse the Buddha's profound meaning through addiction to naive literalism.

Tathagatagarbha is just a potential to become a buddha. When we say it is has infinite qualities, this is nothing more nor less than when the Vajrapañjara praises the so called "jewel-like mind":

The jewel-like mind is tainted with evil conceptual imputations;
but when the mind is purified it becomes pure.

Just as space cannot be destroyed,
just as is space, so too is the mind.

By activating the jewel-like mind
and meditating on the mind itself, there is the stage of buddhahood,
and in this life there will be sublime buddhahood.

There is no buddha nor a person
outside of the jewel-like mind,
the abode of consciousness is ultimate,
outside of which there isn't the slightest thing.

All buddhahood is through the mind...

Matter, sensation, perception formations and consciousness
these all arise from the mind,
these [five] munis are not anything else.

Like a great wishfulfilling gem,
granting the results of desires and goals,
the pure original nature of the true state of the mind
bestows the result, Buddha's awakening

There is no other basis apart from this natural purity of the mind that is inseparable clarity and emptiness. We can call it whatever we want, but still this fact remains. The Lankāvatara rightly observes that tathāgatagarbha is just a name for emptiness and the ālayavijñāna for those afraid of emptiness. Jayānanda writes that ālayavijñāna is the mind that comprehends the basis, i.e. emptiness. How else can the mind be purified of evil conceptual imputations other than by realizing emptiness? Emptiness free from all extremes is the pure original nature of the true state of the mind, so why bother confusing oneself with all kinds of rhetoric? The mind itself has two aspects, emptiness and clarity, ka dag and lhun grub, and these are inseparable. This inseparable clarity and emptiness is called the ālaya in gsar ma and the basis in Nyingma. This also known as tathagatagarbha when it encased in afflictions, the dharmadhātu from its ultimate side, the ālayavijñāna from its relative side and so on. It really is not that complicated.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 9:48 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

What I found helpful about Nyingma is the way they are able to combine experience with empowerments, transmissions and explanation.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone does that. It is not a unique Nyingma thing.

Crazywisdom said:

They do it better. Rigpa'i tsal wang is a direct experience. The four initiations are imaginary.

Malcolm wrote:

Then you have never properly received the four empowerments...on the other hand, the more empowerments you receive, the better you become at receiving them. Its a practice, not a gateway. This applies equally to the famed rig pa'i tshal dbang. Most people who receive it the first time have no clue what is going on.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

What I found helpful about Nyingma is the way they are able to combine experience with empowerments, transmissions and explanation.

Malcolm wrote:

Everyone does that. It is not a unique Nyingma thing.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 9:26 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

But this system is just endless proliferation that never end, ati of anu of maha, maha of ati of anu....etc.

Maybe in your head it is. Your unique arguments make for an interesting aside.

Malcolm wrote:

I find that Nyingmapas have a talent for endless over-classification.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 9:24 PM

Title: Re: Tantra vs. Sutra Buddha Nature

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

So talking about Dzogchen to someone like this SOB is the definition of samaya violation, because upon hearing what he doesn't like to hear or read he disparages it. Now both sayer and responder are headed to hell. So time for confessions and to drop this. It's called Secret Mantra not Public Mantra.

Malcolm wrote:

SOB is a single issue poster. Tathāgatagarbha is a self; it is filled with infinite qualities; it is permanent; and empty of adventitious taints. For him this what gzhan stong means and that is all. He appears to have no interest at all in the actual philosophical issues with Dolbupa's view at stake. There are all kinds of people who do not take issue with what the tathāgatagarbha sūtra say (like Gorampa, for example) who have all kinds of issues with Dolbupa's overly literal interpretation of them.

As far as the other things goes, he is not saying that buddhanature is not a direct perception, he just thinks that it is a mistaken to say that only buddhas can have such a direct perception, he thinks (erroneously) that also tenth stage bodhisattvas can have such a direct perception (even though it is clearly stated that their perception of tathāgatagarbha is generic i.e. abstract, and not direct).

I don't see him disparaging Secret Mantra. We are not talking about anything very specific, so I don't see the issue.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 8:43 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Ok. Sure. So is what you just said. The import is there is such a tantra and explanation and method. If one has such a teacher one can have such a practice.

Malcolm wrote:

The method of practicing Guhyagarbha is mahāyoga — it is only the fact that the thirteenth chapter has a brief mention of Dzogchen that makes it stand out.

Basically Longchenpa is reading a lot into the tantra.

Crazywisdom said:

You are upholding the Zurpa tradition. Longchenpa successfully goes to great lengths to show the limitations of this view.

Malcolm wrote:

I am not upholding any such tradition. The fact that Longchenpa has to go through great lengths to read Dzogchen into the Guhyagarbha is a) a testament to his energy and intellect b) a testament to the fact that it is a bit of a reach.

One can also explain the carya tantra, the Mañjuśrīnamasaṃgīti, according both Kālacakra and Dzogchen; but it does not make it a niruttarayoga tantra or an atiyoga tantra. See my point? Everyone classifies Guhyagarba as a Mahāyoga tantra. Some people sub-classify it as ati of mahā. But this system is just endless proliferation that never ends, ati of anu of maha, maha of ati of anu....etc.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 8:30 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm's position is that the sugatagarbha can be visibly seen with the eyes through various yogic techniques and that the sugatagarbha cannot be seen in the Sutras.....his statement is false in BOTH the tantras and Sutras.

Malcolm wrote:

No, it is not false.

Son of Buddha said:

The Buddha nature can be seen by the eye by being's other than the Buddha.....

Malcolm wrote:

No, it cannot. Tenth stage bodhisattvas can perceive a generic approximation of tathāgatagarbha, but that is all. And no one else can see even that much. The Indian version states:

Son of a good family, bodhisattvas of the tenth stage can see only a generic approximation of the tathagātagarbha that exists in their bodies.

Chinese long version (from Tibetan):

Son of a good family, buddha nature can be seen by only a buddha, and not a śrāvaka [arhat] or a pratyekabuddha.

Son of Buddha said:

on top of the fact the idea that a person can see the Buddha nature and another person cannot see the Buddha Nature does not in any way shape form or fashion show that there are two different Buddha natures.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on how it is being defined.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 8:14 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

"Existence" is probably not the correct word for something that is unborn and beyond conceptuality. Semantics.

Malcolm wrote:

To say that something is unborn is to say either a) it always existed from time immemorial b) it never arose and is not something one would consider real. If it is former, then one's view is no different than nonbuddhists. If it is the latter, than wisdom is just as empty as everything else (buddhist view).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 8:07 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Since it has no causes, it should therefore arise at all times, randomly, in ants, humans, dogs, etc.

smcj said:

The Uttartantra has a lot of analogies for Buddha Nature, each with a commentary explaining the significance. But the only one that I personally need is the clouds and the sun in the sky. The sun is never contaminated by the clouds. So the salient point is what perspective you are speaking from. If you are above the clouds there is absolutely no difference between a stormy day and clear weather. There are teachings from that perspective, such as Huang Po's "There is no difference between the enlightened and unenlightened." So yes, from that perspective it is fully present at all times in ants, human, dogs, etc.

But obviously I'm not a pilot (or yogi) so I've got my raincoat in my car at all times. So therefore, no one can have this truly existing wisdom, not even a buddha, since it already exists without needing to be realized.
Huh?

Malcolm wrote:

To say that something truly exists is to say that it produces itself without any cause or condition. It is not something that can be realized, much less known.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 7:50 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

That's basically how I interpret the above quote from Khenpo Tsultrim. How else to understand the distinction between "consciousness" which is non-arising as per Madhyamaka, and "Wisdom Mind" which has true existence? I haven't had teachings with questions answered, so obviously I'm just guessing. It would have been nice if he had elaborated on it some more in his book..

Malcolm wrote:

What does it mean to say that wisdom has true existence? It has no cause? It is like the mind of god, self-existing, unconditioned?

smcj said:

More like the mind of Buddha. Since K.T.'s quote is a presentation of Shentong, I think it safe to say it is empty-of-(anything)-other than its own innate buddha qualities. That much is pretty standard Shentong presentation, with possible variations of course.

Malcolm wrote:

So therefore, no one can have this truly existing wisdom, not even a buddha, since it already exists without needing to be realized. Since it has no causes, it should therefore arise at all times, randomly, in ants, humans, dogs, etc. Practicing the path is useless, since wisdom already exists, truly.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 7:36 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

What do you think that basis is?

conebeckham said:

The Dharmadhatu?

smcj said:

That's basically how I interpret the above quote from Khenpo Tsultrim. How else to understand the distinction between "consciousness" which is non-arising as per Madhyamaka, and "Wisdom Mind" which has true existence? I haven't had teachings with questions answered, so obviously I'm just guessing. It would have been nice if he had elaborated on it some more in his book..

Malcolm wrote:

What does it mean to say that wisdom has true existence? It has no cause? It is like the mind of god, self-existing, unconditioned?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 7:30 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Ok. Mind is empty, and therefore there is no impediment. Display arises. We mistake display for subject/object. We reify. I'm with you. So, we purify the kleshas, bakchaks, what-have-you. When purified, reification no longer occurs. Does display still occur? If so, from where? Even if subject/object duality is exhausted by the purification of all stains, there is the base, yes?

Malcolm wrote:

What do you think that basis is?

conebeckham said:

The Dharmadhatu?

Malcolm wrote:

The dharmadhātu is aware, some sort of universal awareness?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 5:41 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

But I also posit an awareness, or sentience, as, I think, do you.

Malcolm wrote:

An awareness that is different than the mind?

conebeckham said:

An awareness that is common to both the "mind," i.e., sentient beings, and "Wisdom," i.e. The Purified continuum of Buddhas.

Malcolm wrote:

Oh, so you just mean clarity, the characteristic of the mind. But clarity is conditioned, and cannot alone serve as a basis for buddhahood.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 5:33 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

But I also posit an awareness, or sentience, as, I think, do you.

Malcolm wrote:

An awareness that is different than the mind?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Ok. Mind is empty, and therefore there is no impediment. Display arises. We mistake display for subject/object. We reify. I'm with you. So, we purify the kleshas, bakchaks, what-have-you. When purified, reification no longer occurs. Does display still occur? If so, from where? Even if subject/object duality is exhausted by the purification of all stains, there is the base, yes?

asunthatneversets said:

By "base" do you mean "gzhi"?

conebeckham said:

I mean the same thing that Sherlock means, whatever his reference term would be.....

I am assuming it is gzhi, and not kun gzhi.

Malcolm wrote:

gsar ma kun gzhi; rnying ma gzhi, same meaning, different word.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 5:29 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Ok. Mind is empty, and therefore there is no impediment. Display arises. We mistake display for subject/object. We reify. I'm with you. So, we purify the kleshas, bakchaks, what-have-you. When purified, reification no longer occurs. Does display still occur? If so, from where? Even if subject/object duality is exhausted by the purification of all stains, there is the base, yes?

Malcolm wrote:

What do you think that basis is?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 5:25 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

So, the answer is that your nature of water is merely an abstraction, and does not really exist.

dzogchungpa said:

Are you then saying that the nature of mind is merely an abstraction?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, in the sense that there is no nature of the mind apart from the mind.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 4:38 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Yes, all dharmas are like a reflection. But what is the basis, the surface, the mirror, the water, upon which dharmas reflect??

Malcolm wrote:

One's mind, of course.

conebeckham said:

OK! but is "one's mind" all water? Or is it just a specific body of water? Water has the same characteristics no matter what body it resides in.....light passes through it, more or less, depending on the temporary obscurations suspended in it, reflections can appear in it, given light.....but at all times the nature of water is unchanged. If one's mind were a puddle, and the puddle dried up, was the water impermanent? Or has it changed state? Will it eventually recondense and form another puddle? Is the Nature of Water one, or different, with the various Bodies of Water?

Malcolm wrote:

One cannot find the nature of water apart from water. It does not precede or succeed it. Now then, if you are an essentialist [Hindu, etc.], you will argue that all water derives its nature from some hypothetical essence of water. If you are a nominalist [Buddhist], you will argue our notion of a characteristic of water is an abstraction derived from our experiences of water. So, the answer is that your nature of water is merely an abstraction, and does not really exist. See MMK chapter 5:7:

Therefor space is not existent, it is not non-existent, is not the characterized, is not the characteristic; also any other of the five elements are the same as space.

And 5:8:

Some of small intelligence, see existents in terms of 'is' or 'is not'; they do not perceive the pacification of views, or peace.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 4:11 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Can we not say that the reflection is how the water appears?

Malcolm wrote:

all of the water or only a part?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 4:04 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Yes, all dharmas are like a reflection. But what is the basis, the surface, the mirror, the water, upon which dharmas reflect??

Malcolm wrote:

One's mind, of course.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 3:39 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Ok. Sure. So is what you just said. The import is there is such a tantra and explanation and method. If one has such a teacher one can have such a practice.

Malcolm wrote:

The method of practicing Guhyagarbha is mahāyoga — it is only the fact that the thirteenth chapter has a brief mention of Dzogchen that makes it stand out.

Basically Longchenpa is reading a lot into the tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 3:36 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Without the water, there would be no reflection, yes?

Malcolm wrote:

Of course, but there is no moon in the water.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 3:22 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Sherlock said:

Actually we are arguing that the moon is just a reflection.

conebeckham said:

Mmmm....the reflection of the moon is actually "water," though.

Malcolm wrote:

Since when it a reflection part of the surface it is reflected in?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 2:24 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

[quote="Crazywisdom"]

Responding briefly to your arguments. Kyedzog are indivisible. You can approach the wheel from any point. One is not a Buddha due to looking left and walking right. It's a mere obscuration. Once this is done away with everything manifests.[/quote]

Easy to say, in practice however, not so easy — no matter which path one chooses.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 1:33 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

The Dharmakāya produces form bodies for sentient beings — did you ever ask yourself how?

Funny, I was going to ask you the same question.

So let us start with "Dharmakaya produces..." Really? Nothing produces something?
Hmmm...

Malcolm wrote:

Right, this actually only happens from the side of sentient being. In reality, the dharmakāya does not produce anything. The Mahāyāna Uttaratantra states:

Just as the reflection of Indra appears in a pure ground of sapphire, [435/a] likewise, the reflection of the body of the Munindra arises in the pure ground of the mind of migrating beings.

The reflection that arises or subsides for migrating beings is engaged through the power of whether their minds are permeated or not with taints, just like the appearance of the reflection [of Indra] in the worlds is in the same way not seen as existing or not existing.

The Vajracchedikā Sūtra states:

Whoever sees me as form,

whoever knows me as sound,

those people who apprehend me incorrectly do not see me, [411/b] and so do not see the dharmakāya.

The buddhas are dharmatā.

The guides are the dharmakāya.

Since dharmatā is unknowable, it cannot be known.

So you have to ask yourself what dharmatā is. The Saptaśatikā-prajñāpāramitā Sūtra states:

Inconceivable wisdom is the wisdom of the buddhas. The absence of perception of any phenomenon is the wisdom of the buddhas...If it is asked why, the omniscience with the mode of the nonexistence of wisdom in the ultimate is the wisdom of the buddha.

The Mahāyāna Uttaratantra states:

Just as space is nothing at all, invisible, imperceptible, unsupported, totally beyond sight,

formless, indemonstrable

and cannot be seen

even though one looks high and low, likewise, even though one looks for buddha everywhere, he isn't there.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 1:26 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

No. It's an Atiyoga tantra. It's view is equal to the ninth. That's all I'm going to say. Except path appearances are not built or developed. They are obscured only. They can gradually appear like defogging a window. So viewing this as development is a wrong view. Samsara has no beginning so the sambhogakaya appears fully endowed from beginningless time. It appears w/i this bindi

Malcolm wrote:

The Guhyagarbha is a mahāyoga tantra, which mentions Dzogchen exactly twice and most importantly in chapter thirteen. You are not the only person who can read, or who has taken teachings on these things.

Your position above is not more profound than the Uttaratantra, which of course makes a distinction between impure, pure/impure and pure, from the perspective of sentient beings, bodhisattvas, and buddhas. No one ever said the path was additive, it is only subtractive, gathering the two accumulations for example, means just that one is removing the two obscurations. When one is obscured, one is impure; when on the path, especially the aryan path, pure/impure; and when one attains buddhahood, pure. It does not mean that one has in fact actually removed or added anything. Nevertheless, these so called buddha qualities both can be considered naturally perfected, and they also are produced by a process of transformation and there is no contradiction between these two things. If someone thinks there is a contradiction, they have to explain why they are not at present omniscient.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 1:18 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Is Bare Awareness a phenomenon? Or is it of another category entirely? If the Ultimate were just a sort of "Bare Awareness," one could say such awareness is indeed "empty of all phenomena," correct? And yet one could not say that the "nature of the dharmadhatu" --suchness--is not a mere "blankness," but that there is awareness there.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "awareness", naked or clothed, outside of your mind. There is no buddhahood outside of your mind. Searching for buddhahood somewhere else other than in your mind is deluded.

conebeckham said:

No argument here. Also, no appearances of phenomena outside your mind. But who said anything about searching for Buddhahood somewhere else other than one's mind? Certainly not me.....

Malcolm wrote:

Is your mind something relative or something ultimate? Is the awareness of your mind relative or ultimate? If your mind is relative, its awareness must also be relative, correct?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 1:17 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

It is quite another to claim that the ultimate is empty of all relative phenomena.

Ok, so then the Dharmakaya is a solid object? Or a convenient fiction used as upaya?

Wow.

Malcolm wrote:

Depends on how you are defining it. For example, in Secret Mantra, among the seven limbs of three kāyas, dharmakāya is the limb of the absence of inherent existence.

Sambhogakāya has three limbs: union, great bliss and perfect enjoyments.

Nirmānakāya has three limbs great compassion, the uninterrupted stream of the wheel of activities, and never ceasing.

In sūtra, dharmakāya is the two-fold omniscience that comes about from gathering the accumulation of wisdom.

This however does not mean that there is some platonic ultimate that exists separate from the relative phenomena of the world. The three kāyas function in the world for sentient beings. The dharmakāya produces form bodies for sentient beings — did you ever ask yourself how? Or did you think that the dharmakāya, sambhogakāya and nirmanakāya were something like the father, son and holy ghost?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

conebeckham said:

Is Bare Awareness a phenomenon? Or is it of another category entirely? If the Ultimate were just a sort of "Bare Awareness," one could say such awareness is indeed "empty of all phenomena," correct? And yet one could not say that the "nature of the dharmadhatu" --suchness-is not a mere "blankness," but that there is awareness there.

Malcolm wrote:

There is no "awareness", naked or clothed, outside of your mind. There is no buddhahood outside of your mind. Searching for buddhahood somewhere else other than in your mind is deluded.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 12:57 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Guhyagarbha has more pointed words. The kayas are fully endowed in this bindi. The only job is to stop distractions.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, there is a problem of literalism. For example, ChNN very clearly explains that even through the buddhaqualities are lhun grub, they are lhun grub as a _potential_.

Vimalamitra also makes this distinction, as does the Six Dimensions Tantra:

Since the cause and result are different,

[the basis] too is not naturally perfect (lhun grub).

Likewise, if the cause and result were the same, effort would be meaningless.

Crazywisdom said:

Khenpo Namdrol never makes this caveat. Longchenpa either. And Guhyagarbha is a dzogchen tantra. It is beyond cause and effect. This is explicit but also secret. So. I prob shouldn't discuss it.

Malcolm wrote:

Longchenpa absolutely makes this caveat, he does so in both the Tshig Don Mdzod as well as the Theg mchog mdzod when he discusses the six incorrect positions of the basis. Moreover, so does Vimalamitra, at length, in his commentary in Six Dimensions Tantra. Longchenpa may not make this distinction in the phyogs bcu mun sel, but then, Guhyagarbha is a mahāyoga tantra, and its view is a bit limited.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 12:51 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Honestly, this thread is an embarrassment. If anyone who actually reads the book wants to talk about it, I'll be back.

Malcolm wrote:

In all fairness, the book preview given on Amazon is sufficient to assess the opinions of this scholar. Quite simple, there are many people of eternalist bent, who cannot fathom and refuse to fathom that the Buddha's teaching means there is no "super reality of the individual ego" (that Bhattacharya is arguing for).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Tuesday, May 5th, 2015 at 12:26 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Guhyagarbha has more pointed words. The kayas are fully endowed in this bindi. The only job is to stop distractions.

Malcolm wrote:

Again, there is a problem of literalism. For example, ChNN very clearly explains that even though the buddhaqualities are lhun grub, they are lhun grub as a _potential_.

Vimalamitra also makes this distinction, as does the Six Dimensions Tantra:

Since the cause and result are different,

[the basis] too is not naturally perfect (lhun grub).

Likewise, if the cause and result were the same,

effort would be meaningless.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 11:45 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are you saying that In Dzogchen tathāgatagarbha is impermanent whereas in the sutras it is permanent?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that the term is used very differently. Here in Varjayāna, since the basis of the potential to achieve buddhahood is the physical body, especially key points of tantra anatomy, and since the mind is located in this bindu of four elements and so on, the term is being used differently than in sūtra.

dzogchungpa said:

Well, it seems to me that one could say it is being used the same way, but since there is a different explanation of how buddhahood is achieved there is a different idea of what the 'garbha' of the 'tathagata' is. Does that make sense?

Malcolm wrote:

It is pretty hard to say that something which is made of conditioned and impermanent things is conditioned and permanent, no? Unless tathāgatagarbha refers to a potential for awakening (which it in fact does) rather than full-blown buddhahood (which in fact it does not).

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 9:35 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and since it those four elements are impermanent, it really does not correspond to tathāgatagarbha taught in the sūtras.

dzogchungpa said:

I don't doubt it. Are you saying that In Dzogchen tathāgatagarbha is impermanent whereas in the sutras it is permanent?

Malcolm wrote:

I am saying that the term is used very differently. Here in Varjayāna, since the basis of the potential to achieve buddhahood is the physical body, especially key points of tantra anatomy, and since the mind is located in this bindu of four elements and so on, the term is being used differently than in sūtra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 8:36 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Arguing with you is hopeless. Why? You genuinely think this is responsive and counters the quote above. In fact, it makes it obvious that sutra is dealing with generalities and tantra is dealing with specifics. A college education would help you. Our more study or something.

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, it is like arguing with a Christian.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 8:35 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm

it is not a question of "believing what I want," Stephen Hodge also has doubts about the veracity of later portions of the translation by Dharmakṣema. The version translated by by Fa-hsien appears to be the original.

Sure it is a question of what you believe.....and likewise many scholars, historians and Buddhists think the Vajrayana Tantras are entirely dubious in origin and in many cases contain very perverse teachings if token literally.

Also the first 17 chapters of the Dharmakeshema version Correspond to the Original Faxian version, my quote came from chapter 8

Second I find it hard to believe you like the Faxian version better you know seeing as the Faxian version uses the term JIVATMAN instead of Atman it teaches directly the term Soul.

But as I said before believe what you want.

Malcolm wrote:

I don't prefer any Chinese translation. The Tibetan translation from Sanskrit is based on the same text as Faxian's translation, as far as I can tell. The Tibetan translation from Chinese is the Dharmakeshema version. Naturally, I prefer the Tibetan translation from Sanskrit, because it is a much more accurate translation than the version translated from Chinese.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 8:15 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Speaking of Dzogchen,

<http://vajracakra.com/viewtopic.php?f=57&t=1086&p=12465#p12464>: In Dzogchen, the thigle of elements in the heart is considered tathāgatagarbha.

Malcolm wrote:

Right, and since it those four elements are impermanent, it really does not correspond to tathāgatagarbha taught in the sūtras.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 8:13 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Are all phenomena suchness or not?

conebeckham said:

Of course the nature of all phenomena is suchness. But suchness is not merely phenomenal non-existence, in Shentong. Suchness is also luminous awareness--not merely absence of "self."

Malcolm wrote:

And it is for this reason, for example, that Rongton Sheja Kunrig classifies gzhan stong as a species of false aspectarian yogacara, or a sort of intermediate view between yogacara and madhyamaka.

conebeckham said:

The Ultimate truth is certainly empty of stains, but is "full" of qualities. But these are all just conceptual "approximations."

Malcolm wrote:

The problem lies when one conflates the language of the tathatagarbha teachings, the language of yogacara and the language of madhyamaka. The ancient yogacarins in India took virtually no interest in tathāgatagarbha theory devoting only a total of two commentaries to the subject: the Uttaratāntra and the subcommentary on that by Asaṅga. Further proof, is that Madhyamakas such as Bhāvavieka and Chandrakīrti treat the subject of tathāgatagarbha theory with much more interest than Asaṅga, Vasubandhu and so on. We do not really find consistent commentarial treatment of tathāgatagarbha theory until the Vajrayāna commentaries dating from the ninth century onward. Even here it is not systematic.

conebeckham said:

Madhyamika in the classical sense denies the ability of conceptual mind to encompass reality. Shentong also does the same thing. The only thing Shentong, as I understand it, posits is an awareness which is beyond description, also beyond the ability of conceptual mind to encompass reality--but in that sense, it does posit "something" other than "bare emptiness" as an "ultimate."

Malcolm wrote:

And thus gzhan stong slips off the other side of the horse while trying avoid the extreme of annihilation. Such an assertion of existence in the ultimate cannot be considered free from extremes, because it is an extreme. This is why the Buddha states in the Ārya-saṃvṛitiparamārthasatyānirdeśa-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

Devaputra: ultimate truth is beyond the range of the omniscient wisdom endowed with the supreme of all aspects. However one describes ultimate truth, it is not like that.

And as Gorampa states:

Other than the need for the existence of a middle path which avoids two extremes in all three vehicles, as explained in the Ratnavali, the system of Mādhyamikas must be free from the extreme of permanence because the ultimate asserted in the lower vehicles is not established, and free from the extreme of annihilation since the causes and results of action are not denied in the relative.

Also based upon this Mahāyāna, since one meditates having brought together the trio of the special view that reality's own nature is free from the extremes of the dualistic grasping of existence and nonexistence and so on, compassion in relation to sentient beings, and the development of Mahāyāna bodhicitta, at the time of the final result while never moving from the state of the dharmadhātu free from all proliferation one will effortlessly produce the benefit of sentient beings throughout all of space.

There cannot be a Madhyamaka better than this, nor a result better than this.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 7:24 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Are all phenomena suchness or not?

Awakening faith in Mahayana...

Malcolm wrote:

Right, so you did not even answer the question.

As a basic definition, nirvana, space and so on are included in "all phenomena." In fact, the Śatasāhasrika-prajñāpāramitā, etc., state:

All phenomena are included with the category of suchness, those cannot go beyond that category. If it asked why, Subhuti no coming or coming can be perceived in suchness. Subhuti, all phenomena are within these categories: the dharmadhātu, are the limit of reality, uniformity and inconceivability.

And:

Subhuti, when categorized, all phenomena are the nature of being unreal. Subhuti, in the same way, also all phenomena are nature of emptiness, all phenomena are the nature of signlessness, all phenomena are the nature of aspirationlessness. Subhuti, in the same way also, all phenomena are the nature of suchness, all phenomena are the nature of the limit of reality, all phenomena are the nature of dharmadhātu.

This being so, it is ludicrous to assert that the ultimate is empty of all relative phenomena. Such an assertion directly contradicts the words of the Buddha. It is one thing to claim "tathāgatagarbha is empty of adventitious afflictions." It is quite another to claim that the ultimate is empty of all relative phenomena. The ultimate is merely the emptiness of all phenomena, there is no other ultimate that can be found.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 9:36 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

The universal ātman of the Upaniṣads is not here being spoken of.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a mere assertion on your part.

David Reigle said:

Yes, it is my understanding of the evidence presented, and hopefully it correctly represents Bhattacharya's position.

Malcolm wrote:

Given that the atman spoken of in the upanishads as being thumb sized etc, is explicitly rejected by the Buddha, your assertion would seem to be quite unsupported.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 8:49 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

The universal ātman of the Upaniṣads is not here being spoken of.

Malcolm wrote:

This is a mere assertion on your part.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 5:34 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm.

Umm, no, that is not what gzhan stong is. This is how it is defined:

Dharmatā, the thoroughly established, the ultimate truth, is not empty of its own nature, but because it is empty of imputed and other-dependent entities, relative entities, conditioned phenomena, it is empty of other entities. That is the true unperturbed emptiness, ultimate truth, dharmakāya, [3/b] the limit of the real, suchness, and emptiness endowed with the supreme of all aspects. The powers, major and minor marks and so on are the unconditioned qualities that abide in that from the beginning. You do realise your quote is in agreement with what I am saying right?

All your quote us saying is the ultimate truth which is the Buddha attributes(as I stated in the queen srimala Sutra) is empty of imputed and other-dependent entities, relative entities, conditioned phenomena, it is empty of other entities which are adventitious defilements (which again was what was taught in the Queen Srimala Sutra I quoted)

Here is some more info to add to yours

The Mountain Doctrine Tibet's Fundamental Treatise on Other-Emptiness and the Buddha Matrix By: Dolpopa.

Moreover the Angulimala Sutra says:

“Manjushri, an empty home in a built-up city is called empty due to the absence of humans. A pot is empty due to the absence of water. A river is empty due to water not flowing. Is a village that is without householders called “empty, empty?” Or are the households empty in all respects? They are not empty in all respects; they are called empty due to the absence of humans. Is a pot empty in all respects? It is not empty in all respects; it is called “empty” due to the absence of water. Is a river empty in all respects? It is not empty in all respects; it is called “empty” because water is not flowing. Similarly, liberation is not empty in all respects; it is called “empty” because of being devoid of all defects. A Buddha, a supermundane victor, is not empty but is called “empty” because of being devoid of defects and due to the absence of humanness and godhood that have ten of millions of afflictive emotions.

Alas, venerable Manjushri, acting out the behavior of a bug, you do not know the real meaning of empty and non-empty. The naked ones” also meditate on all as empty. Do not say anything, you bug of the naked ones!

[Dolpopa’s Commentary]

The passage from “The Buddha is like space” through “How could you, Angulimala, understand/ Empty nothingness!” which indicates, in accordance with the assertions of some, that everything is a self-emptiness of nothingness is an introduction by Manjushri. It leads to Angulimala’s delineating the difference between self-emptiness and other-emptiness, despite the fact that Manjushri actually knows the difference.

Then, using the example of hail-stone becoming non-existent upon melting, he teaches that the final liberation, Buddhahood, is not empty. This teaches that the ultimate supermundane truth, the body of attributes, is not empty of its own entity. Using the example of an empty home, an empty vase, and an empty river, he teaches an emptiness of all defects; this teaches that the final liberation is other-emptiness. All descriptions of non-emptiness/ “Liberation is not empty in all respects,” “A supermundane victor is not empty,” “Non-empty phenomena are other,” and so forth—mean that the ultimate noumenon is not itself empty of itself.

Malcolm wrote:

What you do not seem to understand is while the sūtra passages you are citing are noncontroversial, the gzhan stong interpretation Dolbupa applied to them in general is controversial for many reasons, but mostly having to do with his novel (and largely unprecedented) interpretation of the three own natures, his idea that the perfected nature (parinispāna) was empty of both the dependent (paratantra) and imputed (parikalpita) natures. In fact Maitreyanātha, Asaṅga and Vasubandhu uniformly consider that the absence of the imputed in the dependent is the perfected. The second place where the gzhan stong view is found contradictory to Nāgārjuna is that if one follows the gzhan stong view, saṃsāra and nirvāṇa cannot be inseparable. Therefore, the statement by the Buddha in the Hevajra Tantra must be false:

This so-called “saṃsāra,” just this is nirvāṇa.

Many other clear and unambiguous statements by the Buddha on the identity of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa must also be considered false. Not to mention Nāgārjuna’s famed dictum:

Saṃsāra is not the slightest bit different from nirvāṇa, nirvāṇa is not the slightest bit different from saṃsāra;
whatever is the limit of nirvāṇa, that is the limit of saṃsāra, a difference between those two does not exist even slightly.

We can see that Vasubandhu agrees with this meaning in the Sūtrālaṃkārabhāṣya:

The meaning of nirvāṇa being all-pervasive is that because saṃsāra and peace (nirvāṇa) have one taste due to one not having concepts about their faults and qualities, in the respect there is no difference between saṃsāra and nirvāṇa.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 5:10 AM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

You need to accumulate merit to realize emptiness, as well as the rūpakāya. You need to accumulate wisdom to realize the dharmakāya.

Tenso said:

Confusing. Dharmakaya is emptiness.

Malcolm wrote:

No, Dharmakāya is the two fold omniscience that comes from realizing emptiness and accumulating wisdom. Accumulating merit improves your mind and makes it ever more clear.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 3:28 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Sherlock said:

Malcolm, is the main way Nyingma and Sakya view differ in the way the Nyingmas say there is a different relative truth for each of the 9 yanas?

Malcolm wrote:

IN terms of tantra, yes. Sapan rejects the idea.

But otherwise, in terms of sutra, Sakya and Nyingma is more or less on the same page.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 3:24 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. Gzhan stong is the theory that the ultimate truth is empty of relative truth and utterly different than it; it is not the theory that the nature of mind (tathāgatagarbha) is empty of adventitious defilements and replete with buddha qualities (potentially). You can cite the Śrīmālādevī-siṃhanāda sūtra (and the nine other tathāgatagarbha sūtras) till you pass out from exhaustion but it won't make tathāgatagarbha theory any more "gzhan stong".

Son of Buddha said:

That's weird seeing as Dolpopa used that quote as the literal definition of Shentong

The Ultimate Truth is the Tathagatagarbha and is empty of the relative truth which is the adventitious defilements and utterly different than it Your refuting yourself.

Malcolm wrote:

Are all phenomena suchness or not?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 3:20 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Um that quote from that Buddhist Sutra is LITERALLY the DEFINITION of Shentong.....
You sir are in denial.

Malcolm wrote:

Your quote does not support Dolbupa's entire theory, which has much more to do with his treatment of three own natures, his interpretation of the idea of the three turnings, and so on that it does tathāgatagarbha.

We all accept tathāgatagarbha theory, we just don't accept Dolbupas interpretation of it, because it is eternalist.

Son of Buddha said:

Um yea that quote IS the actual definition of Shentong simple as that. As far as Dolpopas teachings, he ties many other teachings in to make a full system, that still doesn't change what the literal definition of Other Emptiness(Shentong) is.

Malcolm wrote:

Umm, no, that is not what gzhan stong is. This is how it is defined:

Dharmatā, the thoroughly established, the ultimate truth, is not empty of its own nature, but because it is empty of imputed and other-dependent entities, relative entities, conditioned phenomena, it is empty of other entities. That is the true unperturbed emptiness, ultimate truth, dharmakāya, [3/b] the limit of the real, suchness, and emptiness endowed with the supreme of all aspects. The powers, major and minor marks and so on are the unconditioned qualities that abide in that from the beginning.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 3:11 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

BuddhaFollower said:

Rangtong, Shentong, Prasangika and Svatantrika are all Tibetan categories.

Malcolm wrote:

Yup.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 3:05 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

(1) the idea that Shentong is a Tibetan invention is false, Shentong is literally taught in Buddhist Indian Holy texts.

(2) the idea that Shentong did not exist in India is false again Shentong is literally taught in INDIAN Buddhist Holy texts.

Malcolm wrote:

As to points one and two, no. It was never taught in India.

Son of Buddha said:

So Other Emptiness(Shentong) is not taught in ANY Indian Buddhist Sutra?

Malcolm wrote:

Nope. Gzhan stong is the theory that the ultimate truth is empty of relative truth and utterly different than it; it is not the theory that the nature of mind (tathāgatagarbha) is empty of adventitious defilements and replete with buddha qualities (potentially). You can cite the Śrīmālādevī-siṃhanāda sūtra (and the nine other tathāgatagarbha sūtras) till you pass out from exhaustion but it won't make tathāgatagarbha theory any more "gzhan stong".

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 3:03 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Um that quote from that Buddhist Sutra is LITERALLY the DEFINITION of Shentong.....
You sir are in denial.

Malcolm wrote:

Your quote does not support Dolbupa's entire theory, which has much more to do with his treatment of three own natures, his interpretation of the idea of the three turnings, and so on that it does tathāgatagarbha.

We all accept tathāgatagarbha theory, we just don't accept Dolbupas interpretation of it, because it is eternalist.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 2:45 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

(1) the idea that Shentong is a Tibetan invention is false, Shentong is literally taught in Buddhist Indian Holy texts.

(2) the idea that Shentong did not exist in India is false again Shentong is literally taught in INDIAN Buddhist Holy texts.

Malcolm wrote:

As to points one and two, no. It was never taught in India.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 1:09 AM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

p. 300-p.301.

Malcolm wrote:

No, he merely says on these pages that the meaning of Madhyamaka and Yogacara are included within Dzogchen.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 12:25 AM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lobsang said:

it is claimed that His Eminence Gyaltsab Rinpoche said that those persons who hear the recording of Him reciting the mantra

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN gives the lung for this mantra in person all the time, it is part of the Shitro practice which comes from Namcho.

Lobsang said:

Thanks but that doesn't answer my questions, no offence really.

Who is 'ChNN'?

Malcolm wrote:
Chogyal Namkhai Norbu.

In general, you cannot receive a lung from a recording.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 12:24 AM
Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong
Content:
Sherlock said:
All gzhan stong views (including Gelug) are needlessly convoluted.

Mipham shows how simple and elegant the old Nyingma view is and how it applies to both sutra and tantra. This is also the Indian view.

Mipham acknowledges that e.g. Gelug view can help people who find it hard to accept emptiness fully but this is provisional. He even quotes Tsongkhapa saying that.

smcj said:
I don't buy that the Gelug view as Shentong. .

Malcolm wrote:
It is upside down gzhan stong, why you have even read Gelugs on this forum assert that things are not empty of themselves, they are merely empty of inherent existence.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Monday, May 4th, 2015 at 12:21 AM
Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?
Content:

Tenso said:
Well, there is really no such thing as an immortal nirmanakayā because the rūpakāya always arises out of the dharmakāya, and therefore, the issue of mortal/immortal never arises for a buddha. If you can achieve buddhahood by a given path, then you realize dharmakāya, and if you realize dharmakāya, you can always generate rūpakāya, which you do so in response to the needs of sentient beings.
Thats good to know but then why do you need two accumulations to achieve buddhahood? If im not mistaken you need one accumulation to realize rupakaya and the other one for dharmakaya so what your saying is you only really need one? Help clarify please.

Malcolm wrote:
You need to accumulate merit to realize emptiness, as well as the rūpakāya. You need to accumulate wisdom to realize the dharmakāya.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 11:51 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So, has anyone read the book yet and if so, what did you think?

Malcolm wrote:

Are you kidding? There is no point at all in criticizing a book you have read....

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 11:39 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Yes

Malcolm wrote:

Right, well, they are there in gsar ma, just expressed differently. A certain point in your practice, one can visibly see the elemental winds in their colors. The connection elements —> winds —> wisdoms is made in gsar ma tantra.

Crazywisdom said:

So they do or do not have a means of manifesting an immortal nirmanakaya like GR?

Malcolm wrote:

Well, there is really no such thing as an immortal nirmanakayā because the rūpakāya always arises out of the dharmakāya, and therefore, the issue of mortal/immortal never arises for a buddha. If you can achieve buddhahood by a given path, then you realize dharmakāya, and if you realize dharmakāya, you can always generate rūpakāya, which you do so in response to the needs of sentient beings.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 11:23 PM

Title: Re: is vajrayana budhism a path of renunciation or isn't it?

Content:

Tsongkhapafan said:

There is no spiritual path without renunciation as the very definition of a spiritual path is an exalted awareness conjoined with non-fabricated renunciation, so of course the Vajrayana is a path of renunciation - it's a supramundane path if practised properly.

Objects are not contaminated from their own side, so if you remember emptiness, your enjoyment is not a cause of samsara.

Malcolm wrote:

No, I explained this already. In Vajrayāna you do not renounce sense objects, in lower yānas, you do. It is therefore not a path of renunciation.

This is distinct from having renunciation, which is necessary to practice any path at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:48 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Sherlock said:

I have faith in the unassailable position of Nagarjuna, Rongzompa, Longchenpa, Sapan, Mipham.

Have any gzhan stong pas tried to refute this before?

Malcolm wrote:

They never refute Nāgārjuna, they merely consider Madhyamaka incomplete. This is why the Yogacara master Dharmapāla wrote a commentary on Aryadeva's four hundred. They accept Madhyamaka, just think that some Madhyamakas negate too much.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:40 PM

Title: Re: Mantra Liberation Through Hearing ("Ha Gan Ga")

Content:

Lobsang said:

it is claimed that His Eminence Gyaltsab Rinpoche said that those persons who hear the recording of Him reciting the mantra

Malcolm wrote:

ChNN gives the lung for this mantra in person all the time, it is part of the Shitro practice which comes from Namcho.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:36 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

Yes

Malcolm wrote:

Right, well, they are there in gsar ma, just expressed differently. A certain point in your practice, one can visibly see the elemental winds in their colors. The connection elements —> winds —> wisdoms is made in gsar ma tantra.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:33 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

Does he use the term "empty-of-other"?

Malcolm wrote:

What characterizes a gzhan stong pa is the use of three own-natures to explain the two truths of Madhyamaka. This trend begins with the 10th century Indian polymath, Ratnakaraśanti, in his Madhyamakālaṃkāra.

However, Longchenpa never does this, relegating the three own natures to the cittamantra system. He never conflates it with Madhyamaka.

smcj said:

I'll take that as an extremely reluctant "yes".

Malcolm wrote:

The term "empty of other" is just a word, it does not necessarily characterize a position. Actually, I have never seen Longchen use the term anywhere. Not saying he never did, but I have not seen it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:31 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Sherlock said:

To sum up, it's better to stick to old school Madhyamika like Sakya, Nyingma up to Longchenpa or Kagyu up to 8th Karmapa. It is much more logical and elegant too.

smcj said:

I'm not great on history, but my understanding is that Karmapa III was a Shentongpa...

Malcolm wrote:

I would not go that far. He admired Dolbupa's "new Dharma terminology," but there is no evidence that he was influenced by Dolbupa.

The first person I know of to make the claim that Rangjung Dorje as well as Longchenpa were gzhan stong pas is the great Nyingma master and scholar, Rigzin Tsewang Norbu (1658-1755). I think this is the reason you commonly see Longchenpa's name included in Kagyu accounts of gzhan stong history is that gzhan ston entered Karma Kagyu via Rigzin Tsewang Norbu because he was the guru (and disciple) of the 8th Situ Panchen (1700-1775).

Personally, I don't agree with Rigzin Tsewang Norbu's opinion, since Longchenpa never makes use of key parts of gzhan stong teachings, so I think it is enthusiastic overreach.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:19 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

Longchen is junior to Dolbupa (i.e. live after him), and explicitly identifies such texts as Dharmadharmatāvibhanga as belonging to the mind-only system. Longchenpa was not a gzhan stong pa.

smcj said:

Does he use the term "empty-of-other"?

Malcolm wrote:

What characterizes a gzhan stong pa is the use of three own-natures to explain the two truths of Madhyamaka. This trend begins with the 10th century Indian polymath, Ratnakaraśanti, in his Madhyamakālaṃkāra.

However, Longchenpa never does this, relegating the three own natures to the cittamantra system. He never conflates it with Madhyamaka.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 9:47 PM

Title: Re: Mipham was not gzhan stong

Content:

smcj said:

There is room for debate on that. From the translator's introduction of "Maitreya's Distinguishing Phenomena and Pure Being (with commentary by Mipham)"

1. The section of the text treating of phenomena follows the Chittamatra (mind only) tradition and serves the important purpose of explaining how the mind confuses itself and thus wanders in samsara by assuming that outer perceived objects and the inner perceiving mind actually exist as two different things, just because they appear to do so.
2. The section on pure being follows the shentong Madhyamaka (empty-of-other middle way) tradition by describing the nature of mind in an affirmative fashion, as self-present wisdom-awareness, the clear light.

It should also be noted that Longchenpa does use the "empty-of-other" terminology long before Shentong was established as a view.

Malcolm wrote:

Longchen is junior to Dolbupa (i.e. lived after him), and explicitly identifies such texts as Dharmadharmatāvibhanga as belonging to the mind-only system. Longchenpa was not a gzhan stong pa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 9:45 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

"Inner yānas" thinking only applies to Nyingma tantras. It is not relevant to gsar ma. One cannot fit Hevajra, Cakrasamvara, etc., into the Nyingma classification scheme (which never existed in India in any case).

In any case, wisdom is wisdom. The fact that the body reverts to wisdom is the identical in both systems.

Crazywisdom said:

Yes. I've often wondered if this were true. But the lights thing

Malcolm wrote:

What lights thing? Can you be more specific? You mean the five lights?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 8:34 PM

Title: Re: Do people really deserve compassion?

Content:

Jesse said:

I have really been thinking, why do these people deserve compassion?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes.

Jesse said:

Just because ignorance causes them to act in these ways?

Malcolm wrote:

Especially then.

Jesse said:

So what. At what point does karma cease being a cause unto itself, at what point are people no longer the victim of their karma, and just plain being assholes?

Malcolm wrote:

In this case, it is not karma that is causing this, it is affliction. Affliction leads to such behavior, just as your afflictions presently inform your anger towards them and has motivated you to engage in the karma talking with malice and hatred about others.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 6:50 PM

Title: Re: Is 'drupon' a title?

Content:

Fortyeightvows said:

Is 'drupon' a title?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, primarily in the Drikung school, where it means roughly, master of a retreats, and is only given to those who have accomplished many years in strict retreat.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 6:49 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm No it does not it says

Son of a good family, bodhisattvas of the tenth stage can see only a general approximation of the tathagātagarbha that exists in their bodies.

You probably got your quotes mixed up the are about 4 that say similar things but differ on the capacities of the 10th level Bodhisattva.

But since you find problem with that quote here us another.

Nirvana Sutra

Son's of good families, those who see it with the eyes are Buddha Tathagatas.

Bodhisattva's in the tenth stage see Buddha Nature with the eyes and also see it through hearing. All sentient beings up to Bodhisattva's in the ninth stage see Buddha Nature through hearing.

There are not 2 different Buddha Nature's.

Malcolm wrote:

There most certainly two ways the concept is used, one in Vajrayāna, where it is taken to be the so called indestructible bindu which is composed of the elemental winds as well as the material from one's father and mind, along with one's mind; and the sugatagarbha strictly as dharmakāya, which is said in Nirvana sūtra to exist in the body solely for the reason that the mind inhabits the body. It is the mind that is encased by affliction, nothing else. Of course, we can also understand the many statements in sūtra and tantra that the mind itself is buddhahood, and there is no buddhahood to seek out apart from the mind. The mind when purified, becomes the dharmakāya, but it is not dharmakāya from the very beginning, even though its nature is intrinsically pure. You have mistaken the cause (intrinsically pure mind) for the result (dharmakāya, when that intrinsically pure mind is stripped of all adventitious obscurations). For example, The Dharmarāja Sūtra states:

The Bhagavan said to the bodhisattva Many Desires, "Many Desires, before, that was tainted. Now it is clean, pure, very pure. The mind is one thing, nondual, without any other properties. Since that mind is pure, all phenomena become pure.

Son of a good family, for example, a tree is cut down at the root, not at the branches and leaves. Likewise, if the mind is realized, it is equivalent with cutting all phenomena at the root. Since the mind is pure, all phenomena will be pure."

As for Buddhahood itself, the Pitāputrasamāgamana Sūtra states:

Great king, "buddhahood" is a term for seeing reality. "Seeing reality" is a term for the limit of reality. "Limit of reality" is a term for the dharmadhātu.

Great king, the dharmadhātu cannot be explained apart from being just a name, just a symbol, just a convention, [just relative], just an expression and just a designation.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 6:24 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Wayfarer said:

That is the sense in which Buddhism generally is sceptical. It is neither denying or asserting the reality of something 'beyond the six sense gates'...

Malcolm wrote:

Sure it is. The six sense gates are defined as the all. Beyond which, nothing can be said because it is "out of range."

Wayfarer said:

That is why, I think, Nāgārjuna criticizes all philosophical views of 'the absolute' -

Malcolm wrote:

But he didn't. Ultimate truth is a correct cognition; relative truth, a cognition that is incorrect.

Wayfarer said:

Nothing here can be shown to be self-existent, so it does not 'truly exist' - but it is also not 'non-existent'.

Malcolm wrote:

Not sure why you fall into the third extreme here, unless you accept the Gelug formulation of madhyamaka, and mean that there is no existence in the ultimate and no non-existence in the relative.

Wayfarer said:

Actually our whole situation is really very perplexing, but we don't realize how perplexing it is. I think that sense of being utterly perplexed by our situation is the basic starting-point for the Buddhist analysis.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not that perplexing: relatively everything arises from conditions, ultimately, nothing arises at all.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 10:30 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

[

Yes the Sutra's do say the 10th level bodhisattva's can see the Buddha Nature.....again still waiting on an actual DIFFERENCE between Sutra Buddha Nature and Tantric Buddha Nature.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the sutra does not say that.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=19423&start=120#p280894>

Son of Buddha said:

Yea it does

Nirvana Sutra

'Noble son, although bodhisattvas dwelling on the tenth level [the tenth bhumi - i.e. the very highest level of spiritual development, just below that of a Buddha] do perceive Buddha-dhatu, it is not clear to them. Noble son, you might ask with what eye do bodhisattvas dwelling on the tenth level perceive Buddha-dhatu, though it is not clear to them, with what eye do the blessed Buddhas clearly perceive it? Noble son, that seen with the eye of insight (prajna-caksus) is not clear, while that seen with the Buddha eye is clear. It is not clear while engaging in the practice of a bodhisattva, but it is clear when no longer engaging in the practice [i.e. when full Buddhahood has been attained and one is no longer a trainee Buddha]. Though they perceive it because they dwell on the tenth level, it is not clear to them, whereas it is clear to those who do not dwell or proceed [along the preparatory levels]. What bodhisattva-mahasattvas perceive with insight [prajna] is not clear, whereas the blessed Buddhas perceive it clearly because they have eradicated (literally: severed) causes and effects. All-Knowing (sarvajna) is said to be the Buddha-dhatu, whereas tenth-level bodhisattvas are not said to be All-Knowing and so although they perceive it [i.e. the Buddha Nature], it is not clear to them.'

And again whether one sees the Buddha Nature or not does not denote that there are 2 different Buddha natures. Just like you not being able to see my car while I can does not denote that there are 2 different cars.

Peace and Love

Malcolm wrote:

No, it does not, it says,,,

Son of a good family, bodhisattvas of the tenth stage can see only a general approximation of the tathagātagarbha that exists in their bodies.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 9:48 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

[

Yes the Sutra's do say the 10th level bodhisattva's can see the Buddha Nature.....again still waiting on an actual DIFFERENCE between Sutra Buddha Nature and Tantric Buddha Nature.

Malcolm wrote:

No, the sutra does not say that.

<https://www.dharmawheel.net/viewtopic.php?f=39&t=19423&start=120#p280894>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 9:24 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

it is taught in the Nirvana Sutra that the Tenth level Bodhisattva's can clearly see it with their eyes.

BuddhaFollower said:

Dzogchen is not limited to Tenth level Bodhisattvas.

Malcolm wrote:

Not only that, but the sutra does not say that they can.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 8:29 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm

it is not a question of "believing what I want," Stephen Hodge also has doubts about the veracity of later portions of the translation by Dharmakṣema. The version translated by by Fa-hsien appears to be the original.

Sure it is a question of what you believe.....and likewise many scholars, historians and Buddhists think the Vajrayana Tantras are entirely dubious in origin and in many cases contain very perverse teachings if taken literally.

Also the first 17 chapters of the Dharmakṣema version Correspond to the Original Faxian version, my quote came from chapter 8

Second I find it hard to believe you like the faxian version better you know seeing as the Faxian version uses the term JIVATMAN instead of Atman it teaches directly the term Soul.

But as I said before believe what you want.

Malcolm wrote:

Ok, the translation you are using has confused fascicles with chapters. There are only five chapters in the original text. Even so, the Chinese translation is quite inaccurate compared with the Tibetan translation. This is why I don't trust it.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 7:57 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Read mine and Malcolm's discussion as you can see no actual difference has been presented between the Sutras and Tantras idea of Buddha Nature.

BuddhaFollower said:

There is no anatomy in your passage for attaining rainbow body like in Malcolm's passage.

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm's point was

Here, it is said that sugatagarbha has a physical location in the body. So really, there is a difference in how this concept is used in sutra and in tantra.

There are other Dzogchen texts which indicate that sugatagarbha can be visibly seen with the eyes through various yogic techniques. This is really quite different than the way it is presented in sutra, won't you agree?

And I have proven that the Sutra LIKEWISE teach that the Sugatagarbha has a physical location in the body just like the Tantras do.

Malcolm wrote:

Where in the body do sutras say sugatagarbha is located? There are other Dzogchen texts that declare the four elements are sugatagarbha.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 7:55 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

No sūtra or tantra says this. However, for example, the Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva Tantra states:

The sugatagarbha exists intrinsically in all sentient beings. That exists just as sesame seeds are permeated with oil. Its basis — it is based on the material aggregate. It's location — it is located in the center of the heart. Also that is called "the transcendent state of Samantabhadra's sealed locket". For example, like a sealed locket of leather, inside its location, from the center of a five colored light there exist peaceful kāyas the size of mustard grains in halos of light. That is the location of vidyā. For example, it is like form of a vase.

Here, it is said that sugatagarbha has a physical location in the body. So really, there is a difference in how this concept is used in sutra and in tantra.

There are other Dzogchen texts which indicate that sugatagarbha can be visibly seen with the eyes through various yogic techniques. This is really quite different than the way it is presented in sutra, won't you agree?

Son of Buddha said:

Nope don't agree seeing that the same exact thing is taught in the Sutras as well

Tatagatagarbha Sutra

when I look at beings with my Buddha vision, I see that the tathagatagarbha is surrounded by a husk of ignorance, just as the seeds of a fruit are only found at its core. kulaputra, that tathagatagarbha is cold and unripe. It is the profound nirvananirvṛta that is brought about by Maha jnana (great wisdom). It is called the Samyak sambuddha (perfect Buddha), the Tathagata, the Arhat and so on. kulaputras, after the Tathagata has observed beings, he reveals this message in order to purify the bodhisattva mahasattva jnana."

and

I see the different beings with their many kleshad, transmigrating through the long night of endless samsara and I perceive that within their bodies is the wondrous Tathagatagarbha. They are august and pure and no different from myself. For this reason the Buddha expounds the Dharma for beings, that they might sever those kleshad and purify their Tathagata jnana. I turn the Dharmacakra again and again in order to convert all worlds."

Plenty more quotes if you need them..... Again you have not shown how there are 2 different Buddha Natures nor have you shown any difference between the Sutra and Tantra versions of Buddha Nature.

Malcolm wrote:

No, in these sutras it is made very clear that only buddhas can this, but in the tantras, ordinary persons can see the sugatagarbha, so the difference is huge.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 6:42 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Enlightenment/Dharmakaya is the same thing as the Buddha Nature..... I proved that in my last post to you.

BuddhaFollower said:

Do you understand that there are 2 Buddha Natures, sutric Buddha Nature and tantric Buddha Nature?

As Malcolm said:

Malcolm wrote:

There are two kinds of buddhanature, one as presented in sutra, another which is presented in the tantras. The sutrayāna version is often conflated with the way buddhanature is defined in tantra, especially in Dzogchen. In other words, the term "buddhanature" is used differently in sutra and tantra.

Son of Buddha said:

Got any actual proof for that statement?

What Sutra or Tantra literally says "There are 2 different kinds of Buddha Nature"?

Peace and Love

Malcolm wrote:

No sūtra or tantra says this. However, for example, the Mind Mirror of Vajrasattva Tantra states:

The sugatagarbha exists intrinsically in all sentient beings. That exists just as sesame seeds are permeated with oil. Its basis — it is based on the material aggregate. It's location — it is located in the center of the heart. Also that is called "the transcendent state of Samantabhadra's sealed locket". For example, like a sealed locket of leather, inside its location, from the center of a five colored light there exist peaceful kāyas the size of mustard grains in halos of light. That is the location of vidyā. For example, it is like form of a vase.

Here, it is said that sugatagarbha has a physical location in the body. So really, there is a difference in how this concept is used in sutra and in tantra.

There are other Dzogchen texts which indicate that sugatagarbha can be visibly seen with the eyes through various yogic techniques. This is really quite different than the way it is presented in sutra, won't you agree?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 6:34 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

You sure about that? Nirvana Sutra chapter 8

Malcolm wrote:

It is questionable whether there actually is a chapter 8 in the original Mahāyāna Parinirvana sūtra. The direct Tibetan translation from Sanskrit by Jinamitra, Jñānagarbha and Devacandra has only five chapters, in three thousand and nine hundred ślokas.

The version from Chinese is considerably longer, by an entire volume. I personally do not trust the long Chinese recension at all.

M

Son of Buddha said:

Hey believe what you want, I know people who think Vajrayana Tantra is a disgusting perversion of Buddhism in general so they are welcome to their opinions as are you.

Malcolm wrote:

It is not a question of "believing what I want," Stephen Hodge also has doubts about the veracity of later portions of the translation by Dharmakṣema. The version translated by Fa-hsien appears to be the original.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 5:21 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

You sure about that? Nirvana Sutra chapter 8

Malcolm wrote:

It is questionable whether there actually is a chapter 8 in the original Mahāyāna Parinirvana sūtra. The direct Tibetan translation from Sanskrit by Jinamitra, Jñānagarbha and Devacandra has only five chapters, in three thousand and nine hundred ślokas.

The version from Chinese is considerably longer, by an entire volume. I personally do not trust the long Chinese recension at all.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 2:07 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Son of Buddha said:

Malcolm

This is not the same text as Thurman's

Ah I see then it's a commentary of a commentary.

Question: Does the term Atman exist in the version of the text you are quoting?

Malcolm wrote:

Yes, where it is defined as svarupa.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 1:53 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

This quotation comes from Vasubandhu's own commentary on his Vijñapti-mātratā-siddhi Viṃśatikā, verse 10:

yo bālair dharmāṇāṃ svabhāvo grāhyagrāhakādiḥ parikalpitas tena kalpitenātmanā teṣāṃ nairātmyam, na tv anabhilāpyenātmanā yo buddhānāṃ viṣayaḥ.

"The own-nature of phenomena, consisting in graspable and grasper, as childish minds imagine it, that is the imaginary Self of phenomena; and it is through this imaginary Self that phenomena are without-self; but not by the ineffable Self which is the domain of the Buddhas."

Malcolm wrote:

Having clarified this, we can then see how best to understand the following statement:

Yogins do not know the inexpressible nature [atman] of their own or others' minds; when they know the dualistic part of their own apprehensions, seeming like their own minds and others' minds, they generate the concept, "My mind and the minds of others are known". However, in reality, they have not known the intrinsic nature [svarūpa] of their own and other's minds.

Son of Buddha said:

Your translations doesn't match up that well with Thurman's.

Malcolm wrote:

This is not the same text as thurman's

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 1:44 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Are all those citations from the Nikayas?

Malcolm wrote:

This is the question you asked:

Yes, so how does that citation support the statement "Buddhist tathata is freedom from extremes."?

I already told you that the Nikayas do not discuss the issue, so why would I bother trying to cite something it does not exist? Suchness is principally a Mahāyāna tenet.

However, the Advice to Katyāyana is an Agamic sūtra, and it one used frequently to demonstrate that Buddha taught freedom extremes in a limited way to the śrāvakas.

dzogchungpa said:

Very good, but the point is I was asking Sherlock to support his statement "Buddhist tathata is freedom from extremes." with a citation from the Nikayas, and you responded, presumably on his behalf, with the Katyāyana thing.

Malcolm wrote:

Which is from the nikayas...

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 1:35 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

Yes, so how does that citation support the statement "Buddhist tathata is freedom from extremes."?

Malcolm wrote:

Nāgārjuna cites this very passage in MMK 15 in order to demonstrate the truth the Buddha is speaking about:

Whoever sees inherent existence, dependent existence,
existence or non-existence,
they do not see the truth
in the Buddha's doctrine;
because the Bhagavan, explaining existence and non-existence,
also negates
both 'is' and 'is not'
in the Advice to Katyāyana.

The Ārya-pratyutpanna-buddhasaṃmukhāvasthitasamādhī-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:

One who understands suchness and the meaning of nonconceptuality as dharma, there is no proliferation in him.

Or the Vajrapadaśārasaṃgrahapañjikā:

Without proliferation from the beginning,
pure suchness is the nature of purity.

Or the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā:

If one knows how matter is, one knows in that way just how it is suchness, unmistaken suchness, unchanging, nonconceptual, signless, effortless, without proliferation and imperceptible.

or the Sūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya:

In that way, the dharma called "suchness" is truly beyond proliferation, intellectual debate and range of consciousness, and is explained as inconceivable because it cannot be conceived by the immature.

I could go on and on, but there is no need, right?

dzogchungpa said:
Are all those citations from the Nikayas?

Malcolm wrote:
This is the question you asked:
Yes, so how does that citation support the statement "Buddhist tathata is freedom from extremes."?
I already told you that the Nikayas do not discuss the issue, so why would I bother trying to cite something it does not exist? Suchness is principally a Mahāyāna tenet.

However, the Advice to Katyāyana is an Agamic sūtra, and it one used frequently to demonstrate that Buddha taught freedom extremes in a limited way to the śrāvakas.

Author: Malcolm
Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 1:29 AM
Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism
Content:
dzogchungpa said:
So your citation is?

Malcolm wrote:
As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One: "Lord, 'Right view, right view,' it is said. To what extent is there right view?"

"By & large, Kaccayana, this world is supported by (takes as its object) a polarity, that of existence & non-existence. But when one sees the origination of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'non-existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. When one sees the cessation of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one.
<http://www.accesstoinight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.015.than.html>

dzogchungpa said:
Yes, so how does that citation support the statement "Buddhist tathata is freedom from extremes."?

Malcolm wrote:
Nāgārjuna cites this very passage in MMK 15 in order to demonstrate the truth the Buddha is speaking about:
Whoever sees inherent existence, dependent existence,
existence or non-existence,
they do not see the truth
in the Buddha's doctrine;
because the Bhagavan, explaining existence and non-existence,
also negates
both 'is' and 'is not'

in the Advice to Katyāyana.

The Ārya-pratyutpanna-buddhasaṃmukhāvasthitasamādhī-nāma-mahāyāna-sūtra:
One who understands suchness and the meaning of nonconceptuality as dharma, there is no proliferation in him.

Or the Vajrapadaśārasaṃgrahapañjikā:

Without proliferation from the beginning,
pure suchness is the nature of purity.

Or the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā:

If one knows how matter is, one knows in that way just how it is suchness, unmistaken suchness, unchanging, nonconceptual, signless, effortless, without proliferation and imperceptible.

Or the Sūtrālamkāravṛttibhāṣya:

In that way, the dharma called "suchness" is truly beyond proliferation, intellectual debate and the range of consciousness, and is explained as inconceivable because it cannot be conceived by the immature.

I could go on and on, but there is no need, right?

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 12:58 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

dzogchungpa said:

So your citation is?

Malcolm wrote:

As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One: "Lord, 'Right view, right view,' it is said. To what extent is there right view?"

"By & large, Kaccayana, this world is supported by (takes as its object) a polarity, that of existence & non-existence. But when one sees the origination of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'non-existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. When one sees the cessation of the world as it actually is with right discernment, 'existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one.

<http://www.accesstoinsight.org/tipitaka/sn/sn12/sn12.015.than.html>

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 12:56 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Malcolm wrote:

... suchness is merely the emptiness of all phenomena, nothing more or less.

dzogchungpa said:

The book appears to be based primarily on the Nikayas. Can you provide a citation from the Nikayas for this?

Malcolm wrote:

"Suchness", tattva, is not really a word used much in the Agamas, where it does occur, it refers to nirvana.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Sunday, May 3rd, 2015 at 12:33 AM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

Malcolm - But this is not a self that is separate from the aggregates, nor is it a self apart from what is wrongly identified as a self. This is no more controversial than when Candrakīrti states that absence of nature is the nature of all things.

Quite so, in which case, if this is Bhattacharya's approach, then the only new wrinkle from him would be the nature of the Hindu Atman. If it is identical to tathata or Suchness, then Buddhists have misunderstood or misconstrued the Hindu Atman for a long time.

Malcolm wrote:

But it isn't, since suchness is merely the emptiness of all phenomena, nothing more or less.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 9:40 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

Will said:

So Malcolm, Vasubandhu or Thurman needs more interpretation here, in Sutralamkara 9:23:

Supreme selflessness is completely pure suchness, and that is a buddha's "self," in the sense of "intrinsic reality."

You may be, as other critics are, assuming that Bhattacharya's Atmic 'self' is a glorified version of our ordinary 'self'. I do not know yet, because I have not read the book. But Vasubandhu above and the Avatamsaka Sutra, among others, makes it clear that our true nature lacks nature (svabhava or svarupa). Since that true nature is real, then it can be thought of as a True self, with emphasis on True, not self.

Malcolm wrote:

Sthiramati clarifies the above:

ཞེས་བྱ་བའི་བདག་གི་སྒྲིལ་འདིའི་སྐབས་སུ་ངོ་བོ་ཉིད་ཀྱི་དོན་ལ་བྱ་སྟེ། སངས་རྒྱལ་རྣམས་བདག་མེད་པའི་ངོ་བོ་ཉིད་ཏུ་གྱུར་པས་བདག་གི་མཆོག་ཐོབ་པ་ཡིན་ནི་ཞེས་བྱ་བའི་དོན་ཏེ།
"The term "self" in this context means "svabhava", i.e., it means "since the Buddhas become the nature of selflessness, they obtain the supreme self."

But this is not a self that is separate from the aggregates, nor is it a self apart from what is wrongly identified as a self. This is no more controversial than when Candrakīrti states that absence of nature is the nature of all things.

M

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 8:47 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

When I posed this question to ChNN he said the former is the exhaustion of karma and the latter results in the body of light. The implication is that togal has a higher result re immortal nirmanakaya of light.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Sachen, the result of the completion stage is that the physical body reverts to wisdom. There is no difference in the results at all; the path is the only difference.

Crazywisdom said:

I still feel the inner yanas might be a higher view, path and result, bc of the way five lights manifest beyond volition. but also bc guhyagarbha has these two stages of completion w Mahamudra preceding clear light.

Malcolm wrote:

"Inner yānas" thinking only applies to Nyingma tantras. It is not relevant to gsar ma. One cannot fit Hevajra, Cakrasamvara, etc., into the Nyingma classification scheme (which never existed in India in any case).

In any case, wisdom is wisdom. The fact that the body reverts to wisdom is the identical in both systems.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 8:09 PM

Title: Re: Rainbow Body - Why?

Content:

Crazywisdom said:

When I posed this question to ChNN he said the former is the exhaustion of karma and the latter results in the body of light. The implication is that togal has a higher result re immortal nirmanakaya of light.

Malcolm wrote:

According to Sachen, the result of the completion stage is that the physical body reverts to wisdom. There is no difference in the results at all; the path is the only difference.

Author: Malcolm

Date: Saturday, May 2nd, 2015 at 8:03 PM

Title: Re: The Ātman-Brahman in Ancient Buddhism

Content:

David Reigle said:

While it is a bit premature for me to engage in an academic discussion of a book that can hardly have yet been read by others (unless one reads French), I will nonetheless provide a quotation from it (p. 33) as an example. This quotation comes from Vasubandhu's own commentary on his Vijñapti-mātratā-siddhi Viṃśatikā, verse 10:

yo bālair dharmāṇāṃ svabhāvo grāhyagrāhakādiḥ parikalpitas tena kalpitenātmanā teṣāṃ nairātmyam, na tv anabhilāpyenātmanā yo buddhānāṃ viṣayaḥ.

"The own-nature of phenomena, consisting in graspable and grasper, as childish minds imagine it, that is the imaginary Self of phenomena; and it is through this imaginary Self that phenomena are without-self; but not by the ineffable Self which is the domain of the Buddhas."

Vasubandhu, at least, here accepted an ineffable (anabhilāpya) ātman that is the domain (viṣaya) of the Buddhas. This he distinguished from the absence of self (nairātmya) in phenomena (dharma-s).

Yes, this is the same Vasubandhu who earlier wrote a supplementary chapter to his Abhidharma-kośa on the person (pudgala). This supplementary chapter, chapter 9, is one of the strongest statements of anātman and one of the most sustained arguments against the ātman to be found anywhere in the Buddhist writings. It is for reasons like this that Bhattacharya in his book stresses the need to ask "which ātman?" is being referred to in any Buddhist statement about the ātman.

Malcolm wrote:

In order to understand that Vasubandhu is trying to at here, however, one needs to consult Vinitadeva's subcommentary, the Prakaraṇa viṃśatikāṭikā:

...བཟོད་དུ་མེད་པའི་བདག་ཉིད་ཀྱིས་ཞེས་བྱ་བ་ནི་བཟོད་པར་མི་རྣམས་པར་རང་གི་ངོ་བོས་ཞེས་བྱ་བའི་ཐ་ཆིག་གོ

Thus "the inexpressible atman" turns out to mean "...a term for an intrinsic nature [རང་གི་ངོ་བོ, svarūpa] that cannot be expressed."

Having clarified this, we can then see how best to understand the following statement:

རྣམས་འཕྱོར་པས་རང་གི་སེམས་དང་གཞན་གྱི་སེམས་བཟོད་དུ་མེད་པའི་བདག་ཉིད་ཀྱི་མ་རིག་སྟེ།
དེ་དག་རང་གི་གཟུང་བའི་ཆ་གཉིས་རང་དང་གཞན་གྱི་སེམས་སྒྲ་བྱུར་རིག་པ་ན་རང་དང་གཞན་གྱི་སེམས་རིག་གོ་ཞེས་རྟོག་པར་བྱེད་གྱི།
ཡང་དག་པའི་དོན་དུ་ན་རང་དང་གཞན་གྱི་སེམས་ཀྱི་རང་གི་ངོ་བོ་ལ་ནི་མ་རིག་གོ།

Yogins do not know the inexpressible nature [atman] of their own or others' minds; when they know the dualistic part of their own apprehensions, seeming like their own minds and others' minds, they generate the concept, "My mind and the minds of others are known". However, in reality, they have not known the intrinsic nature [svarūpa] of their own and other's minds.

Thus, I think it is very hasty to presume that Vasubandhu's Viṃśatikāvṛtti can be used to justify an upanishadic-like self in Buddhadharmā. This text in turn needs to be read in light of Vinitadeva's subcommentary, which clarifies what Vasubandhu is saying very clearly.

Without consulting Indian commentaries that may only exist in Tibetan, it is very hard to get a handle on Indian Buddhist texts when read through the eyes people who are expert mainly in Upanishadic, Vedic, and other non-Buddhist literature in Sanskrit.

Also, one needs to look and see what Xuan Tshang says about this passage and so on.